THis is clear both by what hath bin ſaid, and by that which Origen relates of certain Biſhops in his time, Homil. 7. in Matth. I know ſome, ſaith he, which are over Churches, who without Scripture have permitted the Wife to marry while her former Husband liv'd. And did this againſt Scripture, which ſaith, The Wife is bound to her Husband ſo long as he lives; and ſhe ſhall be call'd an adultreſs, if, her Husband living, ſhe take another Man; yet did they not permit this without cauſe, perhaps for the infirmity of ſuch as had not continence, they permitted evil to avoid worſe. Ye ſee Origen and the Doctors of his Age, not without all cauſe, permitted Women after Divorce to marry, though their former Husbands were living; yet writes that they permitted againſt Scripture. But what cauſe could they have to do ſo, unleſs they thought our Saviour in his precepts of Divorce had ſo forbid'n, as willing to remit ſuch perfection to his weaker ones, caſt into danger of worſe faults?

The ſame thought Leo, Biſhop of Rome, Ep. 85. to the African Biſhops of Mauritania Cæſarienſis, wherin complaining of a certain Prieſt who divorcing his Wife, or being divorc'd by her, as other copies have it, had married another, neither diſſolves the Matrimony, nor excommunicates him, only unprieſts him. The Fathers therfore, as we ſee, did not ſimply and wholly condemn Marriage after Divorce.

But as for me, this remitting of our Saviour's precepts, which theſe Ancients allow to the infirm in marrying after Vow and Divorce, I can in no ways admit; for what ſo ever plainly conſents not with the Commandment, cannot, I am certain, be permitted, or ſuffer'd in any Chriſtian: for heav'n and earth ſhall paſs away, but not a tittle from the Commands of God among them who expect life eternal. Let us therfore conſider, and waigh the words of our Lord concerning Marriage and Divorce, which he pronounc't both by himſelf, and by his Apoſtle, and let us compare them with other Oracles of God; for whatſoever is contrary to theſe, I ſhall not perſuade the leaſt tolerating thereof. But if it can be taught to agree with the Word of God, yea to be commanded that moſt men may have permiſſion giv'n them to divorce and marry again, I muſt prefer the Autority of God's Word before the Opinion of Fathers and Doctors, as they themſelves teach.

CHAP. XXV.

The words of our Lord, and of the Holy Ghoſt, by the Apoſtle Paul concerning Divorce, are explain'd.

BUT the words of our Lord and of the Holy Ghoſt, out of which Auſtin and ſome others of the Fathers think it concluded that our Saviour forbids Marriage after any Divorce, are theſe; Mat. 5. 31, 32. It hath bin ſaid, &c. And Mat. 19. 7. They ſay unto him, why did Moſes then command? &c. And Mark 10. and Luke 16. Rom. 7. 1, 2, 3. 1 Cor. 7. 10, 11. Hence therfore they conclude that all Marriage after Divorce is call'd Adultery; which to commit, being no ways to be tolerated in any Chriſtian, they think it follows that ſecond marriage is in no caſe to be permitted either to the Divorcer, or to the Divorced.

The 1. axiom that Chriſt could not condemn of Adultery that which he once commanded.

But that it may be more fully and plainly perceiv'd what force is in this kind of reaſoning, it will be the beſt cours to lay down certain grounds wherof no Chriſtian can doubt the truth. Firſt, it is a wickednes to ſuſpect that our Saviour branded that for Adultery, which himſelf, in his own Law which he came to fulfil and not to diſſolve, did not only permit, but alſo command; for by him the only Mediator, was the whole Law of God giv'n. But that by this Law of God Marriage was permitted after any divorce, is certain by Deut. 24. 1.

CHAP. XXVI.

That God in his Law did not only grant, but alſo command Divorce to certain men.

DEut. 24. 1. When a man hath taken a wife, &c. But in Mal. 2. 15, 16. is read the Lord's command to put her away whom a man hates, in theſe words: Take heed to your ſpirit, and let none deal injuriouſly againſt the wife of his youth. If he hate, let him put away, ſaith the Lord God of Iſrael. And he ſhall hide thy violence with his garment, that marries her divorc't by thee, ſaith the Lord of hoſts; but take heed to your ſpirit, and do no injury. By theſe Teſtimonies of the divine Law, we ſee that the Lord did not only permit, but alſo expreſly and earneſtly commanded his people, by whom he would that all holineſs and faith of Marriage-cov'nant ſhould be obſerved, that he who could not induce his mind to love his wife with a true conjugal love, might diſmiſs her that ſhe might marry to another.

CHAP. XXVII.

That what the Lord permitted and commanded to his ancient people concerning Divorce, belongs alſo to Chriſtians.

NOW what the Lord permitted to his firſt-born people, that certainly he could not forbid to his own among the Gentiles, whom he made coheirs and into one body with his people; nor could he ever permit, much leſs command ought that was not good for them, at leaſt ſo us'd as he commanded. For being God, he is not chang'd as Man. Which thing who ſeriouſly conſiders, how can he imagine that God would make that wicked to them that believe, and ſerv him under Grace, which he granted and commanded to them that ſerv'd him under the Law? Whenas the ſame cauſes require the ſame permiſſion. And who that knows but humane matters, and loves the truth, will deny that many Marriages hang as ill together now, as ever they did among the Jews? So that ſuch Marriages are liker to torments than true Marriages. As therfore the Lord doth always ſuccor and help the oppreſſed, ſo he would ever have it provided for injur'd husbands and wives, that under pretence of the marriage-bond, they be not ſold to perpetual vexations, inſtead of the loving and comfortable marriage-duties. And laſtly, as God doth always deteſt hypocriſie and fraud, ſo neither doth he approve that among his people, that ſhould be counted marriage, wherin none of thoſe duties remain, wherby the league of wedlock is chiefly preſerv'd. What inconſiderate neglect then of God's Law is this, that I may not call it worſe, to hold that Chriſt our Lord would not grant the ſame remedies both of divorce and ſecond marriage to the weak, or to the evil, if they will needs have it ſo, but eſpecially to the innocent and wronged, whenas the ſame urgent cauſes remain as before, when the diſcipline of the Church and Magiſtrate hath try'd what may be try'd.

CHAP. XXVIII.

That our Lord Chriſt intended not to make new Laws of Marriage and Divorce, or of any civil matters.

Axiom 2.

IT is agreed by all who determin of the Kingdom and Offices of Chriſt by the holy Scriptures, as all godly men ought to do, that our Saviour upon earth took not on him either to give new Laws in civil affairs, or to change the old. But it is certain that Matrimony and Divorce are civil things. Which the Chriſtian Emperors knowing, gave conjugal Laws, and reſerv'd the adminiſtration of them to thir own Courts; which no true ancient Biſhop ever condemn'd.

Our Saviour came to preach Repentance and Remiſſion; ſeeing therfore thoſe who put away thir wives without any juſt cauſe, were not toucht with conſcience of the ſin, through miſunderſtanding of the Law, he recall'd them to a right interpretation, and taught that the woman in the beginning was ſo joyn'd to the man, that there ſhould be a perpetual union both in body and ſpirit: where this is not, the matrimony is already broke, before there be yet any divorce made or ſecond marriage.

CHAP. XXIX.

That it is wicked to ſtrain the words of Chriſt beyond thir purpoſe.

This is his third Axiom, wherof there needs no explication here.

CHAP. XXX.

That all places of Scripture about the ſame thing are to be joyn'd, and compar'd, to avoid Contradictions.

Axiom 4.

This he demonſtrates at large out of ſundry places in the Goſpel, and principally by that precept againſt ſwearing, which compar'd with many places of the Law and Prophets, is a flat contradiction of them all, if we follow ſuperſtitiouſly the letter. Then having repeated briefly his four Axioms, he thus proceeds.

Mat. 5. 34.

Theſe things thus preadmoniſht, let us enquire what the undoubted meaning is of our Saviour's words, and enquire according to the rule which is obſerv'd by all learned and good men in thir expoſitions; that praying firſt to God, who is the only opener of our hearts, we may firſt with fear and reverence conſider well the words of our Saviour touching this queſtion. Next, that we may compare them with all other places of Scripture treating of this matter, to ſee how they conſent with our Saviour's words, and thoſe of his Apoſtle.

CHAP. XXXI.

This Chapter diſputes againſt Auſtin and the Papiſts, who deny ſecond marriage ev'n to them who divorce in caſe of Adultery; which becauſe it is not controverted among true Proteſtants, but that the innocent perſon is eaſily allow'd to marry, I ſpare the tranſlating.

CHAP. XXXII.

That a manifeſt Adultreſs ought to be divorc't, and cannot lawfully be retain'd in marriage by any true Chriſtian.

This though he prove ſufficiently, yet I let paſs, becauſe this queſtion was not handled in the Doctrin and Diſciplin of Divorce; to which book I bring ſo much of this Treatiſe as runs parallel.

That Adultery is to be puniſht by death.

This Chapter alſo I omit for the reaſon laſt alleg'd.

This is generally granted, and therfore excuſes me the writing out.

CHAP. XXXV.

Places in the Writings of the Apoſtle Paul touching Divorce explain'd.

LET us conſider the anſwers of the Lord giv'n by the Apoſtle ſeverally. Concerning the firſt, which is Rom. 7. 1. Know ye not, brethren, for I ſpeak to them that know the law, &c. Ver. 2. The woman is bound by the law to her husband ſo long as he liveth. Here it is certain that the Holy Ghoſt had no purpoſe to determin ought of marriage, or divorce, but only to bring an example from the common and ordinary law of Wedloc, to ſhew that as no covenant holds either party being dead, ſo now that we are not bound to the law, but to Chriſt our Lord, ſeeing that through him we are dead to ſin, and to the law; and ſo joyn'd to Chriſt that we may bring forth fruit in him from a willing godlines, and not by the compulſion of law, wherby our ſins are more excited, and become more violent. What therfore the holy Spirit here ſpeaks of matrimony, cannot be extended beyond the general rule.

Beſides it is manifeſt, that the Apoſtle did allege the law of Wedloc, as it was deliver'd to the Jews; for, ſaith he, I ſpeak to them that know the law. They knew no law of God but that of Moſes, which plainly grants divorce for ſeveral reaſons. It cannot therfore be ſaid that the Apoſtle cited this general example out of the law, to aboliſh the ſeveral exceptions of that law, which God himſelf granted by giving autority to divorce.

Next, when the Apoſtle brings an example out of God's law concerning man and wife, it muſt be neceſſary that we underſtand ſuch for man and wife, as are ſo indeed according to the ſame law of God; that is, who are ſo diſpos'd as that they are both willing and able to perform the neceſſary duties of marriage; not thoſe who under a falſe title of marriage, keep themſelves mutually bound to injuries and diſgraces; for ſuch twain are nothing leſs than lawful man and wife.

The like anſwer is to be giv'n to all the other places both of the Goſpel and the Apoſtle, that whatever exception may be prov'd out of God's law, be not excluded from thoſe places. For the Spirit of God doth not condemn things formerly granted and allowed, where there is like cauſe and reaſon. Hence Ambroſe upon that place, 1 Cor. 7. 15. A brother or a ſiſter is not under bondage in ſuch caſes, thus expounds; The reverence of marriage is not due to him who abhors the author of marriage; nor is that marriage ratify'd which is without devotion to God: he ſins not therfore who is put away for God's cauſe, though he joyn himſelf to another. For the diſhonour of the Creator diſſolves the right of matrimony to him who is deſerted, that he be not accus'd, though marrying to another. The faith of wedloc is not to be kept with him who departs, that he might not hear the God of Chriſtians to be the author of wedloc. For if Ezra caus'd the misbelieving wives and husbands to be divorc't, that God might be appeas'd, and not offended, though they took others of thir own faith, how much more more ſhall it be free, if the misbeliever depart to marry one of our own Religion. For this is not to be counted matrimony which is againſt the law of God.

Two things are here to be obſerv'd toward the following diſcourſe, which truth it ſelf, and the force of Gods word hath drawn from this holy man. For thoſe words are very large, Matrimony is not ratiſy'd without devotion to God. And the diſhonour of the Creator diſſolvs the right of matrimony. For devotion is far off, and diſhonour is done to God by all who perſiſt in any wickednes and hainous crime.

CHAP. XXXVI.

That although it ſeem in the Goſpel, as if our Saviour granted Divorce only for Adultery, yet in very deed he granted it for other cauſes alſo.

NOW is to be dealt with this queſtion, Whether it be lawful to divorce and marry again for other cauſes beſides adultery, ſince our Saviour expreſt that only? To this queſtion, if we retain our principles already laid, and muſt acknowledg it to be a curſed blaſphemy, if we ſay that the words of God do contradict one another, of neceſſity we muſt confeſs that our Lord did grant divorce, and marriage after that, for other cauſes beſides adultery, notwithſtanding what he ſaid in Matthew. For firſt, they who conſider but only that place, 1 Cor. 7. which treats of believers and misbelievers matcht together, muſt of force confeſs, That our Lord granted juſt divorce, and ſecond marriage in the cauſe of deſertion, which is other than the cauſe of fornication. And if there be one other cauſe found lawful, then is it moſt true that divorce was granted not only for fornication.

Next, it cannot be doubted, as I ſhew'd before, by them to whom it is giv'n to know God and his judgments out of his own word, but that, what means of peace and ſafety God ever granted and ordain'd to his elected people, the ſame he grants and ordains to men of all ages who have equally need of the ſame remedies. And who, that is but a knowing man, dares ſay there be not husbands and wives now to be found in ſuch a hardneſs of heart, that they will not perform either conjugal affection, or any requiſite duty therof, though it be moſt deſerv'd at thir hands?

Neither can any one defer to confeſs, but that God whoſe property it is to judg the cauſe of them that ſuffer injury, hath provided for innocent and honeſt perſons wedded, how they might free themſelves by lawful means of Divorce, from the bondage and iniquity of thoſe who are falſly term'd thir husbands or thir wives. This is cleer out of Deut. 24. 1. Malach. 2. Matth. 19. 1 Cor. 7. and out of thoſe principles which the Scripture every where teaches, That God changes not his mind, diſſents not from himſelf, is no accepter of perſons; but allows the ſame remedies to all men oppreſt with the ſame neceſſities and infirmities; yea, requires that we ſhould uſe them. This he will eaſily perceive, who conſiders theſe things in the Spirit of the Lord.

Laſtly, it is moſt certain, that the Lord hath commanded us to obey the civil Laws every one of his own Commonwealth, if they be not againſt the Laws of God.

CHAP. XXXVII.

For what cauſes Divorce is permitted by the civil Law ex l. Conſenſu Codic. de repudiis.

IT is alſo manifeſt that the Law of Thedoſius and Valentinian, which begins Conſenſu, &c. touching Divorce, and many other decrees of pious Emperours agreeing herwith, are not contrary to the word of God; and therfore may be recall'd into uſe by any Chriſtian Prince or Commonwealth, nay ought to be with due reſpect had to every nation. For whatſoever is equal and juſt, that in every thing is to be ſought and us'd by Chriſtians. Hence it is plain that Divorce is granted by divine approbation, both to husbands and to wives, if either party can convict the other of theſe following offences before the Magiſtrate.

If the husband can prove the wife to be an Adultereſs, a Witch, a Murdreſs, to have bought or ſold to ſlavery any one free born, to have violated Sepulchers, committed ſacrilege, favor'd theevs and robbers, deſirous of feaſting with ſtrangers, the husband not knowing, or not willing, if ſhe lodg forth without a juſt and probable cauſe, or frequent theaters and ſights, he forbidding, if ſhe be privie with thoſe that plot againſt the State, or if ſhe deal falſly, or offer blows. And if the wife can prove her husband guilty of any thoſe forenamed crimes, and frequent the company of lewd women in her ſight; or if he beat her, ſhe had the like liberty to quit her ſelf; with this difference, that the man after Divorce might forthwith marry again; the woman not till a year after, leſt ſhe might chance to have conceav'd.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

An expoſition of thoſe places wherin God declares the nature of holy Wedloc.

NOW to the end it may be ſeen that this agrees with the divine law, the firſt inſtitution of Marriage is to be conſider'd, and thoſe texts in which God eſtabliſht the joyning of male and female, and deſcrib'd the duties of them both. When God had determin'd to make woman, and give her as a wife to man, he ſpake thus, Gen. 2. 18. It is not good for man to be alone, I will make him a help meet for him. And Adam ſaid, but in the Spirit of God, v. 23, 24. This is now bone of my bone, and fleſh of my fleſh. Therefore ſhall a man leav his father and mother, and ſhall cleav to his wife, and they ſhall be one fleſh.

To this firſt inſtitution did Chriſt recal his own; when anſwering the Phariſees, he condemn'd the licence of unlawful Divorce. He taught therfore by his example, that we, according to this firſt inſtitution, and what God hath ſpok'n therof, ought to determin what kind of cov'nant Marriage is, how to be kept, and how far; and laſtly, for what cauſes to be diſſolv'd. To which decrees of God theſe alſo are to be joyn'd, which the holy Ghoſt hath taught by his Apoſtle, that neither the Husband nor the Wife hath power of thir own body, but mutually each of eithers. That the husband ſhall love the wife as his own body, yea as Chriſt loves his Church; and that the wife ought to be ſubject to her husband, as the Church is to Chriſt.

By theſe things the nature of holy Wedloc is certainly known; wherof if only one be wanting in both or either party, and that either by obſtinate malevolence, or too deep inbred weaknes of mind, or laſtly, through incurable impotence of Body, it cannot then be ſaid that the cov'nant of matrimony holds good between ſuch; if we mean that cov'nant which God inſtituted and call'd Marriage, and that wherof only it muſt be underſtood that our Saviour ſaid, Thoſe whom God hath joyn'd, let no man ſeparate.

And hence is concluded, that matrimony requires continual cohabitation and living together, unleſs the calling of God be otherwiſe evident; which union if the parties themſelves diſjoyn either by mutual conſent, or one againſt the others will depart, the Marriage is then brok'n. Wherin the Papiſts, as in other things, oppoſe themſelves againſt God; while they ſeparate for many cauſes from bed and board, and yet will have the bond of matrimony remain, as if this cov'nant could be other then the conjunction and communion not only of bed and board, but of all other loving and helpful duties. This we may ſee in theſe words; I will make him a help meet for him; bone of his bones, and fleſh of his fleſh: for this cauſe ſhall he leav father and mother, and cleav to his wife, and they twain ſhall be one fleſh. By which words who diſcerns not, that God requires of them both ſo to live together, and to be united not only in body but in mind alſo, with ſuch an affection as none may be dearer and more ardent among all the relations of Mankind, nor of more efficacy to the mutual offices of love, and loyalty. They muſt communicate and conſent in all things both divine and human, which have any moment to well and happy living. The wife muſt honour and obey her husband, as the Church honours and obeys Chriſt her head. The husband muſt love and cheriſh his wife, as Chriſt his Church. Thus they muſt be to each other, if they will be true man and wife in the ſight of God, whom certainly the Churches ought to follow in thir judgment. Now the proper and ultimate end of Marriage is not copulation, or children, for then there was not true matrimony between Joſeph and Mary the mother of Chriſt, nor between many holy perſons more; but the full and proper and main end of Marriage, is the communicating of all duties, both divine and human, each to other with utmoſt benevolence and affection.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXXIX.

The properties of a true and Chriſtian Marriage more diſtinctly repeated.

BY which definition we may know that God eſteems and reckons upon theſe four neceſſary properties to be in every true Marriage. 1. That they ſhould live together, unleſs the calling of God require otherwiſe for a time. 2. That they ſhould love one another to the height of dearnes, and that in the Lord, and in the communion of true Religion. 3. That the huſband bear himſelf as the head and preſerver of his wife, inſtructing her to all godlineſs and integrity of life; that the wife alſo be to her huſband a help, according to her place, eſpecially furdering him in the true worſhip of God, and next in all the occaſions of civil life. And 4. That they defraud not each other of conjugal benevolence, as the Apoſtle commands, 1 Cor. 7. Hence it follows, according to the ſentence of God, which all Chriſtians ought to be rul'd by, that between thoſe who either through obſtinacy, or helples inability, cannot or will not perform theſe repeated duties, between thoſe there can be no true matrimony, nor ought they to be counted man and wife.

CHAP. XL.

Whether thoſe Crimes recited Chap. 37. out of the Civil Law, diſſolv Matrimony in God's account.

NOW if a huſband or wife be found guilty of any thoſe crimes, which by the Law conſenſu are made cauſes of Divorce, 'tis manifeſt that ſuch a man cannot be the head and preſerver of his wife, nor ſuch a woman be a meet help to her huſband, as the divine Law in true Wedloc requires; for theſe faults are puniſht either by death, or deportation, or extream infamy, which are directly oppoſite to the cov'nant of Marriage. If they deſerve death, as Adultery and the like, doubtleſs God would not that any ſhould live in Wedloc with them whom he would not have to live at all. Or if it be not death, but the incurring of notorious infamy, certain it is neither juſt, nor expedient, nor meet that an honeſt man ſhould be coupled with an infamous woman, nor an honeſt matron with an infamous man. The wiſe Roman Princes had ſo great regard to the equal honour of either wedded perſon, that they counted thoſe Marriages of no force which were made between the one of good repute, and the other of evil note. How much more will all honeſt regard of Chriſtian expedience and comlines beſeem and concern thoſe who are ſet free and dignify'd in Chriſt, then it could the Roman Senate, or their ſons, for whom that Law was provided?

And this all godly men will ſoon apprehend, that he who ought to be the head and preſerver not only of his wife, but alſo of his children and family, as Chriſt is of his Church, had need be one of honeſt name: ſo likewiſe the wife, which is to be the meet help of an honeſt and good man, the mother of an honeſt off-ſpring and family. The glory of the man, ev'n as the man is the glory of Chriſt, ſhould not be tainted with ignominy; as neither of them can avoid to be, having bin juſtly appeacht of thoſe forenamed crimes; and therfore cannot be worthy to hold thir place in a Chriſtian family: yea they themſelves turn out themſelves and diſſolv that holy covenant. And they who are true brethren and ſiſters in the Lord, are no more in bondage to ſuch violaters of Marriage.

But heer the patrons of wickedneſs and diſſolvers of Chriſtian diſciplin will object, that it is the part of man and wife to bear one anothers croſs, whether in calamity, or infamy, that they might gain each other, if not to a good name, yet to repentance and amendment. But they who thus object, ſeek the impunity of wickednes, and the favour of wicked men, not the duties of true charity; which prefers public honeſty before private intereſt, and had rather the remedies of wholſom puniſhment appointed by God ſhould be in uſe, then that by remiſneſs, the licence of evil doing ſhould encreaſe. For if they who by committing ſuch offences, have made void the holy knot of Marriage, be capable of repentance, they will be ſooner mov'd when due puniſhment is executed on them, then when it is remitted.

We muſt ever beware, leſt in contriving what will be beſt for the ſouls health of Delinquents, we make our ſelvs wiſer and diſcreeter than God. He that religiouſly waighs his Oracles concerning Marriage, cannot doubt that they who have committed the foreſaid tranſgreſſions, have loſt the right of Matrimony, and are unworthy to hold thir dignity in an honeſt and Chriſtian family.

But if any huſband or wife ſee ſuch ſigns of repentance in thir tranſgreſſor, as that they doubt not to regain them by continuing with them, and partaking of thir miſeries and attaintures, they may be left to thir own hopes, and thir own mind, ſaving ever the right of Church and Commonwealth, that it receive no ſcandal by the neglect of due ſeverity, and thir children no harm by this invitation to licence, and want of good education.

From all theſe conſiderations, if they be thought on, as in the preſence of God, and out of his word, any one may perceav, who deſires to determine of theſe things by the Scripture, that thoſe cauſes of lawful divorce, which the moſt religious Emperors Theodoſius and Valentinian ſet forth in the forecited place, are according to the law of God, and the prime inſtitution of Marriage. And were ſtill more and more ſtraitn'd, as the Church and State of the Empire ſtill more and more corrupted and degenerated. Therfore pious Princes and Commonwealths both may and ought eſtabliſh them again, if they have a mind to reſtore the honour, ſanctity, and religion of holy wedloc to thir people, and diſentangle many conſciences from a miſerable and perilous condition, to a chaſte and honeſt life.

To thoſe recited cauſes wherfore a wife might ſend a divorce to her huſband, Juſtinian added four more, Conſtit. 117. And four more, for which a man might put away his wife. Three other cauſes were added in the Code de repudiis, l. Jubemus. All which cauſes are ſo clearly contrary to the firſt intent of marriage, that they plainly diſſolv it. I ſet them not down, being eaſie to be found in the body of the civil Law.

It was permitted alſo by Chriſtian Emperors, that they who would divorce by mutual conſent, might without impediment. Or if there were any difficulty at all in it, the law expreſſes the reaſon, that it was only in favour of the children; ſo that if there were none, the law of thoſe godly Emperors made no other difficulty of a divorce by conſent. Or if any were minded without conſent of the other to divorce, and without thoſe cauſes which have been nam'd, the Chriſtian Emperors laid no other puniſhment upon them, then that the Huſband wrongfully divorcing his Wife, ſhould give back her dowry, and the uſe of that which was call'd Donatio propter nuptias; or if there were no dowry nor no donation, that he ſhould then give her the fourth part of his goods. The like penalty was inflicted on the wife departing without juſt cauſe. But that they who were once married, ſhould be compell'd to remain ſo ever againſt thir wills, was not exacted. Wherin thoſe pious Princes follow'd the Law of God in Deut. 24. 1. and his expreſs charge by the Prophet Malachy to diſmiſs from him the wife whom he hates. For God never meant in marriage to give to man a perpetual torment inſtead of a meet help. Neither can God approve that to the violation of this holy league (which is violated as ſoon as true affection ceaſes and is loſt) ſhould be added murder, which is already committed by either of them who reſolvedly hates the other, as I ſhew'd out of 1 John 15. Whoſo hateth his brother, is a murderer.

CHAP. XLI.

Whether the Huſband or Wife deſerted may marry to another.

THE wifes deſertion of her huſband the Chriſtian Emperors plainly decreed to be a juſt cauſe of divorce, whenas they granted him the right therof, if ſhe had but lain out one night againſt his will without probable cauſe. But of the man deſerting his wife they did not ſo determin: Yet if we look into the word of God, we ſhall find, that he who though but for a year without juſt cauſe forſakes his wife, and neither provides for her maintenance, nor ſignifies his purpoſe of returning, and good will towards her, whenas he may, hath forfeited his right in her ſo forſak'n. For the Spirit of God ſpeaks plainly, that both man and wife hath ſuch power over one anothers perſon, as that they cannot deprive each other of living together, but by conſent, and for a time.

Hither may be added that the holy Spirit grants deſertion to be a cauſe of Divorce, in thoſe anſwers giv'n to the Corinthians concerning a brother or ſiſter deſerted by a miſbeleever. If he depart, let him depart, a brother or a ſiſter is not under bondage in ſuch caſes. In which words, who ſees not that the Holy Ghoſt openly pronounc't; that the party without cauſe deſerted, is not bound for anothers wilful deſertion?

But ſom will ſay, that this is ſpok'n of a miſ-beleever departing. But I beſeech ye, doth not he reject the faith of Chriſt in his deeds, who raſhly breaks the holy Covnant of Wedloc inſtituted by God? and beſides this the holy Spirit does not make the miſ-beleeving of him who departs, but the departing of him who miſbeleevs, to be the juſt cauſe of freedom to the brother or ſiſter.

Since therfore it will be agreed among Chriſtians, that they who depart from Wedloc without juſt cauſe, do not only deny the faith of matrimony, but of Chriſt alſo, what ever they profeſs with their mouths, it is but reaſon to conclude, that the party deſerted is not bound in caſe of cauſleſs deſertion, but that he may lawfully ſeek another conſort, if it be needful to him, toward a pure and blameles converſation.

CHAP. XLII.

That impotence of Body, Leproſie, Madnes, &c. are juſt cauſes of Divorce

OF this, becauſe it was not diſputed in the doctrin and diſciplin of Divorce, him that would know furder I commend to the Latin original.

CHAP. XLIII.

That to grant Divorce for all the cauſes which have bin hitherto brought, diſagrees not from the words of Chriſt naming only the cauſe of Adultery.

NOW we muſt ſee how theſe things can ſtand with the words of our Saviour, who ſeems directly to forbid all Divorce except it be for Adultery. To the underſtanding wherof, we muſt ever remember this: That in the words of our Saviour there can be no contrariety: That his words and anſwers are not to be ſtretcht beyond the queſtion propos'd: That our Saviour did not there purpoſe to treat of all the cauſes for which it might be lawful to divorce and marry again; for then that in the Corinthians of marrying again without guilt of adultery could not be added. That it is not good for that man to be alone, who hath not the ſpecial gift from above. That it is good for every ſuch one to be married, that he may ſhun Fornication.

With regard to theſe principles, let us ſee what our Lord anſwer'd to the tempting Phariſees about Divorce, and ſecond Marriage, and how far his anſwer doth extend.

Firſt, no man who is not very contentious will deny that the Phariſees askt our Lord whether it were lawful to put away ſuch a wife, as was truly, and according to Gods law, to be counted a wife; that is, ſuch a one as would dwell with her husband, and both would and could perform the neceſſary duties of Wedloc tolerably. But ſhe who will not dwell with her husband, is not put away by him, but goes of her ſelf: and ſhe who denies to be a meet help, or to be ſo hath made her ſelf unfit by open miſdemeanours, or through incurable impotencies cannot be able, is not by the Law of God to be eſteem'd a wife; as hath bin ſhewn both from the firſt inſtitution, and other places of Scripture. Neither certainly would the Phariſees propound a queſtion concerning ſuch an unconjugal wife; for thir depravation of the Law had brought them to that paſs, as to think a man had right to put away his wife for any cauſe, though never ſo ſlight. Since therfore it is manifeſt that Chriſt anſwer'd the Phariſees concerning a fit and meet Wife according to the Law of God, whom he forbid to divorce for any cauſe but Fornication: Who ſees not that it is a wickedneſs ſo to wreſt and extend that anſwer of his, as if it forbad to divorce her who hath already forſak'n, or hath loſt the place and dignity of a Wife by deſerved infamy, or hath undertak'n to be that which ſhe hath not natural ability to be?

This truth is ſo powerful, that it hath mov'd the Papiſts to grant thir kind of Divorce for other cauſes beſides adultery, as for ill uſage, and the not performing of conjugal duty; and to ſeparate from bed and board for theſe cauſes, which is as much Divorce, as they grant for Adultery.

But ſom perhaps will object, that though it be yielded that our Lord granted Divorce not only for Adultery, yet it is not certain that he permitted Marriage after Divorce, unleſs for that only cauſe. I anſwer, firſt, That the ſentence of Divorce, and ſecond Marriage, is one and the ſame. So that when the right of Divorce is evinc'd to belong not only to the cauſe of Fornication, the power of ſecond Marriage is alſo prov'd to be not limited to that cauſe only; and that moſt evidently, when as the Holy Ghoſt, 1 Cor. 7. ſo frees the deſerted party from Bondage, as that he may not only ſend a juſt Divorce in caſe of Deſertion, but may ſeek another Marriage.

Laſtly, Seeing God will not that any ſhould live in danger of Fornication and utter ruin for the default of another, and hath commanded the Husband to ſend away with a Bill of Divorce her whom he could not love; it is impoſſible that the charge of Adultery ſhould belong to him who for lawful cauſes divorces and marries, or to her who marries after ſhe hath bin unjuſtly rejected, or to him who receives her without all fraud to the former wedloc. For this were a horrid blaſphemy againſt God, ſo to interpret his words, as to make him diſſent from himſelf; for who ſees not a flat contradiction in this, to enthral blameleſs men and women to miſeries and injuries, under a falſe and ſoothing title of Marriage, and yet to declare by his Apoſtle that a brother or ſiſter is not under bondage in ſuch caſes? No leſs do theſe two things conflict with themſelves, to enforce the innocent and faultles to endure the pain and miſery of anothers perverſnes, or elſe to live in unavoidable temptation; and to affirm elſewhere that he lays on no man the burden of another mans ſin, nor doth conſtrain any man to the endangering of his ſoul.

THis although it be well prov'd, yet becauſe it concerns only the Offendor, I leave him to ſearch out his own Charter himſelf in the Author.

That ſom perſons are ſo ordain'd to Marriage, as that they cannot obtain the gift of Continence, no not by earneſt Prayer; and that therin every one is to be left to his own judgment and conſcience, and not to have a burden laid upon him by any other.

CHAP. XLVII.

The Concluſion of this Treatiſe.

THeſe things, moſt renowned King, I have brought together, both to explain for what cauſes the unhappy, but ſomtimes moſt neceſſary help of Divorce ought to be granted, according to God's Word, by Princes and Rulers: as alſo to explain how the words of Chriſt do conſent with ſuch a grant. I have bin large indeed both in handling thoſe Oracles of God, and in laying down thoſe certain principles, which he who will know what the mind of God is in this matter, muſt ever think on and remember. But if we conſider what miſt and obſcurity hath bin pour'd out by Antichriſt upon this queſtion, and how deep this pernicious contempt of Wedloc, and admiration of ſingle life, ev'n in thoſe who are not call'd therto, hath ſunk into many mens perſuaſions, I fear leſt all that hath bin ſaid, be hardly enough to perſuade ſuch that they would ceaſe at length to make themſelves wiſer and holier then God himſelf, in being ſo ſevere to grant lawful Marriage, and ſo eaſie to connive at all, not only whordoms, but deflowrings, and adulteries. When as among the people of God, no whordom was to be tolerated.

Our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, who came to deſtroy the works of Satan, ſend down his Spirit upon all Chriſtians, and principally upon Chriſtian Governours both in Church and Commonwealth (for of the clear judgment of your Royal Majeſty I nothing doubt, revolving the Scripture ſo often as ye do) that they may acknowledg how much they provoke the anger of God againſt us, when as all kind of unchaſtity is tolerated, fornications and adulteries winkt at: But holy and honourable Wedloc is oft withheld by the meer perſuaſion of Antichriſt, from ſuch as without this remedy, cannot preſerve themſelves from damnation! For none who hath but a ſpark of honeſty will deny that Princes and States ought to uſe diligence toward the maintaining of pure and honeſt life among all men, without which all Juſtice, all fear of God, and true Religion decays.

And who knows not that chaſtity and purenes of life can never be reſtor'd, or continu'd in the Common-wealth, unleſs it be firſt eſtabliſht in private houſes, from whence the whole breed of men is to come forth? To effect this, no wiſe man can doubt that is is neceſſary for Princes and Magiſtrates firſt with ſeverity to puniſh Whor~~dom and Adultery; next to ſee that Marriages be lawfully contracted, and in the Lord~~, then that they be faithfully kept; and laſtly, when that unhappines urges, that they be lawfully diſſolv'd, and other Marriage granted, according as the law of God, and of nature, and Conſtitutions of pious Princes have decreed; as I have ſhewn both by evident autorities of Scripture, together with the writings of the ancient Fathers, and other teſtimonies. Only the Lord grant that we may learn to prefer his ever juſt and ſaving Word, before the Comments of Antichriſt, too deeply rooted in many, and the falſe and blaſphemous expoſition of our Saviour's words. Amen.

A POSTSCRIPT.

THus far Martin Bucer: Whom where I might without injury to either part of the cauſe, I deny not to have epitomiz'd; in the reſt obſerving a well-warranted rule, not to give an Inventory of ſo many words, but to weigh thir force. I could have added that eloquent and right Chriſtian diſcours, writt'n by Eraſmus on this Argument, not diſagreeing in effect from Bucer. But this, I hope, will be anough to excuſe me with the meer Engliſhman, to be no forger of new and looſe opinions. Others may read him in his own phraſe on the firſt to the Corinthians, and eaſe me who never could delight in long citations, much leſs in whole traductions; Whether it be natural diſpoſition or education in me, or that my mother bore me a ſpeaker of what God made mine own, and not a tranſlator. There be others alſo whom I could reck'n up, of no mean account in the Church (and Peter Martyr among the firſt) who are more then half our own in this controverſy. But this is a providence not to be ſlighted, that as Bucer wrote this tractat of Divorce in England and for England, ſo Eraſmus profeſſes he begun here among us the ſame ſubject, eſpecially out of compaſſion, for the need he ſaw this Nation had of ſome charitable redreſs herin; and ſeriouſly exhorts others to uſe thir beſt induſtry in the clearing of this point, wherin cuſtom hath a greater ſway then verity. That therfore which came into the mind of theſe two admired ſtrangers to do for England, and in a touch of higheſt prudence which they took to be not yet recover'd from monaſtic ſuperſtition, if I a native am found to have done for mine own Country, altogether ſutably and conformly to thir ſo large and clear underſtanding, yet without the leaſt help of thirs, I ſuppoſe that hence-forward among conſcionable and judicious perſons, it will no more be thought to my diſcredit, or at all to this Nations diſhonour. And if theſe thir Books, the one ſhall be printed often with beſt allowance in moſt religious Cities, the other with expreſs autority of Leo the tenth a Pope, ſhall for the propagating of truth be publiſht and republiſht, though againſt the receiv'd opinion of that Church, and mine containing but the ſame thing, ſhall in a time of reformation, a time of free ſpeaking, free writing, not find a permiſſion to the Preſs; I refer me to wiſeſt men, whether truth be ſuffer'd to be truth, or liberty to be liberty now among us, and be not again in danger of new fetters and captivity after all our hopes and labours loſt: and whether Learning be not ( which our enemies too profetically fear'd ) in the way to be trodd'n down again by ignorance. Wherof while time is, out of the faith owing to God and my Country, I bid this Kingdom beware; and doubt not but God who hath dignify'd this Parliament already to ſo many glorious degrees, will alſo give them ( which is a ſingular bleſſing ) to inform themſelves rightly in the midſt of an unprincipl'd age; and to prevent this working myſtery of ignorance and eccleſiaſtical thraldom, which under new ſhapes and diſguiſes begins afreſh to grow upon us.

A Reply to a Nameleſs Answer againſt the Doctrin and Diſciplin of Divorce.

Wherin the trivial Author of that Anſwer is diſcover'd, the Licenſer conferr'd with, and the Opinion which they traduce, defended.

Prov. XXVI. 5.

Anſwer a fool according to his folly, leſt he be wiſe in his own conceit.

---

After many Rumours of Confutations and Convictions, forth-coming againſt the Doctrin and Diſciplin of Divorce, and now and then a by-blow from the Pulpit, feather'd with a cenſure ſtrict indeed, but how true, more beholding to the Authority of that devout place which it borrowed to be utter'd in, then to any ſound reaſon which it could oracle; while I ſtill hoped as for a bleſſing to ſee ſome piece of diligence, or learned diſcretion come from them, it was my hap at length, lighting on a certain parcel of Queries, that ſeek and find not, to find not ſeeking, at the tail of Anabaptiſtical, Antinomian, Heretical, Atheiſtical Epithets, a jolly Slander; called Divorce at pleaſure: I ſtood awhile and wondered, what we might do to a Man's heart, or what Anatomy uſe, to find in it ſincerity; for all our wonted Marks every day fail us, and where we thought it was, we ſee it is not, for alter and change reſidence it cannot ſure. And yet I ſee no good of Body or of Mind ſecure to a man for all his paſt labours without perpetual watchfulneſs, and perſeverance. Whenas one above others, who hath ſuffer'd much and long in the defence of Truth, ſhall after all this, give her cauſe to leave him ſo deſtitute and ſo vacant of her defence, as to yield his mouth to be the common road of Truth and Falſehood, and ſuch falſehood as is joyned with a raſh and heedleſs Calumny of his Neighbour. For what Book hath he ever met with, as his complaint is, Printed in the City, maintaining either in the title, or in the whole purſuance, Divorce at pleaſure? 'Tis true, that to divorce upon extream neceſſity, when through the perverſneſs, or the apparent unfitneſs of either, the continuance can be to both no good at all, but an intolerable injury and temptation to the wrong'd and the defrauded, to divorce then there is a Book that writes it lawful. And that this Law is a pure and wholſome national Law, not to be with-held from Good Men, becauſe others likely enough may abuſe it to thir pleaſure, cannot be charged upon that Book, but muſt be entred a bold and impious Accuſation againſt God himſelf; who did not for this abuſe with-hold it from his own people. It will be juſt therfore, and beſt for the reputation of him who in his Subitanes hath thus cenſured, to recal his ſentence. And if, out of the abundance of his Volumes, and the readineſs of his Quill, and the vaſtneſs of his other Imployments, eſpecially in the great Audit for Accounts, he can ſpare us ought to the better underſtanding of this point, he ſhall be thankt in publick; and what hath offended in the Book, ſhall willingly ſubmit to his correction. Provided he be ſure not to come with theſe old and ſtale Suppoſitions, unleſs he can take away clearly what that Diſcourſe hath urged againſt them, by one who will expect other Arguments to be perſwaded the good health of a ſound Anſwer, then the Gout and Dropſie of a big Margent, litter'd and overlaid with crude and huddl'd Quotations. But as I ſtill was waiting, when theſe light-armed Refuters would have done pelting at thir three Lines uttered with a ſage delivery of no Reaſon, but an impotent and worſe then Bonner-like Cenſure, to burn that which provokes them to a fair diſpute; at length a Book was brought to my hands intitl'd, An Anſwer to the Doctrinand Diſciplin of Divorce.

Gladly I receiv'd it, and very attentively compoſed my ſelf to read; hoping that now ſome good Man had vouchſafed the pains to inſtruct me better, then I could yet learn out of all the Volumes which for this purpoſe I had viſited. Only this I marvel'd, and other men have ſince, when as I, in a ſubject ſo new to this Age, and ſo hazardous to pleaſe, conceal'd not my Name, why this Author, defending that part which is ſo creeded by the People, would conceal his. But ere I could enter three leaves into the Pamphlet, (for I defer the pleaſant rudeneſs which by the Licencer's leave I met with afterwards) my ſatisfaction came in abundantly, that it could be nothing why he durſt not name himſelf, but the guilt of his own wretchedneſs. For firſt, not to ſpeak of his abrupt and bald beginning, his very firſt Page notoriouſly bewraies him an illiterate and arrogant preſumer in that which he underſtands not, bearing us in hand as if he knew both Greek and Hebrew, and is not able to ſpell it; which had he been, it had been either written as it ought, or ſcor'd upon the Printer. If it be excuſed as the careleſneſs of his deputy, be it known, the learned Author himſelf is inventoried, and ſumm'd up to the utmoſt value of his Livery-Cloak. Whoever he be, though this to ſome may ſeem a ſlight Conteſt, I ſhall yet continue to think that Man full of other ſecret injuſtice, and deceitful pride, who ſhall offer in publick to aſſume the skill, though it be but of a Tongue which he hath not, and would catch his readers to believe of his ability, that which is not in him. The Licenſer indeed, as his Authority now ſtands, may licenſe much; but if theſe Greek Orthographies were of his Licenſing, the Boys at School might reckon with him at his Grammar. Nor did I find this his want of the pretended Languages alone, but accompanied with ſuch a low and home-ſpun Expreſſion of his Mother-Engliſh all along, without joynt or frame, as made me ere I knew further of him, often ſtop and conclude, that this Author could for certain be no other then ſome Mechanic Nor was the ſtile flat and rude, and the matter grave and ſolid, for then there had been pardon; but ſo ſhallow and ſo unwary was that alſo, as gave ſufficiently the character of a groſs and ſluggiſh, yet a contentious and overweening pretender. For firſt, it behoving him to ſhew, as he promiſes, what Divorce is, and what the true Doctrin and Diſciplin therof, and this being to do by ſuch principles and proofs as are received on both ſides, he performs neither of theſe; but ſhews it firſt from the Judaical practice, which he himſelf diſallows, and next from the practice of Canon-Law, which the Book he would confute utterly rejects, and all Laws depending theron; which this puny Clark calls the Laws of England, and yet pronounceth them by an Eccleſiaſtical Judg: as if that were to be accounted the Law of England, which dependeth on the Popery of England; or if it were, this Parliament he might know hath now damn'd that Judicature. So that whether his meaning were to inform his own Party, or to confute his Adverſary, inſtead of ſhewing us the true Doctrin and Diſciplin of Divorce, he ſhews us nothing but his own contemptible Ignorance. For what is the Moſaic Law to his Opinion? and what is the Canon, utterly now antiquated, either to that, or to mine? Ye ſee already what a faithful Definer we have him. From ſuch a wind Egg of definition as this, they who expect any of his other Arguments to be well hatcht, let them enjoy the virtue of thir worthy Champion. But one thing more I obſerved, a ſingular note of his ſtupidity, and that his Trade is not to meddle with Books, much leſs with Confutations; whenas the Doctrin of Divorce had now a whole Year been publiſhed the ſecond time, with many Arguments added, and the former ones bettered and confirmed, this idle Pamphlet comes reeling forth againſt the firſt Edition only, as may appear to any by the Pages quoted. Which put me in mind of what by chance I had notice of to this purpoſe the laſt Summer, as nothing ſo ſerious but happens oftimes to be attended with a ridiculous accident; it was then told me that the Doctrin of Divorce was anſwered, and the Anſwer half printed againſt the firſt Edition, not by one, but by a pack of Heads; of whom the chief, by circumſtance, was intimated to me, and ſince ratified to be no other, if any can hold laughter, and I am ſure none will gueſs him lower than an actual Serving-man. This Creature, for the ſtory muſt on, (and what though he be the loweſt perſon of an Interlude, he may deſerve a canvaſing) tranſplanted himſelf, and to the improvement of his Wages, and your better notice of his Capacity, turned Soliciter. And having converſed much with a ſtripling Divine or two of theſe newly-fledg Probationers, that uſually come ſcouting from the Univerſity, and lie here no lame Legers to pop into the Betheſda of ſome Knights Chaplainſhip, where they bring Grace to his good Cheer, but no Peace or Benediction elſe to his Houſe; theſe made the Cham-party, he contributed the Law, and both joyned in the Divinity. Which made me intend, following the advice alſo of friends, to lay aſide the thoughts of miſpending a Reply to the Buz of ſuch a Drone's neſt. But finding that it lay, whatever was the matter, half a year after unfiniſhed in the Preſs, and hearing for certain that a Divine of note, out of his good-will to the Opinion, had taken it into his Reviſe, and ſomthing had put out, ſomthing put in, and ſtruck it here and there with a claw of his own Calligraphy to keep it from tainting: And farther, when I ſaw the Stuff, though very coarſe and thredbare, garniſht and trimly faced with the commendations of a Licenſer, I reſolved, ſo ſoon as leaſure granted me the recreation, that my Man of Law ſhould not altogether loſe his Soliciting. Although I impute a ſhare of the making to him whoſe Name I find in the Approbation, who may take, as his mind ſerves him, this Reply. In the mean-while it ſhall be ſeen, I refuſe no Occaſion, and avoid no Adverſary, either to maintain what I have begun, or to give it up for better reaſon.

To begin then with the Licenſer and his Cenſure. For a Licenſer is not contented now to give his ſingle Imprimatur, but brings his Chair into the Title leaf; there ſits and judges up, or judges down what Book he pleaſes: if this be ſuffered, what worthleſs Author, or what cunning Printer will not be ambitious of ſuch a ſtale to put off the heavieſt gear; which may in time bring in round fees to the Licenſer, and wretched miſleading to the People? But to the matter: he approves the publiſhing of this Book, to preſerve the ſtrength and honour of Marriage againſt thoſe ſad breaches and dangerous abuſes of it. Belike then the wrongful ſuffering of all thoſe ſad breaches and abuſes in Marriage to a remedileſs thraldom, is the ſtrength and honour of Marriage; a boiſterous and beſtial Strength, a diſhonourable Honour, an infatuated Doctrin, worſe then the Salvo jure of tyranizing, which we all fight againſt. Next he ſaith, that common Diſcontents make theſe Breaches in unſtaid Minds, and Men given to change. His words may be apprehended, as if they diſallowed only to divorce for common Diſcontents, in unſtaid minds, having no cauſe, but a deſire of change, and then we agree. But if he takes all Diſcontents on this ſide Adultery, to be common, that is to ſay, not difficult to endure, and to affect only unſtaid Minds, it might adminiſter juſt cauſe to think him the unfitteſt man that could be, to offer at a * Comment upon Job; as ſeeming by this to have no more true ſence of a good man in his afflictions, then theſe Edomitiſh friends had, of whom Job complains, and againſt whom God teſtifies his anger. Shall a man of your own Coat, who hath eſpouſed his Flock, and repreſents Chriſt more, in being the true Husband of his Congregation, then an ordinary man doth in being the Husband of his Wife, and yet this repreſentment is thought a chief cauſe why Marriage muſt be inſeparable; ſhall this ſpiritual Man ordinarily for the increaſe of his maintenance, or any ſlight cauſe, forſake that wedded Cure of Souls, that ſhould be deareſt to him, and marry another, and another? and ſhall not a perſon wrongfully afflicted, and perſecuted even to extremity, forſake an unfit, injurious and peſtilent Mate, tied only by a civil and fleſhly Covenant? If you be a man ſo much hating Change, hate that other Change; if your ſelf be not guilty, counſel your Brethren to hate it; and leave to be the ſupercilious Judg of other mens Miſeries and Changes, that your own be not judged. The reaſons of your licens'd Pamphlet, you ſay are good; they muſt be better then your own then, I ſhall wonder elſe how ſuch a trivial fellow was accepted and commended, to be the confuter of ſo dangerous an Opinion as ye give out mine.

* Mr. Caryl.

Now therfore to your Atturney, ſince no worthier an Adverſary makes his Appearance, nor this neither his Appearance, but lurking under the ſafety of his nameleſs obſcurity; ſuch as ye turn him forth at the Poſtern, I muſt accept him, and in a better temper then Ajax, do mean to ſcourge this Ram for ye till I meet with his Vlyſſes.

He begins with Law, and we have it of him as good, cheap as any Huckſter at Law, newly ſet up, can poſſibly afford, and as impertinent; but for that he hath receiv'd his hanſel. He preſumes alſo to cite the Civil Law, which I perceive by his citing never came within his Dormitory; yet what he cites, makes but againſt himſelf.

His ſecond thing therfore is to refute the adverſe Poſition, and very methodically, three Pages before he ſets it down; and ſets his own in the place, That diſagreement of mind or diſpoſition, though ſhewing it ſelf in much ſharpneſs, is not by the Law of God or Man a juſt cauſe of Divorce.

To this Poſition I anſwer; That it lays no battery againſt mine, no nor ſo much as faces it, but tacks about long ere it comes near, like a harmleſs and reſpectful Confutement. For I confeſs that diſagreement of mind or diſpoſition, though in much ſharpneſs, is not always a juſt cauſe of Divorce; for much may be endured. But what if the ſharpneſs be much more than his much? To that point it is our miſhap we have not here his grave deciſion. He that will contradict the Poſition which I alledged, muſt hold that no diſagreement of Mind or Diſpoſition can divorce, though ſhewn in moſt ſharpneſs; otherwiſe he leaves a place for Equity to appoint limits, and ſo his following Arguments will either not prove his own Poſition, or not diſprove mine.

His firſt Argument, all but what hobbles to no purpoſe, is this; Where the Scripture commands a thing to be done, it appoints when, how, and for what, as in the caſe of Death, or Excommunication. But the Scripture directs not what meaſure of diſagreement or contrariety may divorce; Therefore the Scripture allows not any Divorce for diſagreement.

Anſwer. Firſt I deny your Major; the Scripture appoints many things, and yet leaves the circumſtance to Man's diſcretion, particularly, in your own Examples; Excommunication is not taught when, and for what to be, but left to the Church. How could the Licenſer let paſs this childiſh ignorance, and call it good? Next, in matters of Death, the Laws of England, whereof you have intruded to be an opiniaſtrous Sub-advocate, and are bound to defend them, conceive it not enjoyned in Scripture, when or for what cauſe they ſhall put to death, as in Adultery, Theft, and the like. Your Minor alſo is falſe, for the Scripture plainly ſets down for what meaſure of diſagreement a Man may divorce, Deut. 24. 1. Learn better what that phraſe means, If ſhe find no favour in his eyes.

Your ſecond Argument, without more tedious fumbling, is briefly thus. If Diverſity in Religion, which breeds a greater diſlike then any natural diſagreement, may not cauſe a Divorce, then may not the leſſer diſagreement: But diverſity of Religion may not; Ergo.

Anſwer. Firſt, I deny in the Major, that diverſity of Religion breeds a greater diſlike to Marriage-duties, than natural Diſagreement. For between Iſraelite, or Chriſtian and Infidel, more often hath been ſeen to much love: but between them who perpetually claſh in natural Contrarieties, it is repugnant that there ſhould be ever any married Love or Concord. Next I deny your Minor, that it is commanded not to divorce in diverſity of Religion, if the Infidel will ſtay: for that place in St. Paul commands nothing, as that Book at large affirmed, though you over-skipt it.

Secondly, If it do command, it is but with condition that the Infidel be content, and well-pleaſed to ſtay, which cuts off the ſuppoſal of any great hatred or diſquiet between them, ſeeing the Infidel hath liberty to depart at pleaſure; and ſo this compariſon avails nothing.

Your third Argument is from Deut. 22. If a man hate his Wife, and raiſe an ill report, that he found her no Virgin: if this were falſe, he might not put her away, though hated never ſo much.

Anſwer. This was a malicious hatred, bent againſt her Life, or to ſend her out of doors without her Portion. Such a Hater loſes by due puniſhment that privilege, Deut. 24. 1. to divorce for a natural Diſlike; which though it could not love conjugally, yet ſent away civilly, and with juſt conditions. But doubtleſs the Wife in that former caſe had liberty to depart from her falſe Accuſer, leſt his hatred ſhould prove mortal; elſe the Law peculiarly made to right the Woman, had turned to her greateſt miſchief.

Your fourth Argument; One Chriſtian ought to bear the infirmities of another, but chiefly of his Wife.

Anſwer. I grant infirmities, but not outrages, not perpetual defraudments of trueſt conjugal ſociety, not injuries and vexations as importunate as fire. Yet to endure very much, might do well at Exhortation, but not a compulſive Law. For the Spirit of God himſelf, by Solomon, declares that ſuch a Conſort the Earth cannot bear, and better dwell in a corner of the Houſe-top, or in the Wilderneſs. Burdens may be born, but ſtill with conſideration to the ſtrength of an honeſt Man complaining. Charity indeed bids us forgive our Enemies, yet doth not force us to continue friendſhip and familiarity with thoſe friends who have been falſe or unworthy towards us; but is contented in our peace with them, at a fair diſtance. Charity commands not the Husband to receive again into his Boſom the adulterous Wife, but thinks it enough, if he diſmiſs her with a beneficent and peaceful Diſmiſſion. No more doth Charity command; nor can her Rule compel, to retain in neareſt Union of Wedloc, one whoſe other groſſeſt faults, or diſabilities to perform what was covenanted, are the juſt Cauſes of as much grievance and diſſention in a Family, as the private Act of Adultery. Let not therfore, under the name of fulfilling Charity, ſuch an unmerciful and more than legal Yoke, be padlockt upon the Neck of any Chriſtian.

Your fifth Argument: If the Husband ought to love his Wife, as Chriſt his Church, then ought ſhe not to be put away for contrariety of Mind.

Anſwer. This Similitude turns againſt him: For if the Husband muſt be as Chriſt to the Wife, then muſt the Wiſe be as the Church to her Husband. If there be a perpetual contrariety of Mind in the Church toward Chriſt, Chriſt himſelf threatens to divorce ſuch a Spouſe, and hath often done it. If they urge this was no true Church, I urge again that was no true Wiſe.

His ſixth Argument is from Matth. 5. 32. which he expounds after the old faſhion, and never takes notice of what I brought againſt that Expoſition; let him therfore ſeek his Anſwer there. Yet can he not leave this Argument, but he muſt needs firſt ſhew us a curvet of his madneſs, holding out an Objection, and running himſelf upon the point. For, ſaith he, if Chriſt except no Cauſe but Adultery, then all other Cauſes, as Frigidity, inceſtuous Marriage, &c. are no Cauſes of Divorce; and anſwers, That the Speech of Chriſt holds univerſally, as he intended it; namely, to condemn ſuch Divorce as was groundleſly practiſed among the Jews, for every Cauſe which they thought ſufficient, not checking the Law of Conſanguinities or Affinities, or forbidding other Cauſe which makes Marriage void ipſo facto.

Anſw. Look to it now you be not found taking Fees on both ſides; for if you once bring Limitations to the univerſal Words of Chriſt, another will do as much with as good Authority; and affirm, that neither did he check the Law, Deut. 24. 1. nor forbid the Cauſes that make Marriage void actually; which if any thing in the World doth, Unfitneſs doth, and Contrariety of Mind; yea, more than Adultery, for that makes not the Marriage void, not much more unfit, but for the time, if the offended Party forgive. But Unfitneſs and Contrariety fruſtrates and nullifies for ever, unleſs it be a rare chance, all the good and peace of wedded Converſation; and leaves nothing between them enjoyable, but a prone and ſavage Neceſſity, not worth the name of Marriage, unaccompanied with Love. Thus much his own Objection hath done againſt himſelf.

Argument 7th. He inſiſts, that Man and Wife are one fleſh, therfore muſt not ſeparate. But muſt be ſent to look again upon the *35th Page of that Book, where he might read an Anſwer, which he ſtirs not. Yet can he not abſtain but he muſt do us another pleaſure ere he goes; although I call the Common Pleas to witneſs, I have not hired his Tongue, whatever Men may think by his arguing. For beſides Adultery, he excepts other Cauſes which diſſolve the Union of being one fleſh, either directly, or by conſequence. If only Adultery be excepted by our Saviour, and he voluntarily can add other Exceptions that diſſolve that Union both directly and by conſequence, theſe Words of Chriſt, the main Obſtacle of Divorce, are open to us by his own Invitation, to include whatever Cauſes diſſolve that Union of Fleſh, either directly or by conſequence. Which, till he name other Cauſes more likely, I affirm to be done ſooneſt by Unfitneſs and Contrariety of Mind; for that induces Hatred, which is the greateſt Diſſolver both of ſpiritual and corporal Union, turning the Mind, and conſequently the Body, to other Objects. Thus our doughty Adverſary, either directly or by conſequence, yields us the Queſtion with his own mouth; and the next thing he does, recants it again.

* Former Edition.

His 8th Argument ſhivers in the uttering, and he confeſſeth to be not over-confident of it; but of the reſt it may be ſworn he is. St. Paul, 1 Cor. 7. ſaith, that the married have trouble in the fleſh; therfore we muſt bear it, though never ſo intolerable.

I anſwer. If this be a true Conſequence, why are not all Troubles to be born alike? why are we ſuffered to divorce Adulteries, Deſertions, or Frigidities? Who knows not that Trouble and Affliction is the Decree of God upon every ſtate of life? Follows it therfore, that though they grow exceſſive and inſupportable, we muſt not avoid them? If we may in all other Conditions, and not in Marriage, the doom of our ſuffering ties us not by the Trouble, but by the Bond of Marriage; and that muſt be proved inſeparable from other Reaſons, not from this place. And his own Confeſſion declares the weakneſs of this Argument, yet his ungovern'd Arrogance could not be diſſwaded from venting it.

ſharpneſs, is not always a juſt cauſe of Divorce; for much may be endured. But what if the ſharpneſs be much more than his much? To that point it is our miſhap we have not here his grave deciſion. He that will contradict the Poſition which I alledged, muſt hold that no diſagreement of Mind or Diſpoſition can divorce, though ſhewn in moſt ſharpneſs; otherwiſe he leaves a place for Equity to appoint limits, and ſo his following Arguments will either not prove his own Poſition, or not diſprove mine.

His firſt Argument, all but what hobbles to no purpoſe, is this; Where the Scripture commands a thing to be done, it appoints when, how, and for what, as in the caſe of Death, or Excommunication. But the Scripture directs not what meaſure of diſagreement or contrariety may divorce; Therefore the Scripture allows not any Divorce for diſagreement.

Anſwer. Firſt I deny your Major; the Scripture appoints many things, and yet leaves the circumſtance to Man's diſcretion, particularly, in your own Examples; Excommunication is not taught when, and for what to be, but left to the Church. How could the Licenſer let paſs this childiſh ignorance, and call it good? Next, in matters of Death, the Laws of England, wherof you have intruded to be an opiniaſtrous Sub-advocate, and are bound to defend them, conceive it not enjoyned in Scripture, when or for what cauſe they ſhall put to death, as in Adultery, Theft, and the like. Your Minor alſo is falſe, for the Scripture plainly ſets down for what meaſure of diſagreement a Man may divorce, Deut. 24. 1. Learn better what that phraſe means, If ſhe find no favour in his eyes.

Your ſecond Argument, without more tedious ſumbling, is briefly thus. If Diverſity in Religion, which breeds a greater diſlike then any natural diſagreement, may not cauſe a Divorce, then may not the leſſer diſagreement: But diverſity of Religion may not; Ergo.

Anſwer. Firſt, I deny in the Major, that diverſity of Religion breeds a greater diſlike to Marriage-duties, than natural Diſagreement. For between Iſraelite, or Chriſtian and Infidel, more often hath been ſeen to much love: but between them who perpetually claſh in natural Contrarieties, it is repugnant that there ſhould be ever any married Love or Concord. Next I deny your Minor, that it is commanded not to divorce in diverſity of Religion, if the Infidel will ſtay: for that place in St. Paul commands nothing, as that Book at large affirmed, though you over-skipt it.

Secondly, If it do command, it is but with condition that the Infidel be content, and well-pleaſed to ſtay, which cuts off the ſuppoſal of any great hatred or diſquiet between them, ſeeing the Infidel hath liberty to depart at pleaſure; and ſo this compariſon avails nothing.

Your third Argument is from Deut. 22. If a man hate his Wife, and raiſe an ill report, that he found her no Virgin: if this were falſe, he might not put her away, though hated never ſo much.

Anſwer. This was a malicious hatred, bent againſt her Life, or to ſend her out of doors without her Portion. Such a Hater loſes by due puniſhment that privilege, Deut. 24. 1. to divorce for a natural Diſlike; which though it could not love conjugally, yet ſent away civilly, and with juſt conditions. But doubtleſs the Wife in that former caſe had liberty to depart from her falſe Accuſer, leſt his hatred ſhould prove mortal; elſe the Law peculiarly made to right the Woman, had turned to her greateſt miſchief.

Your fourth Argument; One Chriſtian ought to bear the infirmities of another, but chiefly of his Wife.

Anſwer. I grant infirmities, but not outrages, not perpetual defraudments of trueſt conjugal ſociety, not injuries and vexations as importunate as fire. Yet to endure very much, might do well at Exhortation, but not a compulſive Law. For the Spirit of God himſelf, by Solomon, declares that ſuch a Conſort the Earth cannot bear, and better dwell in a corner of the Houſe-top, or in the Wilderneſs. Burdens may be born, but ſtill with conſideration to the ſtrength of an honeſt Man complaining. Charity indeed bids us forgive our Enemies, yet doth not force us to continue friendſhip and familiarity with thoſe friends who have been falſe or unworthy towards us; but is contented in our peace with them, at a fair diſtance. Charity commands not the Husband to receive again into his Boſom the adulterous Wife, but thinks it enough, if he diſmiſs her with a beneficent and peaceful Diſmiſſion. No more doth Charity command; nor can her Rule compel, to retain in neareſt Union of Wedloc, one whoſe other groſſeſt faults, or diſabilities to perform what was covenanted, are the juſt Cauſes of as much grievance and diſſention in a Family, as the private Act of Adultery. Let not therfore, under the name of fulfilling Charity, ſuch an unmerciful and more than legal Yoke, be padlockt upon the Neck of any Chriſtian.

Your fifth Argument: If the Husband ought to love his Wife, as Chriſt his Church, then ought ſhe not to be put away for contrariety of Mind.

Anſwer. This Similitude turns againſt him: For if the Husband muſt be as Chriſt to the Wife, then muſt the Wife be as the Church to her Husband. If there be a perpetual contrariety of Mind in the Church toward Chriſt, Chriſt himſelf threatens to divorce ſuch a Spouſe, and hath often done it. If they urge this was no true Church, I urge again that was no true Wife.

His ſixth Argument is from Matth. 5. 32. which he expounds after the old faſhion, and never takes notice of what I brought againſt that Expoſition; let him therfore ſeek his Anſwer there. Yet can he not leave this Argument, but he muſt needs firſt ſhew us a curvet of his madneſs, holding out an Objection, and running himſelf upon the point. For, ſaith he, if Chriſt except no Cauſe but Adultery, then all other Cauſes, as Frigidity, inceſtuous Marriage, &c. are no Cauſes of Divorce; and anſwers, That the Speech of Chriſt holds univerſally, as he intended it; namely, to condemn ſuch Divorce as was groundleſly practiſed among the Jews, for every Cauſe which they thought ſufficient, not checking the Law of Conſanguinities or Affinities, or forbidding other Cauſe which makes Marriage void ipſo facto.

Anſw. Look to it now you be not found taking Fees on both ſides; for if you once bring Limitations to the univerſal Words of Chriſt, another will do as much with as good Authority; and affirm, that neither did he check the Law, Deut. 24. 1. nor forbid the Cauſes that make Marriage void actually; which if any thing in the World doth, Unfitneſs doth, and Contrariety of Mind; yea, more than Adultery, for that makes not the Marriage void, not much more unfit, but for the time, if the offended Party forgive. But Unfitneſs and Contrariety fruſtrates and nullifies for ever, unleſs it be a rare chance, all the good and peace of wedded Converſation; and leaves nothing between them enjoyable, but a prone and ſavage Neceſſity, not worth the name of Marriage, unaccompanied with Love. Thus much his own Objection hath done againſt himſelf.

Argument 7th. He inſiſts, that Man and Wife are one fleſh, therfore muſt not ſeparate. But muſt be ſent to look again upon the *35th Page of that Book, where he might read an Anſwer, which he ſtirs not. Yet can he not abſtain but he muſt do us another pleaſure ere he goes; although I call the Common Pleas to witneſs, I have not hired his Tongue, whatever Men may think by his arguing. For beſides Adultery, he excepts other Cauſes which diſſolve the Union of being one fleſh, either directly, or by conſequence. If only Adultery be excepted by our Saviour, and he voluntarily can add other Exceptions that diſſolve that Union both directly and by conſequence, theſe Words of Chriſt, the main Obſtacle of Divorce, are open to us by his own Invitation, to include whatever Cauſes diſſolve that Union of Fleſh, either directly or by conſequence. Which, till he name other Cauſes more likely, I affirm to be done ſooneſt by Unfitneſs and Contrariety of Mind; for that induces Hatred, which is the greateſt Diſſolver both of ſpiritual and corporal Union, turning the Mind, and conſequently the Body, to other Objects. Thus our doughty Adverſary, either directly or by conſequence, yields us the Queſtion with his own mouth; and the next thing he does, recants it again.

* Former Edition.

His 8th Argument ſhivers in the uttering, and he confeſſeth to be not over-confident of it; but of the reſt it may be ſworn he is. St. Paul, 1 Cor. 7. ſaith, that the married have trouble in the fleſh; therfore we muſt bear it, though never ſo intolerable.

I anſwer. If this be a true Conſequence, why are not all Troubles to be born alike? why are we ſuffered to divorce Adulteries, Deſertions, or Frigidities? Who knows not that Trouble and Affliction is the Decree of God upon every ſtate of life? Follows it therfore, that though they grow exceſſive and inſupportable, we muſt not avoid them? If we may in all other Conditions, and not in Marriage, the doom of our ſuffering ties us not by the Trouble, but by the Bond of Marriage; and that muſt be proved inſeparable from other Reaſons, not from this place. And his own Confeſſion declares the weakneſs of this Argument, yet his ungovern'd Arrogance could not be diſſwaded from venting it.

His 9th Argument is, That a Husband muſt love his Wife as himſelf; therfore he may not divorce for any Diſagreement, no more than he may ſeparate his Soul from his Body.

I anſwer: If he love his Wife as himſelf, he muſt love her ſo far as he may preſerve himſelf to her in a cheerful and comfortable manner, and not ſo as to ruin himſelf by anguiſh and ſorrow, without any benefit to her. Next, if the Husband muſt love his Wife as himſelf, ſhe muſt be underſtood a Wife in ſome reaſonable meaſure, willing and ſufficient to perform the chief Duties of her Covenant, elſe by the hold of this Argument it would be his great Sin to divorce either for Adultery or Deſertion. The reſt of this will run circuit with the Union of one Fleſh, which was anſwered before. And that to divorce a Relative and Metaphorical Union of two Bodies into one Fleſh, can't be likened in all things to the dividing of that natural Union of Soul and Body into one Perſon, is apparent of it ſelf.

His laſt Argument he fetches from the inconvenience that would follow upon this freedom of Divorce, to the corrupting of mens Minds, and the overturning of all humane Society.

But for me, let God and Moſes anſwer this Blaſphemer, who dares bring in ſuch a foul Indictment againſt the Divine Law. Why did God permit this to his people the Jews, but that the Right and Good which came directly therby was more in his eſteem, than the Wrong and Evil which came by accident? And for thoſe weak Suppoſes of Infants that would be left in thir Mothers Belly (which muſt needs be good News for Chamber-maids to hear a Serving-man grown ſo provident for great Bellies) and Portions and Joyntures likely to incur imbezlement hereby, the antient Civil Law inſtructs us plentifully how to award, which our profound Oppoſite knew not, for it was not in his Tenures.

His Arguments are ſpun; now follows the Chaplain with his Antiquities, wiſer if he had refrained, for his very touching ought that is learned, ſoils it, and lays him ſtill more and more open, a conſpicuous Gull. There being both Fathers and Councels more antient, wherwith to have ſerved his purpoſe better than with what he cites, how may we do to know the ſubtile drift that moved him to begin firſt with the twelfth Councel of Toledo? I would not undervalue the depth of his Notion; but perhaps he had heard that the Men of Toledo had ſtore of good blade Mettle, and were excellent at Cutling: Who can tell but it might be the reach of his policy, that theſe able Men of Deciſion would do beſt to have the prime ſtroak among his Teſtimonies in deciding this Cauſe? But all this craft avails him not; for ſeeing they allow no cauſe of Divorce but Fornication, what do theſe keen Doctors here, but cut him over the Sinews with thir Toledo's, for holding in the precedent Page other Cauſes of Divorce beſides, both directly and by conſequence? As evil doth that Saxon Councel, next quoted, beſtead him. For if it allow Divorce preciſely for no cauſe but Fornication, it thwarts his own Expoſition: and if it underſtand Fornication largely, it ſides with whom he would confute. However, the Authority of that Synod can be but ſmall, being under Theodorus, the Canterbury Biſhop, a Grecian Monk of Tarſus, revolted from his own Church to the Pope. What have we next? The Civil Law ſtufft in between two Councels, as if the Code had been ſome Synod; for that he underſtood himſelf in this Quotation, is incredible; where the Law, Cod. l. 3. tit. 38. leg. 11. ſpeaks not of Divorce, but againſt the dividing of Poſſeſſions to divers Heirs, wherby the married Servants of a great Family were divided, perhaps into diſtant Countries and Colonies; Father from Son, Wife from Husband, ſore againſt thir will. Somewhat lower he confeſſeth, that the Civil Law allows many Reaſons of Divorce, but the Canon Law decrees otherwiſe; A fair credit to his Cauſe! And I amaze me, though the fancy of this Doubt be as obtuſe and ſad as any Mallet, how the Licenſer could ſleep out all this, and ſuffer him to uphold his Opinion by Canons and Gregorial Decretals; a Law which not only his Adverſary, but the whole Reformation of this Church and State hath branded and rejected. As ignorantly, and too ignorantly to deceive any Reader but an unlearned, he talks of Juſtin Martyr's Apology, not telling us which of the twain; for that paſſage in the beginning of his firſt, which I have cited elſewhere, plainly makes againſt him: So doth Tertullian, cited next, and next Eraſmus, the one againſt Marcion, the other in his Annotations on Matthew, and to the Corinthians. And thus ye have the Liſt of his choice Antiquities, as pleaſantly choſen as ye would wiſh from a man of his handy Vocation, pufft up with no luck at all, above the ſtint of his capacity.

Now he comes to the Poſition, which I ſet down whole; and like an able Textman, ſlits it into four, that he may the better come at it with his Barber-Surgery, and his Sleeves turned up. Wherin firſt, he denies that any Diſpoſition, Unfitneſs, or Contrariety of Mind, is unchangeable in Nature, but that by the help of Diet and Phyſick it may be alter'd.

I mean not to diſpute Philoſophy with this Pork, who never read any. But I appeal to all Experience, though there be many drugs to purge theſe redundant Humours and Circulations, that commonly impair Health, and are not natural, whether any man can with the ſafety of his life bring a healthy Conſtitution into Phyſick with this deſign, to alter his natural temperament and diſpoſition of Mind. How much more vain and ridiculous would it be, by altering and rooting up the Grounds of Nature, which is moſt likely to produce Death or Madneſs, to hope the reducing of a Mind to this or that fitneſs, or two diſagreeing Minds to a mutual Sympathy? Suppoſe they might, and that with great danger of thir Lives and right Senſes, alter one temperature, how can they know that the ſucceeding Diſpoſition will not be as far from Fitneſs and Agreement? They would perhaps change Melancholy into Sanguin; but what if Fleam and Choler in as great a meaſure come inſtead, the Unfitneſs will be ſtill as difficult and troubleſome? But laſtly, Whether theſe things be changeable or not, Experience teaches us, and our Poſition ſuppoſes that they ſeldom do change in any time commenſurable to the Neceſſities of Man, or convenient to the Ends of Marriage; and if the fault be in the one, ſhall the other live all his days in Bondage and Miſery for anothers perverſneſs, or immedicable diſaffection? To my Friends, of which may feweſt be ſo unhappy, I have a Remedy, as they know, more wiſe and manly to preſcribe: but for his Friends and Followers ( of which many may deſerve juſtly to feel themſelves the unhappineſs which they conſider not in others ) I ſend them by his advice to ſit upon the Stool and ſtrain, till thir croſs Diſpoſitions and Contrarieties of Mind ſhall change to a better correſpondence, and to a quicker apprehenſion of common ſenſe, and thir own good.

His ſecond Reaſon is as heedleſs; becauſe that Grace may change the Diſpoſition, therfore no Indiſpoſition may cauſe Divorce.

Anſw. Firſt, it will not be deniable that many perſons, gracious both, may yet happen to be very unfitly married to the great diſturbance of either. Secondly, What if one have Grace, the other not, and will not alter, as the Scriptures teſtifie there be of thoſe, in whom we may expect a change, when the Blackamoor changes his colour, or the Leopard his ſpots, Jer. 13. 23. Shall the gracious therefore dwell in Torment all his life for the ungracious? We ſee that holieſt Precepts, than which there can no better Phyſick be adminiſtred to the mind of Man, and ſet on with powerful Preaching, cannot work this cure, no not in the Family, not in the Wife of him that preaches Day and Night to her. What an unreaſonable thing it is that Men, and Clergymen eſpecially, ſhould exact ſuch wondrous Changes in another man's Houſe, and are ſeen to work ſo little in thir own?

To the ſecond Point of the Poſition, That this Unfitneſs hinders the main Ends and Benefits of Marriage; he anſwers, If I mean the Unfitneſs of Choler, or ſullen Diſpoſition, that ſoft words, according to Solomon, pacify wrath.

But I reply, That the Saying of Solomon is a Proverb frequently true, not univerſally, as both the Event ſhews, and many other Sentences written by the ſame Author, particularly of an evil Woman, Prov. 21. 9, 19. and in other Chapters, that ſhe is better ſhunn'd than dwelt with, and a Deſert is preferr'd before her Society. What need the Spirit of God put this choice into our heads, if ſoft words could always take effect with her? How frivolous is not only this Diſputer, but he that taught him thus, and let him come abroad?

To his ſecond Anſwer I return this, That although there be not eaſily found ſuch an Antipathy, as to hate one another like a Toad or Poiſon; yet that there is oft ſuch a diſlike in both, or either, to conjugal Love, as hinders all the comfort of Matrimony, ſcarce any can be ſo ſimple as not to apprehend. And what can be that favour, found or not found, in the eyes of the Husband, but a natural Liking or Diſliking; wherof the Law of God, Deut. 24. bears witneſs, as of an ordinary Accident, and determins wiſely and divinely therafter. And this diſaffection hap'ning to be in the one, not without the unſpeakable diſcomfort of the other, muſt he be left like a thing conſecrated to Calamity, and deſpair without Redemption?

Againſt the third Branch of the Poſition, he denies that Solace and Peace, which is contrary to Diſcord and Variance, is the main end of Marriage. What then? He will have it the Solace of Male and Female. Came this Doctrine out of ſome School or ſome Stie? Who but one forſaken of all Senſe and civil Nature, and chiefly of Chriſtianity, will deny that Peace, contrary to Diſcord, is the Calling and the general End of every Chriſtian, and of all his Actions, and more eſpecially of Marriage, which is the deareſt League of Love, and the deareſt Reſemblance of that Love which in Chriſt is deareſt to his Church? how then can Peace and Comfort, as it is contrary to Diſcord, which God hates to dwell with, not be the main end of Marriage? Diſcord then we ought to fly, and to purſue Peace, far above the obſervance of a civil Covenant already broken, and the breaking daily iterated on the other ſide. And what better Teſtimony than the words of the Inſtitution it ſelf, to prove that a converſing Solace and peaceful Society, is the prime end of Marriage, without which no other Help or Office can be mutual, beſeeming the Dignity of reaſonable Creatures, that ſuch as they ſhould be coupled in the Rites of Nature by the meer compulſion of Luſt, without Love or Peace, worſe than wild Beaſts? Nor was it half ſo wiſely ſpoken as ſome deem, though Auſtin ſpake it, that if God had intended other than Copulation in Marriage, he would for Adam have created a Friend, rather than a Wife, to converſe with, and our own Writers blame him for this opinion: for which and the like paſſages, concerning Marriage, he might be juſtly taxed of Ruſticity in theſe affairs. For this cannot but be with eaſe conceived, that there is one Society of grave Friendſhip, and another amiable and attractive Society of conjugal Love, beſides the deed of Procreation, which of it ſelf ſoon cloys, and is deſpiſed, unleſs it be cheriſht and reincited with a pleaſing Converſation. Which if ignoble and ſwainiſh Minds cannot apprehend, ſhall ſuch merit therfore to be the Cenſurers of more generous and vertuous Spirits?

Againſt the laſt Point of the Poſition, to prove that Contrariety of Mind is not a greater cauſe of Divorce than corporal Frigidity, he enters into ſuch a tedious and drawling tale of Burning, and Burning, and Luſt and Burning, that the dull Argument it ſelf burns too for want of ſtirring; and yet all this Burning is not able to expel the Frigidity of his Brain. So long therfore as that Cauſe in the Poſition ſhall be proved a ſufficient cauſe of Divorce, rather than ſpend words with this fleamy Clod of an Antagoniſt, more than of neceſſity and a little merriment, I will not now contend whether it be a greater Cauſe than Frigidity or no.

His next attempt is upon the Arguments which I brought to prove the Poſition. And for the firſt, not finding it of that ſtructure as to be ſcaled with his ſhort Ladder, he retreats with a Bravado, that it deſerves no Anſwer. And I as much wonder what the whole Book deſerved, to be thus troubled and ſolicited by ſuch a paltry Solicitor. I would he had not caſt the gracious Eye of his Duncery upon the ſmall Deſerts of a Pamphlet, whoſe every Line medled with, uncaſes him to ſcorn and laughter.

That which he takes for the ſecond Argument, if he look better, is no Argument, but an Induction to thoſe that follow. Then he ſtumbles that I ſhould ſay, the gentleſt ends of Marriage, confeſſing that he underſtands it not. And I believe him heartily: For how ſhould he, a Serving-man both by Nature and by Function, an Idiot by Breeding, and a Solicitor by Preſumption, ever come to know or feel within himſelf what the meaning is of gentle? He blames it for a neat Phraſe, for nothing angers him more than his own proper Contrary. Yet altogether without Art ſure he is not; for who could have deviſed to give us more briefly a better deſcription of his own Servility?

But what will become now of the buſineſs I know not; for the Man is ſuddenly taken with a Lunacy of Law, and ſpeaks Revelations out of the Attorneys Academy only from a lying ſpirit: For he ſays, that where a thing is void, ipſo facto, there needs no legal Proceeding to make it void: which is falſe, for Marriage is void by Adultery or Frigidity, yet not made void without legal Proceeding. Then asks my Opinion of John-a-Noaks and John-a-Stiles: and I anſwer him, that I, for my part, think John Dory was a better Man than both of them; for certainly they were the greateſt Wranglers that ever lived, and have fill'd all our Law-books with the obtunding Story of their Suits and Tryals.

After this he tells a miraculous piece of Antiquity, how two Romans, Titus and Sempronius, made Feoffments, at Rome ſure, and levied Forces by the Common Law. But now his fit of Law paſt, yet hardly come to himſelf, he maintains, that if Marriage be void, as being neither of God nor Nature, there needs no legal proceeding to part it, and I tell him that offends not me; Then, quoth he, this is nothing to your Book, being the Doctrin and Diſciplin of Divorce. But that I deny him; for all Diſciplin is not Legal, that is to ſay Juridical, but ſom is Perſonal, ſom Economical, and ſom Eccleſiaſtical.

Laſtly, If I prove that contrary Diſpoſitions are joyned neither of God nor Nature, and ſo the Marriage void, he will give me the Controverſie. I have prov'd it in that Book to any wiſe Man, and without more ado the Inſtitution proves it.

Where I anſwer an objection uſually made, that the Diſpoſition ought to be known before Marriage, and ſhew how difficult it is to chooſe a fit Conſort, and how eaſy to miſtake; the Servitor would know what I mean by Converſation, declaring his Capacity nothing refined ſince his Law-puddering, but ſtill the ſame it was in the Pantry and at the Dreſſer. Shall I argue of Converſation with this Hoyd'n, to go and practiſe at his opportunities in the Larder? To men of Quality I have ſaid enough; and Experience confirms by daily Example that wiſeſt, ſobereſt, juſteſt Men are ſomtimes miſerably miſtaken in thir choice. Whom to leave thus without remedy, toſt and tempeſted in a moſt unquiet Sea of Afflictions and Temptations, I ſay is moſt unchriſtianly.

But he goes on to untruſs my Arguments, imagining them his maſters Points. Only in the paſſage following, I cannot but admire the ripeneſs, and the pregnance of his native treachery, endeavouring to be more a Fox than his wit will ſuffer him. Wheras I briefly mentioned certain Heads of diſcourſe, which I referr'd to a place more proper according to my Method, to be treated ther at full with all thir Reaſons about them, this Brain-worm againſt all the Laws of diſpute, will needs deal with them here. And as a Country Hind, ſomtimes ambitious to ſhew his betters that he is not ſo ſimple as you take him, and that he knows his advantages, will teach us a new trick to confute by. And would you think to what a pride he ſwells in the Contemplation of his rare ſtratagem, offering to carp at the Language of a Book, which yet he confeſſes to be generally commended; while himſelf will be acknowledged by all that read him, the baſeſt and the hungreſt indighter, that could take the boldneſs to look abroad. Obſerve now the Arrogance of a Groom, how it will mount. I had written that common Adultery is a thing which the rankeſt politician would think it ſhame and diſworſhip, that his Law ſhould countenance. Firſt, it offends him, that rankeſt ſhould ſignifie ought but his own ſmell; who that knows Engliſh, would not underſtand me, when I ſay a rank Serving-man, a rank Pettifogger, to mean a meer Serving-man, a meer and arrant Pettifogger, who lately was ſo hardy, as to lay aſide his Buckram-wallet, and make himſelf a fool in Print, with confuting Books which are above him? Next the word Politician is not uſed to his Maw, and therupon he plays the moſt notorions Hobby-horſe, jeſting and friſking in the Luxury of his Nonſence with ſuch poor fetches to cog a laughter from us, that no antic Hobnail at a Morris, but is more handſomly facetious.

Concerning that place Deut. 24. 1. which he ſaith to be the main Pillar of my Opinion, though I rely more on the Inſtitution than on that: Theſe two Pillars I do indeed confeſs are to me as thoſe two in the Porch of the Temple, Jachin and Boaz, which names import Eſtabliſhment and Strength; nor do I fear who can ſhake them. The Expoſition of Deut. which I brought, is the received Expoſition, both antient and modern, by all Learned Men, unleſs it be a Monkiſh Papiſt here and there: and the Gloſs which he and his obſcure Aſſiſtant would perſwade us to, is meerly new and abſurd, preſuming out of his utter ignorance in the Hebrew, to interpret theſe words of the Text, firſt, in a miſtaken ſenſe of uncleanneſs, againſt all approved Writers. Secondly, in a limited ſenſe, whenas the Original ſpeaks without limitation, ſom uncleanneſs or any: and it had been a wiſe Law indeed to mean it ſelf particular, and not to expreſs the caſe which this acute Rabbi hath all this while been hooking for; wherby they who are moſt partial to him may gueſs that ſomthing is in this Doctrin which I alledg, that forces the Adverſary to ſuch a new and ſtrained Expoſition: Wherin he does nothing for above four Pages, but founder himſelf to and fro in his own Objections; one while denying that Divorce was permitted, another while affirming that it was permitted for the Wives ſake, and after all, diſtruſts himſelf. And for his ſureſt retirement, betakes him to thoſe old Suppoſitions, that Chriſt aboliſht the Moſaic Law of Divorce; that the Jews had not ſufficient knowledg in this point, through the darkneſs of the Diſpenſation of heavenly things; that under the plenteous Grace of the Goſpel, we are tied by cruelleſt compulſion to live in Marriage till death, with the wickedeſt, the worſt, the moſt perſecuting Mate. Theſe ignorant and doting ſurmiſes he might have read confuted at large, even in the firſt Edition, but found it ſafer to paſs that part over in ſilence. So that they who ſee not the ſottiſhneſs of this his new and tedious Expoſition, are worthy to love it dearly.

His Explanation don, he charges me with a wicked Gloſs, and almoſt Blaſphemy, for ſaying that Chriſt in teaching, meant not always to be taken word for word; but like a wiſe Phyſician, adminiſtring one Exceſs againſt another, to reduce us to a perfect mean. Certainly to teach thus, were no diſhoneſt method: Chriſt himſelf hath often uſed Hyberboles in his teaching; and graveſt Authors, both Ariſtotle in the ſecond of his Ethics to Nichomachus, and Seneca in his ſeventh de Beneficiis, adviſe us to ſtretch out the Line of Precept oft-times beyond meaſure, that while we tend further, the mean might be the eaſier attained. And whoever comments that 5th of Matthew, when he comes to the turning of Cheek after Cheek to blows, and the parting both with Cloak and Coat, if any pleaſe to be the rifler, will be forced to recommend himſelf to the ſame Expoſition, though this chattering Law-monger be bold to call it wicked. Now note another precious piece of him; Chriſt, ſaith he, doth not ſay that an unchaſt look is Adultery, but the luſting after her; as if the looking unchaſtly could be without luſting. This gear is licenſed for good reaſon, Imprimatur.

Next he would prove that the Speech of Chriſt is not utter'd in exceſs againſt the Phariſees, firſt, Becauſe he ſpeaks it to his Diſciples, Matth. 5. which is falſe, for he ſpake it to the Multitude, as by the firſt Verſe is evident, among which in all likelyhood were many Phariſes, but out of doubt, all of them Phariſean Diſciples, and bred up in thir Doctrin; from which extreams of Error and Falſity, Chriſt throughout his whole Sermon labours to reclaim the People. Secondly, ſaith he, becauſe Chriſt forbids not only putting away, but marrying her who is put away. Acutely, as if the Phariſes might not have offended as much in marrying the Divorc'd, as in divorcing the Married. The Precept may bind all, rightly underſtood; and yet the vehement manner of giving it, may be occaſion'd only by the Phariſes.

Finally, he winds up his Text with much doubt and trepidation; for it may be his Trenchers were not ſcrap'd, and that which never yet afforded Corn of Savour to his Noddle, the Salt-ſeller was not rubb'd: and therfore in this haſt eaſily granting, that his Anſwers fall foul upon each other, and praying, you would not think he writes, as a Prophet, but as a Man, he runs to the Black Jack, fills his Flagon, ſpreads the Table, and ſerves up Dinner.

After waiting and voiding, he thinks to void my ſecond Argument, and the contradictions that will follow both in the Law and Goſpel, if the Moſaic Law were abrogated by our Saviour, and a compulſive Prohibition fixt inſtead: and ſings his old Song, that the Goſpel counts unlawful that which the Law allow'd, inſtancing in Circumciſion, Sacrifices, Waſhings. But what are theſe ceremonial things to the changing of a moral point in houſhold Duty, equally belonging to Jew and Gentile? Divorce was then right, now wrong; then permitted in the rigorous time of Law, now forbidd'n by Law, even to the moſt extreamly afflicted, in the favourable time of Grace and Freedom. But this is not for an unbutton'd fellow to diſcuſs in the Garret at his Treſle, and dimenſion of Candle by the Snuff; which brought forth his cullionly Paraphraſe on St. Paul, whom he brings in, diſcourſing ſuch idle ſtuff to the Maids and Widows, as his own ſervile Inurbanity forbears not to put into the Apoſtle's mouth, of the Souls converſing: and this he preſumes to do, being a Bayard, who never had the ſoul to know what converſing means, but as his Provender, and the familiarity of the Kitchin ſchool'd his conceptions.

He paſſes to the third Argument, like a Boar in a Vineyard, doing naught elſe, but ſtill as he goes champing and chewing over, what I could mean by this Chimera of a fit converſing ſoul, Notions and Words never made for theſe chops; but like a generous Wine, only by over-working the ſettled Mud of his fancy, to make him drunk, and diſgorge his vileneſs the more openly. All perſons of gentle Breeding (I ſay gentle, though this Barrow grunt at the word) I know will apprehend, and be ſatisfied in what I ſpake, how unpleaſing and diſcontenting the Society of Body muſt needs be between thoſe whoſe Minds cannot be ſociable. But what ſhould a Man ſay more to a Snout in this pickle? what Language can be low and degenerate enough?

The fourth Argument which I had, was, That Marriage being a Covenant, the very being wherof conſiſts in the Performance of unfained Love and Peace; if that wer not tolerably performed, the Cov'nant became broke and revocable. Which how can any, in whoſe mind the principles of right Reaſon and Juſtice are not cancell'd, deny? for how can a thing ſubſiſt, when the true Eſſence therof is diſſolved? Yet this he denies, and yet in ſuch a manner as alters my aſſertion; for he puts in, though the main end be not attain'd in full meaſure: but my Poſition is, if it be not tolerably attained, as throughout the whole Diſcourſe is apparent.

Now for his Reaſons; Heman found not that Peace and Solace which is the main end of Communion with God, ſhould he therfore break off that Communion?

I anſwer, That if Heman found it not, the fault was certainly his own: but in Marriage it happ'ns far otherwiſe: ſomtimes the fault is plainly not his who ſeeks Divorce: ſomtimes it cannot be diſcern'd whoſe fault it is; and therfore cannot in Reaſon or Equity be the matter of an abſolute Prohibition.

His other inſtance declares, what a right Handicrafts-man he is of petty Caſes, and how unfit to be ought elſe at higheſt, but a Hackney of the Law. I change Houſes with a man; it is ſuppoſed I do it for my own ends; I attain them not in this Houſe; I ſhall not therfore go from my Bargain. How without fear might the young Charinus in Andria now cry out, What likeneſs can be here to a Marriage? In this Bargain was no Capitulation, but the yielding of Poſſeſſion to one another, wherin each of them had his ſeveral end apart? in Marriage there is a ſolemn Vow of Love and Fidelity each to other: this Bargain is fully accompliſht in the change; in Marriage the Covenant ſtill is in performing. If one of them perform nothing tolerably, but inſtead of Love, abound in Diſaffection, Diſobedience, Fraud and Hatred; what thing in the nature of a Covenant ſhall bind the other to ſuch a perdurable miſchief? Keep to your Problems of Ten groats, theſe matters are not for Pragmaticks, and Folk-mooters to babble in.

Concerning the place of Paul, that God hath called us to peace, 1 Cor. 7. And therfore certainly, if any-where in this World, we have a right to claim it reaſonably in Marriage, it is plain enough in the ſenſe which I gave, and confeſt by Paræus, and other Orthodox Divines, to be a good ſenſe, and this Anſwerer doth not weak'n it. The other place, that he who hateth, may put away, which, if I ſhew him, he promiſes to yield the whole Controverſie, is, beſides Deut. 24. 1. Deut. 21. 14. and before this, Exod. 21. 8. Of Malachy I have ſpoken more in another place; and ſay again, that the beſt Interpreters, all the Antient, and moſt of the Modern tranſlate it, as I cite it, and very few otherwiſe, wherof perhaps Junius is the chief.

Another thing troubles him, that Marriage is called the myſtery of Joy. Let it ſtill trouble him; for what hath he to do either with joy or with myſtery? He thinks it frantick Divinity to ſay, it is not the outward continuance of Marriage that keeps the Covenant of Marriage whole; but whoſoever doth moſt according to peace and love, whether in Marriage or Divorce, he breaks Marriage leaſt. If I ſhall ſpell it to him, he breaks Marriage leaſt, is to ſay, he diſhonours not Marriage; for leaſt is taken in the Bible, and other good Authors, for, not at all. And a particular Marriage a Man may break, if for a lawful Cauſe, and yet not break, that is, not violate, or diſhonour the Ordinance of Marriage. Hence theſe two Queſtions that follow, are left ridiculous; and the Maids at Algate, whom he flouts, are likely to have more Wit than the Serving-man at Addle-gate.

Wheras he taxes me of adding to the Scripture, in that I ſaid Love only is the fulfilling of every Commandment, I cited no particular Scripture, but ſpake a general ſenſe, which might be collected from many places. For ſeeing Love includes Faith, what is there that can fulfil every Commandment but only Love? and I meant, as any intelligent Reader might apprehend, every poſitive and civil Commandment, wherof Chriſt hath taught us that Man is the Lord. It is not the formal Duty of Worſhip, or the ſitting ſtill, that keeps the holy Reſt of Sabbath; but whoſoever doth moſt according to Charity, whether he works or works not, he breaks the holy Reſt of Sabbath leaſt. So Marriage being a Civil Ordinance, made for Man, not Man for it; he who doth that which moſt accords with Charity, firſt to himſelf, next to whom he next owes it, whether in Marriage or Divorce, he breaks the Ordinance of Marriage leaſt. And what in religious Prudence can be Charity to himſelf, and what to his Wife, either in continuing, or in diſſolving the Marriag-knot, hath been already oft enough diſcourſed. So that what St. Paul ſaith of Circumciſion, the ſame I ſtick not to ſay of a Civil Ordinance, made to the good and comfort of Man, not to his ruin; Marriage is nothing, and Divorce is nothing, but Faith which worketh by Love. And this I truſt none can miſtake.

Againſt the fifth Argument, That a Chriſtian in a higher Order of Prieſthood than that Levitical, is a perſon dedicate to Joy and Peace; and therefore needs not in ſubjection to a Civil Ordinance, made to no other end but for his good, ( when without his fault he finds it impoſſible to be decently or tolerably obſerved ) to plunge himſelf into immeaſurable Diſtractions and Temptations, above his ſtrength; againſt this he proves nothing, but gads into ſilly conjectures of what Abuſes would follow, and with as good reaſon might declaim againſt the beſt things that are.

Againſt the ſixth Argument, That to force the Continuance of Marriage between Minds found utterly unfit and diſproportional, is againſt Nature, and ſeems forbid under that allegorical Precept of Moſes, not to ſow a Field with divers Seeds, leſt both be defiled; not to plough with an Ox and an Aſs together, which I deduced by the pattern of St. Paul's reaſoning what was meant by not muzling the Ox; he rambles over a long Narration, to tell us that by the Oxen are meant the Preachers: which is not doubted. Then he demands if this my reaſoning be like St. Paul's? and I anſwer him, Yes: He replys, that ſure St. Paul would be aſham'd to reaſon thus. And I tell him, No. He grants that place which I alledged, 2 Cor. 6. of unequal yoking, may allude to that of Moſes, but ſays, I cannot prove it makes to my purpoſe, and ſhews not firſt how he can diſprove it. Waigh, Gentlemen, and conſider, whether my Affirmations, backt with Reaſon, may hold ballance againſt the bare Denials of this ponderous Confuter, elected by his ghoſtly Patrons to be my Copesmate.

Proceeding on to ſpeak of myſterious things in Nature, I had occaſion to fit the Language therafter, matters not; for the reading of this odious Fool, who thus ever when he meets with ought above the cogitation of his Breeding, leaves the noiſom ſtench of his rude Slot behind him, maligning that any thing ſhould be ſpoke or underſtood above his own genuin baſeneſs; and gives ſentence that his confuting hath been imployed about a frothy, immeritous and undeſerving Diſcourſe. Who could have believed ſo much Inſolence durſt vent it ſelf from out the Hide of a Varlet, as thus to cenſure that which Men of mature judgment have applauded to be writ with good Reaſon? But this contents him not, he falls now to rave in his barbarous abuſiveneſs; and why? a reaſon befitting ſuch an Artificer, becauſe he ſaith the Book is contrary to all human Learning; whenas the World knows, that all, both Human and Divine Learning, till the Canon-Law, allow'd Divorce by conſent, and for many Cauſes without conſent. Next he dooms it as contrary to Truth; whenas it hath been diſputable among Learned Men ever ſince it was prohibited: and is by Peter Martyr thought an Opinion not impious, but hard to be refuted; and by Eraſmus deem'd a Doctrin ſo charitable and pious, as, if it cannot be uſed, were to be wiſhed it could; but is by Martin Bucer, a man of deareſt and moſt religious Memory in the Church, taught and maintained to be either moſt lawfully uſed, or moſt lawfully permitted. And for this, for I affirm no more than Bucer, what cenſure do you think, Readers, he hath condemned the Book to? To a death no leſs impious than to be burnt by the Hangman. Mr. Licenſer, for I deal not now with this Caitiff, never worth my Earneſt, and now not ſeaſonable for my Jeſt, you are reputed a Man diſcreet enough, religious enough, honeſt enough, that is, to an ordinary competence in all theſe. But now your turn is, to hear what your own hand hath earned ye; that when you ſuffered this nameleſs Hangman to caſt into publick ſuch a deſpiteful Contumely upon a Name and Perſon deſerving of the Church and State equally to your ſelf, and one who hath done more to the preſent advancement of your own Tribe, than you or many of them have done for themſelves; you forgot to be either honeſt, religious, or diſcreet. Whatever the State might do concerning it, ſuppos'd a matter to expect Evil from, I ſhould not doubt to meet among them with wiſe, and honourable, and knowing Men. But as to this brute Libel, ſo much the more impudent and lawleſs for the abuſed Authority which it bears; I ſay again, that I abominate the Cenſure of Raſcals and thir Licenſers.

With difficulty I return to what remains of this ignoble Task, for the diſdain I have to change a period more with the filth and venom of this Gourmand, ſwell'd into a Confuter; yet, for the ſatisfaction of others, I endure all this.

Againſt the ſeventh Argument, That if the Canon-Law and Divines allow Divorce for Conſpiracy of Death, they may as well allow it to avoid the ſame conſequence from the likelihood of natural Cauſes:

Firſt, he denies that the Canon ſo decrees.

I anſwer, That it decrees for danger of Life, as much as for Adultery. Decret. Gregor. l. 4. tit. 19. and in other places: And the beſt Civilians who cite the Canon-Law, ſo collect, as Schneidewin in Inſtitut. tit. 10. p. 4. de Divort. And indeed, who would have denied it, but one of a reprobate Ignorance in all he medles with?

Secondly, He ſaith, the caſe alters; for there the Offender, who ſeeks the Life, doth implicitly at leaſt act a Divorce.

And I anſwer, That here Nature, though no Offender, doth the ſame. But if an Offender by acting a Divorce, ſhall releaſe the offended, this is an ample grant againſt himſelf. He ſaith, Nature teaches to ſave life from one who ſeeks it. And I ſay, ſhe teaches no leſs to ſave it from any other Cauſe that endangers it: He ſaith, that here they are both Actors. Admit they were, it would not be uncharitable to part them; yet ſomtimes they are not both Actors, but the one of them moſt lamentedly paſſive. So he concludes, We muſt not take advantage of our own Faults and Corruptions to releaſe us from our Duties. But ſhall we take no advantage to ſave our ſelves from the faults of another, who hath annull'd his right to our Duty? No, ſaith he, let them die of the Sullens, and try who will pity them. Barbarian, the ſhame of all honeſt Attorneys, why do they not hoiſe him over the Bar, and blanket him?

Againſt the eigth Argument, That they who are deſtitute of all marriageable Gifts, except a Body not plainly unfit, have not the calling to marry, and conſequently married and ſo found, may be divorced: this, he ſaith, is nothing to the purpoſe, and not fit to be anſwer'd. I leave it therfore to the judgment of his Maſters.

Againſt the ninth Argument, That Marriage is a human Society, and ſo chiefly ſeated in Agreement and Unity of Mind: If therfore the Mind cannot have that due Society by Marriage, that it may reaſonably and humanly deſire, it can be no human Society, and ſo not without reaſon divorcible: here he falſifies, and turns what the Poſition required of a reaſonable Agreement in the main matters of Society into an Agreement in all things, which makes the Opinion not mine, and ſo he leaves it.

At laſt and in good hour, we are come to his farewel, which is to be a concluding taſte of his Jabberment in Law, the flaſhieſt and fuſtieſt that ever corrupted in ſuch an unſwill'd Hogſhead.

Againſt my tenth Argument, as he calls it, but as I intended it, my other Poſition, That Divorce is not a thing determinable by a compulſive Law, for that all Law is for ſome good that may be frequently attained without the admixture of a worſe inconvenience: But the Law forbidding Divorce, never attains to any good end of ſuch Prohibition, but rather multiplies Evil; therfore the Prohibition of Divorce is no good Law. Now for his Attorneys priſe: but firſt, like a right cunning and ſturdy Logician, he denies my Argument, not mattering whether in the major or minor; and ſaith there are many Laws made for Good, and yet that Good is not attained, through the defaults of the Party, but a greater inconvenience follows.

But I reply, That this Anſwer builds upon a ſhallow foundation, and moſt unjuſtly ſuppoſes every one in default, who ſeeks Divorce from the moſt injurious Wedloc. The default therfore will be found in the Law it ſelf; which is neither able to puniſh the Offender, but the Innocent muſt withal ſuffer; nor can right the Innocent in what is chiefly ſought, the obtainment of Love or Quietneſs. His Inſtances out of the Common Law are all ſo quite beſide the matter which he would prove, as may be a Warning to all Clients how they venture thir buſineſs with ſuch a cockbrain'd Solicitor. For being to ſhew ſome Law of England, attaining to no good end, and yet through no default of the party, who is therby debar'd all remedy, he ſhews us only how ſome do loſe the benefit of good Laws through thir own default. His firſt Example ſaith, it is a juſt Law that every one ſhall peaceably enjoy his Eſtate in Lands or otherwiſe. Does this Law attain to no good end? the Bar will bluſh at this moſt incogitant Woodcock. But ſee if a draſt of Littleton will recover him to his Senſes. If this man having Fee-ſimple in his Lands, yet will take a Leaſe of his own Lands from another, this ſhall be an Eſtopple to him in an Aſſize from the recovering of his own Land.

Mark now and regiſter him! How many are there of ten thouſand who have ſuch a Fee-ſimple in thir Sconſe, as to take a Leaſe of thir own Lands from another? So that this inconvenience lights upon ſcarce one in an Age, and by his own default; and the Law of enjoying each Man his own, is good to all others. But on the contrary, this Prohibition of Divorce is good to none, and brings inconvenience to Numbers, who lie under intolerable Grievances without thir own default, through the wickedneſs or folly of another ; and all this iniquity the Law remedies not, but in a manner maintains. His other Caſes are directly to the ſame purpoſe, and might have been ſpared, but that he is a Tradeſman of the Law, and muſt be born with at his firſt ſetting up, to lay forth his beſt Ware, which is only gibberiſh.

I have now don that, which for many Cauſes I might have thought, could not likely have been my fortune, to be put to this under-work of ſcowring and unrubbiſhing the low and ſordid Ignorance of ſuch a preſumptuous Lozel. Yet Hercules had the labour once impoſed upon him to carry Dung out of the Augean Stable. At any hand I would be rid of him: for I had rather, ſince the life of Man is likened to a Scene, that all my Entrances and Exits might mix with ſuch perſons only, whoſe Worth erects them and thir Actions to a grave and tragic Deportment, and not to have to do with Clowns and Vices. But if a man cannot peaceably walk into the World, but muſt be infeſted; ſomtimes at his face with Dorrs and Horſe-flies, ſomtimes beneath with bawling Whippets and Shin-barkers, and theſe to be ſet on by Plot and Conſultation with a Junto of Clergymen and Licenſers, commended alſo and rejoyced in by thoſe whoſe partiality cannot yet forgo old papiſtical Principles; have I not cauſe to be in ſuch a manner defenſive, as may procure me freedom to paſs more unmoleſted hereafter by thoſe Incumbrances, not ſo much regarded for themſelves, as for thoſe who incite them? And what defence can properly be uſed in ſuch a deſpicable Encounter as this, but either the Slap or the Spurn? If they can afford me none but a ridiculous Adverſary, the blame belongs not to me, though the whole Diſpute be ſtrew'd and ſcatter'd with Ridiculous? And if he have ſuch an ambition to know no better who are his Mates, but among theſe needy Thoughts, which, though his two Faculties of Serving-man and Solicitor ſhould compound into one Mongrel, would be but thin and meagre, if in this penury of Soul he can be poſſible to have the luſtineſs to think of Fame, let him but ſend me how he calls himſelf, and I may chance not fail to indorſe him on the backſide of Poſterity, not a golden, but a brazen Aſs. Since my fate extorts from me a Talent of Sport, which I had thought to hide in a Napkin, he ſhall be my Batrachomuomachia, my Bavius, my Calandrino, the common Adagy of ignorance and overweening: Nay perhaps, as the provocation may be, I may be driven to curl up this gliding Proſe into a rough Sotadic, that ſhall rime him into ſuch a condition, as inſtead of judging good Books to be burnt by the Executioner, he ſhall be readier to be his own Hangman. Thus much to this Nuiſance.

But as for the Subject it ſelf which I have writ and now defend, according as the oppoſition bears; if any man equal to the matter, ſhall think it appertains him to take in hand this Controverſy, either excepting againſt ought written, or perſwaded he can ſhew better how this Queſtion of ſuch moment, to be throughly known, may receive a true determination, not leaning on the old and rott'n Suggeſtions wheron it yet leans; if his Intents be ſincere to the publick, and ſhall carry him on without bitterneſs to the opinion, or to the perſon diſſenting, let him not, I entreat him, gueſs by the handling, which meritoriouſly hath been beſtowed on this object of contempt and laughter, that I account it any diſpleaſure don me to be contradicted in Print: But as it leads to the attainment of any thing more true, ſhall eſteem it a benefit; and ſhall know how to return his Civility and fair Argument in ſuch a ſort, as he ſhall confeſs that to do ſo is my Choice, and to have don thus was my Chance.

THey, who to States and Governours of the Commonwealth direct thir Speech, High Court of Parlament, or wanting ſuch acceſs in a private condition, write that which they foreſee may advance the publick good; I ſuppoſe them as at the beginning of no mean endeavour, not a little alter'd and mov'd inwardly in thir minds: Some with doubt of what will be the ſucceſs, others with fear of what will be the cenſure; ſome with hope, others with confidence of what they have to ſpeak. And me perhaps each of theſe diſpoſitions, as the ſubject was wheron I enter'd, may have at other times variouſly affected; and likely might in theſe formoſt expreſſions, now alſo diſcloſe which of them ſway'd moſt, but that the very attempt of this Addreſs thus made, and the thought of whom it hath recourſe to, hath got the power within me to a paſſion, far more welcom then incidental to a Preface. Which though I ſtay not to confeſs ere any ask, I ſhall be blameleſs, if it be no other, then the joy and gratulation which it brings to all who wiſh and promote thir Countries Liberty; wherof this whole Diſcourſe propos'd will be a certain Teſtimony, if not a Trophy. For this is not the Liberty which we can hope, that no grievance ever ſhould ariſe in the Commonwealth, that let no man in this World expect; but when complaints are freely heard, deeply conſider'd, and ſpeedily reform'd, then is the utmoſt bound of civil Liberty attain'd, that wiſe men look for. To which if I now manifeſt, by the very ſound of this which I ſhall utter, that we are already in good part arriv'd, and yet from ſuch a ſteep diſadvantage of tyranny and ſuperſtition grounded into our principles, as was beyond the manhood of a Roman recovery, it will be attributed firſt, as is moſt due, to the ſtrong aſſiſtance of God, our Deliverer, next to your faithful guidance and undaunted Wiſdom, Lords and Commons of England. Neither is it in God's eſteem, the diminution of his glory, when honourable things are ſpoken of good men, and worthy Magiſtrates; which if I now firſt ſhould begin to do, after ſo fair a progreſs of your laudable deeds, and ſuch a long obligement upon the whole Realm to your indefatigable vertues, I might be juſtly reckn'd among the tardieſt, and the unwillingeſt of them that praiſe ye. Nevertheles there being three principal things, without which all praiſing is but courtſhip and flattery, Firſt, when that only is prais'd which is ſolidly worth praiſe; next when greateſt likelihoods are brought, that ſuch things are truly and really in thoſe perſons, to whom they are aſcrib'd; the other, when he who praiſes, by ſhewing that ſuch his actual perſwaſion is of whom he writes, can demonſtrate that he flatters not: the former two of theſe I have heretofore endeavour'd, reſcuing the employment from him who went about to impair your merits, with a trivial and malignant Encomium; the latter as belonging chiefly to mine own acquittal, that whom I ſo extoll'd I did not flatter, hath been reſerv'd opportunely to this occaſion. For he who freely magnifies what hath been nobly don, and fears not to declare as freely what might be don better, gives ye the beſt cov'nant of his fidelity; and that his loyaleſt affection and his hope waits on your proceedings. His higheſt praiſing is not flattery, and his plaineſt advice is a kind of praiſing; for tho I ſhould affirm and hold by argument, that it would fare better with Truth, with Learning, and the Commonwealth, if one of your publiſht Orders which I ſhould name, were call'd in, yet at the ſame time it could not but much redound to the luſtre of your mild and equal Government, whenas private perſons are hereby animated to think ye better pleas'd with public advice, then other Statiſts have been delighted heretofore with public flattery. And men will then ſee what difference there is between the magnanimity of a triennial Parlament, and that jealous hautineſs of Prelats and cabin Counſellors that uſurpt of late, whenas they ſhall obſerve ye in the midſt of your Victories and Succeſſes more gently brooking writt'n exceptions againſt a voted Order, then other Courts, which had produc'd nothing worth memory but the weak oſtentation of wealth, would have endur'd the leaſt ſignifi'd diſlike at any ſudden Proclamation. If I ſhould thus far preſume upon the meek demeanour of your civil and gentle greatneſs, Lords and Commons, as what your publiſht Order hath directly ſaid, that to gainſay, I might defend my ſelf with eaſe, if any ſhould accuſe me of being new or inſolent, did they but know how much better I find ye eſteem it to imitate the old and elegant humanity of Greece, then the barbaric pride of a Hunniſh and Norwegian ſtatelines. And out of thoſe ages, to whoſe polite wiſdom and letters we ow that we are not yet Gothes and Jutlanders, I could name him who from his private houſe wrote that diſcourſe to the Parlament of Athens, that perſwades them to change the form of Democraty which was then eſtabliſht. Such honour was done in thoſe days to men who profeſt the ſtudy of Wiſdom and Eloquence, not only in thir own Country, but in other Lands, that Cities and Siniories heard them gladly, and with great reſpect, if they had ought in public to admoniſh the State. Thus did Dion Pruſæus, a ſtranger, and a private Orator, counſel the Rhodians againſt a former Edict: and I abound with other like examples, which to ſet heer would be ſuperfluous. But if from the induſtry of a life wholly dedicated to ſtudious labours, and thoſe natural endowments haply not the worſt for two and fifty degrees of northern latitude, ſo much muſt be derogated, as to count me not equal to any of thoſe who had this privilege, I would obtain to be thought not ſo inferior, as your ſelves are ſuperior to the moſt of them who receiv'd thir counſel: and how far you excel them, be aſſur'd, Lords and Commons, there can no greater teſtimony appear, then when your prudent ſpirit acknowledges and obeys the voice of reaſon, from what quarter ſoever it be heard ſpeaking; and renders ye as willing to repeal any Act of your own ſetting forth, as any ſet forth by your Predeceſſors.

If ye be thus reſolv'd, as it were injury to think ye were not, I know not what ſhould withhold me from preſenting ye with a fit inſtance wherin to ſhew both that love of truth which ye eminently profeſs, and that uprightneſs of your judgment which is not wont to be partial to your ſelves; by judging over again that Order which ye have ordain'd to regulate Printing: That no Book, Pamphlet, or Paper ſhall be henceforth printed, unleſs the ſame be firſt approv'd and licenc'd by ſuch, or at leaſt one of ſuch as ſhall be therto appointed. For that part which preſerves juſtly every mans Copy to himſelf, or provides for the poor, I touch not, only wiſh they be not made pretences to abuſe and perſecute honeſt and painful Men, who offend not in either of theſe particulars. But that other clauſe of Licencing Books, which we thought had dy'd with his brother quadrageſimal and matrimonial when the Prelats expir'd, I ſhall now attend with ſuch a Homily, as ſhall lay before ye, firſt the Inventors of it to be thoſe whom ye will be loth to own; next what is to be thought in general of reading, whatever ſort the Books be; and that this Order avails nothing to the ſuppreſſing of ſcandalous, ſeditious, and libellous Books, which were mainly intended to be ſuppreſt. Laſt, that it will be primely to the diſcouragement of all Learning, and the ſtop of Truth, not only by diſexerciſing and blunting our abilities, in what we know already, but by hindring and cropping the diſcovery that might be yet further made, both in religious and civil Wiſdom.

I deny not, but that it is of greateſt concernment in the Church and Commonwealth, to have a vigilant eye how Books demean themſelves as well as Men; and therafter to confine, impriſon, and do ſharpeſt juſtice on them as malefactors: For Books are not abſolutely dead things, but do contain a potencie of life in them to be as active as that ſoul was whoſe progeny they are; nay they do preſerve as in a viol the pureſt efficacy and extraction of that living intellect that bred them. I know they are as lively, and as vigorouſly productive, as thoſe fabulous Dragons teeth; and being ſown up and down, may chance to ſpring up armed Men. And yet on the other hand, unleſs warineſs be us'd, as good almoſt kill a Man as kill a good Book: who kills a Man kills a reaſonable Creature, God's Image; but he who deſtroys a good Book, kills Reaſon it ſelf, kills the Image of God, as it were in the eye. Many a man lives a burden to the Earth; but a good Book is the pretious life-blood of a maſter ſpirit, imbalm'd and treaſur'd up on purpoſe to a life beyond life. 'Tis true, no age can reſtore a life, wherof perhaps there is no great loſs; and revolutions of ages do not oft recover the loſs of a rejected Truth, for the want of which whole Nations fare the worſe. We ſhould be wary therfore what Perſecution we raiſe againſt the living Labours of publick men, how we ſpill that ſeaſon'd life of Man, preſerv'd and ſtor'd up in Books; ſince we ſee a kind of Homicide may be thus committed, ſometimes a Martyrdom; and if it extend to the whole impreſſion, a kind of maſſacre, wherof the execution ends not in the ſlaying of an elemental life, but ſtrikes at that ethereal and fift eſſence, the breath of Reaſon it ſelf, ſlays an immortality rather then a life. But leſt I ſhould be condemn'd of introducing Licenſe, while I oppoſe Licenſing, I refuſe not the pains to be ſo much hiſtorical, as will ſerve to ſhew what hath been don by ancient and famous Commonwealths, againſt this diſorder, till the very time that this project of Licenſing crept out of the Inquiſition, was catcht up by our Prelats, and hath caught ſome of our Presbyters.

In Athens, where Books and Wits were ever buſier then in any other part of Greece, I find but only two ſorts of Writings which the Magiſtrate car'd to take notice of; thoſe either Blaſphemous and Atheiſtical, or Libellous. Thus the Books of Protagoras were by the Judges of Areopagus, commanded to be burnt, and himſelf baniſht the Territory for a diſcourſe, begun with his confeſſing not to know, whether there were gods, or whether not. And againſt Defaming, it was decreed that none ſhould be traduc'd by name, as was the manner of Vetus Comœdia, wherby we may gueſs how they cenſur'd Libelling: And this courſe was quick enough, as Cicero writes, to quell both the deſperate Wits of other Atheiſts, and the open way of Defaming, as the event ſhew'd. Of other Sects and Opinions, though tending to Voluptuouſneſs, and the denying of divine Providence, they took no heed. Therfore we do not read that either Epicurus, or that Libertine School of Cyrene, or what the Cynick impudence utter'd, was ever queſtion'd by the Laws. Neither is it recorded, that the Writings of thoſe old Comedians were ſuppreſt, though the acting of them were forbid; and that Plato commended the reading of Ariſtophanes, the looſeſt of them all, to his Royal Scholar Dionyſius, is commonly known, and may be excus'd, if holy Chryſoſtom, as is reported, nightly ſtudied ſo much the ſame Author, and had the Art to cleanſe a ſcurrilous Vehemence, into the ſtile of a rouſing Sermon. That other leading City of Greece, Lacedæmon, conſidering that Lycurgus thir Law-giver was ſo addicted to elegant Learning, as to have been the firſt that brought out of Ionia the ſcatter'd Works of Homer, and ſent the Poet Thales from Crete to prepare and mollifie the Spartan ſurlineſs with his ſmooth Songs and Odes, the better to plant among them Law and Civility, it is to be wonder'd how muſeleſs and unbookiſh they were, minding nought but the feats of War. There needed no Licenſing of Books among them, for they diſlik'd all but thir own Laconick Apothegms, and took a ſlight occaſion to chaſe Archilochus out of thir City, perhaps for compoſing in a higher ſtrain then their own ſouldierly Ballats and Roundels could reach to: Or if it were for his broad Verſes, they were not therin ſo cautious, but they were as diſſolute in thir promiſcuous converſing; whence Euripides affirms in Andromache, that thir Women were all unchaſte. Thus much may give us light after what ſort Books were prohibited among the Greeks. The Romans alſo, for many Ages train'd up only to a military roughnes, reſembling moſt the Lacedæmonian guiſe, knew of Learning little but what thir twelve Tables, and the Pontific College with thir Augurs and Flamins taught them in Religion and Law, ſo unacquainted with other Learning, that when Carneades and Critolaus, with the Stoick Diogenes coming Embaſſadors to Rome, took therby occaſion to give the City a taſt of thir Philoſophy, they were ſuſpected for Seducers by no leſs a man then Cato the Cenſor, who mov'd it in the Senat to diſmiſs them ſpeedily, and to baniſh all ſuch Attic Bablers out of Italy. But Scipio and others of the nobleſt Senators withſtood him and his old Sabin auſterity; honour'd and admir'd the Men; and the Cenſor himſelf at laſt in his old age fell to the ſtudy of that wherof before he was ſo ſcrupulous. And yet at the ſame time, Nævius and Plautus, the firſt Latin Comedians, had fill'd the City with all the borrow'd Scenes of Menander and Philemon. Then began to be conſider'd there alſo what was to be done to libellous Books and Authors; for Nevius was quickly caſt into Priſon for his unbridl'd Pen, and releas'd by the Tribunes upon his Recantation: We read alſo that Libels were burnt, and the makers puniſht by Auguſtus. The like ſeverity, no doubt, was us'd, if ought were impiouſly writt'n againſt thir eſteemed gods. Except in theſe two points, how the World went in Books, the Magiſtrat kept no reck'ning. And therfore Lucretius, without impeachment, verſifies his Epicuriſm to Memmius, and had the honour to be ſet forth the ſecond time by Cicero, ſo great a Father of the Commonwealth; although himſelf diſputes againſt that Opinion in his own Writings. Nor was the Satyrical ſharpneſs, or naked plainneſs of Lucilius, or Catullus, or Flaccus, by any Order prohibited. And for matters of State, the ſtory of Titus Livius, though it extoll'd that part which Pompey held, was not therfore ſuppreſt by Octavius Cæſar, of the other Faction. But that Naſo was by him baniſht in his Old age, for the wanton Poems of his Youth, was but a meer covert of State over ſome ſecret Cauſe: and beſides, the Books were neither baniſht nor call'd in. From hence we ſhall meet with little elſe but Tyranny in the Roman Empire, that we may not marvel, if not ſo often bad, as good Books were ſilenc'd. I ſhall therfore deem to have bin large enough, in producing what among the Ancients was puniſhable to write, ſave only which, all other Arguments were free to treat on.

By this time the Emperors were becom Chriſtians, whoſe diſciplin in this point I do not find to have bin more ſevere then what was formerly in practice. The Books of thoſe whom they took to be grand Heretics were examin'd, refuted, and condemn'd in the general Councels; and not till then were prohibited, or burnt by autority of the Emperor. As for the Writings of Heathen Authors, unleſs they were plain invectives againſt Chriſtianity, as thoſe of Porphyrius and Proclus, they met with no interdict that can be cited, till about the Year 400, in a Carthaginian Councel, wherin Biſhops themſelves were forbid to read the Books of Gentiles, but Hereſies they might read: while others long before them on the contrary ſcrupl'd more the Books of Heretics, then of Gentiles. And that the primitive Councels and Biſhops were wont only to declare what Books were not commendable, paſſing no furder, but leaving it to each ones conſcience to read or to lay by, till after the Year 800, is obſerv'd already by Padre Paolo the great unmaſker of the Trentine Councel. After which time the Popes of Rome engroſſing what they pleas'd of Political rule into thir own hands, extended thir dominion over mens eyes, as they had before over thir judgments, burning and prohibiting to be read what they fanſied not; yet ſparing in thir cenſures, and the Books not many which they ſo dealt with: till Martin the 5th by his Bull not only prohibited, but was the firſt that excommunicated the reading of heretical Books; for about that time Wicklef and Huſſe growing terrible, were they who firſt drove the Papal Court to a ſtricter policy of prohibiting. Which cours Leo the 10th, and his Succeſſors follow'd, until the Council of Trent, and the Spaniſh Inquiſition engendring together, brought forth, or perfeted thoſe Catalogues, and expurging Indexes that rake through the entrals of many an old good Author, with a violation wors then any could be offer'd to his Tomb. Nor did they ſtay in matters Heretical, but any ſubject that was not to their palat, they either condemn'd in a Prohibition, or had it ſtrait into the new Purgatory of an Index. To fill up the meaſure of encroachment, thir laſt invention was to ordain that no Book, Pamphlet or Paper, ſhould be printed (as if S. Peter had bequeath'd them the Keys of the Preſs alſo, as well as of Paradiſe) unleſs it were approv'd and licens'd under the Hands of two or three gluttonous Friers. For example:

Let the Chancellor Cini be pleas'd to ſee if in this preſent Work be contain'd ought that may withſtand the Printing,

Vincent Rabbata, Vicar of Florence.

I have ſeen this preſent Work, and find nothing athwart the Catholic Faith and Good Manners: In witneſs wherof I have given, &c.

Nicolò Cini, Chancellor of Florence.

Attending the precedent Relation, it is allow'd that this preſent Work of Davanzati may be Printed,

Vincent Rabatta, &c.

It may be Printed, July 15.

Friar Simon Mompei d'Amelia Chancellor of the holy Office in Florence.

Sure they have a conceit, if he of the bottomleſs pit had not long ſince broke priſon, that this quadruple Exorciſm would bar him down. I fear thir next deſign will be to get into thir cuſtody the Licenſing of that which they ſay * Claudius intended, but went not through with. Voutſafe to ſee another of thir forms the Roman ſtamp:

* Quo veniam daret flatum crepitumque ventris in convivio emittendi. Sueton. in Claudio.

Imprimatur, If it ſeem good to the Reverend Maſter of the holy Palace,

Belcaſtro Vicegerent.

Imprimatur

Friar Nicolò Rodolphi Maſter of the holy Palace.

Somtimes five Imprimaturs are ſeen together dialogue-wiſe in the Piatza of one Title-page, complementing and ducking each to other with thir ſhav'n reverences, whether the Author, who ſtands by in perplexity at the foot of his Epiſtle, ſhall to the Preſs or to the Spunge. Theſe are the pretty Reſponſories, theſe are the dear Antiphonies that ſo bewitcht of late our Prelats, and thir Chaplains with the goodly Eccho they made; and beſotted us to the gay imitation of a lordly Imprimatur, one from Lambeth-houſe, another from the Weſt-end of Pauls; ſo apiſhly Romanizing, that the word of Command ſtill was ſet down in Latin; as if the learned Grammatical Pen that wrote it, would caſt no Ink without Latin: or perhaps, as they thought, becauſe no vulgar tongue was worthy to expreſs the pure conceit of an Imprimatur; but rather, as I hope, for that our Engliſh, the language of Men ever famous, and formoſt in the atchievments of Liberty, will not eaſily find ſervile Letters anow to ſpell ſuch a dictatory preſumption engliſht. And thus ye have the Inventors and the Original of Book-licenſing ript up, and drawn as lineally as any Pedigree. We have it not, that can be heard of, from any ancient State, or Polity, or Church, nor by any Statute left us by our Anceſtors elder or later; nor from the modern Cuſtom of any reformed City, or Church abroad; but from the moſt Antichriſtian Councel, and the moſt tyrannous Inquiſition that ever inquir'd. Till then Books were ever as freely admitted into the World as any other birth; the iſſue of the Brain was no more ſtifl'd then the iſſue of the Womb: no envious Juno ſate croſs-leg'd over the nativity of any man's intellectual off-ſpring; but if it prov'd a Monſter, who denies, but that it was juſtly burnt, or ſunk into the Sea. But that a Book in wors condition then a peccant Soul, ſhould be to ſtand before a Jury ere it be born to the World, and undergo yet in darkneſs the judgment of Radamanth and his Collegues, ere it can paſs the ferry backward into light, was never heard before, till that myſterious Iniquity, provokt and troubl'd at the firſt entrance of Reformation, ſought out new Limbo's and new Hells wherin they might include our Books alſo within the number of thir damned. And this was the rare morſel ſo officiouſly ſnatcht up, and ſo ilfavourdly imitated by our inquiſiturient Biſhops, and the attendant Minorites thir Chaplains. That ye like not now theſe moſt certain Authors of this Licenſing Order, and that all ſiniſter intention was far diſtant from your thoughts, when ye were importun'd the paſſing it, all men who know the integrity of your actions, and how ye honour Truth, will clear ye readily.

But ſom will ſay, What though the Inventors were bad, the thing for all that may be good? It may ſo; yet if that thing be no ſuch deep invention, but obvious, and eaſie for any man to light on, and yet beſt and wiſeſt Commonwealths through all ages and occaſions have forborn to uſe it, and falſeſt ſeducers and oppreſſors of men were the firſt who took it up, and to no other purpoſe but to obſtruct and hinder the firſt approach of Reformation; I am of thoſe who believe, it will be a harder Alchymy then Lullius ever knew, to ſublimat any good uſe out of ſuch an Invention. Yet this only is what I requeſt to gain from this reaſon, that it may be held a dangerous and ſuſpicious fruit, as certainly it deſerves, for the tree that bore it, until I can diſſect one by one the properties it has. But I have firſt to finiſh, as was propounded, what is to be thought in general of reading Books, whatever ſort they be, and whether be more the benefit, or the harm that thence proceeds?

Not to inſiſt upon the examples of Moſes, Daniel and Paul, who were skilful in all the learning of the Egyptians, Caldeans, and Greeks, which could not probably be without reading thir Books of all ſorts, in Paul eſpecially, who thought it no defilement to inſert into holy Scripture the ſentences of three Greek Poets, and one of them a Tragedian, the queſtion was notwithſtanding ſomtimes controverted among the Primitive Doctors, but with great odds on that ſide which affirm'd it both lawful and profitable, as was then evidently perceiv'd, when Julian the Apoſtat, and ſuttleſt enemy to our faith, made a decree forbidding Chriſtians the ſtudy of heathen learning: for, ſaid he, they wound us with our own weapons, and with our own arts and ſciences they overcom us. And indeed the Chriſtians were put ſo to thir ſhifts by this crafty means, and ſo much in danger to decline into all ignorance, that the two Apollinarii were fain, as a man may ſay, to coin all the ſeven liberal Sciences out of the Bible, reducing it into divers forms of Orations, Poems, Dialogues, ev'n to the calculating of a new Chriſtian Grammar. But ſaith the Hiſtorian Socrates, The providence of God provided better then the induſtry of Apollinarius and his ſon, by taking away that illiterat Law with the life of him who deviſ'd it. So great an injury they then held it to be depriv'd of Hellenic learning; and thought it a perſecution more undermining, and ſecretly decaying the Church, then the open cruelty of Decius or Diocleſian. And perhaps it was the ſame politic drift that the Devil whipt St. Jerom in a lenten dream, for reading Cicero; or elſe it was a fantaſm, bred by the fever which had then ſeis'd him. For had an Angel bin his diſcipliner, unleſs it were for dwelling too much upon Ciceronianiſms, and had chaſtiz'd the reading, not the vanity, it had bin plainly partial; firſt to correct him for grave Cicero, and not for ſcurril Plautus, whom he confeſſes to have bin reading not long before; next to correct him only, and let ſo many more ancient Fathers wax old in thoſe pleaſant and florid ſtudies without the laſh of ſuch a tutoring apparition; inſomuch that Baſil teaches how ſome good uſe may be made of Margites a ſportful Poem, not now extant, writ by Homer; and why not then of Morgante an Italian Romance much to the ſame purpoſe? But if it be agreed we ſhall be try'd by viſions, there is a viſion recorded by Euſebius far ancienter then this tale of Jerom, to the Nun Euſtochium, and beſides has nothing of a fever in it. Dionyſius Alexandrinus was about the year 240, a perſon of great name in the Church for piety and learning, who had wont to avail himſelf much againſt Heretics by being converſant in thir Books; until a certain Presbyter laid it ſcrupulouſly to his conſcience, how he durſt venture himſelf among thoſe defiling volumes. The worthy man loth to give offence, fell into a new debate with himſelf what was to be thought; when ſuddenly a Viſion ſent from God, it is his own Epiſtle that ſo avers it, confirm'd him in theſe words: “Read “any Books whatever com to thy hands, for thou art ſufficient both to judg “aright, and to examin each matter. To this Revelation he aſſented the ſooner, as he confeſſes, becauſe it was anſwerable to that of the Apoſtle to the Theſſalonians, Prove all things, hold faſt that which is good. And he might have added another remarkable ſaying of the ſame Author; To the pure, all things are pure, not only meats and drinks, but all kind of knowledg whether of good or evil; the Knowledg cannot defile, nor conſequently the Books, if the Will and Conſcience be not defil'd. For Books are as Meats and Viands are; ſome of good, ſome of evil ſubſtance; and yet God in that unapocryphal viſion, ſaid without exception, Riſe Peter, kill and eat, leaving the choice to each mans diſcretion. Wholeſom meats to a vitiated ſtomac differ little or nothing from unwholeſom; and beſt Books to a naughty mind are not unappliable to occaſions of evil. Bad meats will ſcarce breed good nouriſhment in the healthieſt concoction; but herein the difference is of bad Books, that they to a diſcreet and judicious Reader ſerve in many reſpects to diſcover, to confute, to forewarn, and to illuſtrate. Wherof what better witnes can ye expect I ſhould produce, then one of your own now ſitting in Parlament, the chief of learned men reputed in this Land, Mr. Selden, whoſe volume of natural and national Laws proves, not only by great authorities brought together, but by exquiſit reaſons and theorems almoſt mathematically demonſtrative, that all opinions, yea errors, known, read and collated, are of main ſervice and aſſiſtance toward the ſpeedy attainment of what is trueſt. I conceive therfore, that when God did enlarge the univerſal diet of mans body, ſaving ever the rules of temperance, he then alſo, as before, left arbitrary the dyeting and repaſting of our minds; as wherin every mature man might have to exerciſe his own leading capacity. How great a vertue is Temperance, how much of moment through the whole life of man? yet God commits the managing ſo great a truſt, without particular Law or preſcription, wholly to the demeanour of every grown man. And therfore when he himſelf tabl'd the Jews from heaven, that Omer which was every mans daily portion of Manna, is computed to have bin more then might have well ſuffic'd the heartieſt feeder thrice as many meals. For thoſe actions which enter into a man, rather then iſſue out of him, and therfore defile not, God uſes not to captivat under a perpetual childhood of preſcription, but truſts him with the gift of Reaſon to be his own chuſer; there were but little work left for Preaching, if Law and Compulſion ſhould grow ſo faſt upon thoſe things which hertofore were govern'd only by exhortation. Salomon informs us that much reading is a wearines to the fleſh; but neither he, nor other inſpir'd author tells us that ſuch, or ſuch reading is unlawful: yet certainly had God thought good to limit us herein, it had been much more expedient to have told us what was unlawful, then what was weariſom. As for the burning of thoſe Epheſian Books by St. Paul's converts, 'tis reply'd, the Books were magic, the Syriac ſo renders them. It was a private act, a voluntary act, and leaves us to a voluntary imitation: the men in remorſe burnt thoſe Books which were thir own; the Magiſtrat by this example is not appointed: theſe men practiz'd the Books, another might perhaps have read them in ſome ſort uſefully. Good and evil we know in the field of this World grow up together almoſt inſeparably; and the knowledg of good is ſo involv'd and interwoven with the knowledg of evil, and in ſo many cunning reſemblances hardly to be diſcern'd, that thoſe confuſed ſeeds which were impos'd on Pſyche as an inceſſant labour to cull out, and ſort aſunder, were not more intermixt. It was from out the rind of one apple taſted, that the knowledg of good and evil, as two twins cleaving together, leapt forth into the World. And perhaps this is that doom which Adam fell into of knowing good and evil, that is to ſay of knowing good by evil. As therfore the ſtate of man now is; what wiſdom can there be to chooſe, what continence to forbear without the knowledg of evil? He that can apprehend and conſider vice with all her baits and ſeeming pleaſures, and yet abſtain, and yet diſtinguiſh, and yet prefer that which is truly better, he is the true wayfaring Chriſtian. I cannot praiſe a fugitive and cloiſter'd vertue, unexercis'd and unbreath'd, that never ſallies out and ſees her adverſary, but ſlinks out of the race, where that immortal Garland is to be run for, not without duſt and heat. Aſſuredly we bring not innocence into the world, we bring impurity much rather: that which purifies us is trial, and trial is by what is contrary. That vertue therfore which is but a youngling in the contemplation of evil, and knows not the utmoſt that vice promiſes to her followers, and rejects it, is but a blank vertue, not a pure; her whiteneſs is but an excremental whiteneſs: Which was the reaſon why our ſage and ſerious Poet Spencer, whom I dare be known to think a better teacher then Scotus or Aquinas, deſcribing true temperance under the perſon of Guion, brings him in with his palmer through the cave of Mammon, and the bowr of earthly bliſs, that he might ſee and know, and yet abſtain. Since therfore the knowledg and ſurvey of Vice is in this world ſo neceſſary to the conſtituting of human Vertue, and the ſcanning of error to the confirmation of truth, how can we more ſafely, and with leſs danger ſcout into the regions of ſin and falſity then by reading all manner of Tractats, and hearing all manner of Reaſon? And this is the benefit which may be had of Books promiſcuouſly read. But of the harm that may reſult hence three kinds are uſually reckon'd. Firſt, is fear'd the infection that may ſpread; but then all human learning and controverſie in religious points muſt remove out of the world, yea the Bible it ſelf; for that oftimes relates blaſphemy not nicely, it deſcribes the carnal ſenſe of wicked men not unelegantly, it brings in holieſt men paſſionately murmuring againſt Providence through all the arguments of Epicurus: in other great diſputes it anſwers dubiouſly and darkly to the common reader: And ask a Talmudiſt what ails the modeſty of his marginal Keri, that Moſes and all the Prophets cannot perſwade him to pronounce the textual Chetiv. For theſe cauſes we all know, the Bible it ſelf put by the Papiſt, into the firſt rank of prohibited books. The ancienteſt Fathers muſt be next remov'd, as Clement of Alexandria, and that Euſebian Book of Evangelic preparation, tranſmitting our ears through a hoard of heatheniſh Obſcenities to receive the Goſpel. Who finds not that Irenæus, Epiphanius, Jerom, and others diſcover more hereſies then they well confute, and that oft for hereſie which is the truer opinion? Nor boots it to ſay for theſe, and all the heathen Writers of greateſt infection, if it muſt be thought ſo, with whom is bound up the life of human learning, that they writ in an unknown tongue, ſo long as we are ſure thoſe languages are known as well to the worſt of men, who are both moſt able, and moſt diligent to inſtil the poiſon they ſuck, firſt into the Courts of Princes, acquainting them with the choiſeſt delights, and criticiſms of ſin. As perhaps did that Petronius whom Nero call'd his Arbiter, the Maſter of his Revels; and that notorious ribald of Arezzo, dreaded, and yet dear to the Italian Courtiers. I name not him for poſterities ſake, whom Harry the 8th nam'd in merriment his Vicar of Hell. By which compendious way all the contagion that forein Books can infuſe, will find a paſſage to the people far eaſier and ſhorter then an Indian voyage, though it could be ſail'd either by the North of Cataio Eaſtward, or of Canada Weſtward, while our Spaniſh licenſing gags the Engliſh Preſs never ſo ſeverely. But on the other ſide that infection which is from Books of controverſie in Religion, is more doubtful and dangerous to the learned, then to the ignorant; and yet thoſe Books muſt be permitted untoucht by the Licenſer. It will be hard to inſtance where any ignorant man hath bin ever ſeduc'd by any Papiſtical Book in Engliſh, unleſs it were commended and expounded to him by ſome of that Clergy: and indeed all ſuch tractats whether falſe or true, are as the Propheſie of Iſaiah was to the Eunuch, not to be underſtood without a guide. But of our Prieſts and Doctors how many have bin corrupted by ſtudying the comments of Jeſuits and Sorboniſts, and how faſt they could transfuſe that corruption into the people, our experience is both late and ſad. It is not forgot, ſince the acute and diſtinct Arminius was perverted meerly by the peruſing of a nameleſs diſcours writt'n at Delf, which at firſt he took in hand to confute. Seeing therfore that thoſe Books, and thoſe in great abundance which are likelieſt to taint both life and doctrin, cannot be ſuppreſt without the fall of Learning, and of all ability in diſputation, and that theſe Books of either ſort are moſt and ſooneſt catching to the learned, from whom to the common people whatever is heretical or diſſolute may quickly be convey'd, and that evil manners are as perfectly learnt without Books a thouſand other ways which cannot be ſtopt, and evil doctrin not with Books can propagate, except a teacher guide, which he might alſo do without writing, and ſo beyond prohibiting, I am not able to unfold, how this cautelous enterpriſe of Licenſing can be exempted from the number of vain and impoſſible attempts. And he who were pleaſantly diſpos'd, could not well avoid to lik'n it to the exploit of that gallant man who thought to pound up the crows by ſhutting his Parkgate. Beſides another inconvenience, if learned men be the firſt receivers out of Books, and diſpredders both of vice and error, how ſhall the Licenſers themſelves be confided in, unleſs we can confer upon them, or they aſſume to themſelves above all others in the Land, the grace of infallibility, and uncorruptedneſs? And again, if it be true, that a wiſe man, like a good refiner, can gather gold out of the droſſieſt volume, and that a fool will be a fool with the beſt Book, yea or without Book, there is no reaſon that we ſhould deprive a wiſe Man of any advantage to his wiſdom, while we ſeek to reſtrain from a fool, that which being reſtrain'd will be no hindrance to his folly. For if there ſhould be ſo much exactneſs always us'd to keep that from him which is unfit for his reading, we ſhould in the judgment of Ariſtotle not only, but of Salomon, and of our Saviour, not vouſafe him good precepts, and by conſequence not willingly admit him to good Books; as being certain that a wiſe man will make better uſe of an idle pamphlet, then a fool will do of ſacred Scripture.

'Tis next alledg'd we muſt not expoſe our ſelves to temptations without neceſſity, and next to that, not imploy our time in vain things. To both theſe objections one anſwer will ſerve, out of the grounds already laid, that to all men ſuch Books are not temptations, nor vanities; but uſeful drugs and materials wherwith to temper and compoſe effective and ſtrong med'cins, which man's life cannot want. The reſt, as children and childiſh men, who have not the art to qualifie and prepare theſe working Minerals, well may be exhorted to forbear, but hinder'd forcibly they cannot be by all the licenſing that Sainted Inquiſition could ever yet contrive; which is what I promis'd to deliver next, That this Order of Licenſing conduces nothing to the end for which it was fram'd; and hath almoſt prevented me by being clear already while thus much hath bin explaining. See the ingenuity of Truth, who when ſhe gets a free and willing hand, opens her ſelf faſter then the pace of method and diſcours can overtake her. It was the task which I began with, To ſhew that no Nation, or well inſtituted State, if they valu'd Books at all, did ever uſe this way of Licenſing; and it might be anſwer'd, that this is a piece of prudence lately diſcover'd. To which I return, That as it was a thing ſlight and obvious to think on, ſo if it had bin difficult to find out, there wanted not among them long ſince, who ſuggeſted ſuch a cours; which they not following, leave us a pattern of thir judgment, that it was not the not knowing, but the not approving, which was the cauſe of thir not uſing it. Plato, a man of high autority indeed, but leaſt of all for his Commonwealth, in the book of his Laws, which no City ever yet receiv'd, fed his fancy with making many Edicts to his ayrie Burgomaſters, which they who otherwiſe admire him, wiſh had bin rather buried and excus'd in the genial cups of an Academic night-ſitting. By which Laws he ſeems to tolerat no kind of Learning, but by unalterable Decree, conſiſting moſt of practical Traditions, to the attainment wherof a Library of ſmaller bulk then his own Dialogues would be abundant. And there alſo enacts, that no Poet ſhould ſo much as read to any privat man what he had writt'n, until the Judges and Law-keepers had ſeen it, and allow'd it: But that Plato meant this Law peculiarly to that Commonwealth which he had imagin'd, and to no other, is evident. Why was he not elſe a Law-giver to himſelf, but a Tranſgreſſor, and to be expel'd by his own Magiſtrats, both for the wanton Epigrams and Dialogues which he made, and his perpetual reading of Sophron, Mimus, and Ariſtophanes, Books of groſſeſt infamy, and alſo for commending the latter of them, though he were the malicious Libeller of his chief friends, to be read by the Tyrant Dionyſius, who had little need of ſuch traſh to ſpend his time on? But that he knew this Licenſing of Poems had reference and dependence to many other proviſo's there ſet down in his fancied Republic, which in this world could have no place: and ſo neither he himſelf, nor any Magiſtrat or City ever imitated that cours, which tak'n apart from thoſe other collateral Injunctions, muſt needs be vain and fruitleſs. For if they fell upon one kind of ſtrictneſs, unleſs thir care were equal to regulat all other things of like aptnes to corrupt the mind, that ſingle endeavour they knew would be but a fond labour; to ſhut and fortifie one gate againſt corruption, and be neceſſitated to leave others round about wide open. If we think to regulat Printing, therby to rectifie Manners, we muſt regulat all Recreations and Paſtimes, all that is delightful to Man. No Muſic muſt be heard, no Song be ſet or ſung, but what is grave and Doric. There muſt be licenſing Dancers, that no geſture, motion, or deportment be taught our Youth but what by thir allowance ſhall be thought honeſt; for ſuch Plato was provided of: It will ask more then the work of twenty Licenſers to examin all the Lutes, the Violins, and the Ghittarrs in every houſe; they muſt not be ſuffer'd to prattle as they do, but muſt be licens'd what they may ſay. And who ſhall ſilence all the Airs and Madrigals that whiſper ſoftnes in Chambers? The Windows alſo, and the Balconeys muſt be thought on; there are ſhrewd Books, with dangerous Frontiſpieces, ſet to ſale; who ſhall prohibit them, ſhall twenty Licenſers? The Villages alſo muſt have their viſitors to enquire what Lectures the Bagpipe, and the Rebbeck reads, ev'n to the Ballatry and the Gammuth of every municipal Fidler, for theſe are the Countrymans Arcadia's and his Monte Mayors. Next, what more National corruption, for which England hears ill abroad, then houſhold gluttony; who ſhall be the rectors of our daily rioting? and what ſhall be done to inhibit the multitudes that frequent thoſe houſes where drunk'nes is ſold and harbour'd? Our garments alſo ſhould be referr'd to the licenſing of ſome more ſober work-maſters, to ſee them cut into a leſs wanton garb. Who ſhall regulat all the mixt converſation of our youth, male and female together, as is the faſhion of this Country? who ſhall ſtill appoint what ſhall be diſcours'd, what preſum'd, and no furder? Laſtly, who ſhall forbid and ſeparat all idle reſort, all evil company? Theſe things will be, and muſt be; but how they ſhall be leaſt hurtful, how leaſt enticing, herein conſiſts the grave and governing Wiſdom of a State. To ſequeſter out of the World into Atlantic and Eutopian Polities, which never can be drawn into uſe, will not mend our condition; but to ordain wiſely as in this World of evil, in the midſt wherof God hath plac'd us unavoidably. Nor is it Plato's Licenſing of Books will do this, which neceſſarily pulls along with it ſo many other kinds of Licenſing, as will make us all both ridiculous and weary, and yet fruſtrat; but thoſe unwritt'n, or at leaſt unconſtraining Laws of vertuous education, religious and civil nurture, which Plato there mentions, as the bonds and ligaments of the Commonwealth, the pillars and the ſuſtainers of every writt'n Statute; theſe they be which will bear chief ſway in ſuch matters as theſe, when all Licenſing will be eaſily eluded. Impunity and remiſsnes for certain are the bane of a Commonwealth; but here the great art lies to diſcern in what the Law is to bid reſtraint and puniſhment, and in what things perſwaſion only is to work. If every action which is good or evil in Man at ripe years, were to be under pittance, and preſcription, and compulſion, what were Vertue but a name, what praiſe could be then due to well-doing, what grammercy to be ſober, juſt or continent? Many there be that complain of divine Providence for ſuffering Adam to tranſgreſs. Fooliſh tongues! when God gave him reaſon, he gave him freedom to chooſe, for reaſon is but chooſing; he had bin elſe a meer artificial Adam, ſuch an Adam as he is in the motions. We our ſelves eſteem not of that obedience, or love, or gift, which is of force: God therfore left him free, ſet before him a provoking object, ever almoſt in his eyes; herein conſiſted his merit, herein the right of his reward, the praiſe of his abſtinence. Wherfore did he creat paſſions within us, pleaſures round about us, but that theſe rightly temper'd are the very ingredients of vertue? They are not skilful conſiderers of human things, who imagin to remove ſin by removing the matter of ſin; for, beſides that it is a huge heap increaſing under the very act of diminiſhing, though ſom part of it may for a time be withdrawn from ſom perſons, it cannot from all, in ſuch a univerſal thing as Books are; and when this is don, yet the ſin remains entire. Though ye take from a covetous man all his treaſure, he has yet one jewel left, ye cannot bereave him of his Covetouſneſs. Baniſh all objects of luſt, ſhut up all youth into the ſevereſt diſciplin that can be exercis'd in any hermitage, ye cannot make them chaſte, that came not thither ſo: ſuch great care and wiſdom is requir'd to the right managing of this point. Suppoſe we could expel ſin by this means; look how much we thus expel of ſin, ſo much we expel of vertue; for the matter of them both is the ſame; remove that, and ye remove them both alike. This juſtifies the high Providence of God, who though he commands us Temperance, Juſtice, Continence, yet pours out before us ev'n to a profuſenes all deſirable things, and gives us minds that can wander beyond all limit and ſatiety. Why ſhould we then affect a rigor contrary to the manner of God and of nature, by abridging or ſcanting thoſe means, which Books, freely permitted, are, both to the trial of Vertue, and the exerciſe of Truth? It would be better done to learn that the Law muſt needs be frivolous which goes to reſtrain things, uncertainly and yet equally working to good, and to evil. And were I the chooſer, a dram of well-doing ſhould be preferr'd before many times as much the forcible hindrance of evil-doing. For God ſure eſteems the growth and compleating of one vertuous perſon, more then the reſtraint of ten vitious. And albeit whatever thing we hear or ſee, ſitting, walking, travelling, or converſing, may be fitly call'd our Book, and is of the ſame effect that Writings are; yet grant the thing to be prohibited were only Books, it appears that this Order hitherto is far inſufficient to the end which it intends. Do we not ſee, not once or oftner, but weekly, that continu'd Court-libel againſt the Parlament and City, printed, as the wet ſheets can witnes, and diſpers'd among us, for all that Licenſing can do? Yet this is the prime ſervice a man would think, wherin this Order ſhould give proof of it ſelf. If it were executed, you'l ſay. But certain, if execution be remiſs or blindfold now, and in this particular, what will it be hereafter, and in other Books? If then the Order ſhall not be vain and fruſtrat, behold a new labour, Lords and Commons, ye muſt repeal and proſcribe all ſcandalous and unlicens'd Books already printed and divulg'd; after ye have drawn them up into a Liſt, that all may know which are condemn'd, and which not; and ordain that no forein Books be deliver'd out of cuſtody, till they have bin read over. This office will require the whole time of not a few Overſeers, and thoſe no vulgar men. There be alſo Books which are partly uſeful and excellent, partly culpable and pernicious; this work will ask as many more Officials, to make expurgations and expunctions, that the Commonwealth of Learning be not damnify'd. In fine, when the multitude of Books encreaſe upon thir hands, ye muſt be fain to catalogue all thoſe Printers who are found frequently offending, and forbid the Importation of thir whole ſuſpected Typography. In a word, that this your Order may be exact, and not deficient, ye muſt reform it perfectly according to the model of Trent and Sevil, which I know ye abhor to do. Yet though ye ſhould condeſcend to this, which God forbid, the Order ſtill would be but fruitleſs and defective to that end wherto ye meant it. If to prevent Sects and Schiſms, who is ſo unread or ſo uncatechis'd in ſtory, that hath not heard of many Sects refuſing Books as a hindrance, and preſerving thir Doctrin unmixt for many Ages, only by unwritt'n Traditions? The Chriſtian Faith, for that was once a Schiſm, is not unknown to have ſpread all over Aſia, ere any Goſpel or Epiſtle was ſeen in writing. If the amendment of manners be aim'd at, look into Italy and Spain, whether thoſe places be one ſcruple the better, the honeſter, the wiſer, the chaſter, ſince all the inquiſitional rigor that hath bin executed upon Books.

Another reaſon, wherby to make it plain that this Order will miſs the end it ſeeks, conſider by the quality which ought to be in every Licenſer. It cannot be deny'd but that he who is made judg to ſit upon the birth, or death of Books, whether they may be waſted into this world, or not, had need to be a man above the common meaſure, both ſtudious, learned, and judicious; there may be elſe no mean miſtakes in the cenſure of what is paſſable or not; which is alſo no mean injury. If he be of ſuch worth as behoovs him, there cannot be a more tedious and unpleaſing Journey-work, a greater loſs of time levied upon his head, then to be made the perpetual reader of unchoſen Books and Pamphlets, oftimes huge Volumes. There is no Book that is acceptable, unleſs at certain ſeaſons; but to be enjoyn'd the reading of that at all times, and in a hand ſcars legible, wherof three pages would not down at any time in the faireſt Print, is an impoſition which I cannot beleeve how he that values time, and his own ſtudies, or is but of a ſenſible noſtril ſhould be able to endure. In this one thing I crave leave of the preſent Licenſers to be pardon'd for ſo thinking: who doubtleſs took this office up, looking on it through thir obedience to the Parlament, whoſe command perhaps made all things ſeem eaſie and unlaborious to them; but that this ſhort trial hath wearied them out already, thir own expreſſions and excuſes to them who make ſo many journeys to ſollicit thir licenſe, are teſtimony anough. Seeing therfore thoſe who now poſſeſs the imployment, by all evident ſigns wiſh themſelves well rid of it, and that no man of worth, none that is not a plain unthrift of his own hours, is ever likely to ſucceed them, except he mean to put himſelf to the ſalary of a Preſs-corrector, we may eaſily foreſee what kind of Licenſers we are to expect hereafter, either ignorant, imperious, and remiſs, or baſely pecuniary. This is what I had to ſhew, wherin this order cannot conduce to that end, wherof it bears the intention.

I laſtly proceed from the no good it can do, to the manifeſt hurt it cauſes, in being firſt the greateſt diſcouragement and affront that can be offer'd to Learning and to learned Men. It was the complaint and lamentation of Prelats, upon every leaſt breath of a motion to remove Pluralities, and diſtribute more equally Church revenu's, that then all Learning would be for ever daſht and diſcourag'd. But as for that opinion, I never found cauſe to think that the tenth part of learning ſtood or fell with the Clergy: nor could I ever but hold it for a ſordid and unworthy ſpeech of any Churchman, who had a competency left him. If therfore ye be loth to diſhearten utterly and diſcontent, not the mercenary crew of falſe pretenders to learning, but the free and ingenious ſort of ſuch as evidently were born to ſtudy and love Learning for it ſelf, not for lucre, or any other end, but the ſervice of God and of Truth, and perhaps that laſting fame and perpetuity of praiſe which God and good men have conſented ſhall be the reward of thoſe whoſe publiſht Labours advance the good of mankind, then know, that ſo far to diſtruſt the judgment and the honeſty of one who hath but a common repute in Learning, and never yet offended, as not to count him fit to print his mind without a tutor and examiner, leſt he ſhould drop a ſciſm, or ſomthing of corruption, is the greateſt diſpleaſure and indignity to a free and knowing ſpirit that can be put upon him. What advantage is it to be a Man over it is to be a Boy at School, if we have only ſcapt the Ferular, to come under the feſcu of an Imprimatur? if ſerious and elaborat Writings, as if they were no more then the theam of a Grammar-lad under his Pedagogue, muſt not be utter'd without the curſory eyes of a temporizing and extemporizing licenſer? He who is not truſted with his own actions, his drift not being known to be evil, and ſtanding to the hazard of Law and Penalty, has no great argument to think himſelf reputed in the Commonwealth wherin he was born, for other then a fool or a foreiner. When a man writes to the world, he ſummons up all his reaſon and deliberation to aſſiſt him; he ſearches, meditats, is induſtrious, and likely conſults and confers with his judicious friends; after all which don he takes himſelf to be inform'd in what he writes, as well as any that writ before him; if in this the moſt conſummat act of his fidelity and ripeneſs, no years, no induſtry, no former proof of his abilities can bring him to that ſtate of maturity, as not to be ſtill miſtruſted and ſuſpected, unleſs he carry all his conſiderat diligence, all his midnight watchings, and expence of Palladian oyl, to the haſty view of an unleaſur'd licenſer, perhaps much his younger, perhaps far his inferiour in judgment, perhaps one who never knew the labour of Book-writing, and if he be not repulſt, or ſlighted, muſt appear in print like a Puny with his Guardian, and his Cenſors hand on the back of his title to be his bayl and ſurety, that he is no Idiot, or Seducer, it cannot be but a diſhonor and derogation to the Author, to the Book, to the privilege and dignity of Learning. And what if the author ſhall be one ſo copious of fancy, as to have many things well worth the adding, come into his mind after licenſing, while the Book is yet under the Preſs, which not ſeldom happ'ns to the beſt and diligenteſt writers; and that perhaps a dozen times in one Book: The Printer dares not go beyond his licens't copy; ſo often then muſt the Author trudg to his leav-giver, that thoſe his new inſertions may be view'd; and many a jaunt will be made, ere that licenſer, for it muſt be the ſame man, can either be found, or found at leiſure; mean while either the Preſs muſt ſtand ſtill, which is no ſmall damage, or the author loſe his accurateſt thoughts, and ſend the Book forth wors then he had made it, which to a diligent writer is the greateſt melancholy and vexation that can befal. And how can a man teach with autority, which is the life of teaching; how can he be a Doctor in his Book as he ought to be, or elſe had better be ſilent, whenas all he teaches, all he delivers, is but under the tution, under the correction of his patriarchal licenſer to blot or alter what preciſely accords not with the hidebound humor which he calls his judgment? When every acute reader upon the firſt ſight of a pedantic licenſe, will be ready with theſe like words to ding the Book a coits diſtance from him, I hate a pupil teacher, I endure not an inſtructer that comes to me under the wardſhip of an overſeeing fiſt. I know nothing of the licenſer, but that I have his own hand here for his arrogance; who ſhall warrant me his judgment? The State Sir, replies the Stationer, but has a quick return, The State ſhall be my Governours, but not my Critics; they may be miſtak'n in the choice of a licenſer, as eaſily as this licenſer may be miſtak'n in an author. This is ſom common ſtuff; and he might add from Sir Francis Bacon, That ſuch authoriz'd Books are but the language of the times. For though a licenſer ſhould happ'n to be judicious more then ordinary, which will be a great jeopardy of the next ſucceſſion, yet his very office, and his commiſſion enjoyns him to let paſs nothing but what is vulgarly receiv'd already. Nay, which is more lamentable, if the work of any deceaſed author, though never ſo famous in his life-time, and even to this day, comes to thir hands for licenſe to be printed, or reprinted, if there be found in his Book one ſentence of a ventrous edg, utter'd in the height of zeal, and who knows whether it might not be the dictat of a divine Spirit, yet not ſuting with every low decrepit humor of thir own, though it were Knox himſelf, the Reformer of a Kingdom that ſpake it, they will not pardon him thir daſh: the ſenſe of that great Man ſhall to all poſterity be loſt, for the fearfulneſs, or the preſumptuous raſhneſs of a perfunctory Licenſer. And to what an Author this violence hath bin lately done, and in what Book of greateſt conſequence to be faithfully publiſht, I could now inſtance, but ſhall forbear till a more convenient ſeaſon. Yet if theſe things be not reſented ſeriouſly and timely by them who have the remedy in thir power, but that ſuch iron moulds as theſe ſhall have autority to knaw out the choiſeſt periods of exquiſiteſt Books, and to commit ſuch a treacherous fraud againſt the orphan remainders of worthieſt men after death, the more ſorrow will belong to that haples race of men, whoſe misfortune it is to have underſtanding. Henceforth let no man care to learn, or care to be more then worldly wiſe; for certainly in higher matters to be ignorant and ſlothful, to be a common ſtedfaſt dunce, will be the only pleaſant life, and only in requeſt.

And as it is a particular diſeſteem of every knowing perſon alive, and moſt injurious to the writt'n labours and monuments of the dead, ſo to me it ſeems an undervaluing and vilifying of the whole Nation. I cannot ſet ſo light by all the invention, the art, the wit, the grave and ſolid judgment which is in England, as that it can be comprehended in any twenty capacities how good ſoever, much leſs that it ſhould not paſs except thir Superintendence be over it, except it be ſifted and ſtrain'd with thir ſtrainers, that it ſhould be uncurrant without thir manual ſtamp. Truth and Underſtanding are not ſuch wares as to be monopoliz'd and traded in by tickets and ſtatutes, and ſtandards. We muſt not think to make a ſtaple commodity of all the knowledg in the Land, to mark and licenſe it like our broad cloth, and our woolpacks. What is it but a ſervitude like that impos'd by the Philiſtims, not to be allow'd the ſharpning of our own taxes and coulters, but we muſt repair from all quarters to twenty licenſing forges? Had any one writt'n and divulg'd erroneous things and ſcandalous to honeſt life, miſuſing and forfeiting the eſteem had of his reaſon among men, if after conviction this only cenſure were adjudg'd him, that he ſhould never henceforth write, but what were firſt examin'd by an appointed Officer, whoſe hand ſhould be annext to paſs his credit for him, that now he might be ſafely read, it could not be apprehended leſs then a diſgraceful puniſhment. Whence to include the whole Nation, and thoſe that never yet thus offended, under ſuch a diffident and ſuſpectful prohibition, may plainly be underſtood what a diſparagement it is. So much the more when as dettors and delinquents may walk abroad without a keeper, but unoffenſive Books muſt not ſtir forth without a viſible jaylor in thir title. Nor is it to the common people leſs then a reproach; for if we be ſo jealous over them, as that we dare not truſt them with an Engliſh pamphlet, what do we but cenſure them for a giddy, vitious, and ungrounded people; in ſuch a ſick and weak eſtate of faith and diſcretion, as to be able to take nothing down but through the pipe of a Licenſer? That this is care or love of them, we cannot pretend, whenas in thoſe Popiſh places where the Laity are moſt hated and deſpis'd, the ſame ſtrictnes is us'd over them. Wiſdom we cannot call it, becauſe it ſtops but one breach of licenſe, nor that neither: whenas thoſe corruptions which it ſeeks to prevent, break in faſter at other dores which cannot be ſhut.

And in concluſion it reflects to the diſrepute of our Miniſters alſo, of whoſe labours we ſhould hope better, and of the proficiency which thir flock reaps by them, then that after all this light of the Goſpel which is, and is to be, and all this continual preaching, they ſhould be ſtill frequented with ſuch an unprincipl'd, unedify'd, and laick rabble, as that the whiff of every new pamphlet ſhould ſtagger them out of thir Catechiſm, and Chriſtian walking. This may have much reaſon to diſcourage the Miniſters when ſuch a low conceit is had of all thir exhortations, and the benefiting of thir hearers, as that they are not thought fit to be turn'd looſe to three ſheets of paper without a Licenſer; that all the Sermons, all the Lectures preacht, printed, vented in ſuch numbers, and ſuch volumes, as have now well-nigh made all other Books unſalable, ſhould not be armor enough againſt one ſingle Enchiridon, without the Caſtle St. Angelo of an Imprimatur.

And leſt ſom ſhould perſwade ye, Lords and Commons, that theſe arguments of learned mens diſcouragement at this your Order, are meer flouriſhes, and not real, I could recount what I have ſeen and heard in other Countries, where this kind of inquiſition tyrannizes; when I have ſat among thir learned men, for that honour I had, and bin counted happy to be born in ſuch a place of Philoſophic freedom, as they ſuppos'd England was, while themſelvs did nothing but bemoan the ſervil condition into which Learning amongſt them was brought; that this was it which had dampt the glory of Italian wits; that nothing had bin there writt'n now theſe many years but flattery and fuſtian. There it was that I found, and viſited the famous Galileo grown old, a priſner to the Inquiſition, for thinking in Aſtronomy otherwiſe then the Franciſcan and Dominican licenſers thought. And though I knew that England then was groaning loudeſt under the Prelatical yoak, neverthelesſ I took it as a pledg of future happines, that other Nations were ſo perſwaded of her liberty. Yet was it beyond my hope, that thoſe Worthies were then breathing in her air, who ſhould be her leaders to ſuch a deliverance, as ſhall never be forgott'n by any revolution of time that this world hath to finiſh. When that was once begun, it was as little in my fear, that what words of complaint I heard among learned men of other parts utter'd againſt the Inquiſition, the ſame I ſhould hear by as learned men at home utter'd in time of Parlament againſt an Order of Licenſing; and that ſo generally, that when I had diſclos'd my ſelf a companion of thir diſcontent, I might ſay, if without envy, that he whom an honeſt quæſtorſhip had indear'd to the Sicilians, was not more by them importun'd againſt Verres, then the favourable opinion which I had among many who honour ye, and are known and reſpected by ye, loaded me with entreaties and perſwaſions, that I would not deſpair to lay together that which juſt reaſon ſhould bring into my mind, toward the removal of an undeſerved thraldom upon Learning. That this is not therfore the diſburdning of a particular fancy, but the common grievance of all thoſe who had prepar'd thir minds and ſtudies above the vulgar pitch to advance truth in others, and from others to entertain it, thus much may ſatisfie. And in thir name I ſhall for neither friend nor fo, conceal what the general murmur is; that if it com to inquiſitioning again, and licenſing, and that we are ſo timorous of our ſelvs, and ſo ſuſpicious of all men, as to fear each Book, and the ſhaking of every leaf, before we know what the contents are; if ſom who but of late were little better then ſilenc't from preaching, ſhall com now to ſilence us from reading, except what they pleaſe, it cannot be gueſt what is intended by ſom but a ſecond tyranny over Learning: and will ſoon put it out of controverſie that Biſhops and Presbyters are the ſame to us both name and thing. That thoſe evils of Prelaty which before from five or ſix and twenty Sees were diſtributivly charged upon the whole people, will now light wholly upon Learning, is not obſcure to us: whenas now the Paſtor of a ſmall unlearned Pariſh, on the ſudden ſhall be exalted Archbiſhop over a large dioces of Books, and yet not remove, but keep his other Cure too, a myſtical Pluraliſt. He who but of late cry'd down the ſole ordination of every novice Batchelor of Art, and deny'd ſole juriſdiction over the ſimpleſt Pariſhioner, ſhall now at home in his privat chair aſſume both theſe over worthieſt and excellenteſt Books, and ableſt Authors that write them. This is not, ye Cov'nants and Proteſtations that we have made; this is not to put down Prelaty; this is but to chop an Epiſcopacy; this is but to tranſlate the Palace Metropolitan from one kind of dominion into another; this is but an old canonical ſlight of commuting our penance. To ſtartle thus betimes at a meer unlicens'd Pamphlet, will, after a while, be afraid of every Conventicle, and a while after will make a Conventicle of every Chriſtian meeting. But I am certain that a State govern'd by the rules of Juſtice and Fortitude, or a Church built and founded upon the Rock of Faith and true Knowledg, cannot be ſo puſillanimous. While things are yet not conſtituted in Religion, that freedom of Writing ſhould be reſtrain'd by a diſciplin imitated from the Prelats, and learnt by them from the Inquiſition to ſhut us up all again into the breſt of a Licenſer, muſt needs give cauſe of doubt and diſcouragement to all learned and religious Men. Who cannot but diſcern the finenes of this politic drift, and who are the contrivers; that while Biſhops were to be baited down, then all Preſſes might be open; it was the peoples birth-right and privilege in time of Parlament, it was the breaking forth of light. But now the Biſhops abrogated and voided out of the Church, as if our Reformation ſought no more, but to make room for others into thir Seats under another name; the Epiſcopal Arts begin to bud again; the cruiſe of Truth muſt run no more Oyl; liberty of Printing muſt be enthrall'd again under a Prelatical Commiſſion of twenty; the privilege of the People nullify'd; and which is wors, the freedom of Learning muſt groan again, and to her old fetters: all this the Parlament yet ſitting. Although thir own late Arguments and Defences againſt the Prelats might remember them that this obſtructing Violence meets for the moſt part with an event utterly oppoſit to the end which it drives at: inſtead of ſuppreſſing Sects and Schiſms, it raiſes them and inveſts them with a reputation: The puniſhing of Wits enhances thir autority, ſaith the Vicount St. Albans; and a forbidd'n writing is thought to be a certain ſpark of truth that flies up in the faces of them who ſeek to tread it out. This Order therfore may prove a nurſing Mother to Sects, but I ſhall eaſily ſhew how it will be a ſtep-dame to Truth: and firſt by diſinabling us to the maintenance of what is known already.

Well knows he who uſes to conſider, that our Faith and Knowledg thrives by Exerciſe, as well as our Limbs and Complexion. Truth is compar'd in Scripture to a ſtreaming fountain; if her waters flow not in a perpetual progreſſion, they ſick'n into a muddy pool of Conformity and Tradition. A man may be a Heretic in the truth; and if he believe things only becauſe his Paſtor ſays ſo, or the Aſſembly ſo determins, without knowing other reaſon, though his belief be true; yet the very truth he holds, becomes his hereſie. There is not any burden that ſom would gladlier poſt off to another, then the charge and care of thir Religion. There be, who knows not that there be of Proteſtants and Profeſſors who live and die in as errant an implicit Faith, as any Lay-Papiſt of Loretto. A wealthy man, addicted to his pleaſure and to his profits, finds Religion to be a traffic ſo entangl'd, and of ſo many piddling accounts, that of all myſteries he cannot skill to keep a ſtock going upon that trade. What ſhould he do? fain he would have the name to be religious, fain he would bear up with his neighbours in that. What does he therfore, but reſolvs to give over toyling, and to find himſelf out ſom Factor, to whoſe care and credit he may commit the whole managing of his religious affairs; ſom Divine of note and eſtimation that muſt be. To him he adheres, reſigns the whole Warehouſe of his Religion, with all the Locks and Keys into his cuſtody; and indeed makes the very Perſon of that Man his Religion; eſteems his aſſociating with him a ſufficient evidence and commendatory of his own Piety. So that a man may ſay his Religion is now no more within himſelf, but is becom a dividual movable, and goes and comes near him, according as that good man frequents the houſe. He entertains him, gives him gifts, feaſts him, lodges him; his Religion comes home at night, prays, is liberally ſupt, and ſumptuouſly laid to ſleep; riſes, is ſaluted, and after the malmſey, or ſome well ſpic't bruage, and better breakfaſted, then he whoſe morning appetite would have gladly fed on green figs between Bethany and Jeruſalem; his Religion walks abroad at eight, and leavs his kind entertainer in the ſhop trading all day without his Religion.

Another ſort there be, who when they hear that all things ſhall be order'd, all things regulated and ſetl'd; nothing writt'n but what paſſes through the Cuſtom-houſe of certain Publicans that have the tunnaging and poundaging of all free-ſpok'n Truth, will ſtrait give themſelvs up into your hands, mak'em and cut'em out what Religion ye pleaſe; there be delights, there be recreations and jolly paſtimes that will fetch the day about from Sun to Sun, and rock the tedious year as in a delightful dream. What need they torture thir heads with that which others have tak'n ſo ſtrictly, and ſo unalterably into thir own purveying? Theſe are the fruits which a dull eaſe and ceſſation of our knowledg will bring forth among the people. How goodly, and how to be wiſht were ſuch an obedient unanimity as this? what a fine conformity would it ſtarch us all into? doubtles a ſtanch and ſolid piece of frame-work, as any January could freeze together.

Nor much better will be the conſequence ev'n among the Clergy themſelvs; it is no new thing never heard of before, for a Parochial Miniſter, who has his reward, and is at his Hercules Pillars in a warm Benefice, to be eaſily inclinable, if he having nothing elſe that may rouſe up his ſtudies, to finiſh his circuit in an Engliſh Concordance and a topic Folio, the gatherings and ſavings of a ſober Graduatſhip, a Harmony and a Catena, treading the conſtant round of certain common doctrinal Heads, attended with their Uſes, Motives, Marks and Means; out of which, as out of an Alphabet or Sol fa, by forming and transforming, joyning and diſ-joyning variouſly a little bookcraft, and two hours meditation, might furniſh him unſpeakably to the performance of more then a weekly charge of ſermoning: not to reck'n up the infinit helps of interlinearies, breviaries, ſynopſes, and other loitering gear. But as for the multitude of Sermons ready printed and pil'd up, on every text that is not difficult, our London trading St. Thomas in his Veſtry, and add to boot St. Martin and St. Hugh, have not within thir hallow'd limits more vendible ware of all ſorts ready made: ſo that penury he never need fear of Pulpit-proviſion, having where ſo plenteouſly to refreſh his magazin. But if his rear and flanks be not impal'd, if his back-door be not ſecur'd by the rigid Licenſer, but that a bold Book may now and then iſſue forth, and give the aſſault to ſom of his old Collections in thir Trenches, it will concern him then to keep waking, to ſtand in watch, to ſet good guards and ſentinels about his receiv'd Opinions, to walk the round and counter-round with his fellow inſpectors, fearing leſt any of his flock be ſeduc'd, who alſo then would be better inſtructed, better exercis'd and diſciplin'd. And God ſend that the fear of this diligence which muſt then be us'd, do not make us affect the lazines of a licenſing Church.

For if we be ſure we are in the right, and do not hold the truth guiltily, which becomes not, if we our ſelves condemn not our own weak and frivolous teaching, and the people for an untaught and irreligious gadding rout, what can be more fair, then when a man judicious, learned, and of a conſcience, for ought we know, as good as thirs that taught us what we know, ſhall not privily from houſe to houſe, which is more dangerous, but openly by writing publiſh to the World what his Opinion is, what his Reaſons, and wherfore that which is now thought cannot be ſound. Chriſt urg'd it as wherwith to juſtifie himſelf, that he preacht in public; yet writing is more public then preaching; and more eaſie to refutation, if need be, there being ſo many whoſe buſineſs and profeſſion meerly it is to be the champions of Truth; which if they neglect, what can be imputed but thir ſloth or unability?

Thus much we are hinder'd and diſ-inur'd by this cours of licenſing toward the true knowledg of what we ſeem to know. For how much it hurts and hinders the Licenſers themſelves in the calling of thir Miniſtery, more then any ſecular employment, if they will diſcharge that office as they ought, ſo that of neceſſity they muſt neglect either the one duty or the other; I inſiſt not, becauſe it is a particular, but leave it to thir own conſcience, how they will decide it there.

There is yet behind of what I purpos'd to lay open, the incredible loſs and detriment that this plot of Licenſing puts us to, more then if ſom enemy at Sea ſhould ſtop up all our Hav'ns, and Ports, and Creeks; it hinders and retards the Importation of our richeſt Merchandize, Truth: nay it was firſt eſtabliſht and put in practice by Antichriſtian malice and myſtery on ſet purpoſe to extinguiſh, if it were poſſible, the light of Reformation, and to ſettle falſhood; little differing from that policy wherwith the Turk upholds his Alcoran, by the prohibition of Printing. 'Tis not deny'd, but gladly confeſt, we are to ſend our Thanks and Vows to Heav'n, louder then moſt of Nations, for that great meaſure of Truth which we enjoy, eſpecially in thoſe main Points between us and the Pope, with his appertinences the Prelats: but he who thinks we are to pitch our Tent here, and have attain'd the utmoſt proſpect of Reformation, that the mortal glaſs wherin we contemplat can ſhew us, till we com to beatific Viſion, that man by this very Opinion declares, that he is yet far ſhort of the Truth.

Truth indeed came once into the world with her divine Maſter, and was a perfect ſhape moſt glorious to look on: but when he aſcended, and his Apoſtles after him were laid aſleep, then ſtrait aroſe a wicked race of deceivers, who as that ſtory goes of the Epyptian Typhon with his conſpirators, how they dealt with the good Oſiris, took the virgin Truth, hew'd her lovely form into a thouſand pieces, and ſcatter'd them to the four winds. From that time ever ſince, the ſad friends of Truth, ſuch as durſt appear, imitating the careful ſearch that Iſis made for the mangl'd body of Oſiris, went up and down gathering up limb by limb ſtill as they could find them. We have not yet found them all, Lords and Commons, nor ever ſhall do, till her Maſters ſecond coming; he ſhall bring together every joynt and member, and ſhall mould them into an immortal feature of lovelines and perfection. Suffer not theſe licenſing prohibitions to ſtand at every place of opportunity forbidding and diſturbing them that continue ſeeking, that continue to do our obſequies to the torn body of our martyr'd Saint. We boaſt our light; but if we look not wiſely on the Sun it ſelf, it ſmites us into darknes. Who can diſcern thoſe planets that are oft combuſt, and thoſe ſtars of brighteſt magnitude that riſe and ſet with the Sun, until the oppoſit motion of thir orbs bring them to ſuch a place in the firmament, where they may be ſeen evning or morning? The light which we have gain'd, was giv'n us, not to be ever ſtaring on, but by it to diſcover onward things more remote from our knowledg. It is not the unfrocking of a Prieſt, the unmitring of a Biſhop, and the removing him from off the Presbyterian ſhoulders, that will make us a happy Nation; no, if other things as great in the Church, and in the rule of life both economical and political be not lookt into and reform'd, we have lookt ſo long upon the blaze that Zuinglius and Calvin hath beacon'd up to us, that we are ſtark blind. There be who perpetually complain of ſchiſms and ſects, and make it ſuch a calamity, that any man diſſents from thir maxims. 'Tis thir own pride and ignorance which cauſes the diſturbing, who neither will hear with meeknes, nor can convince, yet all muſt be ſuppreſt which is not found in thir Syntagma. They are the troublers, they are the dividers of unity, who neglect and permit not others to unite thoſe diſſever'd pieces which are yet wanting to the body of Truth. To be ſtill ſearching what we know not, by what we know, ſtill cloſing up truth to truth as we find it (for all her body is homogeneal, and proportional) this is the golden rule in Thelogy as well as in Arithmetic, and makes up the beſt harmony in a Church; not the forc'd and outward union of cold, and neutral, and inwardly-divided minds.

Lords and Commons of England, conſider what Nation it is wherof ye are, and wherof ye are the Governours: a Nation not ſlow and dull, but of a quick, ingenious, and piercing ſpirit, acute to invent, ſuttle and ſinewy to diſcours, not beneath the reach of any point the higheſt that human capacity can ſoar to. Therfore the ſtudies of Learning in her deepeſt Sciences have bin ſo ancient, and ſo eminent among us, that Writers of good antiquity, and able judgment, have bin perſwaded that ev'n the ſchool of Pythagoras, and the Perſian wiſdom, took beginning from the old Philoſophy of this Iland. And that wiſe and civil Roman, Julius Agricola, who govern'd once here for Cæſar, preferr'd the natural Wits of Britain, before the labour'd ſtudies of the French. Nor is it for nothing that the grave and frugal Tranſilvanian ſends out yearly from as far as the mountanous borders of Ruſſia, and beyond the Hercynian wildernes, not thir youth, but thir ſtay'd men, to learn our language, and our Theologic arts. Yet that which is above all this, the favour and the love of Heav'n, we have great argument to think in a peculiar manner propitious and propending towards us. Why elſe was this Nation choſ'n before any other, that out of her as out of Sion ſhould be proclaim'd and ſounded forth the firſt tidings and trumpet of Reformation to all Europ? And had it not bin the obſtinat perverſnes of our Prelats againſt the divine and admirable ſpirit of Wicklef, to ſuppreſs him as a ſchiſmatic and innovator, perhaps neither the Bohemian Huſſe and Jerom, no nor the name of Luther, or of Calvin had bin ever known: the glory of a reforming all our neighbours had bin compleatly ours. But now, as our obdurat Clergy have with violence demean'd the matter, we are become hitherto the lateſt and the backwardeſt Scholers, of whom God offer'd to have made us the Teachers. Now once again by all concurrence of ſigns, and by the general inſtinct of holy and devout men, as they daily and ſolemnly expreſs thir thoughts, God is decreeing to begin ſome new and great period in his Church, ev'n to the reforming of Reformation it ſelf; what does he then but reveal Himſelf to his ſervants, and as his manner is, firſt to his Engliſh-men? I ſay as his manner is, firſt to us, though we mark not the method of his counſels, and are unworthy. Behold now this vaſt City; a City of refuge, the manſion-houſe of liberty, encompaſt and ſurrounded with his protection; the ſhop of War hath not there more anvils and hammers waking, to faſhion out the plates and inſtruments of armed Juſtice in defence of beleaguer'd Truth, then there be pens and heads there, ſitting by thir ſtudious lamps, muſing, ſearching, revolving new notions and idea's wherwith to preſent as with thir homage and thir fealty the approaching Reformation: others as faſt reading, trying all things, aſſenting to the force of reaſon and convincement. What could a man require more from a Nation ſo pliant and ſo prone to ſeek after knowledg? What wants there to ſuch a towardly and pregnant ſoil, but wiſe and faithful Labourers, to make a knowing People, a Nation of Prophets, of Sages, and of Worthies? We reck'n more then five months yet to harveſt; there need not be five weeks, had we but eyes to liſt up, the fields are white already. Where there is much deſire to learn, there of neceſſity will be much arguing, much writing, many opinions; for opinion in good men is but knowledg in the making. Under theſe fantaſtic terrors of ſect and ſchiſm, we wrong the earneſt and zealous thirſt after knowledg and underſtanding which God hath ſtirr'd up in this City. What ſom lament of, we rather ſhould rejoyce at, ſhould rather praiſe this pious forwardnes among men, to reaſſume the ill deputed care of thir Religion into thir own hands again. A little generous prudence, a little forbearance of one another, and ſom grain of charity might win all theſe diligences to joyn, and unite into one general and brotherly ſearch after Truth; could we but forgo this Prelatical tradition of crowding free Conſciences and Chriſtian Liberties into canons and precepts of men. I doubt not, if ſom great and worthy ſtranger ſhould com among us, wiſe to diſcern the mould and temper of a people, and how to govern it, obſerving the high hopes and aims, the diligent alacrity of our extended thoughts and reaſonings in the purſuance of truth and freedom, but that he would cry out as Pirrhus did, admiring the Roman docility and courage; if ſuch were my Epirots, I would not deſpair the greateſt deſign that could be attempted to make a Church or Kingdom happy. Yet theſe are the men cry'd out againſt for ſchiſmaticks and ſectaries, as if, while the Temple of the Lord was building, ſome cutting, ſome ſquaring the Marble, others hewing the Cedars, there ſhould be a ſort of irrational men who could not conſider there muſt be many ſchiſms and many diſſections made in the quarry and in the timber, ere the Houſe of God can be built. And when every ſtone is laid artfully together, it cannot be united into a continuity, it can but be contiguous in this world: neither can every piece of the Building be of one form; nay rather the perfection conſiſts in this, that out of many moderat varieties and brotherly diſſimilitudes that are not vaſtly diſproportional, ariſes the goodly and the graceful ſymmetry that commends the whole pile and ſtructure. Let us therſore be more conſiderat Builders, more wiſe in ſpiritual Architecture, when great Reformation is expected. For now the time ſeems come, wherin Moſes the great Prophet may ſit in Heav'n rejoycing to ſee that memorable and glorious wiſh of his fulfill'd, when not only our ſev'nty Elders, but all the Lords people are become Prophets. No marvel then though ſome men, and ſome good men too perhaps, but young in goodneſs, as Joſhua then was, envy them. They fret, and out of thir own weaknes are in agony, leſt theſe diviſions and ſub-diviſions will undo us. The adverſary again applauds, and waits the hour, when they have brancht themſelves out, ſaith he, ſmall anough into parties and partitions, then will be our time. Fool! he ſees not the firm root, out of which we all grow, though into branches; nor will beware until he ſee our ſmall divided maniples cutting through at every angle of his ill united and unweildy brigade. And that we are to hope better of all theſe ſuppoſed ſects and ſchiſms, and that we ſhall not need that ſolicitude, honeſt perhaps, though over-timorous, of them that vex in this behalf, but ſhall laugh in the end at thoſe malicious applauders of our differences, I have theſe reaſons to perſwade me.

Firſt, when a City ſhall be at it were beſieg'd and blockt about, her navigable river infeſted, inrodes and incurſions round, defiance and battel oft rumor'd to be marching up ev'n to her walls and ſuburb trenches, that then the people, or the greater part, more then at other times, wholly tak'n up with the ſtudy of higheſt and moſt important matters to be reform'd, ſhould be diſputing, reaſoning, reading, inventing, diſcourſing, ev'n to a rarity, and admiration, things not before diſcourſt or writt'n of, argues firſt a ſingular good will, contentedneſs and confidence in your prudent foreſight, and ſafe government, Lords and Commons; and from thence derives it ſelf to a gallant bravery and well grounded contempt of thir enemies, as if there were no ſmall number of as great ſpirits among us, as his was, who when Rome was nigh beſieg'd by Hanibal, being in the City, bought that piece of ground at no cheap rate, wheron Hanibal himſelf encampt his own regiment. Next it is a lively and cheerful preſage of our happy ſucceſs and victory. For as in a body, when the blood is freſh, the ſpirits pure and vigorous, not only to vital, but to rational faculties, and thoſe in the acuteſt, and the perteſt operations of wit and ſuttlety, it argues in what good plight and conſtitution the body is; ſo when the cheerfulneſs of the people is ſo ſprightly up, as that it has not only wherwith to guard well its own freedom and ſafety, but to ſpare, and to beſtow upon the ſolideſt and ſublimeſt points of controverſie, and new invention, it betok'ns us not degenerated, nor drooping to a fatal decay, but caſting off the old and wrincl'd ſkin of corruption to outlive theſe pangs, and wax young again, entring the glorious ways of Truth and proſperous Vertue, deſtin'd to becom great and honourable in theſe latter ages. Methinks I ſee in my mind a noble and puiſſant Nation rouſing her ſelf like a ſtrong man after ſleep, and ſhaking her invincible locks: Methinks I ſee her as an Eagle muing her mighty youth, and kindling her undazl'd eyes at the full mid-day beam; purging and unſcaling her long-abuſed ſight at the fountain it ſelf of heav'nly radiance; while the whole noiſe of timorous and flocking birds, with thoſe alſo that love the twilight, flutter about, amaz'd at what ſhe means, and in thir envious gabble would prognoſticat a year of Sects and Schiſms.

What ſhould ye do then, ſhould ye ſuppreſs all this flowry crop of knowledg and new light ſprung up and yet ſpringing daily in this City? ſhould ye ſet an Oligarchy of twenty ingroſſers over it, to bring a famin upon our minds again, when we ſhall know nothing but what is meaſur'd to us by thir buſhel? Believe it, Lords and Commons, they who counſel ye to ſuch a ſuppreſſing, do as good as bid ye ſuppreſs your ſelves; and I will ſoon ſhew how. If it be deſir'd to know the immediat cauſe of all this free writing and free ſpeaking, there cannot be aſſign'd a truer then your own mild, and free, and human government; it is the liberty, Lords and Commons, which your own valorous and happy Counſels have purchaſt us, Liberty which is the nurſe of all great Wits: this is that which hath rarify'd and enlighten'd our ſpirits like the influence of Heav'n; this is that which hath enfranchis'd, enlarg'd and lifted up our apprehenſions degrees above themſelves. Ye cannot make us now leſs capable, leſs knowing, leſs eagerly purſuing of the truth, unleſs ye firſt make your ſelves, that made us ſo, leſs the lovers, leſs the founders of our true liberty. We can grow ignorant again, brutiſh, formal, and ſlaviſh, as ye found us; but you then muſt firſt becom that which ye cannot be, oppreſſive, arbitrary, and tyrannous, as they were from whom ye have free'd us. That our hearts are now more capacious, our thoughts more erected to the ſearch and expectation of greateſt and exacteſt things, is the iſſue of your own vertu propagated in us; ye cannot ſuppreſs that, unleſs ye reinforce an abrogated and mercileſs Law, that Fathers may diſpatch at will thir own Children. And who ſhall then ſtick cloſeſt to ye, and excite others? not he who takes up arms for Cote and Conduct, and his four nobles of Danegelt. Although I diſpraiſe not the defence of juſt immunities, yet love my peace better, if that were all. Give me the liberty to know, to utter, and to argue freely according to conſcience, above all liberties.

What would be beſt advis'd then, if it be found ſo hurtful and ſo unequal to ſuppreſs Opinions for the newnes, or the unſutablenes to a cuſtomary acceptance, will not be my task to ſay; I only ſhall repeat what I have learnt from one of your own honourable number, a right noble and pious Lord, who had he not ſacrific'd his life and fortunes to the Church and Commonwealth, we had not now miſt and bewail'd a worthy and undoubted Patron of this argument. Ye know him I am ſure; yet I for honours ſake, and may it be eternal to him, ſhall name him, the Lord Brook. He writing of Epiſcopacy, and by the way treating of Sects and Schiſms, left Ye his Vote, or rather now the laſt Words of his dying Charge, which I know will ever be of dear and honour'd regard with Ye, ſo full of Meeknes and breathing Charity, that next to his laſt Teſtament, who bequeath'd Love and Peace to his Diſciples, I cannot call to mind where I have read or heard words more mild and peaceful. He there exhorts us to hear with patience and humility thoſe, however they be miſcall'd, that deſire to live purely, in ſuch a uſe of God's Ordinances, as the beſt guidance of thir conſcience gives them, and to tolerat them, though in ſome diſconformity to our ſelves. The Book it ſelf will tell us more at large, being publiſht to the World, and dedicated to the Parlament by him who both for his life and for his death deſerves, that what advice he left, be not laid by without peruſal.

And now the time in ſpecial is, by privilege to write and ſpeak what may help to the furder diſcuſſing of matters in agitation. The Temple of Janus, with his two controverſal faces, might now not unſignificantly be ſet open. And though all the winds of doctrin were let looſe to play upon the earth, ſo Truth be in the field, we do injuriouſly by licenſing and prohibiting to miſdoubt her ſtrength. Let her and Falſhood grapple ; who ever knew Truth put to the wors, in a free and open encounter? Her confuting is the beſt and ſureſt ſuppreſſing. He who hears what praying there is for light and clearer knowledg to be ſent down among us, would think of other matters to be conſtituted beyond the diſciplin of Geneva, fram'd and fabric't already to our hands. Yet when the new light which we beg for, ſhines in upon us, there be who envy and oppoſe, if it com not firſt in at thir caſements. What a colluſion is this, whenas we are exhorted by the wiſe man to uſe diligence, to ſeek for wiſdom as for hidd'n treaſures early and late, that another Order ſhall enjoyn us, to know nothing but by ſtatute? When a man hath bin labouring the hardeſt labour in the deep mines of Knowledg, hath furniſht out his findings in all thir equipage, drawn forth his reaſons as it were a battel rang'd, ſcatter'd and defeated all objections in his way, calls out his adverſary into the plain, offers him the advantage of wind and ſun, if he pleaſe, only that he may try the matter by dint of argument; for his opponents then to ſculk, to lay ambuſhments, to keep a narrow bridg of licenſing where the challenger ſhould paſs, though it be valour enough in ſouldierſhip, is but weaknes and cowardiſe in the wars of Truth. For who knows not that Truth is ſtrong, next to the Almighty ; ſhe needs no policies, nor ſtratagems, nor licenſings to make her victorious, thoſe are the ſhifts and the defences that error uſes againſt her power : give her but room, and do not bind her when ſhe ſleeps, for then ſhe ſpeaks not true, as the old Proteus did, who ſpake Oracles only when he was caught and bound, but then rather ſhe turns her ſelf into all ſhapes, except her own, and perhaps tunes her voice according to the time, as Micaiah did before Ahab, until ſhe be adjur'd into her own likenes. Yet is it not impoſſible that ſhe may have more ſhapes then one? What elſe is all that rank of things indifferent, wherin Truth may be on this ſide, or on the other, without being unlike her ſelf? What but a vain ſhadow elſe is the abolition of thoſe ordinances, that hand-writing nail'd to the croſs? what great purchaſe is this Chriſtian liberty which Paul ſo often boaſts of. His doctrin is, that he who eats or eats not, regards a day or regards it not, may do either to the Lord. How many other things might be tolerated in peace, and left to conſcience, had we but charity, and were it not the chief ſtrong hold of our hypocriſie to be ever judging one another? I fear yet this iron yoke of outward conformity hath left a ſlaviſh print upon our necks; the ghoſt of a linen decency yet haunts us. We ſtumble and are impatient at the leaſt dividing of one viſible Congregation from another, though it be not in fundamentals ; and through our forwardnes to ſuppreſs, and our backwardnes to recover any enthral'd piece of truth out of the gripe of cuſtom, we care not to keep truth ſeparated from truth, which is the fierceſt rent and diſunion of all. We do not ſee that while we ſtill affect by all means a rigid external formality, we may as ſoon fall again into a groſs conforming ſtupidity, a ſtark and dead congealment of wood and hay and ſtubble forc'd and frozen together, which is more to the ſudden degenerating of a Church then many ſubdichotomies of petty ſchiſms. Not that I can think well of every light ſeparation ; or that all in a Church is to be expected gold and ſilver and precious ſtones : it is not poſſible for man to ſever the wheat from the tares, the good fiſh from the other frie ; that muſt be the Angels miniſtery at the end of mortal things. Yet if all cannot be of one mind, as who looks they ſhould be? this doubtles is more wholſom, more prudent, and more chriſtian, that many be tolerated, rather then all compel'd. I mean not tolerated Popery, and open Superſtition, which as it extirpats all Religions and civil Supremacies, ſo it ſelf ſhould be extirpat, provided firſt that all charitable and compaſſionat means be us'd to win and regain the weak and the miſled: that alſo which is impious or evil abſolutely either againſt Faith or Manners, no Law can poſſibly permit, that intends not to unlaw it ſelf: but thoſe neighboring differences, or rather indifferences, are what I ſpeak of, whether in ſome point of doctrin or of diſciplin, which though they may be many, yet need not interrupt the unity of Spirit, if we could but find among us the bond of peace. In the mean while if any one would write, and bring his helpful hand to the ſlow-moving Reformation which we labour under, if Truth have ſpok'n to him before others, or but ſeem'd at leaſt to ſpeak, who hath ſo bejeſuited us that we ſhould trouble that man with asking licence to do ſo worthy a deed; and not conſider this, that if it com to prohibiting, there is not ought more likely to be prohibited then Truth itſelf: whoſe firſt appearance to our eyes, blear'd and dimm'd with prejudice and cuſtom, is more unſightly and unplauſible then many errors, ev'n as the perſon is of many a great man ſlight and contemtible to ſee to. And what do they tell us vainly of new opinions, when this very opinion of thirs, that none muſt be heard but whom they like, is the worſt and neweſt opinion of all others; and is the chief cauſe why ſects and ſchiſms do ſo much abound, and true knowledg is kept at diſtance from us; beſides yet a greater danger which is in it? For when God ſhakes a Kingdom, with ſtrong and healthful commotions, to a general reforming, 'tis not untrue that many Sectaries and falſe Teachers are then buſieſt in ſeducing? but yet more true it is, that God then raiſes to his own work men of rare abilities, and more then common induſtry, not only to look back and reviſe what hath bin taught hertofore, but to gain furder and go on, ſom new enlightn'd ſteps in the diſcovery of Truth. For ſuch is the order of God's enlightning his Church, to diſpenſe and deal out by degrees his beam, ſo as our earthly eyes may beſt ſuſtain it. Neither is God appointed and confin'd, where and out of what place theſe his Choſen ſhall be firſt heard to ſpeak; for he ſees not as man ſees, chooſes not as man chooſes, leſt we ſhould devote our ſelves again to ſet places, and aſſemblies, and outward callings of men; planting our faith one while in the old Convocation-houſe, and another while in the Chappel at Weſtminſter; when all the faith and religion that ſhall be there canoniz'd, is not ſufficient without plain convincement, and the charity of patient inſtruction to ſupple the leaſt bruiſe of conſcience, to edifie the meaneſt Chriſtian, who deſires to walk in the Spirit, and not in the letter of human truſt, for all the number of voices that can be there made; no though Harry the 7th himſelf there, with all his leige tombs about him, ſhould lend them voices from the dead, to ſwell thir number. And if the men be erroneous who appear to be the leading Schiſmaticks, what withholds us but our ſloth, our ſelf-will, and diſtruſt in the right cauſe, that we do not give them gentle meetings and gentle diſmiſſions, that we debate not and examin the matter throughly with liberal and frequent audience; if not for thir ſakes, yet for our own? ſeeing no man who hath taſted Learning, but will confeſs the many ways of profiting by thoſe who, not contented with ſtale receits, are able to manage and ſet forth new poſitions to the world. And were they but as the duſt and cinders of our feet, ſo long as in that notion they may yet ſerve to poliſh and brighten the armory of Truth, ev'n for that reſpect they were not utterly to be caſt away. But if they be of thoſe whom God hath fitted for the ſpecial uſe of theſe times with eminent and ample gifts, and thoſe perhaps neither among the Prieſts, nor among the Phariſees, and we in the haſte of a precipitant zeal ſhall make no diſtinction, but reſolve to ſtop thir mouths, becauſe we fear they com with new and dangerous opinions, as we commonly fore-judg them ere we underſtand them, no leſs then wo to us, while thinking thus to defend the Goſpel, we are found the perſecutors.

There have bin not a few ſince the beginning of this Parlament, both of the Presbytery and others, who by thir unlicens'd Books to the contempt of an Imprimatur firſt broke that triple ice clung about our hearts, and taught the people to ſee day: I hope that none of thoſe were the perſwaders to renew upon us this bondage which they themſelves have wrought ſo much good by contemning. But if neither the check that Moſes gave to young Joſhua, nor the countermand which our Saviour gave to young John, who was ſo ready to prohibit thoſe whom he thought unlicens'd, be not anough to admoniſh our Elders how unacceptable to God thir teſty mood of prohibiting is; if neither thir own remembrance what evil hath abounded in the Church by this lett of licenſing, and what good they themſelves have begun by tranſgreſſing it, be not anough, but that they will perſwade, and execute the moſt Dominican part of the Inquiſition over us, and are already with one foot in the ſtirrup ſo active at ſuppreſſing, it would be no unequal diſtribution in the firſt place to ſuppreſs the ſuppreſſors themſelves; whom the change of thir condition hath puſt up, more then thir late experience of harder times hath made wiſe.

And as for regulating the Preſs, let no man think to have the honour of adviſing ye better then your ſelves have done in that Order publiſht next before this, that no Book be printed, unleſs the Printers and the Authors name, or at leaſt the Printers be regiſter'd. Thoſe which otherwiſe com forth, if they be found miſchievous and libellous, the fire and the executioner will be the timelieſt and the moſt effectual remedy that mans prevention can uſe. For this authentic Spaniſh policy of licenſing Books, if I have ſaid ought, will prove the moſt unlicenc'd Book it ſelf within a ſhort while; and was the immediat image of a Star-chamber decree to that purpoſe made in thoſe very times when that Court did the reſt of thoſe her pious works, for which ſhe is now fall'n from the Stars with Lucifer. Wherby ye may gueſs what kind of State prudence, what love of the people, what care of Religion, or good manners there was at the contriving, although with ſingular hypocriſie it pretended to bind Books to thir good behaviour. And how it got the upper hand of your precedent Order ſo well conſtituted before, if we may believe thoſe men whoſe profeſſion gives them cauſe to enquire moſt, it may be doubted there was in it the fraud of ſom old Patentees and Monopolizers in the Trade of Book-ſelling; who under pretence of the poor in thir Company not to be defrauded, and the juſt retaining of each man his ſeveral copy, which God forbid ſhould be gainſaid, brought divers gloſſing colours to the Houſe, which were indeed but colours, and ſerving to no end except it be to exerciſe a ſuperiority over thir neighbours; Men who do not therfore labour in an honeſt profeſſion to which Learning is indetted, that they ſhould be made other mens vaſſals. Another end is thought was aim'd at by ſom of them in procuring by petition this Order, that having power in thir hands, malignant Books might the eaſier ſcape abroad, as the event ſhews. But of theſe Sophiſms and Elenchs of marchandize I ſkill not: This I know, that errors in a good Government and in a bad are equally almoſt incident; for what Magiſtrate may not be miſ-inform'd, and much the ſooner, if liberty of Printing be reduc'd into the power of a few? but to redreſs willingly and ſpeedily what hath bin err'd, and in higheſt autority to eſteem a plain Advertiſement more then others have done a ſumptuous Bride, is a Vertue (honour'd Lords and Commons) anſwerable to Your higheſt Actions, and wherof none can participat, but greateſt and wiſeſt men.

The Preface.

TO deſcant on the Misfortunes of a Perſon fall'n from ſo high a Dignity, who hath alſo payd his final debt both to Nature and his Faults, is neither of it ſelf a thing commendable, nor the intention of this Diſcourſe: Neither was it fond Ambition, or the vanity to get a Name preſent or with Poſterity, by writing againſt a King. I never was ſo thirſty after Fame, nor ſo deſtitute of other hopes and means better and more certaine to attaine it: for Kings have gain'd glorious Titles from their Favourers by writing againſt private Men, as Henry the 8*th* did againſt Luther; but no Man ever gain'd much honour by writing againſt a King, as not uſually meeting with that force of Argument in ſuch Courtly Antagoniſts, which to convince might add to his Reputation. Kings moſt commonly, though ſtrong in Legions, are but weak at Arguments; as they who ever have accuſtom'd from the Cradle to uſe thir Will only as their right hand, their Reaſon always as thir left. Whence unexpectedly conſtrain'd to that kind of combate, they prove but weak and puny Adverſaries: Neverthelesſ, for their ſakes who through cuſtom, ſimplicity, or want of better teaching, have not more ſeriouſly conſider'd Kings, then in the gaudy Name of Majeſty, and admire them and thir doings as if they breath'd not the ſame breath with other mortal Men, I ſhall make no ſcruple to take up (for it ſeems to be the challenge both of him and all his Party) this Gauntlet, though a King's, in the behalfe of Liberty and the Common-wealth.

And furder, ſince it appears manifeſtly the cunning drift of a factious and defeated Party, to make the ſame advantage of his Book, which they did before of his Regall Name and Authority, and intend it not ſo much the defence of his former Actions, as the promoting of their own future Deſigns; making thereby the Book thir own rather then the Kings, as the benefit now muſt be thir own more then his: now the third time to corrupt and diſorder the minds of weaker Men, by new Suggeſtions and Narrations, either falſly or fallaciouſly repreſenting the ſtate of things to the diſhonour of this preſent Government, and the retarding of a general Peace, ſo needfull to this afflicted

Nation, and ſo nigh obtain'd ; I ſuppoſe it no Injurie to the dead, but a good deed rather to the living, if by better information giv'n them, or which is anough, by onely remembring them the truth of what they themſelves know to be heer miſaffirmed, they may be kept from entring the third time unadviſedly into Warr and Bloodſhed : for as to any moment of ſolidity in the Book it ſelf, ſtuft with naught els but the common grounds of Tyranny and Popery, ſugar'd a little over ; or any need of anſwering, in reſpect of ſtaid and well-principl'd men, I take it on me as a work aſſign'd rather then by me chos'n or affected ; which was the cauſe both of beginning it ſo late, and finiſhing it ſo leaſurely in the midſt of other imploiments and diverſions. And if the late King had thought ſufficient thoſe Anſwers and Defences made for him in his life time, they who on the other ſide accus'd his evill Government, judging that on their behalf anough alſo hath bin reply'd, the heat of this Controverſie was in likelyhood drawing to an end ; and the furder mention of his deeds, not ſo much unfortunate as faulty, had in tenderneſs to his late Sufferings been willingly forborn ; and perhaps for the preſent age might have ſlept with him unrepeated, while his Adverſaries, calm'd and aſſwag'd with the ſucceſs of their Cauſe, had bin the leſs unfavourable to his Memory. But ſince he himſelf, making new appeal to Truth and the World, hath left behind him this Book as the beſt Advocate and Interpreter of his owne Actions, and that his Friends by publiſhing, diſperſing, commending, and almoſt adoring it, ſeem to place therein the chief ſtrength and nerves of thir Cauſe, it would argue doubtleſs in the other Party great deficience and diſtruſt of themſelves, not to meet the force of his Reaſon in any Field whatſoever, the force and equipage of whoſe Arms they have ſo oft'n met victoriouſly. And he who at the Bar ſtood excepting againſt the forme and manner of his Judicature, and complain'd that he was not heard ; neither he nor his Friends ſhall have that cauſe now to find fault ; being mett and debated with in this op'n and monumental Court of his owne erecting ; and not onely heard uttering his whole mind at large, but anſwer'd : which to doe effectually, if it be neceſſary that to his Book nothing the more reſpect be had for being his, they of his own Party can have no juſt reaſon to exclaim. For it were too unreaſonable that he, becauſe dead, ſhould have the liberty in his Booke to ſpeak all evill of the Parliament ; and they, becauſe living, ſhould be expected to have leſs freedom, or any for them, to ſpeak home the plain truth of a full and pertinent Reply : As he, to acquit himſelſe, hath not ſpar'd his Adverſaries to load them with all ſorts of Blame and Accuſation, ſo to him, as in his Book alive, there will be us'd no more Courtſhip then he uſes ; but what is properly his owne guilt, not imputed any more to his evill Counſellors (a Ceremony us'd longer by the Parlament then he himſelf deſir'd) ſhall be layd heer, without Circumlocutions at his owne dore. That they who from the firſt beginning, or but now of late, by what unhappineſs I know not, are ſo much affatuated, not with his Perſon only, but with his palpable Faults, and dote upon his Deformities, may have none to blame but thir owne folly, if they live and dye in ſuch a ſtrook'n blindneſs, as next to that of Sodom hath not happ'nd to any ſort of men more groſs or more miſleading.

First then that ſome men (whether this were by him intended or by his Friends) have by policy accompliſh'd after death that revenge upon thir Enemies, which in life they were not able, hath bin oft related. And among other Examples we find that the laſt Will of Cæſar being read to the people, and what bounteous Legacies he had bequeath'd them, wrought more in that vulgar audience to the avenging of his death, then all the art he could ever uſe to win thir favor in his life time. And how much thir intent who publiſh'd theſe overlate Apologies and Meditations of the dead King, drives to the ſame end of ſtirring up the people to bring him that Honour, that Affection, and by conſequence that Revenge to his dead Corps, which he himſelſe living could never gain to his Perſon, it appeares both by the conceited Portrature before his Book, drawn out to the full meaſure of a masking Scene, and ſett there to catch Fools and ſilly Gazers, and by thoſe Latin words after the end, Vota dabunt quæ Bella negarunt ; intimating, that what hee could not compaſs by War hee ſhould atchieve by his Meditations : For in words which admit of various ſenſe, the libertie is ours to chooſe that Interpretation which may beſt mind us of what our reſtleſs Enemies endeavour, and what we are timely to prevent.

And heer may be well obſerv'd the looſe and negligent curioſity of thoſe who took upon them to adorn the ſetting out of this Book; for though the Picture ſett in Front would martyr him and ſaint him to befoole the people, yet the Latin Motto in the end, which they underſtand not, leaves him as it were a politic Contriver to bring about that Intereſt by faire and plauſible words which the force of Arms deny'd him. But quaint Emblems and Devices begg'd from the olde Pageantry of ſome Twelfe-nights entertainment at Whitehall, will do but ill to make a Saint or Martyr: and if the people reſolve to take him ſainted at the rate of ſuch a Canonizing, I ſhall ſuſpect their Calender more then the Gregorian. In one thing I muſt commend his openneſs who gave the Title to this Book, εικὼν βασιλικὴ, that is to ſay, The King's Image; and by the Shrine he dreſſes out for him, certainly would have the people come and worſhip him: For which reaſon this Anſwer alſo is intitl'd, Iconoclaſtes, the famous Surname of many Greek Emperors, who in thir zeal to the Command of God, after long tradition of Idolatry in the Church, tooke courage and broke all ſuperſtitious Images to pieces. But the people, exorbitant and exceſſive in all thir motions, are prone oftimes not to a religious only, but to a civil kind of Idolatry in idolizing thir Kings; though never more miſtak'n in the object of thir worſhip; heretofore being wont to repute for Saints thoſe faithful and courageous Barons who loſt thir lives in the Field, making glorious War againſt Tyrants for the common Liberty; as Simon de Momfort, Earle of Leiceſter, againſt Henry the Third; Thomas Plantagenet Earle of Lancaſter, againſt Edward the Second. But now with a beſotted and degenerate baſeneſs of Spirit, except ſome few who yet retain in them the old Engliſh Fortitude and love of freedom, and have teſtifi'd it by thir matchleſs deeds, the reſt imbaſtardiz'd from the ancient Nobleneſs of thir Anceſtors, are ready to fall flat and give adoration to the Image and Memory of this Man, who hath offer'd at more cunning fetches to undermine our Liberties, and put Tyranny into an Art, then any Brittiſh King before him: which low dejection and debaſement of mind in the people, I muſt confeſs I cannot willingly aſcribe to the natural diſpoſition of an Engliſhman, but rather to two other Cauſes: firſt to the Prelats and thir fellow-teachers, though of another Name and Sect, whoſe Pulpit-ſtuffe both firſt and laſt, hath bin the Doctrin and perpetuall infuſion of Servility and Wretchedneſs to all their Hearers, and their Lives the type of worldlineſs and hypocriſy, without the leaſt true pattern of Vertue, Righteouſneſs or Selfe-denyall in their whole practice. I attribute it next to the factious Inclination of moſt men divided from the Public by ſeveral ends and humours of their owne. At firſt no Man leſs belov'd, no Man more generally condemn'd then was the King; from the time that it became his Cuſtom to break Parlaments at home, and either wilfully or weakly to betray Proteſtants abroad, to the beginning of theſe Combuſtions. All men inveigh'd againſt him; all men, except Court Vaſſals, oppos'd him and his tyrannicall Proceedings; the Cry was univerſall; and this full Parlament was at firſt unanimous in thir diſlike and proteſtation againſt his evill Government. But when they who ſought themſelves and not the publick, began to doubt that all of them could not by one and the ſame way attain to thir ambitious purpoſes, then was the King, or his Name at leaſt, as a fit property firſt made uſe of, his doings made the beſt of, and by degrees juſtified: which begot him ſuch a Party, as after many wiles and ſtruglings with his inward feares, imboldn'd him at length to ſett up his Standard againſt the Parlament. When as before that time, all his Adherents, conſiſting moſt of diſſolute Swordmen and Suburb-royſters, hardly amounted to the making up of one ragged Regiment, ſtrong enough to aſſault the unarmed Houſe of Commons. After which attempte, ſeconded by a tedious and bloody War on his Subjects, wherein he hath ſo farr exceeded thoſe his arbitrary Violences in time of Peace, they who before hated him for his high Miſgovernment, nay fought againſt him with diſplay'd Banners in the Field, now applaud him and extoll him for the wiſeſt and moſt religious Prince that liv'd. By ſo ſtrange a Method amongſt the mad Multitude is a ſudden Reputation won, of Wiſdom by wilfullneſs and ſubtle ſhifts, of Goodneſs by multiplying evill, of Piety by endeavouring to root out true Religion.

But it is evident that the chief of his Adherents never lov'd him, never honourd either him or his Cauſe, but as they took him to ſet a face upon their own lignant Deſignes, nor bemoan his loſs at all, but the loſs of their own aſpiring hopes; like thoſe captive Women whome the Poet notes in his Iliad, to have bewaild the Death of Patroclus in outward ſhow, but indeed their own condition.

> Πάτροκλον πρόφασιν, σφῶν δ' ἀυτῶν κήδ' ἑκάστη.
> Hom. Iliad. τ.

And it needs muſt be ridiculous to any Judgement uninthrall'd, that they who in other matters expreſs ſo little fear either of God or Man, ſhould in this one particular outſtripp all Preciſianiſm with their ſcruples and caſes, and fill mens ears continually with the noiſe of their conſcientious Loyaltie and Allegeance to the King, Rebels in the mean while to God in all their actions beſide: much leſs that they whoſe profeſs'd Loyalty and Allegeance led them to direct Armes againſt the King's Perſon, and thought him nothing violated by the Sword of Hoſtility drawn by them againſt him, ſhould now in earneſt think him violated by the unſparing Sword of Juſtice, which undoubtedly ſo much the leſs in vaine ſhe beares among men, by how much greater and in higheſt place the offender. Els Juſtice, whether moral or politicall, were not Juſtice, but a fals Counterfeit of that impartial and Godlike Vertue. The onely griefe is, that the Head was not ſtrook off to the beſt advantage and commodity of them that held it by the Haire: which obſervation, though made by a common Enemie, may for the truth of it heerafter become a Proverb. But as to the Author of theſe Soliloquies, whether it were the late King, as is vulgarly beleev'd, or any ſecret Coadjutor, and ſome ſtick not to name him, it can add nothing, nor ſhall take from the weight, if any be, of reaſon which he brings. But Allegations, not Reaſons, are the maine Contents of this Book, and need no more then other contrary Allegations to lay the Queſtion before all Men in an eev'n Ballance; though it were ſuppos'd that the Teſtimony of one Man in his own Cauſe affirming could be of any moment to bring in doubt the Autority of a Parlament denying. But if theſe his faire-ſpok'n words ſhall be heer fairely confronted and laid parallel to his own farr-differing deeds, manifeſt and viſible to the whole Nation, then ſurely we may look on them who notwithſtanding ſhall perſiſt to give to bare words more credit than to op'n deeds, as men whoſe Judgment was not rationally evinc'd and perſwaded, but fatally ſtupifi'd and bewitch'd into ſuch a blind and obſtinate belief: for whoſe Cure it may be doubted, not whether any Charm, though never ſo wiſely murmur'd, but whether any Prayer can be available.

I. Upon the Kings calling this laſt Parlament.

THAT which the King laies down here as his firſt foundation, and as it were the head ſtone of his whole Structure, that He call'd this laſt Parlament, not more by others advice, and the neceſſity of his affairs, then by his own chois and inclination, is to all knowing men ſo apparently not true, that a more unlucky and inauſpicious ſentence, and more betok'ning the downfall of his whole Fabric, hardly could have come into his Mind. For who knows not that the inclination of a Prince is beſt known either by thoſe next about him, and moſt in favor with him, or by the current of his own Actions? Thoſe neereſt to this King, and moſt his Favorites, were Courtiers and Prelates; Men whoſe chief ſtudy was to find out which way the King inclin'd, and to imitate him exactly: How theſe Men ſtood affected to Parlaments cannot be forgott'n. No Man but may remember it was thir continuall exerciſe to diſpute and preach againſt them; and in thir common diſcourſe nothing was more frequent, then that they hoped the King ſhould now have no need of Parlaments any more. And this was but the copy which his Paraſites had induſtriouſly taken from his own Words and Actions, who never call'd a Parlament, but to ſupply his neceſſities; and having ſupply'd thoſe, as ſuddenly and ignominiouſly diſſolv'd it, without redreſſing any one greevance of the People: Sometimes chooſing rather to miſs of his Subſidies, or to raiſe them by illegal courſes, then that the People ſhould not ſtill miſs of thir hopes to be reliev'd by Parlaments.

The firſt he broke off at his comming to the Crown, for no other cauſe then to protect the Duke of Buckingham againſt them who had accuſed him, beſides other hainous Crimes, of no leſs then poyſoning the deceaſed King his Father. And ſtill the latter breaking was with more affront and indignity put upon the Houſe and her worthieſt Members then the former. Inſomuch that in the fifth yeare of his Raign, in a Proclamation he ſeems offended at the very rumor of a Parlament divulg'd among the people, as if hee had tak'n it for a kind of Slander, that Men ſhould think him that way exorable, much leſs inclin'd: and forbids it as a preſumption to preſcribe him any time for Parlaments; that is to ſay, either by Perſwaſion or Petition, or ſo much as the reporting of ſuch a Rumor: for other manner of preſcribing was at that time not ſuſpected. By which fierce Edict, the people, forbidd'n to complaine, as well as forc'd to ſuffer, began from thenceforth to deſpair of Parlaments. Whereupon ſuch illegal actions, and eſpecially to get vaſt ſumms of Money, were put in practiſe by the King and his new Officers, as Monopolies, compulſive Knighthoods, Cote, Conduct and Ship-mony, the ſeizing not of one Naboths Vineyard, but of whole Inheritances, under the pretence of Forreſt, or Crown-Lands; Corruption and Bribery compounded for, with impunities granted for the future, as gave evident proof that the King never meant, nor could it ſtand with the reaſon of his Affairs ever to recall Parlaments: having brought by theſe irregular courſes the peoples Intereſt and his own to ſo direct an oppoſition, that he might foreſee plainely, if nothing but a Parlament could ſave the people, it muſt neceſſarily be his undoing.

Till eight or nine years after, proceeding with a high hand in theſe Enormities, and having the ſecond time levied an injurious War againſt his native Countrie, Scotland; and finding all thoſe other ſhifts of raiſing mony, which bore out his firſt Expedition, now to faile him, not of his own chois and inclination, as any Child may ſee, but urg'd by ſtrong neceſſities, and the very pangs of State, which his owne violent Proceedings had brought him to, hee calls a Parlament; firſt in Ireland, which only was to give him four Subſidies, and ſo to expire; then in England, where his firſt demand was but twelve Subſidies, to maintaine a Scotch Warr, condemn'd and abominated by the whole Kingdom; promiſing thir greevances ſhould be conſider'd afterwards. Which when the Parliament, who judg'd that Warr it ſelf one of thir main greevances, made no haſt to grant, not enduring the delay of his impatient will, or els fearing the conditions of thir grant, he breaks off the whole Seſſion, and diſmiſſes them and thir greevances with ſcorn and fruſtration.

Much leſs therefore did hee call this laſt Parlament by his own chois and inclination; but having firſt try'd in vaine all undue ways to procure mony, his Army of thir own accord being beat'n in the North, the Lords petitioning, and the general voice of the People almoſt hiſſing him and his ill-acted regalitie off the Stage, compell'd at length both by his wants, and by his fears, upon meer extremitie he ſummond this laſt Parlament. And how is it poſſible that hee ſhould willingly incline to Parlaments, who never was perceiv'd to call them but for the greedy hope of a whole National Bribe, his Subſidies; and never lov'd, never fulfill'd, never promoted the true end of Parlaments, the redreſs of greevances; but ſtill put them off, and prolong'd them, whether gratify'd or not gratify'd; and was indeed the Author of all thoſe greevances? To ſay therefore that he call'd this Parlament of his own chois and inclination, argues how little truth wee can expect from the ſequel of this Book, which ventures in the very firſt period to affront more then one Nation with an untruth ſo remarkable; and preſumes a more implicit Faith in the people of England, then the Pope ever commanded from the Romiſh Laitie; or els a natural ſottiſhneſs fitt to be abus'd and ridd'n? While in the judgement of wiſe Men, by laying the foundation of his defence on the avouchment of that which is ſo manifeſtly untrue, he hath giv'n a worſe foile to his own cauſe, then when his whole Forces were at any time overthrown. They therefore who think ſuch great Service don to the Kings affaires in publiſhing this Book, will find themſelves in the end miſtaken, if ſenſe and right mind, or but any mediocritie of knowledg and remembrance hath not quite forſak'n men.

But to prove his inclination to Parlaments, he affirmes heer, To have always thought the right way of them moſt ſafe for his Crown, and beſt pleaſing to his People. What he thought we know not, but that he ever took the contrary way we ſaw; and from his own actions we felt long agoe what hee thought of Parlaments or of pleaſing his People: a ſurer Evidence than what we heare now too late in words.

He alleges, that the cauſe of forbearing to convene Parlaments was the ſparkes which ſome mens diſtempers there ſtudied to kindle. They were indeed not temper'd to his temper; for it neither was the Law, nor the rule by which all other tempers were to be try'd; but they were eſteem'd and chos'n for the fitteſt men, in thir ſeverall Counties, to allay and quench thoſe diſtempers which his own inordinate doings had inflam'd. And if that were his refuſing to convene, till thoſe men had bin qualifi'd to his temper, that is to ſay, his will, we may eaſily conjecture what hope ther was of Parlaments, had not fear and his inſatiat povertie in the midſt of his exceſſive wealth conſtrain'd him.

Hee hoped by his freedom and their moderation to prevent miſunderſtandings. And wherefore not by thir freedom and his moderation? But freedom he thought too high a word for them, and moderation too mean a word for himſelf: this was not the way to prevent miſunderſtandings. He ſtill feard paſſion and prejudice in other men; not in himſelf: and doubted not by the weight of his own reaſon to counterpoiſe any Faction; it being ſo eaſie for him, and ſo frequent, to call his obſtinacy reaſon, and other mens reaſon Faction. Wee in the mean while muſt believe that wiſdom and all reaſon came to him by Title with his Crowne; paſſion, prejudice, and faction came to others by being Subjects.

He was ſorry to hear with what popular heat Elections were carri'd in many Places. Sorry rather that Court-Letters and intimations prevail'd no more, to divert, or to deterr the people from thir free Election of thoſe men, whom they thought beſt affected to Religion and thir Countries Libertie, both at that time in danger to be loſt. And ſuch men they were, as by the Kingdom were ſent to adviſe him, not ſent to be cavill'd at, becauſe elected, or to be entertained by him with an undervalue and miſpriſion of their temper, judgement, or affection. In vaine was a Parlament thought fitteſt by the known Laws of our Nation, to adviſe and regulate unruly Kings, if they, inſtead of hearkning to advice, ſhould be permitted to turn it off, and refuſe it by vilifying and traducing thir adviſers, or by accuſing of a popular heat thoſe that lawfully elected them.

His own and his Childrens intereſt oblig'd him to ſeek, and to preſerve the love and welfare of his Subjects. Who doubts it? But the ſame intereſt, common to all Kings, was never yet available to make them all ſeek that, which was indeed beſt for themſelves and thir Poſteritie. All men by thir own and thir Childrens intereſt are oblig'd to Honeſtie and Juſtice: but how little that conſideration works in private men, how much leſs in Kings, their deeds declare beſt.

He intended to oblige both Friends and Enemies, and to exceed their Deſires, did they but pretend to any modeſt and ſober ſenſe; miſtaking the whole buſineſs of a Parlament. Which mett not to receive from him Obligations, but Juſtice; nor hee to expect from them thir modeſty, but their grave advice, utter'd with freedom in the public cauſe. His talk of modeſty in thir deſires of the common welfare, argues him not much to have underſtood what he had to grant, who miſconceav'd ſo much the nature of what they had to deſire. And for ſober ſenſe, the expreſſion was too mean, and recoiles with as much diſhonour upon himſelfe, to be a King where ſober ſenſe could poſſibly be ſo wanting in a Parlament.

The odium and offences which ſome mens rigour, or remiſſneſs in Church and State had contracted upon his Government, hee reſolved to have expiated with better Laws and Regulations. And yet the worſt of miſdemeanors committed by the worſt of all his favourites in the hight of thir dominion, whether acts of rigor or remiſſneſs, he hath from time to time continu'd, own'd, and tak'n upon himſelf by public Declarations, as oft'n as the Clergie, or any other of his Inſtruments felt themſelves overburdn'd with the peoples hatred. And who knows not the ſuperſtitious rigor of his Sundays Chappel, and the licentious remiſſneſs of his Sundays Theater; accompanied with that reverend Statute for Dominical Jigs and Maypoles, publiſht in his own Name, and deriv'd from the example of his Father James? Which teſtifies all that rigor in Superſtition, all that remiſſneſs in Religion to have iſſu'd out originally from his own Houſe, and from his own Autority. Much rather then may thoſe general miſcarriages in State, his proper Sphear, be imputed to no other perſon chiefly than to himſelf. And which of all thoſe oppreſſive Acts or Impoſitions did he ever diſclaime or diſavow, till the fatal aw of this Parlament hung ominouſly over him? Yet heer hee ſmoothly ſeeks to wipe off all the envy of his evill Government upon his Subſtitutes and under Officers; and promiſes, though much too late, what wonders he purpos'd to have don in the reforming of Religion; a work wherein all his undertakings heretofore declare him to have had little or no judgment: Neither could his breeding, or his cours of life acquaint him with a thing ſo ſpiritual. Which may well aſſure us what kind of Reformation we could expect from him; either ſome politic form of an impos'd Religion, or els perpetual vexation and perſecution to all thoſe that comply'd not with ſuch a form. The like amendment he promiſes in State; not a ſtep furder then his Reaſon and Conſcience told him was fit to bee deſir'd; wiſhing hee had kept within thoſe bounds, and not ſuffer'd his own judgment to have bin over-born in ſome things, of which things one was the Earle of Straffords execution. And what ſignifies all this, but that ſtill his reſolution was the ſame to ſet up an arbitrary Government of his own, and that all Britain was to be ty'd and chain'd to the conſcience, judgment, and reaſon of one Man; as if thoſe gifts had been only his Peculiar and Prerogative, intail'd upon him with his fortune to be a King? When as doubtleſs no man ſo obſtinate, or ſo much a Tyrant, but profeſſes to be guided by that which he calls his Reaſon and his Judgment, tho never ſo corrupted; and pretends alſo his Conſcience. In the mean while for any Parliament, or the whole Nation to have either reaſon, judgment, or conſcience by this rule, was altogether in vaine, if it thwarted the King's Will; which was eaſie for him to call by any other more plauſible name. And thus we find theſe faire and ſpecious promiſes, made upon the experience of many hard ſufferings, and his moſt mortifi'd retirements, being throughly ſifted, to contain nothing in them much different from his former practices, ſo croſs and ſo averſe to all his Parlaments, and both the Nations of this Iland. What fruits they could in likelyhood have produc'd in his reſtorement is obvious to any prudent foreſight.

And this is the ſubſtance of his firſt Section, till wee come to the devout of it, model'd into the form of a privat Pſalter. Which they who ſo much admire the Arch-Biſhops late Breviary, and many other as good Manuels and Handmaids of Devotion, the lip-work of every Prelatical Liturgiſt, clapt together, and quilted out of Scripture-phraſe, with as much eaſe, and as little need of Chriſtian diligence or judgment as belongs to the compiling of any ordnary, and ſalable piece of Engliſh Divinity that the Shops value. But he who from ſuch a kind of Pſalmiſtry, or any other verbal Devotion, without the pledge and earneſt of ſutable deeds, can be perſwaded of a zeal and true righteouſneſs in the perſon, hath much yet to learn, and knows not that the deepeſt policy of a Tyrant hath been ever to counterfet Religious. And Ariſtotle in his Politics hath mentioned that ſpecial craft among twelve other tyrannical Sophiſms. Neither want we examples: Andronicus Comnenus the Byzantine Emperor, though a moſt cruel Tyrant, is reported by Nicetas to have been a conſtant reader of Saint Pauls Epiſtles; and by continual ſtudy had ſo incorporated the phraſe and ſtile of that tranſcendent Apoſtle into all his familiar Letters, that the imitation ſeem'd to vie with the original. Yet this availd not to deceave the people of that Empire, who notwithſtanding his Saints vizard, tore him to peeces for his Tyranny. From Stories of this nature both antient and modern which abound, the Poets alſo, and ſom Engliſh have been in this point ſo mindfull of Decorum, as to put never more pious words in the mouth of any perſon then of a Tyrant. I ſhall not inſtance an abſtruſe Author, wherein the King might be leſs converſant, but one whom wee well know was the Cloſet Companion of theſe his ſolitudes, William Shakeſpeare, who introduces the Perſon of Richard the third, ſpeaking in as high a ſtrain of pietie and mortification as is utterd in any paſſage of this Book, and ſometimes to the ſame ſenſe and purpoſe with ſome words in this place; I intended, ſaith he, not onely to oblige my Friends, but mine Enemies. The like ſaith Richard, Act 2. Scen. 1.

I do not know that Engliſhman alive,
With whom my ſoule is any jott at odds,
More then the Infant that is born to night;
I thank my God for my humilitie.

Other ſtuff of this ſort may be read throughout the whole Tragedie, wherein the Poet us'd not much licence in departing from the truth of Hiſtory, which delivers him a deep diſſembler, not of his affections onely, but of Religion.

In praying therefore, and in the outward work of Devotion, this King we ſee hath not at all exceeded the worſt of Kings before him. But herein the worſt of Kings, profeſſing Chriſtianiſm, have by farr exceeded him. They, for ought we know, ſtill pray'd their own, or at leaſt borrowed from fit Authors. But this King, not content with that which, although in a thing holy, is no holy theft, to attribute to his own making other mens whole Prayers, hath as it were unhallow'd and unchriſtn'd the very duty of Prayer it ſelf, by borrowing to a Chriſtian uſe Prayers offerd to a Heathen God. Who would have imagin'd ſo little feare in him of the true all-ſeeing Deitie, ſo little reverence of the Holy Ghoſt, whoſe office is to dictat and preſent our Chriſtian Prayers, ſo little care of truth in his laſt words, or honour to himſelf, or to his Friends, or ſenſe of his afflictions, or of that ſad hour which was upon him, as immediatly before his death to pop into the hand of that grave Biſhop who attended him, as a ſpecial Relique of his Saintly exerciſes, a Prayer ſtol'n word for word from the mouth of a Heathen Woman praying to a Heathen God; and that in no ſerious Book, but in the vain amatorious Poem of Sir Philip Sidneys Arcadia; a Book in that kind full of worth and witt, but among religious thoughts and duties not worthy to be nam'd; nor to be read at any time without good caution, much leſs in time of trouble and affliction to be a Chriſtians Prayer-Book? It hardly can be thought upon without ſom laughter, that he who had acted over us ſo ſtately and ſo tragically, ſhould leave the World at laſt with ſuch a ridiculous exit, as to bequeath among his deifying friends that ſtood about him ſuch a piece of mockery to be publiſht by them, as muſt needs cover both his and their heads with ſhame and confuſion. And ſure it was the hand of God that let them fall, and be taken in ſuch a fooliſh Trapp, as hath expos'd them to all deriſion, if for nothing els, to throw contempt and diſgrace in the ſight of all Men upon this his idoliz'd Book, and the whole roſarie of his Prayers; thereby teſtifying how little he accepted them from thoſe who thought no better of the living God than of a Buzzard Idol, that would be ſerv'd and worſhipt with the polluted traſh of Romances and Arcadias, cadias, without diſcerning the affront ſo irreligiouſly and ſo boldly offer'd him to his face.

Thus much be ſaid in general to his Prayers, and in ſpecial to that Arcadian Prayer us'd in his Captivity; anough to undeceive us what eſteem we are to ſet upon the reſt.

And thus farr in the whole Chapter we have ſeen and conſider'd, and it cannot but be clear to all men, how and for what ends, what concernments and neceſſities the late King was no way induc'd, but every way conſtrain'd to call this laſt Parliament: yet here in his firſt Prayer he trembles not to avouch as in the ears of God, That he did it with an upright intention to his Glory, and his peoples Good: of which dreadful Atteſtation how ſincerely meant, God, to whom it was avow'd, can only judg; and he hath judg'd already, and hath writt'n his impartial Sentence in Characters legible to all Chriſt'ndom; and beſides hath taught us that there be ſome whom he hath giv'n over to deluſion, whoſe very Mind and Conſcience is defil'd, of whom Saint Paul to Titus makes mention.

II. Upon the Earle of Strafford's Death.

THIS next Chapter is a penitent Confeſſion of the King, and the ſtrangeſt, if it be well weigh'd, that ever was Auricular. For he repents heer of giving his Conſent, though moſt unwillingly, to the moſt ſeaſonable and ſolemn piece of Juſtice that had bin don of many years in the Land: But his ſole Conſcience thought the contrary. And thus was the welfare, the ſafety, and within a little, the unanimous demand of three populous Nations to have attended ſtill on the ſingularity of one Man's opinionated Conſcience; if men had always been ſo tame and ſpiritleſs, and had not unexpectedly found the grace to underſtand, that if his Conſcience were ſo narrow and peculiar to it ſelf, it was not fit his Authority ſhould be ſo ample and univerſal over others: For certainly a private Conſcience ſorts not with a publick Calling, but declares that Perſon rather meant by nature for a private Fortune. And this alſo we may take for truth, that he whoſe Conſcience thinks it ſin to put to death a capital Offendor, will as oft think it meritorious to kill a righteous Perſon. But let us hear what the ſin was that lay ſo ſore upon him; and as his Prayer giv'n to Dr. Juxton, teſtifies to the very day of his death, it was his ſigning the Bill of Straffords execution: A Man whom all men look'd upon as one of the boldeſt and moſt impetuous Inſtruments that the King had to advance any violent or illegal Deſign. He had rul'd Ireland and ſom parts of England, in an arbitrary manner; had indeavour'd to ſubvert fundamental Laws, to ſubvert Parlaments, and to incenſe the King againſt them; he had alſo endeavour'd to make Hoſtility between England and Scotland: He had counſel'd the King to call over that Iriſh Army of Papiſts, which he had cunningly rais'd, to reduce England, as appear'd by good Teſtimony then preſent at the Conſultation: For which, and many other Crimes alleg'd and prov'd againſt him in 28 Articles, he was condemn'd of High Treaſon by the Parlament. The Commons by far the greater number caſt him; the Lords after they had bin ſatiſfi'd in a full Diſcourſe by the King's Sollicitor, and the Opinions of many Judges deliver'd in their Houſe, agreed likewiſe to the Sentence of Treaſon. The People univerſally cri'd out for Juſtice. None were his Friends but Courtiers and Clergymen, the worſt at that time, and moſt corrupted ſort of Men; and Court-Ladies, not the beſt of Women; who when they grow to that inſolence as to appear active in State-Affairs, are the certain ſign of a diſſolute, degenerat, and puſillanimous Common-wealth. Laſt of all the King, or rather firſt, for theſe were but his Apes, was not ſatiſfi'd in Conſcience to condemn him of High Treaſon; and declar'd to both Houſes, That no fears or reſpects whatſoever ſhould make him alter that Reſolution founded upon his Conſcience. Either then his Reſolution was indeed not founded upon his Conſcience, or his Conſcience receav'd better information, or els both his Conſcience and this his ſtrong Reſolution ſtrook ſail, notwithſtanding theſe glorious words, to his ſtronger fear; for within a few days after, when the Judges at a privie Counſel, and four of his elected Biſhops had pick'd the thorn out of his Conſcience, he was at length perſwaded to ſigne the Bill for Strafford's Execution. And yet perhaps that it wrung his Conſcience to condemn the Earl of High Treaſon is not unlikely; not becauſe he thought him guiltleſs of higheſt Treaſon, had half thoſe Crimes bin committed againſt his own privat Intereſt or Perſon, as appear'd plainly by his charge againſt the ſix Members; but becauſe he knew himſelf a Principal in what the Earl was but his Acceſſory, and thought nothing Treaſon againſt the Common-wealth, but againſt himſelf only.

Had he really ſcrupl'd to ſentence that for Treaſon which he thought not treaſonable, why did he ſeem reſolv'd by the Judges and the Biſhops? and if by them reſolv'd, how comes the ſcruple heer again? It was not then as he now pretends, The importunities of ſome, and the fear of many, which made him ſign, but the ſatisfaction giv'n him by thoſe Judges and ghoſtly Fathers of his own chooſing. Which of him ſhall we believe? for he ſeems not one, but double; either here we muſt not beleeve him profeſſing that his Satisfaction was but ſeemingly receav'd and out of fear, or els we may as well beleeve that the ſcruple was no real ſcruple, as we can beleeve him heer againſt himſelf before, that the ſatisfaction then receiv'd was no real ſatisfaction: of ſuch a variable and fleeting Conſcience what hold can be tak'n? But that indeed it was a facil Conſcience, and could diſſemble ſatisfaction when it pleas'd, his own inſuing Actions declar'd; being ſoon after found to have the chief hand in a moſt deteſted Conſpiracy againſt the Parlament and Kingdom, as by Letters and Examinations of Percy, Goring, and other Conſpirators came to light; that his intention was to reſcue the Earl of Strafford, by ſeizing on the Tower of London; to bring up the Engliſh Army out of the North, joyn'd with eight thouſand Iriſh Papiſts rais'd by Strafford, and a French Army to be landed at Portſmouth againſt the Parlament and thir Friends. For which purpoſe the King, though requeſted by both Houſes to disband thoſe Iriſh Papiſts, refus'd to do it, and kept them ſtill in armes to his own purpoſes. No marvel then, if being as deeply criminous as the Earl himſelf, it ſtung his Conſcience to adjudg to death thoſe miſdeeds whereof himſelf had been the chief Author: no marvel though inſtead of blaming and deteſting his Ambition, his evil Counſel, his violence and oppreſſion of the People, he fall to praiſe his great Abilities, and with Scolaſtick Flouriſhes beneath the decencie of a King, compares him to the Sun, which in all figurative uſe and ſignificance beares alluſion to a King, not to a Subject: No marvel though he knit Contradictions as cloſe, as words can lie together, not approving in his judgment, and yet approving in his ſubſequent reaſon all that Strafford did, as driv'n by the neceſſity of times, and the temper of that people; for this excuſes all his Miſdemeanors: Laſtly, no marvel that he goes on building many fair and pious Concluſions upon falſe and wicked Premiſes, which deceave the common Reader, not well diſcerning the antipathy of ſuch Connexions: but this is the marvel, and may be the aſtoniſhment of all that have a Conſcience, how he durſt in the ſight of God (and with the ſame words of contrition wherwith David repents the murdering of Uriah) repent his lawful compliance to that juſt act of not ſaving him, whom he ought to have deliver'd up to ſpeedy puniſhment, though himſelf the guiltier of the two. If the deed were ſo ſinful to have put to death ſo great a Malefactor, it would have tak'n much doutleſs from the heavineſs of his Sin, to have told God in his Confeſſion, how he labour'd, what dark Plots he had contriv'd, into what a League entred, and with what Conſpirators againſt his Parlament and Kingdoms, to have reſcu'd from the claim of Juſtice ſo notable and ſo dear an Inſtrument of Tyranny; which would have bin a Story, no doubt, as pleaſing in the ears of Heav'n, as all theſe equivocal Repentances. For it was fear, and nothing els, which made him fain before both the ſcruple and the ſatisfaction of his Conſcience, that is to ſay, of his mind: his firſt fear, pretended Conſcience, that he might be born with to refuſe ſigning; his latter fear being more urgent, made him find a Conſcience both to ſign, and to be ſatisfy'd. As for Repentance it came not on him till a long time after; when he ſaw he could have ſuffer'd nothing more though he had deny'd that Bill. For how could he underſtandingly repent of letting that be Treaſon which the Parlament and whole Nation ſo judg'd? This was that which repented him, to have giv'n up to juſt puniſhment ſo ſtout a Champion of his Deſigns, who might have bin ſo uſeful to him in his following civil Broiles. It was a worldly Repentance, not a conſcientious; or els it was a ſtrange Tyranny which his Conſcience had got over him, to vex him like an evil Spirit for doing one act of Juſtice, and by that means to fortify his Reſolution from ever doing ſo any more. That mind muſt needs be irrecoverably deprav'd, which either by chance or importunity, taſting but once of one juſt deed, ſpatters at it and abhors the reliſh ever after. To the Scribes and Phariſees, Wo was denounc'd by our Saviour, for ſtraining at a Gnat and ſwallowing a Camel, though a Gnat were to be ſtrain'd at: But to a Conſcience with whom one good deed is ſo hard to paſs down as to endanger almoſt a choaking, and bad deeds without number, though as big and bulkie as the ruin of three Kingdoms, go down currently without ſtraining, certainly a far greater woe appertains. If his Conſcience were come to that unnatural Dyſcraſy, as to digeſt poyſon and to keck at wholeſom food, it was not for the Parlament, or any of his Kingdoms to feed with him any longer. Which to conceal he would perſwade us that the Parlament alſo in their Conſcience eſcap'd not ſome touches of remorſe for putting Strafford to death, in forbidding it by an after-act to be a Precedent for the future. But in a fairer conſtruction, that act impli'd rather a deſire in them to pacifie the King's mind, whom they perceav'd by this means quite alienated; in the mean while not imagining that this after-act ſhould be retorted on them to tie up Juſtice for the time to come upon like occaſion, whether this were made a Precedent or not, no more then the want of ſuch a Precedent, if it had bin wanting, had bin available to hinder this.

But how likely is it that this after-act argu'd in the Parlament thir leaſt repenting for the death of Strafford, when it argu'd ſo little in the King himſelf, who notwithſtanding this after-act, which had his own hand and concurrence, if not his own inſtigation, within the ſame year accus'd of High Treaſon no leſs than ſix Members at once for the ſame pretended Crimes which his Conſcience would not yield to think treaſonable in the Earl: So that this his ſuttle Argument to faſt'n a repenting, and by that means a guiltineſs of Strafford's death upon the Parlament, concludes upon his own head; and ſhews us plainly that either nothing in his judgment was Treaſon againſt the Common-wealth, but only againſt the King's Perſon; a tyrannical Principle; or that his Conſcience was a perverſe and prevaricating Conſcience, to ſcruple that the Common-wealth ſhould puniſh for treaſonous in one eminent Offender, that which he himſelf ſought ſo vehemently to have puniſht in ſix guiltleſs perſons. If this were that touch of Conſcience which he bore with greater regrett then for any other ſin committed in his life, whether it were that proditory Aid ſent to Rochel and Religion abroad, or that prodigality of ſhedding blood at home, to a million of his Subjects lives not valu'd in compariſon of one Strafford, we may conſider yet at laſt what true ſenſe and feeling could be in that Conſcience, and what fitneſs to be the Maſter-conſcience of three Kingdomes.

But the reaſon why he labours that we ſhould take notice of ſo much tenderneſs and regret in his Soul for having any hand in Strafford's death, is worth the marking e're we conclude: He hop'd it would be ſome evidence before God and Man to all poſteritie that he was farr from bearing that vaſt load and guilt of blood layd upon him by others: Which hath the likeneſs of a ſuttle Diſſimulation, bewailing the blood of one Man, his commodious Inſtrument, put to death moſt juſtly, though by him unwillingly, that we might think him too tender to ſhed willingly the blood of thoſe thouſands, whom he counted Rebells. And thus by dipping voluntarily his fingers end, yet with ſhew of great remorſe, in the blood of Strafford, whereof all Men cleer him, he thinks to ſcape that Sea of innocent blood wherein his own guilt inevitably hath plung'd him all over. And we may well perceave to what eaſie ſatisfactions and purgations he had inur'd his ſecret Conſcience, who thinks by ſuch weak policies and oſtentations as theſe to gain belief and abſolution from underſtanding Men.

III. Upon

III. Upon his going to the Houſe of Commons.

CONcerning his unexcuſable and hoſtile march from the Court to the Houſe of Commons, there needs not much be ſaid; for he confeſſes it to be an act which moſt men whom he calls his Enemies cry'd ſhame upon, indifferent men grew jealous of and fearfull, and many of his Friends reſented, as a motion ariſing rather from paſſion then reaſon: He himſelf in one of his Anſwers to both Houſes made profeſſion to be convinc'd that it was a plaine breach of thir Privilege; yet here like a rotten building newly trimm'd over, he repreſents it ſpeciouſly and fraudulently, to impoſe upon the ſimple Reader; and ſeeks by ſmooth and ſuttle words not here only, but through his whole Book, to make ſome beneficial uſe or other even of his worſt miſcarriages.

Theſe Men, ſaith he, meaning his Friends, knew not the juſt motives and pregnant grounds with which I thought my ſelf furniſhed; to wit, againſt the five Members whom he came to dragg out of the Houſe. His beſt Friends indeed knew not, nor could ever know his Motives to ſuch a riotous act: and had he himſelfe known any juſt grounds, he was not ignorant how much it might have tended to his juſtifying, had he nam'd them in this place, and not conceal'd them. But to ſuppoſe them real, ſuppoſe them known, what was this to that violation and diſhonour put upon the whole Houſe, whoſe very dore forcibly kept op'n, and all the paſſages neer it he beſett with Swords and Piſtols cockt and menac'd in the hands of about three hundred Swaggerers and Ruffians, who but expected, nay audibly call'd for, the word of Onſet to begin a ſlaughter.

He had diſcover'd as he thought unlawfull coreſpondencies which they had us'd, and Engagements to imbroile his Kingdomes, and remembers not his own unlawfull Correſpondencies and Conſpiracies with the Iriſh Army of Papiſts, with the French to land at Portſmouth, and his tampring both with the Engliſh and Scotch Army to come up againſt the Parlament: the leaſt of which attempts by whomſoever, was no leſs then manifeſt Treaſon againſt the Common-wealth.

If to demand Juſtice on the five Members were his Plea, for that which they with more reaſon might have demanded Juſtice upon him (I uſe his own Argument) there needed not ſo rough aſſiſtance. If hee had reſolv'd to bear that repuls with patience, which his Queen by her words to him at his return little thought he would have done, wherefore did he provide againſt it with ſuch an armed and unuſual Force? But his heart ſerv'd him not to undergoe the hazzard that ſuch a deſperat ſcuffle would have brought him to. But wherfore did he goe at all, it behooving him to know there were two Statutes that declar'd he ought firſt to have acquainted the Parlament who were the Accuſers, which he refus'd to doe, though ſtill profeſſing to govern by Law, and ſtill juſtifying his attempts againſt Law: And when he ſaw it was not permitted him to attaint them but by a fair tryal, as was offer'd him from time to time, for want of juſt matter which yet never came to light, he let the buſineſs fall of his own accord; and all thoſe Pregnancies and juſt motives came to juſt nothing.

He had no temptation of diſpleaſure or revenge againſt thoſe Men: None but what he thirſted to execute upon them, for the conſtant oppoſition which they made againſt his tyrannous Proceedings, and the love and reputation which they therfore had among the people.

He miſt but little to have produc'd Writings under ſome Mens own hands. But yet he miſt, though their Chambers, Trunks, and Studies were ſeal'd up and ſearcht; yet not found guilty. Providence would not have it ſo. Good Providence that curbs the raging of proud Monarchs, as well as of madd Multitudes. Yet he wanted not ſuch probabilities (for his pregnant is come now to probable) as were ſufficient to raiſe jealouſies in any King's heart: And thus his pregnant motives are at laſt prov'd nothing but a Tympany, or a Queen Maries Cuſhion; for in any Kings heart, as Kings go now, what ſhadowie conceit or groundleſs toy will not create a Jealouſie?

That he had deſign'd to aſſault the Houſe of Commons, taking God to witneſs, he utterly denies; yet in his Anſwer to the City, maintains that any courſe of vio- lence had bin very juſtifiable. And we may then gueſs how far it was from his deſign: However it diſcover'd in him an exceſſive eagerneſs to be aveng'd on them that croſs'd him; and that to have his will, he ſtood not to doe things never ſo much below him. What a becomming ſight it was to ſee the King of England one while in the Houſe of Commons, by and by in the Guild-Hall among the Liveries and Manufactures, proſecuting ſo greedily the track of five or ſix fled Subjects; himſelf not the Solliciter only but the Purſivant, and the Apparitor of his own partial Cauſe. And although in his Anſwers to the Parlament, he hath confeſs'd, firſt that his manner of proſecution was illegal, next that as he once conceiv'd he had ground anough to accuſe them, ſo at length that he found as good cauſe to deſert any proſecution of them; yet here he ſeems to reverſe all, and againſt promiſe takes up his old deſerted Accuſation, that he might have ſomething to excuſe himſelf, inſtead of giving due reparation, which he always refus'd to give them whom he had ſo diſhonour'd.

That I went, ſaith he of his going to the Houſe of Commons, attended with ſome Gentlemen; Gentlemen indeed, the ragged Infantrie of Stewes and Brothels; the ſpawn and ſhipwrack of Taverns and Dicing-Houſes: and then he pleads it was no unwonted thing for the Majeſty and ſafety of a King to be ſo attended, eſpecially in diſcontented times. An illuſtrious Majeſtie no doubt, ſo attended; a becomming ſafety for the King of England, plac'd in the fidelity of ſuch Guards and Champions: happy times, when Braves and Hackſters, the only contented Members of his Government, were thought the fitteſt and the faithfulleſt to defend his Perſon againſt the diſcontents of a Parlament and all good Men. Were thoſe the choſ'n ones to preſerve reverence to him, while he enter'd unaſſur'd, and full of ſuſpicions, into his great and faithful Counſel? Let God then and the World judg whether the Cauſe were not in his own guilty and unwarrantable doings: The Houſe of Commons upon ſeveral Examinations of this buiſneſs declar'd it ſufficiently prov'd that the comming of thoſe Souldiers, Papiſts and others with the King, was to take away ſome of thir Members, and in caſe of oppoſition or denyal, to have fall'n upon the Houſe in a hoſtile manner. This the King here denies; adding a fearful Imprecation againſt his own life, If he purpoſed any violence or oppreſſion againſt the Innocent, then, ſaith he, let the Enemie perſecute my Soul, and tred my life to the ground, and lay my Honour in the duſt. What need then more diſputing? He appeal'd to God's Tribunal, and behold God hath judg'd and done to him in the ſight of all men according to the verdict of his own mouth: To be a warning to all Kings hereafter how they uſe preſumptuouſly the words and proteſtations of David, without the ſpirit and conſcience of David. And the King's admirers may heer ſee thir madneſs, to miſtake this Book for a monument of his worth and wiſdom, when as indeed it is his Doomſday Booke; not like that of William the Norman his Predeceſſor, but the record and memorial of his Condemnation; and diſcovers whatever hath befal'n him, to have bin haſt'nd on from Divine Juſtice by the raſh and inconſiderat Appeal of his own lips. But what evaſions, what pretences, though never ſo unjuſt and emptie, will he refuſe in matters more unknown, and more involv'd in the miſts and intricacies of State, who, rather then not juſtifie himſelf in a thing ſo generally odious, can flatter his Integritie with ſuch frivolous excuſes againſt the manifeſt diſſent of all men, whether Enemies, Neuters, or Friends. But God and his Judgments have not bin mock'd; and good men may well perceive what a diſtance there was ever like to be between him and his Parlament, and perhaps between him and all amendment, who for one good deed, though but conſented to, askes God forgiveneſs; and from his worſt deeds done, takes occaſion to inſiſt upon his righteouſneſs.

IV. Upon

IV. Upon the Inſolency of the Tumults.

WE have here, I muſt confeſs, a neat and well-couch'd invective againſt Tumults, expreſſing a true fear of them in the Author; but yet ſo handſomly compos'd, and withal ſo feelingly, that, to make a Royal compariſon, I believe Rehoboam, the Son of Solomon, could not have compos'd it better. Yet Rehoboam had more cauſe to inveigh againſt them; for they had ſton'd his Tribute-gatherer, and perhaps had as little ſpar'd his own Perſon, had he not with all ſpeed betak'n him to his Charret. But this King hath ſtood the worſt of them in his own Houſe without danger, when his Coach and Horſes, in a panic feare, have bin to ſeek, which argues that the Tumults at Whitehall were nothing ſo dangerous as thoſe at Sechem.

But the matter here conſiderable is not whether the King, or his Houſhold Rhetorician have made a pithy declamation againſt Tumults, but firſt whether theſe were Tumults or not; next if they were, whether the King himſelf did not cauſe them. Let us examin therfore how things at that time ſtood. The King, as before hath bin prov'd, having both call'd this Parlament unwillingly, and as unwillingly from time to time condeſcended to thir ſeveral acts, carrying on a disjoint and privat intereſt of his own, and not enduring to be ſo croſs'd and overſwaid, eſpecially in the executing of his chief and boldeſt Inſtrument, the Deputy of Ireland, firſt tempts the Engliſh Army, with no leſs reward than the ſpoil of London, to come up and deſtroy the Parlament. That being diſcover'd by ſome of the Officers, who, tho bad enough, yet abhorr'd ſo foul a deed, the King hard'nd in his purpoſe, turns him next to the Scotch Army, and baites his temptation with a richer reward; not only to have the ſacking of London, but four Northern Counties to be made Scottiſh, with Jewels of great value to be giv'n in pawn the while. But neither would the Scots, for any promiſe of reward, be bought to ſuch an execrable and odious treachery; but with much honeſty gave notice of the Kings deſign both to the Parlament and City of London. The Parlament moreover had intelligence, and the people could not but diſcern that there was a bitter and malignant party grown up now to ſuch a boldneſs, as to give out inſolent and threatning ſpeeches againſt the Parlament it ſelf. Beſides this, the Rebellion in Ireland was now broke out; and a Conſpiracy in Scotland had been made, while the King was there, againſt ſome chief Members of that Parlament; great numbers here of unknown and ſuſpicious perſons reſorted to the City. The King being return'd from Scotland, preſently diſmiſſes that Guard which the Parlament thought neceſſary in the midſt of ſo many dangers to have about them, and puts another Guard in thir place, contrary to the privilege of that high Court, and by ſuch a one commanded, as made them no leſs doubtful of the Guard it ſelf. Which they therfore upon ſome ill effects thereof firſt found, diſcharge; deeming it more ſafe to ſit free, tho without a Guard, in op'n danger, then incloſ'd with a ſuſpected ſafety. The people therfore, leſt thir worthieſt and moſt faithful Patriots, who had expos'd themſelves for the public, and whom they ſaw now left naked, ſhould want aid, or be deſerted in the midſt of theſe dangers, came in multitudes, tho unarm'd, to witneſs their fidelity and readineſs in caſe of any violence offer'd to the Parlament. The King both envying to ſee the peoples love thus devolv'd on another object, and doubting leſt it might utterly diſable him to do with Parlaments as he was wont, ſent a Meſſage into the City forbidding ſuch reſorts. The Parlament alſo both by what was diſcover'd to them, and what they ſaw in a malignant Party (ſome of which had already drawn blood in a Fray or two at the Court Gate, and ev'n at thir own Gate in Weſtminſter-Hall) conceaving themſelves to be ſtill in danger where they ſate, ſent a moſt reaſonable and juſt Petition to the King, that a Guard might be allow'd them out of the City, whereof the Kings own Chamberlain, the Earl of Eſſex, might have command; it being the right of inferiour Courts to make chois of thir own Guard. This the King refuſ'd to do, and why he refuſ'd, the very next day made manifeſt: For on that day it was that he ſallied out from Whitehall, with thoſe truſty Myrmidons, to block up, or give aſſault to the Houſe of Commons. He had, beſides all this, begun to fortify his Court, and entertain'd armed Men not a few; who ſtanding at his Palace Gate, revil'd, and with drawn Swords wounded many of the People, as they went by unarm'd, and in a peaceable manner, whereof ſome dy'd. The paſſing by of a multitude, tho neither to St. George's Feaſt, nor to a Tilting, certainly of it ſelf was no Tumult; the expreſſion of thir loyalty and ſtedfaſtneſs to the Parlament, whoſe lives and ſafeties by more than ſlight rumors they doubted to be in danger, was no Tumult. If it grew to be ſo, the cauſe was in the King himſelf and his injurious retinue, who both by hoſtile preparations in the Court, and by actual aſſailing of the People, gave them juſt cauſe to defend themſelves.

Surely thoſe unarmed and petitioning people needed not have been ſo formidable to any, but to ſuch whoſe conſciences miſgave them how ill they had deſerv'd of the people; and firſt began to injure them, becauſe they juſtly fear'd it from them; and then aſcribe that to popular Tumult, which was occaſion'd by thir own provoking.

And that the King was ſo emphatical and elaborat on this Theam againſt Tumults, and expreſs'd with ſuch a vehemence his hatred of them, will redound leſs perhaps than he was aware to the commendation of his Government. For beſides that in good Governments they happ'n ſeldomeſt, and riſe not without cauſe, if they prove extreme and pernicious, they were never counted ſo to Monarchy, but to Monarchical Tyranny; and extremes one with another are at moſt antipathy. If then the King ſo extremely ſtood in fear of Tumults, the inference will endanger him to be the other extreme. Thus far the occaſion of this diſcours againſt Tumults; now to the diſcourſe it ſelf, voluble anough, and full of ſentence, but that, for the moſt part, either ſpecious rather than ſolid, or to his cauſe nothing pertinent.

He never thought any thing more to preſage the miſchiefs that enſued, than thoſe Tumults. Then was his foreſight but ſhort, and much miſtak'n. Thoſe Tumults were but the mild effects of an evil and injurious reign; not ſigns of miſchiefs to come, but ſeeking relief for miſchiefs paſt: thoſe ſigns were to be read more apparent in his rage and purpos'd revenge of thoſe free expoſtulations and clamors of the people againſt his lawleſs Government. Not any thing, ſaith he, portends more God's diſpleaſure againſt a Nation than when he ſuffers the clamours of the Vulgar to paſs all bounds of Law and reverence to Autority. It portends rather his diſpleaſure againſt a tyrannous King, whoſe proud Throne he intends to overturn by that contemptible Vulgar; the ſad cries and oppreſſions of whom his Royaltie regarded not. As for that ſupplicating people, they did no hurt either to Law or Autority, but ſtood for it rather in the Parlament againſt whom they fear'd would violate it.

That they invaded the Honour and Freedom of the two Houſes, is his own officious accuſation, not ſeconded by the Parlament, who had they ſeen cauſe, were themſelves beſt able to complain. And if they ſhook and menac'd any, they were ſuch as had more relation to the Court than to the Commonwealth; Enemies, not Patrons of the people. But if their petitioning unarmed were an invaſion of both Houſes, what was his entrance into the Houſe of Commons, beſetting it with armed men? In what condition then was the honour and freedom of that Houſe?

They forebore not rude deportments, contemptuous words and actions to himſelf and his Court.

It was more wonder, having heard what treacherous hoſtility he had deſign'd againſt the City and his whole Kingdom, that they forbore to handle him as people in thir rage have handl'd Tyrants heretofore for leſs offences.

They were not a ſhort Ague, but a fierce quotidian Fever. He indeed may beſt ſay it, who moſt felt it; for the ſhaking was within him, and it ſhook him by his own deſcription worſe than a Storm, worſe than an Earthquake; Belſhazzars Palſy. Had not worſe fears, terrors, and envies made within him that commotion, how could a multitude of his Subjects, armd with no other weapon then Petitions, have ſhak'n all his joints with ſuch a terrible Ague? Yet that the Parlament ſhould entertain the leaſt fear of bad intentions from him or his party, he endures not; but would perſwade us that men ſcare themſelves and others without cauſe: for he thought fear would be to them a kind of Armor, and his deſign was, if poſſible, to diſarm all, eſpecially of a wiſe fear and ſuſpicion; for that he knew would find weapons.

He goes on therfore with vehemence to repeat the miſchiefs done by theſe Tumults. They firſt petitioned, then protected; dictate next, and laſtly overaw the Parlament. They remov'd obſtructions, they purg'd the Houſes, caſt out rotten members. If there were a man of iron, ſuch as Talus, by our Poet Spencer, is feign'd to be the page of Juſtice, who with his iron Flail could do all this, and expeditiouſly, without thoſe deceitful forms and circumſtances of Law, worſe than ceremonies in Religion; I ſay God ſend it done, whether by one Talus, or by a thouſand.

But they ſubdu'd the men of conſcience in Parlament, back'd and abetted all ſeditious and ſchiſmatical Propoſals againſt Government eccleſiaſtical and civil.

Now we may perceive the root of his hatred whence it ſprings. It was not the King's grace or princely goodnes, but this iron Flail, the People, that drove the Biſhops out of thir Baronies, out of thir Cathedrals, out of the Lords Houſe, out of thir Copes and Surplices, and all thoſe Papiſtical innovations, threw down the High-Commiſſion and Star-chamber, gave us a Triennial Parlament, and what we moſt deſir'd; in revenge whereof he now ſo bitterly inveighs againſt them: theſe are thoſe ſeditious and ſchiſmatical Propoſals then by him condeſcended to as acts of Grace, now of another name; which declares him, touching matters of Church and State, to have been no other man in the deepeſt of his Solitude, than he was before at the higheſt of his Sovranty.

But this was not the worſt of theſe Tumults, they plaid the haſty Midwives, and would not ſtay the ripening, but went ſtraight to ripping up, and forcibly cut out abortive Votes.

They would not ſtay perhaps the Spaniſh demurring, and putting off ſuch wholſom acts and counſels, as the politic Cabinet at Whitehall had no mind to. But all this is complain'd here as done to the Parlament, and yet we heard not the Parlament at that time complain of any violence from the people, but from him. Wherefore intrudes he to plead the cauſe of Parlament againſt the people, while the Parlament was pleading thir own cauſe againſt him, and againſt him were forced to ſeek refuge of the people? 'Tis plain then that thoſe confluxes and reſorts interrupted not the Parlament, nor by them were thought tumultuous, but by him only and his Court Faction.

But what good man had not rather want any thing he moſt deſired for the public good, than attain it by ſuch unlawful and irreligious means? as much as to ſay, Had not rather ſit ſtill, and let his Country be tyranniz'd, than that the people, finding no other remedy, ſhould ſtand up like Men, and demand thir Rights and Liberties. This is the artificialeſt piece of fineneſs to perſwade Men to be Slaves, that the wit of Court could have invented. But hear how much better the Moral of this Leſſon would befit the Teacher: What good man had not rather want a boundleſs and arbitrary power, and thoſe fine Flowers of the Crown, call'd Prerogatives, then for them to uſe force and perpetual vexation to his faithful Subjects, nay to wade for them through Blood and civil War? So that this and the whole bundle of thoſe following ſentences may be apply'd better to the convincement of his own violent courſes, than of thoſe pretended Tumults.

Who were the chief Demagogues to ſend for thoſe Tumults, ſome alive are not ignorant. Setting aſide the affrightment of this Goblin word; for the King by his leave, cannot coin Engliſh, as he could Mony, to be current (and 'tis believ'd this wording was above his known Stile and Orthography, and accuſes the whole compoſure to be conſcious of ſome other Author) yet if the People were ſent for, embold'nd and directed by thoſe Demagogues, who, ſaving his Greek, were good Patriots, and by his own confeſſion Men of ſome repute for Parts and Piety, it helps well to aſſure us there was both urgent cauſe, and the leſs danger of thir coming.

Complaints were made, yet no redreſs could be obtain'd. The Parlament alſo complain'd of what danger they ſate in from another party, and demanded of him a Guard, but it was not granted. What marvel then if it chear'd them to ſee ſome ſtore of thir Friends, and in the Roman, not the pettifogging ſenſe, thir Clients ſo neer about them; a defence due by nature both from whom it was offer'd, and to whom, as due as to thir Parents; tho the Court ſtorm'd and fretted to ſee ſuch honour giv'n to them, who were then beſt Fathers thers of the Common-wealth. And both the Parlament and People complain'd, and demanded Juſtice for thoſe aſſaults, if not Murders done at his own doors by that crew of Rufflers; but he, inſtead of doing Juſtice on them, juſtifi'd and abetted them in what they did, as in his public Anſwer to a Petition from the City may be read. Neither is it ſlightly to be paſs'd over, that in the very place where Blood was firſt drawn in this Cauſe, as the beginning of all that follow'd, there was his own Blood ſhed by the Executioner: According to that ſentence of Divine Juſtice, In the place where Dogs lick'd the Blood of Naboth, ſhall Dogs lick thy Blood, ev'n thine.

From hence he takes occaſion to excuſe that improvident and fatal error of his abſenting from the Parlament. When he found that no Declaration of the Biſhops could take place againſt thoſe Tumults. Was that worth his conſidering, that fooliſh and ſelf-undoing Declaration of twelve Cypher Biſhops, who were immediately appeacht of Treaſon for that audacious Declaring? The Biſhops peradventure were now and then pull'd by the Rochets, and deſerv'd another kind of pulling; but what amounted this to the fear of his own Perſon in the Streets? Did he not the very next day after his irruption into the Houſe of Commons, than which nothing had more exaſperated the people, go in his Coach unguarded into the City? Did he receive the leaſt affront, much leſs violence in any of the Streets, but rather humble demeanors and ſupplications? Hence may be gather'd, that however in his own guiltineſs he might have juſtly fear'd, yet that he knew the people ſo full of aw and reverence to his Perſon, as to dare commit himſelf ſingle among the thickeſt of them, at a time when he had moſt provok'd them. Beſides in Scotland they had handled the Biſhops in a more robuſtious manner; Edinborough had bin full of Tumults, two Armies from thence had entred England againſt him: yet after all this he was not fearful, but very forward to take ſo long a Journey to Edinborough; which argues firſt, as did alſo his rendition afterward to the Scotch Army, that to England he continu'd ſtill, as he was indeed, a ſtranger, and full of diffidence; to the Scots only a native King, in his confidence, tho not in his dealing towards them. It ſhews us next beyond doubting, that all this his fear of Tumults was but a meer pretence and occaſion tak'n of his reſolved abſence from the Parlament for ſome other end not difficult to be gueſs'd. And thoſe inſtances wherein valour is not to be queſtion'd for not ſcuffling with the Sea, or an undiſciplind Rabble, are but ſubſervient to carry on the ſolemn jeſt of his fearing Tumults; if they diſcover not withal the true reaſon why he departed, only to turn his ſlaſhing at the Court Gate to ſlaughtering in the Field; his diſorderly bickering to an orderly invading; which was nothing els but a more orderly diſorder.

Some ſuſpected and affirm'd that he meditated a War, when he went firſt from Whitehall. And they were not the worſt heads that did ſo, nor did any of his former acts weak'n him to that, as he alledges for himſelf; or if they had, they cleer him only for the time of paſſing them, not for whatever thoughts might come after into his mind. Former actions of improvidence or fear, not with him unuſual, cannot abſolve him of all after-meditations.

He goes on proteſting his no intention to have left Whitehall, had theſe horrid Tumults giv'n him but fair Quarter, as if he himſelf, his Wife and Children had been in peril. But to this anough hath bin anſwer'd.

Had this Parlament, as it was in its firſt Election, namely with the Lord and Baron Biſhops, ſate full and free, he doubts not but all had gon well. What warrant is this of his to us? whoſe not doubting was all good mens greateſt doubt.

He was reſolv'd to hear Reaſon, and to conſent ſo far as he could comprehend. A hopeful reſolution: what if his reaſon were found by oft experience to comprehend nothing beyond his own advantages, was this a reaſon fit to be intruſted with the common good of three Nations?

But, ſaith he, as Swine are to Gardens, ſo are Tumults to Parlaments. This the Parlament, had they found it ſo, could beſt have told us. In the mean while who knows not that one great Hog may do as much miſchief in a Garden as many little Swine? He was ſometimes prone to think, that had he call'd this laſt Parlament to any other place in England, the ſad conſequences might have bin prevented. But change of Air changes not the mind. Was not his firſt Parlament at Oxford diſſolv'd after two Subſidies giv'n him, and no Juſtice receiv'd? Was not his laſt in the ſame place, where they ſate with as much freedom, as much quiet from Tumults as they could deſire, a Parlament, both in his account and their own, conſiſting of all his Friends, that fled after him, and ſuffer'd for him, and yet by him nicknam'd, and caſhiered for a Mungril Parlament, that vext his Queen with their baſe and mutinous motions? as his Cabinet-letter tells us. Whereby the World may ſee plainly, that no ſhifting of place, no ſifting of Members to his own mind, no number, no paucity, no freedom from Tumults could ever bring his arbitrary wilfulneſs, and tyrannical Deſigns to brook the leaſt ſhape or ſimilitude, the leaſt counterfet of a Parlament.

Finally, inſtead of praying for his people as a good King ſhould do, he prays to be deliver'd from them, as from wild Beaſts, Inundations, and raging Seas, that had overborn all Loyalty, Modeſty, Laws, Juſtice, and Religion. God ſave the People from ſuch Interceſſors.

V. Upon the Bill for Triennial Parlaments, and for ſetling this, &c.

THE Bill for Triennial Parlaments was doubtleſs a good Bill, and the other for ſetling this was at that time very expedient; and in the Kings own words no more then what the World was fully confirm'd he might in Juſtice, Reaſon, Honour, and Conſcience grant them; for to that end he affirms to have don it.

But whereas he attributes the paſſing of them to his own act of Grace and Willingneſs, as his manner is to make Vertues of his neceſſities, and giving to himſelf all the praiſe, heaps ingratitude upon the Parlament, a little memory will ſet the clean contrary before us; that for thoſe beneficial Acts we ow what we ow to the Parlament; but to his granting them neither praiſe nor thanks. The firſt Bill granted much leſs than two former Statutes yet in force by Edward the third; that a Parlament ſhould be call'd every year, or ofter, if need were: nay from a far antienter Law-Book call'd the Mirror, it is affirm'd in a late Treatiſe call'd Rights of the Kingdom, that Parlaments by our old Laws ought twice a year to be at London. The ſecond was ſo neceſſary that nothing in the power of man more ſeem'd to be the ſtay and ſupport of all things from that ſteep ruin to which he had nigh brought them, then that Act obtain'd. He had by his ill Stewardſhip, and, to ſay no worſe, the needleſs raiſing of two Armies intended for a civil War, begger'd both himſelf and the Public; and beſides had left us upon the ſcore of his needy Enemies for what it coſt them in thir own defence againſt him. To diſingage him and the Kingdom great ſums were to be borrow'd, which would never have bin lent, nor could ever be repaid, had the King chanced to diſſolve this Parlament as heretofore. The Errors alſo of his Government had brought the Kingdom to ſuch extremes, as were incapable of all recovery without the abſolute continuance of this Parlament. It had bin els in vain to go about the ſetling of ſo great diſtempers, if he, who firſt caus'd the Malady, might, when he pleas'd, reject the Remedy. Notwithſtanding all which, that he granted both theſe Acts unwillingly, and as a meer paſſive Inſtrument, was then viſible ev'n to moſt of thoſe men who now will ſee nothing.

At paſſing of the former Act he himſelf conceal'd not his unwillingneſs; and teſtifying a general diſlike of thir actions, which they then proceeded in with great approbation of the whole Kingdom, he told them with a maſterly Brow, that by this Act he had oblig'd them above what they had deſerv'd, and gave a piece of Juſtice to the Common-wealth three times ſhort of his Predeceſſors, as if he had bin giving ſom boon, or begg'd office to a ſort of his deſertleſs Grooms.

That he paſs'd the latter Act againſt his will, no man in reaſon can hold it queſtionable. For if the February before he made ſo dainty, and were ſo loth to beſtow a Parlament once in three years upon the Nation, becauſe this had ſo oppos'd his courſes, was it likely that the May following he ſhould beſtow willingly on this Parlament an indiſſoluble ſitting, when they had offended him much more by cutting ſhort and impeaching of High Treaſon his chief Favourites? It was his fear then, not his favour, which drew from him that Act, leſt the Parlament, incens'd by his Conſpiracies againſt them, about the ſame time diſcover'd, ſhould with the People have reſented too hainouſly thoſe his doings, if to the ſuſpicion of their danger from him he had alſo added the denial of this only means to ſecure themſelves.

From theſe Acts therfore in which he glories, and wherewith ſo oft he upbraids the Parlament, he cannot juſtly expect to reap ought but diſhonour and diſpraiſe; as being both unwillingly granted, and the one granting much leſs then was before allow'd by Statute, the other being a teſtimony of his violent and lawleſs Cuſtom, not only to break Privileges, but whole Parlaments; from which Enormity they were conſtrain'd to bind him firſt of all his Predeceſſors; never any before him having giv'n like cauſes of diſtruſt and jealouſie to his People. As for this Parlament, how far he was from being advis'd by them, as he ought, let his own words expreſs.

He taxes them with undoing what they found well done: and yet knows they undid nothing in the Church but Lord Biſhops, Liturgies, Ceremonies, High Commiſſion, judg'd worthy by all true Proteſtants to be thrown out of the Church. They undid nothing in the State but irregular and grinding Courts, the main grievances to be remov'd; and if theſe were the things which in his opinion they found well done, we may again from hence be inform'd with what unwillingneſs he remov'd them; and that thoſe gracious Acts wherof ſo frequently he makes mention, may be engliſh'd more properly Acts of fear and diſſimulation againſt his mind and conſcience.

The Bill preventing diſſolution of this Parlament he calls An unparallel'd Act, out of the extreme confidence that his Subjects would not make ill uſe of it. But was it not a greater confidence of the People to put into one Man's hand ſo great a Power, till he abus'd it, as to ſummon and diſſolve Parlaments? He would be thankt for truſting them, and ought to thank them rather for truſting him: the truſt iſſuing firſt from them, not from him.

And that it was a meer truſt, and not his Prerogative, to call and diſſolve Parlaments at his pleaſure; and that Parlaments were not to be diſſolv'd, till all Petitions were heard, all Greevances redreſt, is not only the aſſertion of this Parlament, but of our antient Law-books, which averr it to be an unwritt'n Law of common Right, ſo ingrav'n in the Hearts of our Anceſtors, and by them ſo conſtantly enjoy'd and claim'd, as that it needed not enrouling. And if the Scots in thir Declaration could charge the King with breach of their Laws for breaking up that Parlament without their conſent, while matters of greateſt moment were depending; it were unreaſonable to imagin that the Wiſdom of England ſhould be ſo wanting to it ſelf through all ages, as not to provide by ſome known Law, writt'n or unwritt'n, againſt the not calling, or the arbitrary diſſolving of Parlaments; or that they who ordain'd thir ſummoning twice a year, or as oft as need requir'd, did not tacitely enact alſo, that as neceſſity of affaires call'd them, ſo the ſame neceſſity ſhould keep them undiſſolv'd till that were fully ſatisfi'd. Were it not for that, Parlaments, and all the fruit and benefit we receave by having them, would turn ſoon to meer abuſion. It appears then that if this Bill of not diſſolving were an unparallel'd Act, it was a known and common Right which our Anceſtors under other Kings enjoy'd as firmly as if it had bin grav'n in Marble; and that the infringement of this King firſt brought it into a writt'n Act: Who now boaſts that as a great favour done us, which his own leſs fidelity then was in former Kings, conſtrain'd us only of an old undoubted Right, to make a new writt'n Act. But what needed writt'n Acts, when as antiently it was eſteem'd part of his Crown-Oath not to diſſolve Parlaments till all Grievances were conſider'd? whereupon the old Modi of Parlament, calls it flat Perjury, if he diſſolve them before, as I find cited in a Book mention'd at the beginning of this Chapter, to which and other Law-tractats I refer the more Lawyerlie mooting of this point, which is neither my element, nor my proper work heer; ſince the Book which I have to anſwer pretends to reaſon not to autorities and quotations: and I hold reaſon to be the beſt Arbitrator, and the Law of Law it ſelf.

'Tis true, that good Subjects think it not juſt that the King's condition ſhould be worſe by bettering theirs. But then the King muſt not be at ſuch a diſtance from the people in judging what is better and what worſe; which might have bin agreed, had he known (for his own words condemn him) as well with moderation to uſe, as with earneſtneſs to deſire his own advantages.

A continual Parlament he thought would keep the Common-wealth in tune. Judg, Common-wealth, what proofs he gave that this boaſted profeſſion was ever in his thought.

Some, ſaith he, gave out that I repented me of that ſetling Act. His own actions gave it out beyond all ſuppoſition; for doubtleſs it repented him to have eſtabliſh'd that by Law, which he went about ſo ſoon after to abrogate by the Sword.

He calls thoſe Acts which he confeſſes tended to thir good, not more Princely then friendly Contributions: As if to do his duty were of courteſie, and the diſcharge of his truſt a parcel of his liberality; ſo nigh loſt in his eſteem was the birthright of our Liberties, that to give them back again upon demand ſtood at the mercy of his Contribution.

He doubts not but the affections of his People will compenſate his ſufferings for thoſe acts of confidence: And imputes his ſufferings to a contrary Cauſe. Not his confidence but his diſtruſt was that which brought him to thoſe ſufferings, from the time that he forſook his Parlament; and truſted them ne're the ſooner for what he tells of thir pietie and religious ſtrictneſs, but rather hated them as Puritans, whom he always ſought to extirpate.

He would have it beleev'd, that to bind his hands by theſe Acts argu'd a very ſhort foreſight of things, and extreme fatuitie of mind in him, if he had meant a War. If we ſhould conclude ſo, that were not the only Argument: neither did it argue that he meant Peace; knowing that what he granted for the preſent out of fear, he might as ſoon repeal by force, watching his time; and deprive them the fruit of thoſe Acts, if his own deſigns wherin he put his truſt took effect.

Yet he complains, That the Tumults threatn'd to abuſe all Acts of Grace and turn them into wantonneſs. I would they had turn'd his wantonneſs into the grace of not abuſing Scripture. Was this becoming ſuch a Saint as they would make him, to adulterate thoſe ſacred words from the grace of God to the acts of his own grace? Herod was eat'n up of Worms for ſuffering others to compare his voice to the voice of God; but the Borrower of this Phraſe gives much more cauſe of jealouſie, that he lik'n'd his own acts of grace to the acts of God's Grace.

From profaneneſs he ſcarce comes off with perfet ſenſe. I was not then in a capacity to make War, therefore I intended not. I was not in a capacity, therefore I could not have giv'n my Enemies greater advantage then by ſo unprincely inconſtancy to have ſcatter'd them by Arms, whom but lately I had ſettl'd by Parlament. What place could there be for his inconſtancy to do that thing wherto he was in no capacity? Otherwiſe his inconſtancy was not ſo unwonted, or ſo nice but that it would have eaſily found pretences to ſcatter thoſe in revenge whom he ſettl'd in fear.

It had bin a courſe full of ſin as well as of hazard and diſhonour. True; but if thoſe Conſiderations withheld him not from other actions of like nature, how can we believe they were of ſtrength ſufficient to withhold him from this? And that they withheld him not, the event ſoon taught us.

His letting ſome men go up to the Pinacle of the Temple, was a temptation to them to caſt him down headlong. In this Simily we have himſelf compar'd to Chriſt, the Parlament to the Devil, and his giving them that Act of ſetling, to his letting them go up to the Pinacle of the Temple. A tottring and giddy Act rather then a ſetling. This was goodly uſe made of Scripture in his Solitudes: But it was no Pinacle of the Temple, it was a Pinacle of Nebuchadnezzar's Palace from whence he and Monarchy fell headlong together.

He would have others ſee that All the Kingdoms of the World are not worth gaining by ways of ſin which hazard the Soul; and hath himſelf left nothing unhazarded to keep three. He concludes with ſentences that rightly ſcand, make not ſo much for him as againſt him, and confeſſes that the Act of ſettling was no ſin of his Will; and we eaſily believe him, for it hath bin clearly prov'd a ſin of his unwillingneſs.

With his Oriſons I meddle not, for he appeals to a high Audit. This yet may be noted, that at his Prayers he had before him the ſad preſage of his ill ſucceſs, As of a dark and dangerous Storm, which never admitted his return to the Port from whence he ſet out. Yet his Prayer-Book no ſooner ſhut, but other hopes flatter'd him; and thir flattering was his deſtruction.

VI. Upon his Retirement from Weſtminſter.

THE Simily wherwith he begins I was about to have found fault with, as in a garb ſomwhat more poetical then for a Statiſt: but meeting with many ſtrains of like dreſs in other of his Eſſaies, and him hearing reported a more diligent reader of Poets, then of Politicians, I begun to think that the whole Book might perhaps be intended a piece of Poetrie. The words are good, the fiction ſmooth and cleanly; there wanted only Rime, and that they ſay is beſtow'd upon it lately. But to the Argument.

I ſtay'd at White-Hall till I was driv'n away by ſhame more than fear. I retract not what I thought of the fiction, yet heer I muſt confeſs it lies too op'n. In his Meſſages and Declarations, nay in the whole Chapter next but one before this, he affirms that The danger wherein his Wife, his Children, and his own Perſon were by thoſe Tumults, was the main cauſe that drove him from White-Hall, and appeals to God as witneſs: he affirms here that it was ſhame more then fear. And Digby, who knew his mind as well as any, tells his new-liſted Guard, That the principal cauſe of his Majeſties going thence, was to ſave them from being trod in the dirt. From whence we may diſcern what falſe and frivolous excuſes are avow'd for truth, either in thoſe Declarations, or in this penitential Book. Our Forefathers were of that courage and ſeverity of zeal to Juſtice and their native Liberty, againſt the proud contempt and miſrule of thir Kings, that when Richard the Second departed but from a Committee of Lords who ſate preparing matter for the Parlament, not yet aſſembl'd, to the removal of his evil Counſellors, they firſt vanquiſh'd and put to flight Robert de Vere his chief Favourite; and then coming up to London with a huge Army, requir'd the King then withdrawn for fear, but no furder off then the Tower, to come to Weſtminſter. Which he refuſing, they told him flatly that unleſs he came they would chooſe another. So high a Crime it was accounted then for Kings to abſent themſelves, not from a Parlament, which none ever durſt, but from any meeting of his Peers and Counſellors which did but tend towards a Parlament. Much leſs would they have ſuffer'd that a King for ſuch trivial and various pretences, one while for fear of Tumults, another while for ſhame to ſee them, ſhould leave his Regal Station, and the whole Kingdom bleeding to death of thoſe wounds which his own unskilful and pervers Government had inflicted.

Shame then it was that drove him from the Parlament, but the ſhame of what? was it the ſhame of his manifold errors and miſdeeds, and to ſee how weakly he had plai'd the King? No; But to ſee the barbarous rudeneſs of thoſe Tumults to demand any thing. We have ſtarred here another, and I believe the trueſt, cauſe of his deſerting the Parlament. The worſt and ſtrangeſt of that Any-thing which the people then demanded, was but the unlording of Biſhops, and expelling them the Houſe, and the reducing of Church-Diſcipline to a conformity with other Proteſtant Churches; this was the Barbariſm of thoſe Tumults: and that he might avoid the granting of thoſe honeſt and pious demands, as well demanded by the Parlament as the People, for this very cauſe more then for fear, by his own confeſſion here, he left the City; and in a moſt tempeſtuous ſeaſon forſook the Helm and Steerage of the Common-wealth. This was that terrible Any-thing from which his Conſcience and his Reaſon choſe to run rather then not deny. To be importun'd the removing of evil Counſellors, and other grievances in Church and State, was to him an intolerable oppreſſion. If the Peoples demanding were ſo burd'nſome to him, what was his denial and delay of Juſtice to them?

But as the demands of his People were to him a burd'n and oppreſſion, ſo was the advice of his Parlament eſteem'd a bondage; Whoſe agreeing Votes, as he affirms, were not by any Law or Reaſon concluſive to his Judgment. For the Law, it ordains a Parlament to adviſe him in his great Affairs; but if it ordain alſo that the ſingle judgment of a King ſhall out-ballance all the wiſdom of his Parlament, it ordains that which fruſtrats the end of its own ordaining. For where the King's judgment may diſſent to the deſtruction, as it may happ'n, both of himſelf and the Kingdom, there Advice, and no furder, is a moſt inſufficient and fruſtraneous means to be provided by Law in caſes of ſo high concernment. It being therfore moſt unlike a Law, to ordain a remedy ſo ſlender and unlawlike, to be the utmoſt means of all publick ſafety or prevention, as Advice is, which may at any time be rejected by the ſole judgment of one man, the King, and ſo unlike the Law of England, which Lawyers ſay is the quinteſſence of Reaſon; we may conclude that the King's negative voice was never any Law, but an abſurd and reaſonleſs Cuſtom, begott'n and grown up either from the flattery of baſeſt times, or the uſurpation of immoderate Princes. Thus much to the Law of it, by a better evidence then Rowles and Records, Reaſon.

But is it poſſible he ſhould pretend alſo to Reaſon, that the judgment of one Man, not as a wiſe or good Man, but as a King, and oft times a wilful, proud, and wicked King, ſhould outweigh the prudence and all the vertue of an elected Parlament? What an abuſive thing it were then to ſummon Parlaments, that by the major part of voices greateſt matters may be there debated and reſolv'd, when as one voice after that ſhall daſh all thir Reſolutions?

He attempts to give a reaſon why it ſhould, Becauſe the whole Parlament repreſents not him in any kind. But mark how little he advances; for if the Parlament repreſent the whole Kingdom, as is ſure anough they do, then doth the King repreſent only himſelf; and if a King without his Kingdom be in a civil ſenſe nothing, then without or againſt the Repreſentative of his whole Kingdom, he himſelf repreſents nothing, and by conſequence his judgment and his negative is as good as nothing; and though we ſhould allow him to be ſomething, yet not equal or comparable to the whole Kingdom, and ſo neither to them that repreſent it.

Yet here he maintains, To be no furder bound to agree with the Votes of both Houſes, then he ſees them to agree with the will of God, with his juſt Rights as a King, and the general good of his People. As to the freedom of his agreeing or not agreeing, limited with due bounds, no man reprehends it; this is the Queſtion here, or the Miracle rather, why his only not agreeing ſhould lay a negative bar and inhibition upon that which is agreed to by a whole Parlament, though never ſo conducing to the publick good or ſafety. To know the will of God better then his whole Kingdom, whence ſhould he have it? Certainly Court-breeding and his perpetual converſation with Flatterers was but a bad School. To judg of his own Rights could not belong to him, who had no right by Law in any Court to judg of ſo much as Felony or Treaſon, being held a party in both theſe caſes, much more in this; and his Rights however ſhould give place to the general good, for which end all his Rights were giv'n him. Laſtly to ſuppoſe a clearer inſight and diſcerning of the general good, allotted to his own ſingular judgment, then to the Parlament and all the People, and from that ſelf-opinion of diſcerning to deny them that good which they, being all Freemen, ſeek earneſtly and call for, is an arrogance and iniquity beyond imagination rude and unreaſonable; they undoubtedly having moſt autoritie to judg of the public good, who for that purpoſe are choſ'n out and ſent by the People to adviſe him. And if it may be in him to ſee oft the major part of them not in the right, had it not bin more his modeſtie to have doubted thir ſeeing him more oft'n in the wrong?

He paſſes to another reaſon of his denials, Becauſe of ſome mens hydropic unſatiableneſs, and thirſt of asking, the more they drank, whom no fountain of Regal bountie was able to overcome. A compariſon more properly beſtow'd on thoſe that came to guzzle in his Wine-cellar, then on a freeborn People that came to claim in Parlament thir Rights and Liberties, which a King ought therefore to grant, becauſe of right demanded; not to deny them for fear his bounty ſhould be exhauſt, which in theſe demands (to continue the ſame Metaphor) was not ſo much as broach'd; it being his duty, not his bounty to grant theſe things.

Putting off the Courtier, he now puts on the Philoſopher, and ſententiouſly diſputes to this effect, That reaſon ought to be us'd to men, force and terror to Beaſts; that he deſerves to be a Slave who captivates the rational ſoveranty of his Soul, and liberty of his Will to compulſion; that he would not forfeit that freedom which cannot be deni'd him as a King, becauſe it belongs to him as a Man and a Chriſtian, though to preſerve his Kingdom; but rather dye enjoying the Empire of his Soul, then live in ſuch a vaſſalage, as not to uſe his reaſon and conſcience to like or diſlike as a King. Which words of themſelves, as far as they are ſenſe, good and philoſophical, yet in the mouth of him who to engroſs this common liberty to himſelf, would tred down all other men into the condition of Slaves and Beaſts, they quite loſe their commendation. He confeſſes a rational ſoverantie of Soul, and freedom of Will in every man, and yet with an implicit repugnancy would have his reaſon the ſoveran of that ſoveranty, and would captivate and make uſeleſs that natural freedom of will in all other men but himſelf. But them that yeeld him this obedience he ſo well rewards, as to pronounce them worthy to be Slaves. They who have loſt all to be his Subjects, may ſtoop and take up the reward. What that freedom is, which cannot be denied him as a King, becauſe it belongs to him as a Man and a Chriſtian, I underſtand not. If it be his Negative Voice, it concludes all men who have not ſuch a Negative as his againſt a whole Parlament, to be neither Men nor Chriſtians: and what was he himſelf then all this while, that we denied it him as a King? Will he ſay that he injoy'd within himſelf the leſs freedom for that? Might not he, both as a Man and as a Chriſtian, have raignd within himſelf in full ſovranty of ſoul, no man repining, but that his outward and imperious Will muſt invade the civil Liberties of a Nation? Did we therfore not permit him to uſe his reaſon or his conſcience, not permitting him to bereave us the uſe of ours? And might not he have enjoy'd both as a King, governing us as Free-men by what Laws we our ſelves would be govern'd? It was not the inward uſe of his reaſon and his conſcience that would content him, but to uſe them both as a Law over all his Subjects, in whatever he declar'd as a King to like or diſlike. Which uſe of reaſon, moſt reaſonleſs and unconſcionable, is the utmoſt that any Tyrant ever pretended over his Vaſſals.

In all wiſe Nations the Legiſlative Power, and the judicial execution of that Power, have bin moſt commonly diſtinct, and in ſeveral hands; but yet the former ſupreme, the other ſubordinat. If then the King be only ſet up to execute the Law, which is indeed the higheſt of his Office, he ought no more to make or forbid the making of any Law agreed upon in Parlament, then other inferior Judges, who are his Deputies. Neither can he more reject a Law offerd him by the Commons, then he can new make a Law which they reject. And yet the more to credit and uphold his cauſe, he would ſeem to have Philoſophy on his ſide, ſtraining her wiſe dictates to unphiloſophical purpoſes. But when Kings come ſo low, as to fawn upon Philoſophy, which before they neither valu'd nor underſtood, 'tis a ſign that fails not, they are then put to their laſt Trump. And Philoſophy as well requites them, by not ſuffering her gold'n ſayings either to become their lips, or to be us'd as masks and colours of injurious and violent deeds. So that what they preſume to borrow from her ſage and vertuous Rules, like the Riddle of Sphinx not underſtood, breaks the neck of thir own cauſe.

But now again to Politicks: He cannot think the Majeſty of the Crown of England to be bound by any Coronation Oath in a blind and brutiſh formality, to conſent to whatever its Subjects in Parlament ſhall require What Tyrant could preſume to ſay more, when he meant to kick down all Law, Government, and bond of Oath? But why he ſo deſires to abſolve himſelf the Oath of his Coronation would be worth the knowing. It cannot but be yielded that the Oath which binds him to performance of his Truſt, ought in reaſon to contain the ſum of what his chief Truſt and Office is. But if it neither do enjoin nor mention to him, as a part of his duty, the making or the marring of any Law, or ſcrap of Law, but requires only his aſſent to thoſe Laws which the People have already choſ'n, or ſhall chooſe (for ſo both the Latin of that Oath, and the old Engliſh, and all reaſon admits, that the People ſhould not loſe under a new King what freedom they had before) then that Negative Voice ſo contended for, to deny the paſſing of any Law which the Commons chooſe, is both againſt the Oath of his Coronation, and his Kingly Office. And if the King may deny to paſs what the Parlament hath chos'n to be a Law, then doth the King make himſelf ſuperiour to his whole Kingdom; which not only the general Maxims of Policy gainſay, but ev'n our own ſtanding Laws, as hath bin cited to him in Remonſtrances heertofore, that the King hath two Superiors, the Law, and his Court of Parlament. But this he counts to be a blind and brutiſh formality, whether it be Law, or Oath, or his Duty, and thinks to turn it off with wholeſom words and phraſes, which he then firſt learnt of the honeſt People, when they were ſo oft'n compell'd to uſe them againſt thoſe more truly blind and brutiſh formalities thruſt upon us by his own command.

As for his inſtance, in caſe He and the Houſe of Peers attempted to enjoyne the Houſe of Commons, it bears no equalitie; for he and the Peers repreſent but themſelves, the Commons are the whole Kingdom.

Thus he concludes his Oath to be fully diſcharg'd in governing by Laws already made, as being not bound to paſs any new, if his Reaſon bids him deny. And ſo may infinite miſchiefs grow, and a whole Nation be ruin'd, while our general good and ſafety ſhall depend upon the privat and overweening Reaſon of one obſtinat Man, who againſt all the Kingdom, if he liſt, will interpret both the Law, and his Oath of Coronation by the tenor of his own Will. Which he himſelf confeſſes to be an arbitrary power, yet doubts not in his Argument to imply, as if he thought it more fit the Parlament ſhould be ſubject to his Will, then he to their Advice, a man neither by nature nor by nurture wiſe. How is it poſſible that he in whom ſuch Principles as theſe were ſo deep rooted, could ever, tho reſtor'd again, have raign'd otherwiſe then tyrannically?

He objects, That Force was but a ſlaviſh Method to diſpel his Error. But how oft'n ſhall it be anſwer'd him, that no force was us'd to diſpel the error out of his head, but to drive it from off our necks? for his error was imperious, and would command all other men to renounce their own reaſon and underſtanding, till they periſh'd under the injunction of his all-ruling error.

He alleges the uprightneſs of his intentions to excuſe his poſſible failings; a Poſition fals both in Law and Divinity: Yea contrary to his own better principles, who affirms in the twelfth Chapter, that The goodneſs of a mans intention will not excuſe the ſcandal and contagion of his example. His not knowing, through the corruption of Flattery and Court-principles, what he ought to have known, will not excuſe his not doing what he ought to have don; no more than the ſmall skill of him who undertakes to be a Pilot will excuſe him to be miſled by any wandring Star miſtak'n for the Pole. But let his intentions be never ſo upright, what is that to us? What anſwer for the reaſon and the National Rights which God hath giv'n us, if having Parlaments, and Laws, and the power of making more to avoid miſchief, we ſuffer one mans blind intentions to lead us all with our eyes op'n to manifeſt deſtruction?

And if Arguments prevail not with ſuch a one, Force is well us'd; not to carry on the weakneſs of our Counſels, or to convince his Error, as he ſurmiſes, but to acquit and reſcue our own Reaſon, our own Conſciences from the force and prohibition laid by his uſurping error upon our Liberties and Underſtandings.

Never thing pleas'd him more, then when his judgment concur'd with theirs. That was to the applauſe of his own judgment, and would as well have pleas'd any ſelf-conceited man.

Yea in many things he choſe rather to deny himſelf then them. That is to ſay in trifles. For of his own Intereſts and perſonal Rights he conceaves himſelf Maſter. To part with, if he pleaſe, not to conteſt for, againſt the Kingdom which is greater then he, whoſe Rights are all ſubordinat to the Kingdoms good: And in what concerns Truth, Juſtice, the right of Church, or his Crown, no man ſhall gain his conſent againſt his mind. What can be left then for a Parlament, but to ſit like Images, while he ſtill thus either with incomparable arrogance aſſumes to himſelf the beſt ability of judging for other men what is Truth, Juſtice, Goodneſs, what his own or the Churches right, or with unſufferable Tyranny reſtrains all men from the enjoyment of any good, which his judgment, though erroneous, thinks not fit to grant them; notwithſtanding that the Law and his Coronal Oath requires his undeniable aſſent to what Laws the Parlament agree upon.

He had rather wear a Crown of Thorns with our Saviour. Many would be all one with our Saviour, whom our Saviour will not know. They who govern ill thoſe Kingdoms which they had a right to, have to our Saviours Crown of Thorns no right at all. Thorns they may find anow of their own gathering, and their own twiſting; for Thorns and Snares, ſaith Solomon, are in the way of the froward: but to wear them, as our Saviour wore them, is not giv'n to them that ſuffer by thir own demerits. Nor is a Crown of Gold his due, who cannot firſt wear a Crown of Lead; not only for the weight of that great Office, but for the compliance which it ought to have with them who are to counſel him, which heer he terms in ſcorn An imbaſed flexibleneſs to the various and oft contrary dictates of any Factions, meaning his Parlament; for the queſtion hath bin all this while between them two. And to his Parlament, though a numerous and choiſe Aſſembly, of whom the Land thought wiſeſt, he imputes, rather then to himſelf, want of reaſon, neglect of the Public, intereſt of Parties, and particularitie of private will and paſſion; but with what modeſty or likelihood of truth, it will be weariſon to repeat ſo oft'n.

He concludes with a ſentence fair in ſeeming, but fallacious. For if the conſcience be ill edifi'd, the reſolution may more befit a fooliſh then a Chriſtian King, to prefer a ſelf-will'd conſcience before a Kingdoms good; eſpecially in the denial of that which Law and his Regal Office by Oath bids him grant to his Parlament and whole Kingdom rightfully demanding. For we may obſerve him throughout the diſcours to aſſert his Negative power againſt the whole Kingdom; now under the ſpecious Plea of his conſcience and his reaſon, but heretofore in a lowder note; Without us, or againſt our conſent, the Votes of either or of both Houſes together, muſt not, cannot, ſhall not. Declar. May 4. 1642.

With theſe and the like deceavable Doctrines he levens alſo his Prayer.

VII. Upon the Queens departure.

TO this Argument we ſhall ſoon have ſaid; for what concerns it us to hear a Husband divulge his Hoſhould privacies, extolling to others the vertues of his Wife? an infirmity not ſeldom incident to thoſe who have leaſt cauſe. But how good ſhe was a Wife, was to himſelf, and be it left to his own fancy; how bad a Subject is not much diſputed. And being ſuch, it need be made no wonder, tho ſhe left a Proteſtant Kingdom with as little honour as her Mother left a Popiſh.

That this is the firſt example of any Proteſtant Subjects that have tak'n up Arms againſt thir King a Proteſtant, can be to Proteſtants no diſhonour; when it ſhall be heard that he firſt levied War on them, and to the intereſt of Papiſts more then of Proteſtants. He might have giv'n yet the precedence of making War upon him to the Subjects of his own Nation, who had twice oppos'd him in the op'n Field, long ere the Engliſh found it neceſſary to do the like. And how groundleſs, how diſſembled is that fear, leſt ſhe, who for ſo many years had bin averſe from the Religion of her Husband, and every year more and more, before theſe diſturbances broke out, ſhould for them be now the more alienated from that to which we never heard ſhe was inclin'd? But if the fear of her Delinquency, and that Juſtice which the Proteſtants demanded on her, was any cauſe of her alienating the more, to have gain'd her by indirect means had been no advantage to Religion, much leſs then was the detriment to looſe her furder off. It had bin happy if his own actions had not giv'n cauſe of more ſcandal to the Proteſtants, then what they did againſt her could juſtly ſcandalize any Papiſt.

Them who accus'd her, well anough known to be the Parlament, he cenſures for Men yet to ſeek thir Religion, whether Doctrine, Diſcipline, or good manners; the reſt he ſooths with the name of true Engliſh Proteſtants, a meer ſciſmatical name, yet he ſo great an enemy of Sciſm.

He aſcribes rudeneſs and barbarity, worſe then Indian, to the Engliſh Parlament; and all vertue to his Wife, in ſtrains that come almoſt to Sonnetting: How fit to govern men, undervaluing and aſperſing the great Council of his Kingdom, in compariſon of one Woman. Examples are not far to ſeek how great miſchief and diſhonour hath befall'n to Nations under the Government of effeminate and uxorious Magiſtrates, who being themſelves govern'd and overſwaid at home under a feminine Uſurpation, cannot but be far ſhort of ſpirit and autority without dores to govern a whole Nation.

Her tarrying here he could not think ſafe among them who were ſhaking hands with Allegeance, to lay faſter hold on Religion; and taxes them of a duty rather then a crime, it being juſt to obey God rather then Man, and impoſſible to ſerve two Maſters. I would they had quite ſhak'n off what they ſtood ſhaking hands with; the fault was in thir courage, not in thir cauſe.

In his Prayer he praies that the diſloyalty of his Proteſtant Subjects may not be a hindrance to her love of the true Religion; and never prays, that the diſſoluteneſs of his Court, the ſcandals of his Clergy, the unſoundneſs of his own Judgment, the lukewarmneſs of his Life, his Letter of compliance to the Pope, his permitting Agents at Rome, and the Pope's Nuntio here, may not be found in the ſight of God far greater hindrances to her converſion.

But this had bin a ſuttle Prayer indeed, and well pray'd, though as duly as a Pater-noſter, if it could have charm'd us to ſit ſtill and have Religion and our Liberties one by one ſnatch'd from us, for fear leſt riſing to defend our ſelves, we ſhould fright the Queen, a ſtiff Papiſt, from turning Proteſtant. As if the way to make his Queen a Proteſtant, had bin to make his Subjects more then half-way Papiſts.

He prays next that his conſtancy may be an antidote againſt the poyſon of other mens example. His conſtancy in what? Not in Religion, for it is op'nly known that her Religion wrought more upon him, then his Religion upon her; and his op'n favouring of Papiſts, and his hatred of them call'd Puritans, made moſt men ſuſpect ſhe had quite perverted him. But what is it that the blindneſs of hypocriſy dares not do? It dares pray, and thinks to hide that from the eyes of God, which it cannot hide from the op'n view of man.

VIII. Upon his repulſe at Hull, and the fate of the Hothams.

HULL, a Town of great ſtrength and opportunitie both to Sea and Land-Affairs, was at that time the Magazin of all thoſe Arms which the King had bought with mony moſt illegally extorted from his Subjects of England, to uſe in a cauſeleſs and moſt unjuſt Civil War againſt his Subjects of Scotland. The King in high diſcontent and anger had left the Parlament, and was gone toward the North, the Queen into Holland, where ſhe pawn'd and ſet to ſail the Crown-Jewels (a crime heretofore counted treaſonable in Kings) and to what intent theſe ſums were rais'd, the Parlament was not ignorant. His going northward in ſo high a chaſe, they doubted was to poſſeſs himſelf of that ſtrength, which the ſtorehouſe and ſituation of Hull might add ſuddenly to his malignant Party. Having firſt therefore in many Petitions earneſtly pray'd him to diſpoſe and ſettle, with conſent of both Houſes, the military Power in truſty hands, and he as oft refuſing, they were neceſſitated by the turbulence and danger of thoſe times to put the Kingdom by thir own autority into a poſture of defence; and very timely ſent Sir John Hotham, a Member of the Houſe, and Knight of that County, to take Hull into his cuſtody, and ſome of the Train'd-bands to his aſſiſtance: Neither had the King before that time omitted to attempt the ſame, firſt by Colonel Legg, one of thoſe who were imploy'd to bring the Army up againſt the Parlament, then by the Earl of Newcaſtle under a diſguiſe. And Letters of the Lord Digby were intercepted, wherein was wiſht that the King would declare himſelf, and retire to ſome ſafe place; other information came from abroad, that Hull was the place deſign'd for ſome new enterpriſe.

But theſe Attempts not ſucceeding, and that Town being now in cuſtody of the Parlament, he ſends a Meſſage to them, that he had firmly reſolv'd to go in Perſon into Ireland, to chaſtiſe thoſe wicked Rebels (for theſe and worſe words he then gave them) and that toward this work he intended forthwith to raiſe by his Commiſſions, in the Counties near Weſtcheſter, a Guard for his own Perſon conſiſting of 2000 foot, and 200 horſe, that ſhould be arm'd from his Magazine at Hull. On the other ſide, the Parlament, forſeeing the King's drift, about the ſame time ſend him a Petition, that they might have leave for neceſſary cauſes to remove the Magazin of Hull to the Tower of London; to which the King returns his denial; and ſoon after going to Hull, attended with about 400 horſe, requires the Governour to deliver him up the Town; whereof the Governour beſought humbly to be excus'd, till he could ſend notice to the Parlament who had entruſted him; wherat the King much incens'd, proclaims him Traitor before the Town Walls, and gives immediate order to ſtop all Paſſages between him and the Parlament. Yet he himſelf diſpatches poſt after poſt to demand juſtice as upon a Traitor, uſing a ſtrange iniquity to require Juſtice upon him whom he then waylaid and debarr'd from his appearance. The Parlament no ſooner underſtood what had paſs'd, but they declare that Sir John Hotham had done no more then was his duty, and was therfore no Traitor.

This relation being moſt true, proves that which is affirm'd here to be moſt falſe; ſeing the Parlament, whom he accounts his greateſt Enemies, had more confidence to abet and own what Sir John Hotham had done, then the King had confidence to let him anſwer in his own behalf.

To ſpeak of his patience, and in that ſolemn manner, he might better have forborn; God knows, ſaith he, it affected me more with ſorrow for others then with anger for my ſelf; nor did the affront trouble me ſo much as their ſin. This is read, I doubt not, and beleev'd: and as there is ſome uſe of every thing, ſo is there of this Book, were it but to ſhew us, what a miſerable, credulous, deluded thing that creature is, which is call'd the vulgar; who notwithſtanding what they might know, will beleeve ſuch vain-glories as theſe. Did not that choleric and vengeful act of proclaiming him Traitor before due proceſs of Law, having bin convinc'd ſo late before of his illegality with the five Members, declare his anger to be incens'd? doth not his own relation confeſs as much? and his ſecond Meſſage left him fuming three days after, and in plain words teſtifies his impatience of delay till Hotham be ſeverely puniſh'd, for that which he there terms an inſupportable affront.

Surely if his ſorrow for Sir John Hotham's ſin were greater then his anger for the affront, it was an exceeding great ſorrow indeed, and wondrous charitable. But if it ſtirr'd him ſo vehemently to have Sir John Hotham puniſht, and not at all that we hear to have him repent, it had a ſtrange operation to be call'd a ſorrow for his ſin. He who would perſwade us of his ſorrow for the ſins of other men, as they are ſins, not as they are ſin'd againſt himſelf, muſt give us firſt ſome teſtimony of a ſorrow for his own ſins, and next for ſuch ſins of other men as canot be ſuppos'd a direct injury to himſelf. But ſuch compunction in the King no man hath yet obſerv'd; and till then, his ſorrow for Sir John Hotham's ſin will be call'd no other then the reſentment of his repulſe; and his labour to have the ſinner only puniſh'd, will be call'd by a right name, his revenge.

And the hand of that cloud which caſt all ſoon after into darkneſs and diſorder, was his own hand. For aſſembling the Inhabitants of Yorkſhire, and other Counties, horſe and foot, firſt under colour of a new Guard to his Perſon, ſoon after, being ſuppli'd with Ammunition from Holland, bought with the Crown-Jewels, he begins an op'n War by laying Seige to Hull: which Town was not his own, but the Kingdom's; and the Arms there, public Arms, bought with the publick Mony, or not his own. Yet had they bin his own by as good right as the privat Houſe and Arms of any man are his own; to uſe either of them in a way not privat, but ſuſpitious to the Common-wealth, no Law permits. But the King had no proprietie at all either in Hull or in the Magazin: ſo that the following Maxims which he cites of bold and diſloyal Undertakers may belong more juſtly to whom he leaſt meant them. After this he again relapſes into the praiſe of his patience at Hull, and by his overtalking of it, ſeems to doubt either ther his own conſcience, or the hardneſs of other mens belief. To me the more he praiſes it in himſelf, the more he ſeems to ſuſpect that in very deed it was not in him, and that the lookers on ſo likewiſe thought.

Thus much of what he ſuffer'd by Hotham, and with what patience; now of what Hotham ſuffer'd, as he judges, for oppoſing him: He could not but obſerve how God not long after pleaded and aveng'd his cauſe. Moſt men are too apt, and commonly the worſt of men, ſo to interpret and expound the judgments of God, and all other events of providence or chance, as makes moſt to the juſtifying of thir own cauſe, though never ſo evil; and attribute all to the particular favour of God towards them. Thus when Saul heard that David was in Keilah, God, ſaith he, hath delivered him up into my hands, for he is ſhut in. But how far that King was deceav'd in his thought that God was favouring to his cauſe, that ſtory unfolds; and how little reaſon this King had to impute the death of Hotham to God's avengement of his repulſe at Hull, may eaſily be ſeen. For while Hotham continu'd faithful to his truſt, no man more ſafe, more ſucceſsful, more in reputation then he: But from the time he firſt ſought to make his peace with the King, and to betray into his hands that Town, into which before he had deny'd him entrance, nothing proſper'd with him. Certainly had God purpos'd him ſuch an end for his oppoſition to the King, he would not have deferr'd to puniſh him till then, when of an Enemy he was chang'd to be the King's Friend, nor have made his repentance and amendment the occaſion of his ruin. How much more likely is it, ſince he fell into the act of diſloyalty to his charge, that the judgment of God concurr'd with the puniſhment of man, and juſtly cut him off for revolting to the King? To give the World an example, that glorious deeds done to ambitious ends, find reward anſwerable, not to thir outward ſeeming, but to thir inward ambition. In the mean while what thanks he had from the King for revolting to his cauſe, and what good opinion for dying in his ſervice, they who have ventur'd like him, or intend, may here take notice.

He proceeds to declare, not only in general wherfore God's Judgment was upon Hotham, but undertakes by fanſies, and alluſions to give a criticiſm upon every particular: That his head was divided from his Body, becauſe his heart was divided from the King; two heads cut off in one family for affronting the head of the Common-wealth; the eldeſt ſon being infected with the ſin of the Father, againſt the Father of his Countrie. Theſe petty gloſſes and conceits on the high and ſecret Judgments of God, beſides the boldneſs of unwarrantable commenting, are ſo weak and ſhallow, and ſo like the quibbl's of a Court-Sermon, that we may ſafely reck'n them either fetcht from ſuch a pattern, or that the hand of ſome houſhold Preiſt foiſted them in, leſt the World ſhould forget how much he was the Diſciple of thoſe Cymbal Doctors. But that Argument by which the Author would commend them to us, diſcredits them the more: For if they be ſo obvious to every fancy, the more likely to be erroneous, and to miſconceive the mind of thoſe high ſecrecies, whereof they preſume to determin. For God judges not by human fancy.

But however God judg'd Hotham, yet he had the King's pity: but mark the reaſon how prepoſterous; ſo far he had his pity, as he thought he at firſt acted more againſt the light of his conſcience then many other men in the ſame cauſe. Queſtionleſs they who act againſt conſcience, whether at the Bar of human, or divine Juſtice, are pitied leaſt of all. Theſe are the common grounds and verdicts of Nature, whereof when he who hath the judging of a whole Nation, is found deſtitute under ſuch a Governour, that Nation muſt needs be miſerable.

By the way he jerks at ſome mens reforming to models of Religion, and that they think all is gold of Pietie that doth but gliſter with a ſhew of Zeal. We know his meaning, and apprehend how little hope there could be of him from ſuch language as this: But are ſure that the pietie of his prelatick Model gliſter'd more upon the Poſts and Pillars which thir zeal and fervencie gilded over, then in the true works of ſpiritual edification.

He is ſory that Hotham felt the juſtice of others, and fell not rather into the hands of his mercy. But to clear that, he ſhould have ſhewn us what mercy he had ever us'd to ſuch as fell into his hands before, rather then what mercy he intended to ſuch as never could come to ask it. Whatever mercy one man might have expected, 'tis too well known the whole Nation found none; though they beſought it oft'n, and ſo humbly, but had bin ſwallow'd up in blood and ruin, to ſet his private will above the Parlament, had not his ſtrength fail'd him. Yet clemency he counts a debt, which he ought pay to thoſe that crave it; ſince we pay not any thing to God for his Mercy but Prayers and Praiſes. By this reaſon we ought as freely to pay all things to all men; for of all that we receive from God, what do we pay for, more then prayers and praiſes? we look'd for the diſcharge of his Office, the payment of his Duty to the Kingdom, and are paid Court-paiment with empty ſentences that have the ſound of gravity, but the ſignificance of nothing pertinent.

Yet again after his mercy paſt and granted, he returns back to give ſentence upon Hotham; and whom he tells us he would ſo fain have ſav'd alive, him he never leaves killing with a repeated Condemnation, though dead long ſince. It was ill that ſome body ſtood not neer to whiſper him, that a reiterating Judg is worſe then a tormentor. He pities him, he rejoices not, he pities him again; but ſtill is ſure to brand him at the tail of his pity with ſome ignominious mark, either of ambition or diſloyaltie. And with a kind of cenſorious pity aggravates rather then leſs'ns or conceals the fault: To pity thus is to triumph.

He aſſumes to foreknow, that after times will diſpute, whether Hotham were more infamous at Hull, or at Tower-hill. What knew he of after times, who while he ſits judging and cenſuring without end, the fate of that unhappy Father and his Son at Tower-hill, knew not that the like fate attended him before his own Palace-Gate; and as little knew whether after times do not reſerve a greater infamy upon his own Life and Raign.

He ſays but over again in his Prayer, what his Sermon hath preacht; How acceptably to thoſe in Heav'n we leave to be decided by that precept which forbids vain Repetitions. Sure anough it lies as heavie as he can lay it upon the head of poor Hotham.

Needs he will faſt'n upon God a peece of revenge as done for his ſake; and takes it for a favour, before he know it was intended him: which in his cloſet had bin excuſable, but in a writt'n and publiſh'd Prayer too preſumptuous. Eccleſiaſtes hath a right name for ſuch kind of Sacrifices.

Going on he prays thus, Let not thy Juſtice prevent the objects and opportunities of my Mercy. To folly, or to blaſphemy, or to both ſhall we impute this? Shall the Juſtice of God give place, and ſerve to glorifie the Mercies of a Man? All other Men who know what they ask, deſire of God that thir doings may tend to his glory; but in this prayer God is requir'd that his Juſtice would forbear to prevent, and as good have ſaid to intrench upon the glory a Man's Mercy. If God forbear his Juſtice, it muſt be ſure to the magnifying of his own Mercy: But here a mortal man takes the boldneſs to ask that glory out of his hand. It may be doubted now by them who underſtand Religion, whether the King were more unfortunate in this his Prayer, or Hotham in thoſe his ſufferings.

IX. Upon the liſting and raiſing Armies, &c.

IT were an endleſs work to walk ſide by ſide with the verboſity of this Chapter; only to what already hath not bin ſpok'n, convenient Anſwer ſhall be giv'n. He begins again with Tumults; all demonſtration of the Peoples Love and Loyalty to the Parlament was Tumult; thir petitioning, Tumult; thir defenſive Armies were but liſted Tumults; and will take no notice that thoſe about him, thoſe in a time of Peace liſted into his own Houſe, were the beginners of all theſe Tumults; abuſing and aſſaulting not only ſuch as came peaceably to the Parlament at London, but thoſe that came petitioning to the King himſelf at York. Neither did they abſtain from doing violence and outrage to the Meſſengers ſent from Parlament; he himſelf either count'nancing or conniving at them.

He ſuppoſes that His receſs gave us confidence that he might be conquer'd. Other men ſuppoſe both that and all things els, who knew him neither by nature warlike, nor experienc'd, nor fortunate; ſo far was any Man that diſcern'd aught from eſteeming him unconquerable; yet ſuch are readieſt to imbroil others.

But he had a Soul invincible. What praiſe is that? The Stomach of a Child is oftimes invincible to all correction. The unteachable man hath a ſoul to all reaſon and good advice invincible; and he who is intractable, he whom nothing can perſwade, may boaſt himſelf invincible; when as in ſome things to be overcome is more honeſt and laudable then to conquer.

He labours to have it thought that his fearing God more than Man was the ground of his ſufferings; but he ſhould have known that a good principle not rightly underſtood may prove as hurtful as a bad, and his fear of God may be as faulty as a blind zeal. He pretended to fear God more than the Parlament, who never urg'd him to do otherwiſe; he ſhould alſo have fear'd God more then he did his Courtiers, and the Biſhops who drew him, as they pleas'd, to things inconſiſtent with the fear of God. Thus boaſted Saul to have perform'd the Commandment of God, and ſtood in it againſt Samuel; but it was found at length that he had fear'd the People more then God, in ſaving thoſe fat Oxen for the worſhip of God which were appointed for deſtruction. Not much unlike, if not much wors was that fact of his, who for fear to diſpleaſe his Court and mungrel Clergy, with the diſſoluteſt of the People, upheld in the Church of God, while his power laſted, thoſe Beaſts of Amalec, the Prelats, againſt the advice of his Parlament and the example of all Reformation; in this more unexcuſable then Saul, that Saul was at length convinc'd, he to the hour of death fix'd in his fals perſwaſion, and ſooths himſelf in the flattering peace of an erroneous and obdurat conſcience; ſinging to his ſoul vain Pſalms of exultation, as if the Parlament had aſſail'd his reaſon with the force of Arms, and not he on the contrary their reaſon with his Arms, which hath been prov'd already, and ſhall be more hereafter.

He twits them with his Acts of Grace; proud, and unſelf-knowing words in the mouth of any King who affects not to be a God, and ſuch as ought to be as odious in the ears of a free Nation. For if they were unjuſt acts, why did he grant them as of grace? If juſt, it was not of his grace, but of his duty and his Oath to grant them.

A glorious King he would be, though by his ſufferings: But that can never be to him whoſe ſufferings are his own doings. He fains a hard chois put upon him either to kill his Subjects, or be kill'd. Yet never was King leſs in danger of any violence from his Subjects, till he unſheath'd his Sword againſt them; nay long after that time, when he had ſpilt the blood of thouſands, they had ſtill his Perſon in a fooliſh veneration.

He complains, That civil War muſt be the fruits of his ſeventeeen years raigning with ſuch a meaſure of Juſtice, Peace, Plenty, and Religion, as all Nations either admir'd or envi'd. For the Juſtice we had, let the Councel Table, Star-chamber, High Commiſſion ſpeak the praiſe of it; not forgetting the unprincely uſage, and, as far as might be, the aboliſhing of Parlaments, the diſplacing of honeſt Judges, the ſale of Offices, Bribery and Exaction, not found out to be puniſh'd, but to be ſhar'd in with impunity for the time to come. Who can number the Extortions, the Oppreſſions, the public Robberies and Rapines committed on the Subject both by Sea and Land under various pretences? Thir poſſeſſions alſo tak'n from them, one while as Forreſt-Land, another while a Crown-Land; nor were thir Goods exempted, no not the Bullion in the Mint; Piracy was become a project own'd and authoriz'd againſt the Subject.

For the peace we had, what peace was that which drew out the Engliſh to a needleſs and diſhonourable Voyage againſt the Spaniard at Cales? Or that which lent our ſhipping to a treacherous and Antichriſtian War againſt the poor Proteſtants of Rochel our ſuppliants? What peace was that which fell to rob the French by Sea, to the imbarring of all our Merchants in that Kingdom? which brought forth that unbleſt expedition to the Iſle of Rhee, doubtful whether more calamitous in the ſucceſs or in the deſign, betraying all the flower of our military Youth and beſt Commanders to a ſhameful ſurpriſal and execution. This was the peace we had, and the peace we gave, whether to friends or to foes abroad. And if at home any peace were intended us, what meant thoſe billeted Souldiers in all parts of the Kingdom, and the deſign of German Horſe to ſubdue us in our peaceful Houſes?

For our Religion, where was there a more ignorant, profane, and vitious Clergy, learned in nothing but the antiquitie of thir Pride, thir Covetouſneſs and Superſtition? whoſe unſincere and levenous Doctrine, corrupting the people, firſt taught them looſneſs, then bondage; looſning them from all ſound knowledg and ſtrictneſs of life, the more to fit them for the bondage of Tyranny and Superſtition. So that what was left us for other Nations not to pity rather than admire or envy all thoſe ſeventeen years, no wiſe man could ſee. For wealth and plenty in a Land where Juſtice raigns not, is no argument of a flouriſhing State, but of a neerneſs rather to ruin or commotion.

Theſe were not ſome miſcarriages only of a Government, which might eſcape, but a univerſal diſtemper, and reducement of Law to arbitrary Power; not through the evil councels of ſome men, but through the conſtant cours and practice of all that were in higheſt favour: whoſe worſt actions he frequently avow'd and took upon himſelf, and whoſe Perſons when he could no longer protect, he eſteem'd and favour'd to the end; but never otherwiſe then by conſtraint, yielded any of them to due Puniſhment; thereby manifeſting that what they did was by his own Autority and Approbation.

Yet heer he asks Whoſe innocent Blood he hath ſhed, what Widows or Orphans tears can witneſs againſt him? After the ſuſpected poyſoning of his Father, not inquir'd into, but ſmother'd up, and him protected and advanc'd to the very half of his Kingdom, who was accus'd in Parlament to be the Author of the fact, after ſo many Years of cruel War on his People in three Kingdoms. Whence the Author of Truths manifeſt, a Scotchman, not unacquainted with affairs, poſitively affirms, That there hath more Chriſtian Blood been ſhed by the Commiſſion, approbation, and connivance of King Charles and his Father James in the latter end of thir raign, then in the Ten Roman Perſecutions. Not to ſpeak of thoſe many Whippings, Pillories, and other corporal inflictions wherewith his raign alſo before this War was not unbloodie; ſome have dy'd in Priſon under cruel reſtraint, others in Baniſhment, whoſe lives were ſhortn'd through the rigour of that Perſecution wherewith ſo many years he infeſted the true Church. And thoſe ſix Members all men judg'd to have eſcap'd no leſs then capital danger; whom he ſo greedily purſuing into the Houſe of Commons, had not there the forbearance to conceal how much it troubl'd him, That the Birds were flown. If ſom Vultur in the Mountains could have op'nd his Beak intelligibly and ſpoke, what fitter words could he have utter'd at the loſs of his Prey? The Tyrant Nero, though not yet deſerving that name, ſet his hand ſo unwillingly to the execution of a condemn'd Perſon, as to wiſh He had not known Letters. Certainly for a King himſelf to charge his Subjects with High Treaſon, and ſo vehemently to proſecute them in his own cauſe, as to do the Office of a Searcher, argu'd in him no great averſation from ſhedding blood, were it but to ſatisfie his anger, and that revenge was no unpleaſing morſel to him, whereof he himſelf thought not much to be ſo diligently his own Caterer. But we inſiſt rather upon what was actual then what was probable.

He now falls to examin the cauſes of this War, as a difficulty which he had long ſtudied to find out. It was not, ſaith he, my withdrawing from Whitehall; for no account in reaſon could be giv'n of thoſe Tumults, where an orderly Guard was granted. But if it be a moſt certain truth that the Parlament could never yet obtain of him any Guard fit to be confided in, then by his own confeſſion ſome account of thoſe pretended Tumults may in reaſon be giv'n; and both concerning them and the Guards anough hath bin ſaid alreadie.

Whom did he protect againſt the Juſtice of Parlament? Whom did he not to his utmoſt power? Endeavouring to have reſcu'd Strafford from their Juſtice, tho with the deſtruction of them and the City; to that end expreſly commanding the admittance of new Soldiers into the Tower, rais'd by Suckling and other Conſpirators, under pretence for the Portugall; not to repeat his other Plot of bringing up the two Armies. But what can be diſputed with ſuch a King, in whoſe mouth and opinion the Parlament it ſelf was never but a Faction, and thir Juſtice no Juſtice, but The dictates and overſwaying Inſolence of Tumults and Rabbles? and under that excuſe avouches himſelf openly the general Patron of moſt notorious Delinquents, and approves thir flight out of the Land, whoſe crimes were ſuch, as that the juſteſt and the faireſt trial would have ſooneſt condemn'd them to death. But did not Catiline plead in like manner againſt the Roman Senat, and the injuſtice of thir trial, and the juſtice of his flight from Rome? Ceſar alſo, then hatching Tyranny, injected the ſame ſcrupulous demurs to ſtop the ſentence of death in full and free Senat decreed on Lentulus and Cethegus, two of Catilines accomplices, which were renew'd and urg'd for Strafford. He voutſafes to the reformation, by both Kingdoms intended, no better name then Innovation and ruin both in Church and State. And what we would have learnt ſo gladly of him in other paſſages before, to know wherein, he tells us now of his own accord. The expelling Biſhops out of the Houſe of Peers, this was ruin to the State; the removing them root and branch, this was ruin to the Church. How happy could this Nation be in ſuch a Governour who counted that thir ruin, which they thought thir deliverance; the ruin both of Church and State, which was the recovery and the ſaving of them both?

To the paſſing of thoſe Bills againſt Biſhops, how is it likely that the Houſe of Peers gave ſo hardly thir conſent, which they gave ſo eaſily before to the attaching them of High Treaſon, 12 at once, only for proteſting that the Parlament could not act without them? Surely if thir rights and privileges were thought ſo undoubted in that Houſe, as is heer maintain'd; then was that Proteſtation, being meant and intended in the name of thir whole ſpiritual Order, no Treaſon; and ſo that Houſe it ſelf will becom liable to a juſt conſtruction either of injuſtice in them for ſo conſenting, or of uſurpation, repreſenting none but themſelves, to expect that their voting or not voting ſhould obſtruct the Commons: Who not for five repulſes of the Lords, no not for fifty, were to deſiſt from what in the name of the whole Kingdom they demanded, ſo long as thoſe Lords were none of our Lords. And for the Bill againſt root and branch, tho it paſs'd not in both Houſes till many of the Lords and ſome few of the Commons, either intic'd away by the King, or overaw'd by the ſence of thir own Malignancy, not prevailing, deſerted the Parlament, and made a fair riddance of themſelves; that was no warrant for them who remain'd faithful, being far the greater number, to lay aſide that Bill of root and branch, till the return of thir fugitives; a Bill ſo neceſſary and ſo much deſir'd by themſelves as by the People.

This was the partiality, this degrading of the Biſhops, a thing ſo wholſom in the State, and ſo Orthodoxal in the Church both ancient and reformed, which the King rather then aſſent to, will either hazard both his own and the Kingdoms ruin, by our juſt defence againſt his force of arms; or proſtrate our conſciences in a blind obedience to himſelf, and thoſe men, whoſe ſuperſtition, zealous or unzealous, would inforce upon us an Antichriſtian tyranny in the Church, neither Primitive, Apoſtolical, nor more anciently univerſal, then ſom other manifeſt corruptions.

But he was bound, beſides his judgment, by a moſt ſtrict and undiſpenſable Oath to preſerve that Order and the rights of the Church. If he mean the Oath of his Coronation, and that the letter of that Oath admit not to be interpreted either by equity, reformation, or better knowledg, then was the King bound by that Oath to grant the Clergie all thoſe Cuſtoms, Franchiſes, and Canonical Privileges granted to them by Edward the Confeſſor; and ſo might one day, under pretence of that Oath, and his conſcience, have brought us all again to Popery. But had he ſo well remembred as he ought, the words to which he ſwore, he might have found himſelf no otherwiſe oblig'd there, then according to the Laws of God, and true profeſſion of the Goſpel. For if thoſe following words, Eſtabliſh'd in this Kingdom, be ſet there to limit and lay preſcription on the Laws of God and truth of the Goſpel by mans eſtabliſhment, nothing can be more abſurd or more injurious to Religion. So that however the German Emperors or other Kings have levied all thoſe Wars on thir Proteſtant Subjects under the colour of a blind and literal obſervance to an Oath, yet this King had leaſt pretence of all. Nor is it to be imagin'd, if what ſhall be eſtabliſh'd come in queſtion, but that the Parlament ſhould overſway the King, and not he the Parlament. And by all Law and Reaſon that which the Parlament will not, is no more eſtabliſh'd in this Kingdom, neither is the King bound by Oath to uphold it as a thing eſtabliſh'd.

Had he gratifi'd, he thinks, Antiepiſcopal Faction with his conſent, and ſacrific'd the Church-government and Revenues to the fury of their covetouſneſs, &c. an Army had not bin rais'd. Whereas it was the fury of his own hatred to the profeſſors of true Religion which firſt incited him to perſecute them with the Sword of War, when Whips, Pillories, Exiles, and Impris'nments were not thought ſufficient. To colour which he cannot find wherewithal but that ſtale pretence of Charles the fifth, and other Popiſh Kings, that the Proteſtants had only an intent to lay hands on the Church revenues, a thing never in the thoughts of this Parlament, till exhauſted by his endleſs War upon them, thir neceſſity ſeis'd on that for the Commonwealth, which the luxury of Prelats had abus'd before to a common miſchief.

His conſent to the unlording of Biſhops (for to that he himſelf conſented, and at Canterbury the chief ſeat of their pride, ſo God would have it) was from his firm perſwaſion of thir contentedneſs to ſuffer a preſent diminution of their rights. Can any man, reading this, not diſcern the pure mockery of a Royal conſent, to delude us only for the preſent, meaning, it ſeems, when time ſhould ſerve to revoke all? By this reckning his conſents and his denials come all to one paſs: and we may hence perceave the wiſdom and the integrity of thoſe Votes which voted his Conceſſions at the Ile of Wight for grounds of a laſting Peace. This he alleges, this controverſie about Biſhops, to be the true ſtate of that difference between him and the Parlament. For he held Epiſcopacy both very Sacred and Divine. With this judgment, and for this cauſe he withdrew from the Parlament, and confeſſes that ſome men knew he was like to bring again the ſame judgment which he carried with him. A fair and unexpected juſtification from his own mouth afforded to the Parlament, who notwithſtanding what they knew of his obſtinat mind, omitted not to uſe all thoſe means, and that patience to have gain'd him.

As for Delinquents, he allows them to be but the neceſſary conſequences of his and their withdrawing and defending. A pretty ſhift to mince the name of a delinquent into a neceſſary conſequent: what is a Traitor, but the neceſſary conſequence of his Treaſon? what a Rebel, but of his Rebellion? From this conceit he would infer a pretext only in the Parlament to fetch in delinquents, as if there had indeed bin no ſuch cauſe, but all the delinquency in London Tumults. Which is the overworn theme, and ſtuffing of all his diſcourſes.

This he thrice repeats to be the true ſtate and reaſon of all that War and Devaſtation in the Land; and that of all the Treaties and Propoſitions offerd him, he was reſolv'd never to grant the aboliſhing of Epiſcopal, or the eſtabliſhment of Presbyterian Government. I would demand now of the Scots and Covnanters (for ſo I call them as miſobſervers of the Cov'nant) how they will reconcile the preſervation of Religion and their Liberties, and the bringing of delinquents to condign puniſhment, with the freedom, honour, and ſafety of this vow'd reſolution here, that eſteems all the Zeal of thir proſtituted Cov'nant no better then a noiſe and ſhew of pietie, a heat for reformation, filling them with prejudice, and obſtructing all equality and clearneſs of judgment in them. With theſe principles who knows but that at length he might have come to take the Cov'nant, as others whom they brotherly admit have don before him? and then all, no doubt, had gon well, and ended in a happy peace.

His prayer is moſt of it borrow'd out of David; but what if it be anſwerd him as the Jews, who truſted in Moſes, were anſwer'd by our Saviour; There is one that accuſeth you, ev'n David, whom you miſapply.

He tells God that his Enemies are many, but tells the people, when it ſerves his turn, they are but a faction of ſome few, prevailing over the major part of both Houſes.

God knows he had no paſſion, deſign or preparation to imbroyle his Kingdom in a civil War. True; for he thought his Kingdom to be Iſſachar, a ſtrong Aſs that would have couch'd down between two burd'ns, the one of prelatical ſuperſtition, the other of civil tyrannie: but what paſſion and deſign, what cloſe and op'n preparation he had made to ſubdue us to both theſe by terror and preventive force, all the Nation knows.

The confidence of ſome men had almoſt perſwaded him to ſuſpect his own innocence. As the words of Saint Paul had almoſt perſwaded Agrippa to be a Chriſtian. But Almoſt in the work of repentance is as good as Not at all.

God, ſaith he, will find out bloody and deceitful men, many of whom have not liv'd out half thir days. It behov'd him to have been more cautious how he tempted Gods finding out of blood and deceit, till his own years had bin furder ſpent, or that he had enjoy'd longer the fruits of his own violent Counſels.

But inſtead of warineſs he adds another temptation, charging God to know that the chief deſign of this War was either to deſtroy his Perſon, or to force his Judgment. And thus his prayer from the evil practice of unjuſt accuſing men to God, ariſes to the hideous raſhneſs of accuſing God before men, to know that for truth, which all men know to be moſt fals.

He prays That God would forgive the People, for they know not what they do. It is an eaſie matter to ſay over what our Saviour ſaid; but how he lov'd the People, other Arguments then affected Sayings muſt demonſtrate. He who ſo oft hath preſum'd raſhly to appeal to the knowledg and teſtimony of God in things ſo evidently untrue, may be doubted what belief or eſteem he had of his forgiveneſs, either to himſelf, or thoſe for whom he would ſo fain that men ſhould hear he pray'd.

X. Upon their ſeizing the Magazins, Forts, &c.

TO put the matter ſooneſt out of controverſy who was the firſt beginner of this Civil War, ſince the beginning of all War may be diſcern'd not only by the firſt act of Hoſtilitie, but by the Counſels and Preparations foregoing, it ſhall evidently appear that the King was ſtill formoſt in all theſe. No King had ever at his firſt coming to the Crown more love and acclamation from a people; never any people found worſe requital of thir loyalty and good affection: Firſt by his extraordinary fear and miſtruſt that thir Liberties and Rights were the impairing and diminiſhing of his Regal Power, the true Original of Tyranny: next by his hatred to all thoſe who were eſteem'd religious; doubting that thir Principles too much aſſerted Libertie. This was quickly ſeen by the vehemence, and the cauſes alleg'd of his perſecuting, the other by his frequent and opprobrious diſſolution of Parlaments; after he had demanded more money of them, and they to obtain thir rights had granted him, then would have bought the Turk out of Morea, and ſet free all the Greeks. But when he ſought to extort from us, by way of Tribute, that which had bin offer'd him conditionally in Parlament, as by a free People, and that thoſe Extortions were now conſum'd and waſted by the luxurie of his Court, he began then (for ſtill the more he did wrong, the more he fear'd) before any Tumult or Inſurrection of the People, to take counſel how he might totally ſubdue them to his own will. Then was the deſign of German Horſe, and Souldiers billeted in all parts; the Pulpits reſounded with no other Doctrine then that which gave all Propertie to the King, and Paſſive Obedience to the Subject. After which innumerable formes and ſhapes of new Exactions and Exacters overſpread the Land: Nor was it anough to be impoveriſh'd, unleſs we were diſarm'd. Our Train'd-Bands, which are the truſtieſt and moſt proper ſtrength of a free Nation, had thir Arms in divers Counties tak'n from them; other Ammunition by deſign was ingroſs'd and kept in the Tower, not to be bought without a Licence, and at a high rate.

Thus far, and many other ways were his Counſels and Preparations beforehand with us, either to a Civil War, if it ſhould happ'n, or to ſubdue us without a War, which is all one, until the raiſing of his two Armies againſt the Scots, and the latter of them rais'd to the moſt perfidious breaking of a ſolemn Pacification.

After the beginning of this Parlament, whom he ſaw ſo reſolute and unanimous to releeve the Common-wealth, and that the Earl of Strafford was condemn'd to die, other of his evil Counſellors impeach'd and impriſon'd, to ſhew there wanted not evil Counſel within himſelf ſufficient to begin a War upon his Subjects, though no way by them provok'd, he ſends an Agent with Letters to the King of Denmark requiring aid againſt the Parlament, endeavours to bring up both Armies, firſt the Engliſh, with whom 8000 Iriſh Papiſts rais'd by Strafford, and a French Army were to join; then the Scots at Newcaſtle, whom he thought to have encourag'd by telling them what mony and horſe he was to have from Denmark. I mention not the Iriſh Conſpiracie till due place. Theſe and many other were his Counſels toward a Civil War. His Preparations, after thoſe two Armies were diſmiſs'd, could not ſuddenly be too op'n: Nevertheleſs there were 8000 Iriſh Papiſts which he refus'd to diſband, though intreated by both Houſes, firſt for reaſons beſt known to himſelf, next under pretence of lending them to the Spaniard; and ſo kept them undiſbanded ed till very near the month wherein that Rebellion broke forth. He was alſo raiſing Forces in London, pretendedly to ſerve the Portugal, but with intent to ſeize the Tower. Into which diverſe Cannoneers were by him ſent; the Court was fortifi'd with Ammunition and Souldiers new liſted, follow'd the King from London, and appear'd at Kingſton ſome hundreds of horſe in a warlike manner, with Waggons of Ammunition after them; the Queen in Holland was buying more; the Inhabitants of Yorkſhire and other Counties were call'd to Arms, and actual Forces rais'd, while the Parlament were yet petitioning in peace.

As to the Act of Hoſtilitie, though not much material in whom firſt it began after ſuch Counſels and Preparations diſcover'd, and ſo far advanc'd by the King, yet in that act alſo he will be found to have had precedency, if not at London by the aſſault of his armed Court upon the naked People, and his attempt upon the Houſe of Commons, yet certainly at Hull, firſt by his cloſe Practices on that Town, next by his Seige. Thus whether Councels, Preparations, or Acts of Hoſtilitie be conſidered, it appears with evidence anough, though much more might be ſaid, that the King is truly charg'd to be the firſt beginner of theſe Civil Wars. To which may be added as a cloſe, that in the Iſle of Wight he charg'd it upon himſelf at the publick Treaty, and acquitted the Parlament.

But as for the ſecuring of Hull and the publick ſtores therin, and in other places, it was no ſurpriſal of his Strength; the cuſtody whereof by Autority of Parlament was committed into hands moſt fit and moſt reſponſible for ſuch a truſt. It were a folly beyond ridiculous, to count our ſelves a free Nation, if the King, not in Parlament, but in his own Perſon, and againſt them, might appropriate to himſelf the ſtrength of a whole Nation as his proper goods. What the Laws of the Land are, a Parlament ſhould know beſt, having both the life and death of Laws in thir lawgiving Power: And the Law of England is, at beſt, but the reaſon of Parlament. The Parlament therefore, taking into thir hands that wherof moſt properly they ought to have the keeping, committed no ſurpriſal. If they prevented him, that argu'd not at all either his innocency or unpreparedneſs, but thir timely foreſight to uſe prevention.

But what needed that? They knew his chiefeſt Arms left him were thoſe only which the antient Chriſtians were wont to uſe againſt thir Perſecuters, Prayers and Tears. O ſacred reverence of God, reſpect and ſhame of men, whither were ye fled when theſe hypocriſies were utter'd? Was the Kingdom then at all that coſt of Blood to remove from him none but Prayers and Tears? What were thoſe thouſands of blaſpheming Cavaliers about him, whoſe mouths let fly Oaths and Curſes by the volley; were thoſe the Prayers? and thoſe Carouſes drunk to the confuſion of all things good or holy, did thoſe miniſter the Tears? Were they Prayers and Tears that were liſted at York, muſter'd on Heworth Moore, and laid Seige to Hull for the guard of his Perſon? Were Prayers and Tears at ſo high a rate in Holland, that nothing could purchaſe them but the Crown-Jewels? yet they in Holland (ſuch word was ſent us) ſold them for Guns, Carabins, Mortar-peeces, Cannons, and other deadly Inſtruments of War, which when they came to York, were all no doubt by the merit of ſome great Saint ſuddenly transform'd into Prayers and Tears; and being divided into Regiments and Brigades, were the only Arms that miſchiev'd us in all thoſe Battels and Incounters.

Theſe were his chief Arms, whatever we muſt call them, and yet ſuch Arms as they who fought for the Common-wealth have by the help of better Prayers vanquiſh'd and brought to nothing.

He bewails his want of the Militia, not ſo much in reference to his own protection as the peoples, whoſe many and ſore oppreſſions greeve him. Never conſidering how ill for ſeventeen years together he had protected them, and that theſe miſeries of the people are ſtill his own handy work, having ſmitt'n them like a forked Arrow ſo ſore into the Kingdom's ſides, as not to be drawn out and cur'd without the inciſion of more fleſh.

He tells us that what he wants in the hands of Power he has in the wings of Faith and Prayer. But they who made no reckning of thoſe Wings while they had that power in thir hands, may eaſily miſtake the Wings of Faith for the Wings of Preſumption, and ſo fall headlong.

We meet next with a compariſon, how apt let them judg that have travell'd to Mecca That the Parlament have hung the Majeſtie of Kingſhip in an airy imagination of Regality, between the Privileges of both Houſes, like the Tomb of Mahomet. He knew not that he was prophecying the death and burial of a Turkiſh Tyranny, that ſpurn'd down thoſe Laws which gave it life and being, ſo long as it endur'd to be a regulated Monarchy.

He counts it an injury not to have the ſole power in himſelf to help or hurt any; and that the Militia which he holds to be his undoubted Right, ſhould be diſpos'd as the Parlament thinks fit: And yet confeſſes that if he had it in his actual diſpoſing, he would defend thoſe whom he calls his good Subjects from thoſe mens violence and fraud, who would perſwade the World that none but Wolves are fit to be truſted with the cuſtody of the Shepherd and his Flock. Surely if we may gueſs whom he means here, by knowing whom he hath ever moſt oppos'd in this Controverſie, we may then aſſure our ſelvs that by violence and fraud he means that which the Parlament hath done in ſetling the Militia, and thoſe the Wolves, into whoſe hands it was by them intruſted: which draws a clear confeſſion from his own mouth, that if the Parlament had left him ſole power of the Militia, he would have us'd it to the deſtruction of them and thir Friends.

As for ſole power of the Militia which he claims as a Right no leſs undoubted then the Crown, it hath bin oft anough told him, that he hath no more autority over the Sword then over the Law; over the Law he hath none, either to eſtabliſh or to abrogate, to interpret, or to execute, but only by his Courts and in his Courts, whereof the Parlament is higheſt: no more therefore hath he power of the Militia which is the Sword, either to uſe or to diſpoſe, but with conſent of Parlament; give him but that, and as good give him all our Laws and Liberties. For if the power of the Sword were any where ſeparate and undepending from the power of Law, which is originally ſeated in the higheſt Court, then were that power of the Sword higher then the power of Law, and being at one man's diſpoſal, might when he pleas'd controul the Law, and enſlave us. Such power as this did the King in op'n terms challenge to have over us, and brought thouſands to help him win it; ſo much more good at fighting then at underſtanding, as to perſwade themſelves that they fought then for the Subjects Liberties.

He is contented, becauſe he knows no other remedy, to reſign this power for his own time, but not for his ſucceſſors: So diligent and careful he is that we ſhould be ſlaves, if not to him, yet to his Poſterity, and fain would leave us the Legacy of another War about it. But the Parlament have done well to remove that queſtion: whom, as his manner is to dignify with ſome good name or other, he calls now a many-headed Hydra of Government, full of factious diſtractions, and not more eyes then mouths. Yet ſurely not more mouths, or not ſo wide as the diſſolute rabble of all his Courtiers had, both Hees and Shees, if ther were any Males among them.

He would prove that to govern by Parlament hath a Monſtroſitie rather then Perfection; and grounds his Argument upon two or three eminent Abſurdities: Firſt by placing Councel in the Senſes, next by turning the Senſes out of the head, and in lieu therof placing Power ſupreme above ſenſe and reaſon; which be now the greater Monſtroſities? Furder to diſpute what kind of Government is beſt, would be a long Theme; it ſufficeth that his reaſons here for Monarchy are found weak and inconſiderable.

He bodes much horror and bad influence after his ecclips. He ſpeaks his wiſhes; but they who by weighing prudently things paſt, foreſee things to come, the beſt Divination, may hope rather all good ſucceſs and happineſs, by removing that darkneſs which the miſtie cloud of his Prerogative made between us and a peaceful Reformation, which is our true Sun-light, and not he, though he would be tak'n for our Sun it ſelf. And wherefore ſhould we not hope to be govern'd more happily without a King, when as all our miſerie and trouble hath bin either by a King, or by our neceſſary vindication and defence againſt him.

He would be thought inforc'd to Perjurie by having granted the Militia, by which his Oath bound him to protect the people. If he can be perjur'd in granting that, why doth he refuſe for no other cauſe the aboliſhing of Epiſcopacy?

But never was any Oath ſo blind as to ſwear him to protect Delinquents againſt Juſtice, but to protect all the people in that order, and by thoſe hands which the Parlament ſhould adviſe him to, and the protected confide in; and not under the ſhew of protection to hold a violent and incommunicable Sword over us as readie to be let fall upon our own necks, as upon our Enemies; nor to make our own Hands and Weapons fight againſt our own Liberties.

By his parting with the Militia he takes to himſelf much praiſe of his aſſurance in God's protection; and to the Parlament imputes the fear of not daring to adventure the injuſtice of their actions upon any other way of ſafety. But wherfore came not this aſſurance of God's protection to him, till the Militia was wrung out of his hand? it ſhould ſeem by his holding it ſo faſt, that his own Actions and Intentions had no leſs of injuſtice in them, then what he charges upon others, whom he terms Chaldeans, Sabeans, and the Devil himſelf. But Job us'd no ſuch Militia againſt thoſe Enemies, nor ſuch a Magazin as was at Hull, which this King ſo contended for, and made War upon us, that he might have wherwithal to make War againſt us.

He concludes, that although they take all from him, yet can they not obſtruct his way to Heav'n. It was no handſome occaſion, by faining obſtructions where they are not, to tell us whither he was going: he ſhould have ſhut the door, and pray'd in ſecret, not here in the High Street. Private Prayers in publick, ask ſomething of whom they ask not, and that ſhall be thir reward.

XI. Upon the Nineteen Propoſitions, &c.

OF the nineteen Propoſitions he names none in particular, neither ſhall the Anſwer: But he inſiſts upon the old Plea of his Conſcience, Honour and Reaſon; uſing the plauſibility of large and indefinite words, to defend himſelf at ſuch a diſtance as may hinder the eye of common Judgment from all diſtinct view and examination of his reaſoning. He would buy the peace of his People at any rate, ſave only the parting with his Conſcience and Honour. Yet ſhews not how it can happ'n that the Peace of a People, if otherwiſe to be bought at any rate, ſhould be inconſiſtent or at variance with the Conſcience and Honour of a King. Till then we may receave it for a better ſentence, that nothing ſhould be more agreeable to the Conſcience and Honour of a King, then to preſerve his Subjects in peace, eſpecially from Civil War.

And which of the Propoſitions were obtruded on him with the point of the Sword, till he firſt with the point of the Sword thruſt from him both the Propoſitions and the Propounders? He never reck'ns thoſe violent and mercileſs Obtruſions, which for almoſt twenty years he had bin forcing upon tender Conſciences by all ſorts of Perſecution, till through the multitude of them that were to ſuffer, it could be no more call'd a Perſecution, but a plain War. From which when firſt the Scots, then the Engliſh were conſtrain'd to defend themſelves, this thir juſt defence is that which he calls here, Thir making War upon his Soul.

He grudges that ſo many things are requir'd of him, and nothing offer'd him in requital of thoſe favours which he had granted. What could ſatiate the deſires of this Man, who being King of England, and Maſter of almoſt two Millions yearly, was ſtill in want; and thoſe acts of Juſtice which he was to do in duty, counts done as favours, and ſuch favours as were not done without the avaritious hope of other rewards beſides ſupreme Honour, and the conſtant Revenue of his place?

This Honour, he ſaith, they did him to put him on the giving part. And ſpake truer then he intended, it being meerly for honours ſake that they did ſo; not that it belong'd to him of right: For what can he give to a Parlament, who receaves all he hath from the People, and for the Peoples good? Yet now he brings his own conditional Rights to conteſt, and be preferr'd before the Peoples good; and yet unleſs it be in order to thir good, he hath no rights at all; raigning by the Laws of the Land, not by his own; which Laws are in the hands of Parlament to change or abrogate as they ſhall ſee beſt for the Common-wealth; ev'n to the taking away of Kingſhip it ſelf, when it grows too maſterful and burd'nſome. For every Common-wealth is in general defin'd, a Societie ſufficient of it ſelf in all things conducible to well being and commodious life. Any of which requiſit things, if it cannot have without the gift or favour of a ſingle Perſon, or without leave of his private reaſon or his conſcience, it cannot be thought ſufficient of it ſelf, and by conſequence no Commonwealth, nor free; but a multitude of Vaſſals in the poſſeſſion and domain of one abſolute Lord, and wholly obnoxious to his will. If the King have power to give or deny any thing to his Parlament, he muſt do it either as a Perſon ſeveral from them, or as one greater; neither of which will be allow'd him: not to be conſider'd ſeverally from them; for as the King of England can do no wrong, ſo neither can he do right but in his Courts and by his Courts; and what is legally done in them, ſhall be deem'd the King's Aſſent, though he as a ſeveral Perſon ſhall judg or endeavour the contrary; ſo that indeed without his Courts, or againſt them, he is no King. If therfore he obtrude upon us any publick miſchief, or withhold from us any general good, which is wrong in the higheſt degree, he muſt do it as a Tyrant, not as a King of England, by the known Maxims of our Law. Neither can he, as one greater, give aught to the Parlament which is not in thir own power, but he muſt be greater alſo then the Kingdom which they repreſent: ſo that to honour him with the giving part was a meer civility, and may be well term'd the Courteſie of England, not the King's due.

But the incommunicable Jewel of his Conſcience he will not give, but reſerve to himſelf. It ſeems that his Conſcience was none of the Crown-Jewels; for thoſe we know were in Holland, not incommunicable to buy Arms againſt Subjects. Being therefore but a private Jewel, he could not have done a greater pleaſure to the Kingdom then by reſerving it to himſelf. But he, contrary to what is here profeſs'd, would have his Conſcience not an incommunicable, but a univerſal Conſcience, the whole Kingdom's Conſcience. Thus what he ſeems to fear leſt we ſhould raviſh from him is our chief complaint that he obtruded upon us; we never forc'd him to part with his Conſcience, but it was he that would have forc'd us to part with ours.

Some things he taxes them to have offer'd him, which while he had the maſtery of his Reaſon, he would never conſent to. Very likely; but had his reaſon maſter'd him as it ought, and not bin maſter'd long ago by his ſenſe and humour (as the breeding of moſt Kings hath bin ever ſenſual and moſt humour'd) perhaps he would have made no difficulty. Mean while at what a fine paſs is the Kingdom, that muſt depend in greateſt Exigencies upon the fantaſie of a King's Reaſon, be he wiſe or fool, who arrogantly ſhall anſwer all the Wiſdom of the Land, that what they offer ſeems to him unreaſonable?

He prefers his love of Truth before his love of the People. His love of Truth would have led him to the ſearch of Truth, and have taught him not to lean ſo much upon his own underſtanding. He met at firſt with Doctrines of unaccountable Prerogative; in them he reſted, becauſe they pleas'd him; they therfore pleas'd him becauſe they gave him all: and this he calls his love of Truth, and prefers it before love of his peoples peace.

Some things they propos'd which would have wounded the inward peace of his Conſcience. The more our evil hap, that three Kingdoms ſhould be thus peſter'd with one Conſcience; who chiefly ſcrupl'd to grant us that which the Parlament advis'd him to, as the chief means of our publick welfare and Reformation. Theſe ſcruples to many perhaps ſeem pretended, to others, upon as good grounds, may ſeem real; and that it was the juſt judgment of God, that he who was ſo cruel and ſo remorceleſs to other mens Conſciences, ſhould have a Conſcience within him as cruel to himſelf; conſtraining him, as he conſtrain'd others, and inſnaring him ſuch ways and counſels as were certain to be his deſtruction.

Other things though he could approve, yet in honour and policy he thought fit to deny, leſt he ſhould ſeem to dare deny nothing. By this means he will be ſure, what with Reaſon, Conſcience, Honour, Policy, or Puntilios, to be found never unfurniſht of a denial: Whether it were his envy not to be overbounteous, or that the ſubmiſſneſs of our asking ſtirr'd up in him a certain pleaſure of denying. Good Princes have thought it thir chief happineſs to be always granting; if good things, for the things ſake; if things indifferent for the peoples, ſake, while this man ſits calculating varietie of excuſes how he may grant leaſt, as if his whole ſtrength and royaltie were plac'd in a meer negative.

Of one Propoſition eſpecially he laments him much, that they would bind him to a general and implicit conſent for whatever they deſir'd. Which though I find not among the nineteen, yet undoubtedly the Oath of his Coronation binds him to no leſs; neither is he at all by his Office to interpoſe againſt a Parlament in the making or not making of any Law; but to take that for juſt and good legally which is there decreed, and to ſee it executed accordingly. Nor was he ſet over us to vie wiſdom with his Parlament, but to be guided by them: any of whom poſſibly may as far excel him in the gift of wiſdom, as he them in place and dignitie. But much neerer is it to impoſſibilitie that any King alone ſhould be wiſer then all his Councel; ſure anough it was not he, though no King ever before him ſo much contended to have it thought ſo. And if the Parlament ſo thought not, but deſir'd him to follow their advice and deliberation in things of public concernment, he accounts it the ſame propoſition, as if Sampſon had bin mov'd to the putting out his eyes, that the Philiſtins might abuſe him. And thus out of an unwiſe or pretended fear leſt others ſhould make a ſcorn of him for yielding to his Parlament, he regards not to give cauſe of worſe ſuſpition that he made a ſcorn of his regal Oath.

But to exclude him from all power of denial ſeems an arrogance; in the Parlament he means: what in him then to deny againſt the Parlament? None at all by what he argues: For, by petitioning, they confeſs their inferioritie, and that obliges them to reſt, if not ſatisfi'd, yet quieted with ſuch an Anſwer as the will and reaſon of their Superior thinks fit to give. Firſt petitioning, in better Engliſh, is no more then requeſting or requiring; and men require not favours only, but their due, and that not only from Superiors, but from Equals, and Inferiors alſo. The nobleſt Romans, when they ſtood for that which was a kind of regal honour, the Conſulſhip, were wont in a ſubmiſſive manner to go about, and beg that higheſt dignity of the meaneſt Plebeians, naming them man by man; which in their tongue was call'd Petitio conſulatus. And the Parlament of England petition'd the King, not becauſe all of them were inferior to him, but becauſe he was ſuperior to any one of them, which they did of civil cuſtom, and for faſhions ſake more then of duty; for by plain Law cited before the Parlament is his Superior.

But what Law in any trial or diſpute enjoyns a Free-man to reſt quieted, though not ſatisfied with the will and reaſon of his ſuperior? It were a mad Law that would ſubject reaſon to ſuperioritie of place. And if our higheſt conſultations and purpos'd Laws muſt be terminated by the Kings will, then is the will of one man our Law, and no ſuttletie of diſpute can redeem the Parlament and Nation from being Slaves: neither can any Tyrant require more then that his will or reaſon, though not ſatisfying, ſhould yet be reſted in, and determin all things. We may conclude therefore that when the Parlament petition'd the King, it was but meerly form, let it be as fooliſh and abſurd as he pleaſes. It cannot certainly be ſo abſurd as what he requires, that the Parlament ſhould confine thir own and all the Kingdoms reaſon to the will of one man, becauſe it was his hap to ſucceed his Father. For neither God nor the Laws have ſubjected us to his will, nor ſet his reaſon to be our Sovran above Law (which muſt needs be, if he can ſtrangle it in the birth) but ſet his perſon over us in the ſovran execution of ſuch Laws as the Parlament eſtabliſh. The Parlament therefore without any uſurpation hath had it alwaies in thir power to limit and confine the exorbitancie of Kings, whether they call it thir will, thir reaſon, or thir conſcience.

But this above all was never expected, nor is to be endur'd, that a King, who is bound by Law and Oath to follow the advice of his Parlament, ſhould be permitted to except againſt them as young Stateſmen, and proudly to ſuſpend his following thir advice, until his ſeven years experience had ſhewn him how well they could govern themſelves. Doubtleſs the Law never ſuppos'd ſo great an arrogance could be in one man; that he whoſe ſeventeen years unexperience had almoſt ruin'd all, ſhould ſit another ſeven years Schoolmaſter, to tutor thoſe who were ſent by the whole Realm to be his Counſelors and Teachers. And with what modeſty can he pretend to be a Stateſman himſelf, who with his Fathers Kingcraft and his own did never that of his own accord which was not directly oppoſit to his profeſſed Intereſt both at home and abroad; diſcontenting and alienating his Subjects at home, weakning and deſerting his Confederats abroad, and with them the common cauſe of Religion? So that the whole courſe of his raign, by an example of his own furniſhing, hath reſembled Phaeton more than Phebus, and forc'd the Parlament to drive like Jehu; which Omen tak'n from his own mouth God hath not diverted.

And he on the other ſide might have remembred that the Parlament ſit in that body, not as his Subjects, but as his Superiors, call'd, not by him, but by the Law; not only twice every year, but as oft as great affairs require, to be his Counſellors and Dictators, tho he ſtomac it; nor to be diſſolv'd at his pleaſure, but when all greevances be firſt remov'd, all Petitions heard and anſwer'd. This is not only Reaſon, but the known Law of the Land.

When he heard that Propoſitions would be ſent him, he ſate conjecturing what they would propound; and becauſe they propounded what he expected not, he takes that to be a warrant for his denying them. But what did he expect? he expected that the Parlament would reinforce ſome old Laws. But if thoſe Laws were not a ſufficient remedy to all greevances, nay were found to be greevances themſelves, when did we loſe that other part of our freedom to eſtabliſh new? He thought ſome injuries don by himſelf and others to the Commonwealth were to be repair'd. But how could that be, while he the chief offender took upon him to be ſole Judg both of the injury and the reparation? He ſtaid till the advantage of his Crown conſider'd might induce him to condeſcend to the Peoples good. Whenas the Crown it ſelf with all thoſe advantages were therfore giv'n him, that the peoples good ſhould be firſt conſider'd; not bargain'd for, and bought by inches with the bribe of more offertures and advantages to his Crown. He look'd for moderate deſires of due Reformation; as if any ſuch deſires could be immoderate. He look'd for ſuch a Reformation both in Church and State, as might preſerve the roots of every greevance and abuſe in both ſtill growing (which he calls the foundation and eſſentials) and would have only the excreſcencies of Evil prun'd away for the preſent, as was plotted before, that they might grow faſt anough between Triennial Parlaments to hinder them by work anough beſides from ever ſtriking at the root. He alleges, They ſhould have had regard to the Laws in force, to the wiſdom and pietie of former Parlaments, to the ancient and univerſal practiſe of Chriſtian Churches. As if they who come with full autority to redreſs public greevances, which oftimes are Laws themſelves, were to have thir hands bound by Laws in force, or the ſuppoſition of more pietie and wiſdom in thir Anceſtors, or the practice of Churches heretofore, whoſe Fathers, notwithſtanding all theſe pretences, made as vaſt alterations to free themſelves from antient Popery. For all antiquity that adds or varies from the Scripture is no more warranted to our ſafe imitation, then what was don the Age before at Trent. Nor was there need to have deſpair'd of what could be eſtabliſh'd in lieu of what was to be annull'd, having before his eyes the Government of ſo many Churches beyond the Seas; whoſe pregnant and ſolid reaſons wrought ſo with the Parlament, as to deſire a uniformity rather with all other Proteſtants, then to be a Schiſm divided from them under a conclave of thirty Biſhops, and a crew of irreligious Prieſts that gap'd for the ſame preferment.

And whereas he blames thoſe Propoſitions for not containing what they ought, what did they mention, but to vindicate and reſtore the Rights of Parlament invaded by Cabin Councils, the Courts of Juſtice obſtructed, and the Government of Church innovated and corrupted? All theſe things he might eaſily have obſerv'd in them, which he affirms he could not find: but found thoſe demanding in Parlament who were lookt upon before as factious in the State, and ſciſmatical in the Church; and demanding not only Tolerations for themſelves in thir vanity, novelty, and confuſion, but alſo an extirpation of that Government whoſe Rights they had a mind to invade. Was this man ever likely to be adviſ'd, who with ſuch a prejudice and diſeſteem ſets himſelf againſt his choſ'n and appointed Counſelers; likely ever to admit of Reformation, who cenſures all the Government of other Proteſtant Churches as bad as any Papiſt could have cenſur'd them? And what King had ever his whole Kingdom in ſuch contempt, ſo to wrong and diſhonour the free elections of his people, as to judg them whom the Nation thought worthieſt to ſit with him in Parlament, few els but ſuch as were puniſhable by the Laws: yet knowing that time was, when to be a Proteſtant, to be a Chriſtian was by Law as puniſhable as to be a Traitor, and that our Saviour himſelf coming to reform his Church, was accus'd of an intent to invade Ceſars right, as good a right as the prelat Biſhops ever had; the one being got by force, the other by ſpiritual uſurpation, and both by force upheld.

He admires and falls into an extaſie that the Parlament ſhould ſend him ſuch a horrid Propoſition, as the removal of Epiſcopacy. But expect from him in an extaſie no other reaſons of his admiration then the dream and tautology of what he hath ſo oft repeated, Law, Antiquitie, Anceſtors, Proſperity, and the like, which will be therfore not worth a ſecond anſwer, but may paſs with his own compariſon, into the common ſewer of other Popiſh arguments.

Had the two Houſes ſu'd out their Liverie from the wardſhip of Tumults, he could ſooner have believ'd them. It concern'd them firſt to ſue out thir Liverie from the unjuſt Wardſhip of his encroaching Prerogative. And had he alſo redeem'd his overdated minority from a Pupilage under Biſhops, he would much leſs have miſtruſted his Parlament; and never would have ſet ſo baſe a character upon them, as to count them no better then the Vaſſals of certain nameleſs men, whom he charges to be ſuch as hunt after Faction with their Hounds the Tumults. And yet the Biſhops could have told him, that Nimrod, the firſt that hunted after faction, is reputed by antient Tradition the firſt that founded Monarchy; whence it appears that to hunt after Faction is more properly the Kings Game, and thoſe Hounds, which he calls the Vulgar, have bin oft'n hollow'd to from Court, of whom the mungrel ſort have bin entic'd; the reſt have not loſt their ſcent, but underſtood aright that the Parlament had that part to act which he had fail'd in; that truſt to diſcharge, which he had brok'n; that eſtate and honour to preſerve, which was far beyond his, the eſtate and honour of the Commonwealth, which he had imbezl'd.

Yet ſo far doth ſelf-opinion or fals principles delude and tranſport him, as to think the concurrence of his reaſon to the Votes of Parlament, not only political, but natural, and as neceſſary to the begetting, or bringing forth of any one compleat act of public wiſdom as the Suns influence is neceſſary to all natures productions. So that the Parlament, it ſeems, is but a Female, and without his procreative Reaſon can produce no Law: Wiſdom, it ſeems, to a King is natural, to a Parlament not natural, but by conjunction with the King: yet he profeſſes to hold his Kingly right by Law; and if no Law could be made but by the great Councel of a Nation, which we now term a Parlament, then certainly it was a Parlament that firſt created Kings; and not only made Laws before a King was in being, but thoſe Laws eſpecially whereby he holds his Crown. He ought then to have ſo thought of a Parlament, if he count it not Male, as of his Mother, which to civil being created both him and the Royaltie he wore. And if it hath bin antiently interpreted the preſaging ſign of a future Tyrant, but to dream of copulation with his Mother, what can it be leſs then actual Tyranny to affirm waking, that the Parlament, which is his Mother, can neither conceive or bring forth any autoritative Act without his maſculine coition? Nay that his Reaſon is as celeſtial and life-giving to the Parlament, as the Sun's influence is to the Earth: What other notions but theſe, or ſuch like, could ſwell up Caligula to think himſelf a God?

But to be rid of theſe mortifying Propoſitions, he leaves tyrannical evaſion unaſſaid; firſt that they are not the joint and free deſires of both Houſes, or the major part; next, that the chois of many Members was carried on by Faction. The former of theſe is already diſcover'd to be an old device put firſt in practice by Charles the fifth, ſince Reformation: Who when the Proteſtants of Germany for thir own defence join'd themſelves in League, in his Declarations and Remonſtrances laid the fault only upon ſome few (for it was dangerous to take notice of too many Enemies) and accuſed them that under colour of Religion they had a purpoſe to invade his and the Churches right; by which policy he deceav'd many of the German Cities, and kept them divided from that League, until they ſaw themſelves brought into a ſnare. That other Cavil againſt the peoples chois puts us in mind rather what the Court was wont to do, and how to tamper with Elections: neither was there at that time any Faction more potent, or more likely to do ſuch a buſineſs then they themſelves who complain moſt.

But he muſt chew ſuch Morſels, as Propoſitions, e're he let them down. So let him; but if the Kingdom ſhall taſte nothing but after his chewing, what does he make of the Kingdom but a great Baby? The ſtraitneſs of his Conſcience will not give him leave to ſwallow down ſuch Camels of ſacrilege and injuſtice as others do. This is the Phariſee up and down, I am not as other men are. But what Camels of injuſtice he could devour, all his three Realms were witneſs, which was the cauſe that they almoſt periſh'd for want of Parlaments. And he that will be unjuſt to man, will be ſacrilegious to God; and to bereave a Chriſtian Conſcience of libertie for no other reaſon then the narrowneſs of his own Conſcience, is the moſt unjuſt meaſure to man, and the worſt ſacrilege to God. That other, which he calls Sacrilege, of taking from the Clergy that ſuperfluous Wealth, which antiquitie as old as Conſtantine, from the credit of a divine Viſion, counted poyſon in the Church, hath bin ever moſt oppoſ'd by men whoſe righteouſneſs in other matters hath bin leaſt obſerv'd. He concludes, as his manner is, with high commendation of his own unbiaſ'd rectitude, and believs nothing to be in them that diſſent from him, but Faction, Innovation, and particular Deſigns. Of theſe Repetitions I find no end, no not in his Prayer; which being founded upon deceitful Principl's, and a fond hope that God will bleſs him in thoſe his Errors, which he calls honeſt, finds a fit anſwer of St. James, Ye ask and receave not, becauſe ye ask amiſs. As for the truth and ſinceritie which he praies may be always found in thoſe his Declarations to the people, the contrariety of his own actions will bear eternal witneſs, how little careful or ſolicitous he was, what he promiſ'd or what he utter'd there.

XII. Upon the Rebellion in Ireland.

THE Rebellion and horrid Maſſacre of Engliſh Proteſtants in Ireland, to the number of 154000 by their own computation, although ſo ſudden and ſo violent, as at firſt to amaze all men that were not acceſſory; yet from whom, and from what counſels it firſt ſprung, neither was, nor could be poſſibly ſo ſecret, as the Contrivers therof, blinded with vain hope, or the deſpair that other Plots would ſucceed, ſuppoſ'd: For it cannot be imaginable that the Iriſh, guided by ſo many ſuttle and Italian heads of the Romiſh Party, ſhould ſo far have loſt the uſe of reaſon, and indeed of common ſenſe, as not ſupported with other ſtrength then thir own, to begin a War ſo deſperate and irreconcilable againſt both England and Scotland at once. All other Nations, from whom they could expect aid, were buſied to the utmoſt of thir own moſt neceſſary Concernments. It remains then that either ſome autoritie, or ſome great aſſiſtance promiſ'd them from England, was that wheron they chiefly truſted. And as it is not difficult to diſcern from what inducing Cauſe this Inſurrection firſt aroſe, ſo neither was it hard at firſt to have apply'd ſome effectual Remedy, though not prevention. But the aſſurance which they had in private, that no remedy ſhould be apply'd, was, it ſeems, one of the chief reaſons that drew on thir undertaking.

Seeing then the main incitement and autority for this Rebellion muſt be needs deriv'd from England, it will be next inquir'd who was the prime Author. The King here denounces a Malediction temporal and eternal, not ſimply to the Author, but to the malitious Author of this bloodſhed; and by that limitation may exempt, not himſelf only, but perhaps the Iriſh Rebels themſelves, who never will confeſs to God or Man that any blood was ſhed by them malitiouſly; but either in the Catholick Cauſe, or common Liberty, or ſome other ſpecious Plea, which the Conſcience from grounds both good and evil uſually ſuggeſts to it ſelf, thereby thinking to elude the direct force of that imputation which lies upon them.

Yet he acknowledges it fell out as a moſt unhappy advantage of ſome mens malice againſt him: but indeed of moſt mens juſt ſuſpicion, by finding in it no ſuch wide departure or diſagreement from the ſcope of his former Counſels and Proceedings. And that he himſelf was the Author of that Rebellion, he denies both here and elſewhere, with many Imprecations, but no ſolid evidence: What on the other ſide againſt his denial hath bin affirm'd in three Kingdoms, being here briefly ſet in view, the Reader may ſo judg as he finds cauſe.

This is moſt certain, that the King was ever friendly to the Iriſh Papiſts, and in his third year, againſt the plain advice of Parlament, like a kind of Pope, ſold them many Indulgencies for mony; and upon all occaſions advancing the Popiſh Party, and negotiating under-hand by Prieſts, who were made his Agents, ingag'd the Iriſh Papiſts in a War againſt the Scotch Proteſtants. To that end he furniſh'd them, and had them train'd in Arms, and kept them up the only Army in his three Kingdoms, till the very burſt of that Rebellion. The Summer before that diſmal October, a Committy of moſt active Papiſts, all ſince in the head of that Rebellion, were in great favour at White-Hall; and admitted to many private Conſultations with the King and Queen. And to make it evident that no mean matters were the ſubject of thoſe Conferences, at their requeſt he gave away his peculiar right to more then five Iriſh Counties, for the payment of an inconſiderable Rent. They departed not home till within two months before the Rebellion; and were either from the firſt breaking out, or ſoon after, found to be the chief Rebels themſelves. But what ſhould move the King, beſides his own inclination to Popery, and the prevalence of his Queen over him, to hold ſuch frequent and cloſe meetings with a Committy of Iriſh Papiſts in his own Houſe, while the Parlament of England ſate unadvis'd with, is declar'd by a Scotch Author, and of it ſelf is clear anough. The Parlament at the beginning of that Summer, having put Strafford to death, impriſon'd others his chief Favourites, and driv'n the reſt to fly; the King, who had in vain tempted both the Scotch and the Engliſh Army to come up againſt the Parlament and City, finding no compliance anſwerable to his hope from the Proteſtant Armies, betakes himſelf laſt to the Iriſh, who had in readineſs an Army of eight thouſand Papiſts, and a Committy here of the ſame Religion. And with them who thought the time now come to do eminent ſervice for the Church of Rome againſt a Puritan Parlament, he concludes that ſo ſoon as both Armies in England ſhould be disbanded, the Iriſh ſhould appear in Arms, maſter all the Proteſtants, and help the King againſt his Parlament. And we need not doubt that thoſe five Counties were giv'n to the Iriſh for other reaſon then the four Northern Counties had bin a little before offer'd to the Scots. The King in Auguſt takes a journey into Scotland; and overtaking the Scotch Army then on thir way home, attempts the ſecond time to pervert them, but without ſucceſs. No ſooner come into Scotland, but he laies a Plot, ſo ſaith the Scotch Author, to remove out of the way ſuch of the Nobility there, as were moſt likely to withſtand, or not to furder his deſigns. This being diſcover'd, he ſends from his ſide one Dillon a Papiſt Lord, ſoon after a chief Rebel, with Letters into Ireland; and diſpatches a Commiſſion under the Great Seal of Scotland at that time in his own cuſtody, commanding that they ſhould forthwith, as had bin formerly agreed, cauſe all the Iriſh to riſe in Arms. Who no ſooner had receiv'd ſuch command, but obey'd; and began in Maſſacre, for they knew no other way to make ſure the Proteſtants, which was commanded them expreſly; and the way, it ſeems, left to thir diſcretion. He who hath a mind to read the Commiſſion it ſelf, and ſound reaſon added why it was not likely to be forg'd, beſides the atteſtation of ſo many Iriſh themſelves, may have recourſe to a Book, Intitl'd, The Myſterie of Iniquity.

After the Rebellion brok'n out, which in words only he deteſted, but under-hand favour'd and promoted by all the offices of friendſhip, correſpondence, and what poſſible aid he could afford them, the particulars whereof are too many to be inſerted here, I ſuppoſe no underſtanding man could longer doubt who was Author or Inſtigator of that Rebellion. If there be who yet doubt, I refer them eſpecially to that Declaration of July 1643. concerning this matter. Againſt which Teſtimonies, Likelyhoods, Evidences, and apparent Actions of his own, being ſo abundant, the bare denyal of one man, though with imprecation, cannot in any reaſon countervail.

As for the Commiſſion granted them, he thinks to evade that by retorting, that ſome in England fight againſt him, and yet pretend his autority. But though a Parlament by the known Laws may affirm juſtly to have the King's Autority inſeparable from that Court, though divided from his Perſon, it is not credible that the Iriſh Rebels who ſo much tender'd his Perſon above his Autoritie, and were by him ſo well receav'd at Oxford, would be ſo far from all humanitie, as to ſlander him with a particular Commiſſion, ſign'd and ſent them by his own hand.

And of his good affection to the Rebels, this Chapter it ſelf is not without witneſs. He holds them leſs in fault then the Scots, as from whom they might alledg to have fetcht thir imitation; making no difference between men that roſe neceſſarily to defend themſelves, which no Proteſtant Doctrin ever diſallow'd, againſt them who threat'nd War, and thoſe who began a voluntary and cauſleſs Rebellion with the Maſſacre of ſo many thouſands who never meant them harm.

He falls next to flaſhes, and a multitude of words, in all which is contain'd no more, then what might be the Plea of any guiltieſt Offender: He was not the Author, becauſe he hath the greateſt ſhare of loſs and diſhonour by what is committed. Who is there that offends God, or his Neighbour, on whom the greateſt ſhare of loſs and diſhonour lights not in the end? But in the act of doing evil, men uſe not to conſider the event of thir evil doing; or if they do, have then no power to curb the ſway of thir own wickedneſs: ſo that the greateſt ſhare of loſs and diſhonour to happ'n upon themſelves, is no argument that they were not guilty. This other is as weak, that a King's Intereſt above that of any other man, lies chiefly in the common Welfare of his Subjects; therfore no King will do aught againſt the common welfare. For by this evaſion any Tyrant might as well purge himſelf from the guilt of raiſing Troubles or Commotions among the people, becauſe undoubtedly his chief Intereſt lies in thir ſitting ſtill.

I ſaid but now that ev'n this Chapter, if nothing els, might ſuffice to diſcover his good affection to the Rebels; which in this that follows too notoriouſly appears; imputing this Inſurrection to the prepoſterous Rigor, and unreaſonable Severitie, the covetous zeal and uncharitable Fury of ſome men (theſe ſome men by his continual paraphraſe are meant the Parlament;) and laſtly, to the fear of utter extirpation. If the whole Iriſhry of Rebels had fee'd ſome Advocate to ſpeak partially and ſophiſtically in thir defence, he could have hardly dazl'd better: Yet nevertheleſs would have prov'd himſelf no other then a plauſible Deceiver. And perhaps thoſe fained Terrors and Jealouſies were either by the King himſelf, or the Popiſh Prieſts which were ſent by him, put into the head of that inquiſitive People, on ſet purpoſe to engage them. For who had power to oppreſs them, or to relieve them being oppreſt, but the King or his immediat Deputy? This rather ſhould have made them riſe againſt the King then againſt the Parlament. Who threat'nd or ever thought of thir extirpation, till they themſelves had begun it to the Engliſh? As for prepoſterous Rigour, covetous Zeal, and uncharitable Fury; they had more reaſon to ſuſpect thoſe Evils firſt from his own commands, whom they ſaw uſing daily no greater argument to prove the truth of his Religion then by enduring no other but his own Prelatical; and to force it upon others, made Epiſcopal, Ceremonial, and Common-Prayer-Book Wars. But the Papiſts underſtood him better then by the outſide; and knew that thoſe Wars were thir Wars. Although if the Common-wealth ſhould be afraid to ſuppreſs op'n Idolatry, leſt the Papiſts thereupon ſhould grow deſperate, this were to let them grow and become our Perſecuters, while we neglected what we might have done Evangelically, to be thir Reformers: Or to do, as his Father James did, who inſtead of taking heart and putting confidence in God by ſuch a deliverance as from the Powder Plot, though it went not off, yet with the meer conceit of it, as ſome obſerve, was hit into ſuch a hectic trembling between Proteſtant and Papiſt all his life after, as that he never durſt from that time do otherwiſe then equivocate or collogue with the Pope and his adherents.

He would be thought to commiſerate the ſad effects of that Rebellion, and to lament that the tears and blood ſpilt there did not quench the ſparks of our civil diſcord here. But who began theſe diſſentions? and what can be more op'nly known then thoſe retardings and delaies which by himſelf were continually deviſ'd, to hinder and put back the relief of thoſe diſtreſſed Proteſtants, whom he ſeems here to compaſſionate? The particulars are too well known to be recited, and too many.

But he offer'd to go himſelf in perſon upon that expedition; and reck'ns up many ſurmiſes why he thinks they would not ſuffer him. But mentions not that by his underdealing to debauch Armies here at home; and by his ſecret Intercours with the chief Rebels, long e're that time every where known, he had brought the Parlament into ſo juſt a diffidence of him, as that they durſt not leave the publick Arms to his diſpoſal, much leſs an Army to his conduct.

He concludes, That next the ſin of thoſe who began that Rebellion, thirs muſt needs be who hinder'd the ſuppreſſing, or diverted the aids. But judgment raſhly giv'n ofttimes involves the Judg himſelf. He finds fault with thoſe who threat'nd all extremity to the Rebels, and pleads much that mercy ſhould be ſhown them. It ſeems he found himſelf not ſo much concern'd as thoſe who had loſt Fathers, Brothers, Wives and Children by thir crueltie; whom in juſtice to retaliate, is not as he ſuppoſes unevangelical, ſo long as Magiſtracy and War is not laid down under the Goſpel. If this his Sermon of affected mercy were not too Phariſaical, how could he permit himſelf to cauſe the ſlaughter of ſo many thouſands here in England for mere Prerogatives, the Toys and Gewgaws of his Crown, for Copes and Surplices, the Trinkets of his Prieſts, and not perceave his own zeal, while he taxes others to be moſt prepoſterous and unevangelical? Neither is there the ſame cauſe to deſtroy a whole City for the raviſhing of a Siſter, not done out of Villany, and recompence offer'd by Marriage; nor the ſame caſe for thoſe Diſciples to ſummon fire from Heav'n upon the whole City where they were deny'd lodging; and for a Nation by juſt War and execution to ſlay whole Families of them who ſo barbarouſly had ſlain whole Families before. Did not all Iſrael do as much againſt the Benjamits for one Rape committed by a few, and defended by the whole Tribe? and did they not the ſame to Jabeſh-Gilead for not aſſiſting them in that revenge? I ſpeak not this, that ſuch meaſure ſhould be meted rigorouſly to all the Iriſh, or as remembring that the Parlament ever ſo decreed, but to ſhew that this his Homily hath more of craft and affectation in it, then of ſound Doctrine.

But it was happy that his going into Ireland was not conſented to; for either he had certainly turn'd his intended Forces againſt the Parlament it ſelf, or not gon at all; or had he gon, what work he would have made there, his own following words declare.

He would have puniſht ſome, no queſtion; for ſome perhaps who were of leaſt uſe, muſt of neceſſity have bin ſacrific'd to his reputation, and the convenience of his affairs. Others he would have diſarm'd, that is to ſay in his own time; but all of them he would have protected from the fury of thoſe that would have drown'd them, if they had refus'd to ſwim down the popular ſtream. Theſe expreſſions are too oft'n met, and too well underſtood for any man to doubt his meaning. By the fury of thoſe, he means no other then the Juſtice of Parlament, to whom yet he had committed the whole buſineſs. Thoſe who would have refus'd to ſwim down the popular ſtream, our conſtant key tells us to be Papiſts, Prelates, and thir Faction: theſe by his own confeſſion here, he would have protected againſt his Puritan Parlament: And by this who ſees not that he and the Iriſh Rebels had but one aim, one and the ſame drift, and would have forthwith join'd in one body againſt us?

He goes on ſtill in his tenderneſs of the Iriſh Rebels, fearing leſt our zeal ſhould be more greedy to kill the Bear for his skin then for any harm he hath done. This either juſtifies the Rebels to have done no harm at all, or infers his opinion that the Parlament is more bloody and rapacious in the proſecution of thir Juſtice, then thoſe Rebels were in the execution of thir barbarous Crueltie. Let men doubt now and diſpute to whom the King was a Friend moſt, to his Engliſh Parlament, or to his Iriſh Rebels.

With whom, that we may yet ſee furder how much he was thir Friend, after that the Parlament had brought them every where either to Famin, or a low condition, he to give them all the reſpit and advantages they could deſire, without advice of Parlament, to whom he himſelf had committed the managing of that War, makes a Ceſſation; in pretence to relieve the Proteſtants, overborn there with numbers, but as the event prov'd, to ſupport the Papiſts, by diverting and drawing over the Engliſh Army there, to his own ſervice here againſt the Parlament. For that the Proteſtants were then on the winning hand, it muſt needs be plain; who notwithſtanding the miſs of thoſe Forces, which at thir landing here maſter'd without difficulty great part of Wales and Cheſhire, yet made a ſhift to keep their own in Ireland. But the plot of this Iriſh Truce is in good part diſcover'd in that Declaration of September 30th, 1643. And if the Proteſtants were but handfuls there, as he calls them, why did he ſtop and waylay both by Land and Sea, to his utmoſt power, thoſe Proviſions and Supplies which were ſent by the Parlament? How were ſo many handfuls call'd over, as for a while ſtood him in no ſmall ſtead, and againſt our main Forces here in England?

Since therefore all the reaſons that can be giv'n of this Ceſſation appear ſo fals and frivolous, it may be juſtly fear'd that the deſign it ſelf was moſt wicked and pernicious. What remains then? He appeals to God, and is caſt; lik'ning his puniſhments to Job's trials, before he ſaw them to have Job's ending. He cannot ſtand to make prolix Apologies. Then ſurely thoſe long Pamphlets ſet out for Declarations and Remonſtrances in his name, were none of his; and how they ſhould be his indeed, being ſo repugnant to the whole courſe of his Actions, augments the difficulty.

But he uſurps a common ſaying, That it is Kingly to do well and hear ill. That may be ſometimes true: but far more frequently to do ill and hear well; ſo great is the multitude of Flatterers, and them that deifie the name of King.

Yet not content with theſe neighbours, we have him ſtill a perpetual Preacher of his own vertues, and of that eſpecially, which who knows not to be Patience perforce?

He believes it will at laſt appear that they who firſt began to embroil his other Kingdoms, are alſo guilty of the blood of Ireland. And we beleeve ſo too; for now the Ceſſation is become a Peace by publiſh'd Articles, and Commiſſion to bring them over againſt England, firſt only ten thouſand by the Earl of Glamorgan, next all of them, if poſſible, under Ormond, which was the laſt of all his Tranſactions done as a publick Perſon. And no wonder; for he lookt upon the blood ſpilt, whether of Subjects or of Rebels, with an indifferent eye, as exhauſted out of his own veins; without diſtinguiſhing, as he ought, which was good blood and which corrupt; the not letting out wherof endangers the whole body.

And what the Doctrin is, ye may perceave alſo by the Prayer, which after a ſhort ejaculation for the poor Proteſtants, prays at large for the Iriſh Rebels, that God would not give them over, or thir Children, to the covetouſneſs, cruelty, fierce and curſed anger of the Parlament.

He finiſhes with a deliberat and ſolemn Curſe upon himſelf and his Father's Houſe. Which how far God hath alreadie brought to paſs, is to the end that men by ſo eminent an example ſhould learn to tremble at his judgments, and not play with Imprecations.

XIII. Upon the calling in of the Scots, and their coming.

IT muſt needs ſeem ſtrange to Men who accuſtom themſelves to ponder and contemplate things in thir firſt original and inſtitution, that Kings, who as all other Officers of the Publick, were at firſt choſ'n and inſtall'd only by conſent and ſuffrage of the People, to govern them as Freemen by Laws of thir own framing, and to be, in conſideration of that dignity and riches beſtow'd upon them, the entruſted Servants of the Common-wealth, ſhould notwithſtanding grow up to that diſhoneſt encroachment, as to eſteem themſelves Maſters both of that great Truſt which they ſerve, and of the People that betruſted them: counting what they ought to do, both in diſcharge of thir publick duty, and for the great reward of Honour and Revenue which they receave, as done all of meer grace and favour; as if thir power over us were by nature, and from themſelves, or that God had ſold us into thir hands. This ignorance or wilful miſtake of the whole matter, had tak'n ſo deep root in the imagination of this King, that whether to the Engliſh or to the Scot, mentioning what acts of his Regal Office, though God knows how unwillingly he had paſs'd, he calls them, as in other places, Acts of grace and bounty; ſo heer ſpecial obligations, favours, to gratifie active ſpirits, and the deſires of that party. Words not only ſounding Pride and Lordly Uſurpation, but Injuſtice, Partiality and Corruption. For to the Iriſh he ſo far condeſcended, as firſt to tolerat in privat, then to cov'nant op'nly the tolerating of Popery: So far to the Scots, as to remove Biſhops, eſtabliſh Presbytery, and the Militia in their own hands; preferring, as ſome thought, the deſires of Scotland before his own Intereſt and Honour. But being once on this ſide Tweed, his reaſon, his conſcience, and his honour became ſo ſtraitn'd with a kind of falſe Virginity, that to the Engliſh neither one nor other of the ſame demands could be granted, wherewith the Scots were gratifi'd; as if our air and climat on a ſudden had chang'd the property and the nature both of Conſcience, Honour, and Reaſon, or that he found none ſo fit as Engliſh to be the ſubjects of his arbitrary power. Ireland was as Ephraim, the ſtrength of his head, Scotland as Judah, was his Lawgiver; but over England, as over Edom, he meant to caſt his Shoo, and yet ſo many ſober Engliſh men not ſufficiently awake to conſider this, like men inchanted with the Circœan cup of ſervitude, will not be held back from running thir own heads into the Yoke of Bondage.

The ſum of his diſcours is againſt ſetling of Religion by violent means; which whether it were the Scots deſign upon England, they are beſt able to clear themſelves. But this of all may ſeem ſtrangeſt, that the King, who, while it was permitted him, never did thing more eagerly then to moleſt and perſecute the conſciences of moſt religious men; he who had made a War, and loſt all rather then not uphold a Hierarchie of perſecuting Biſhops, ſhould have the confidence heer to profeſs himſelf ſo much an Enemy of thoſe that force the conſcience. For was it not he, who upon the Engliſh obtruded new Ceremonies, upon the Scots a new Liturgie, and with his Sword went about to engrave a bloody Rubric on thir backs? Did he not forbid and hinder all effectual ſearch of Truth; nay, like a beſieging Enemy, ſtop all her paſſages both by word and writing? Yet heer can talk of fair and equal diſputations: Where notwithſtanding, if all ſubmit not to his judgment, as not being rationally convicted, they muſt ſubmit (and he conceals it not) to his penaltie, as counted obſtinate. But what if he himſelf and thoſe his learned Churchmen were the convicted or the obſtinat part long ago, ſhould Reformation ſuffer them to ſit lording over the Church in thir fat Biſhopricks and Pluralities, like the great Whore that ſitteth upon many Waters, till they would voutſafe to be diſputed out? Or ſhould we ſit diſputing, while they ſate plotting and perſecuting? Thoſe Clergimen were not to be driv'n into the fold like Sheep, as his Simily runs, but to be driv'n out of the Fold like Wolves or Theeves, where they ſate fleecing thoſe Flocks which they never fed.

He beleeves that Presbytery, though prov'd to be the only Inſtitution of Jeſus Chriſt, were not by the Sword to be ſet up without his conſent; which is contrary both to the Doctrin, and the known practice of all Proteſtant Churches, if his Sword threat'n thoſe who of thir own accord imbrace it.

And although Chriſt and his Apoſtles being to civil affairs but privat men, contended not with Magiſtrats, yet when Magiſtrats themſelves, and eſpecially Parlaments, who have greateſt right to diſpoſe of the civil Sword, com to know Religion, they ought in conſcience to defend all thoſe who receave it willingly againſt the violence of any King or Tyrant whatſoever. Neither is it therfore true, That Chriſtianity is planted or watred with Chriſtian Blood; for there is a large difference between forcing men by the Sword to turn Presbyterians, and defending thoſe who willingly are ſo from a furious inroad of bloody Biſhops arm'd with the Militia of a King thir Pupil. And if covetouſneſs and ambition be an argument that Presbytery hath not much of Chriſt, it argues more ſtrongly againſt Epiſcopacy; which from the time of her firſt mounting to an order above the Presbyters, had no other Parents then Covetouſneſs and Ambition. And thoſe Sects, Schiſms, and Hereſies, which he ſpeaks of, if they get but ſtrength and numbers, need no other pattern then Epiſcopacy and himſelf, to ſet up their ways by the like method of violence. Nor is there any thing that hath more marks of Schiſm and Sectariſm then Engliſh Epiſcopacy; whether we look at Apoſtolick times, or at reformed Churches; for the univerſal way of Church-government before, may as ſoon lead us into groſs error, as thir univerſally corrupted Doctrin. And Government, by reaſon of ambition, was liklieſt to be corrupted much the ſooner of the two. However nothing can be to us catholic or univerſal in Religion, but what the Scripture teaches; whatſoever without Scripture pleads to be univerſal in the Church, in being univerſal is but the more Sciſmatical. Much leſs can particular Laws and Conſtitutions impart to the Church of England any power of conſiſtory or tribunal above other Churches, to be the ſole Judg of what is Sect or Sciſm, as with much rigour, and without Scripture they took upon them. Yet theſe the King reſolves heer to defend and maintain to his laſt, pretending, after all thoſe conferences offer'd, or had with him, not to ſee more rational and religious motives then Souldiers carry in thir Knapſacks; with one thus reſolv'd it was but folly to ſtand diſputing.

He imagins his own judicious zeal to be moſt concern'd in his tuition of the Church. So thought Saul when he preſum'd to offer Sacrifice, for which he loſt his Kingdom; ſo thought Uzziah when he went into the Temple, but was thruſt out with a Leproſie for his opion'd zeal, which he thought judicious. It is not the part of a King, becauſe he ought to defend the Church, therfore to ſet himſelf ſupreme head over the Church, or to meddle with Ecclesial Government, or to defend the Church otherwiſe then the Church would be defended; for ſuch defence is bondage: nor to defend abuſes, and ſtop all Reformation under the name of New moulds fanci'd and faſhion'd to privat deſigns. The holy things of Church are in the power of other keys then were deliver'd to his keeping. Chriſtian libertie, purchas'd with the death of our Redeemer, and eſtabliſh'd by the ſending of his free Spirit to inhabit in us, is not now to depend upon the doubtful conſent of any earthly Monarch; nor to be again fetter'd with a preſumptuous negative voice, tyrannical to the Parlament, but much more tyrannical to the Church of God; which was compell'd to implore the aid of Parlament, to remove his force and heavy hands from off our conſciences, who therfore complains now of that moſt juſt defenſive force, becauſe only it remov'd his violence and perſecution. If this be a violation to his conſcience, that it was hindred by the Parlament from violating the more tender conſciences of ſo many thouſand good Chriſtians, let the uſurping conſcience of all Tyrants be ever ſo violated.

He wonders, Fox wonder, how we could ſo much diſtruſt God's aſſiſtance, as to call in the Proteſtant aid of our Brethren in Scotland: why then did he, if his truſt were in God and the juſtice of his Cauſe, not ſcruple to ſollicit and invite earneſtly the aſſiſtance both of Papiſts and of Iriſh Rebels? If the Scots were by us at length ſent home, they were not call'd in to ſtay heer always; neither was it for the peoples eaſe to feed ſo many Legions longer then thir help was needful.

The Government of thir Kirk we deſpis'd not, but thir impoſing of that Government upon us; not Presbytery but Arch-Presbytery, Claſſical, Provincial, and Dioceſan Presbytery, claiming to it ſelf a Lordly Power and Superintendency both over Flocks and Paſtors, over Perſons and Congregations no way thir own. But theſe debates in his judgment would have bin ended better by the beſt Divines in Chriſt'ndom in a full and free Synod. A moſt improbable way, and ſuch as never yet was us'd, at leaſt with good ſucceſs, by any Proteſtant Kingdom or State ſince the Reformation: Every true Church having wherewithal from Heaven, and the aſſiſting Spirit of Chriſt implor'd to be complete and perfect within it ſelf. And the whole Nation is not eaſily to be thought ſo raw, and ſo perpetually a novice after all this light, as to need the help and direction of other Nations, more then what they write in public of thir opinion, in a matter ſo familiar as Church-Government.

In fine, he accuſes Pietie with the want of Loyalty, and Religion with the breach of Allegeance, as if God and he were one Maſter, whoſe commands were ſo oft'n contrary to the commands of God. He would perſwade the Scots that thir chief Intereſt conſiſts in thir fidelity to the Crown. But true policy will teach them to find a ſafer intereſt in the common friendſhip of England, then in the ruins of one ejected Family.

XIV.

XIV. Upon the Cov'nant.

UPON this theme his diſcourſe is long, his matter little but repetition, and therfore ſoon anſwerd. Firſt after an abuſive and ſtrange apprehenſion of Cov'nants, as if Men pawn'd thir ſouls to them with whom they cov'nant, he digreſſes to plead for Biſhops; firſt from the antiquitie of thir poſſeſſion heer, ſince the firſt plantation of Chriſtianity in this Iland, next from a univerſal preſcription ſince the Apoſtles till this laſt Centurie. But what avails the moſt Primitive Antiquity againſt the plain ſenſe of Scripture? which if the laſt Centurie have beſt follow'd, it ought in our eſteem to be the firſt. And yet it hath bin oft'n prov'd by Learned Men from the Writings and Epiſtles of moſt antient Chriſtians, that Epiſcopacy crept not up into an order above the Presbyters, till many years after that the Apoſtles were deceas'd.

He next is unſatisfi'd with the Cov'nant, not only for ſome paſſages in it referring to himſelf, as he ſuppoſes, with very dubious and dangerous limitations, but for binding men by Oath and Cov'nant to the Reformation of Church-Diſcipline. Firſt thoſe limitations were not more dangerous to him then he to our Libertie and Religion; next, that which was there vow'd to caſt out of the Church an Antichriſtian Hierarchy which God had not planted, but ambition and corruption had brought in, and fosterd to the Churches great damage and oppreſſion, was no point of controverſie to be argu'd without end, but a thing of cleer moral neceſſity to be forthwith don. Neither was the Cov'nant ſuperfluous, though former engagements both religious and legal bound us before: But was the practice of all Churches heertofore intending Reformation. All Iſrael, though bound anough before by the Law of Moſes to all neceſſary duties; yet with Aſa thir King enter'd into a new Cov'nant at the beginning of a Reformation: And the Jews after Captivity, without conſent demanded of that King who was thir Maſter, took ſolemn Oath to walk in the Commandments of God. All Proteſtant Churches have don the like, notwithſtanding former engagements to thir ſeveral Duties. And although his aim were to ſow variance between the Proteſtation and the Cov'nant, to reconcile them is not difficult. The Proteſtation was but one ſtep, extending only to the Doctrin of the Church of England, as it was diſtinct from Church-Diſcipline; the Cov'nant went furder, as it pleas'd God to diſpenſe his light by degrees, and comprehended Church-Government: Former with latter ſteps in the progreſs of well-doing need not reconcilement. Nevertheleſs he breaks through to his concluſion, That all honeſt and wiſe men ever thought themſelves ſufficiently bound by former ties of Religion; leaving Aſa, Ezra, and the whole Church of God in ſundry Ages to ſhift for honeſtie and wiſdom from ſom other then his teſtimonie. And although after-contracts abſolve not till the former be made void, yet he firſt having don that, our duty returns back, which to him was neither moral nor eternal, but conditional.

Willing to perſwade himſelf that many good men took the Cov'nant, either unwarily or out of fear, he ſeems to have beſtow'd ſom thoughts how theſe good men following his advice may keep the Cov'nant and not keep it. The firſt evaſion is, preſuming that the chief end of cov'nanting in ſuch mens intentions was to preſerve Religion in purity, and the Kingdoms peace. But the Cov'nant will more truly inform them that purity of Religion and the Kingdoms peace was not then in ſtate to be preſerv'd, but to be reſtor'd; and therfore binds them not to a preſervation of what was, but to a Reformation of what was evil, what was traditional and dangerous, whether novelty or antiquity, in Church or State. To do this claſhes with no former Oath lawfully ſworn either to God or the King, and rightly underſtood.

In general he brands all ſuch confederations by League and Cov'nant, as the common rode us'd in all factions Perturbations of State and Church. This kind of language reflects with the ſame ignominy upon all the Proteſtant Reformations that have bin ſince Luther; and ſo indeed doth his whole Book, repleniſh'd throughout with hardly other words or arguments, then Papiſts, and eſpecially Popiſh Kings, have us'd heertofore againſt thir Proteſtant Subjects; whom he would perſwade to be every man his own Pope, and to abſolve himſelf of thoſe ties, by the ſuggeſtion of fals or equivocal interpretations too oft repeated to be now anſwer'd.

The Parlament, he ſaith, made thir Cov'nant like Manna, agreeable to every mans Palat. This is another of his gloſſes upon the Cov'nant; he is content to let it be Manna, but his drift is that men ſhould loath it, or at leaſt expound it by thir own reliſh, and latitude of ſenſe; wherein leſt any one of the ſimpler ſort ſhould fail to be his crafts-maſter, he furniſhes him with two or three laxative, he terms them general clauſes, which may ſerve ſomwhat to releeve them againſt the Covnant tak'n: intimating, as if what were lawful and according to the word of God, were no otherwiſe ſo, then as every man fanci'd to himſelf. From ſuch learned explications and reſolutions as theſe upon the Cov'nant, what marvel if no Royaliſt or Malignant refuſe to take it, as having learnt from theſe Princely inſtructions his many Salvo's, cautions, and reſervations, how to be a Covnanter and Anticovnanter, how at once to be a Scot, and an Iriſh Rebel.

He returns again to diſallow of that Reformation which the Cov'nant vows, as being the partial advice of a few Divines. But matters of this moment, as they were not to be decided there by thoſe Divines, ſo neither are they to be determin'd heer by Eſſays and curtal Aphoriſms, but by ſolid proofs of Scripture.

The reſt of his diſcourſe he ſpends, highly accuſing the Parlament, that the main Reformation by them intended, was to rob the Church, and much applauding himſelf both for his forwardneſs to all due Reformation, and his averſneſs from all ſuch kind of Sacrilege. All which, with his glorious title of the Churches Defender, we leave him to make good by Pharaoh's Divinity, if he pleaſe, for to Joſeph's Pietie it will be a task unſutable. As for the parity and poverty of Miniſters, which he takes to be of ſo ſad conſequence, the Scripture reck'ns them for two ſpecial Legacies left by our Saviour to his Diſciples; under which two Primitive Nurſes, for ſuch they were indeed, the Church of God more truly flouriſht then ever after, ſince the time that Imparitie and Church-revenue ruſhing in, corrupted and beleper'd all the Clergie with a worſe infection then Gehazi's; ſome one of whoſe Tribe, rather then a King, I ſhould take to be compiler of that unſalted and Simonical Praier annex'd: Although the Praier it ſelf ſtrongly prays againſt them. For never ſuch holy things as he means were giv'n to more Swine, nor the Churches bread more to Dogs, then when it fed ambitious, irreligious and dumb Prelats.

XV. Upon the many Jealouſies, &c.

TO wipe off jealouſies and ſcandals, the beſt way had bin by clear Actions, or till Actions could be clear'd, by evident reaſons; but meer words we are too well acquainted with. Had his honour and reputation bin dearer to him then the luſt of raigning, how could the Parlament of either Nation have laid ſo oft'n at his dore the breach of Words, Promiſes, Acts, Oaths, and Execrations, as they do avowedly in many of thir Petitions and Addreſſes to him? thither I remit the Reader. And who can believe that whole Parlaments, elected by the People from all parts of the Land, ſhould meet in one mind and reſolution not to adviſe him, but to conſpire againſt him in a wors powder plot then Cateſbies, to blow up, as he terms it, the peoples affection towards him, and batter down their Loyalty by the Engins of foul aſperſions: Waterworks rather then Engins to batter with, yet thoſe aſperſions were rais'd from the foulneſs of his own actions. Whereof to purge himſelf, he uſes no other argument then a general and ſo oft'n iterated commendation of himſelf; and thinks that Court holy-water hath the virtue of expiation, at leaſt with the ſilly people. To whom he familiarly imputes ſin where none is, to ſeem liberal of his forgiveneſs where none is ask'd or needed.

What ways he hath tak'n toward the proſperitie of his people, which he would ſeem ſo earneſtly to deſire, if we do but once call to mind, it will be anough to teach us, looking on the ſmooth inſinuations heer, that Tyrants are not more flatterd by thir Slaves, then forc'd to flatter others whom they fear.

For the peoples tranquillitie he would willingly be the Jona; but leſt he ſhould be tak'n at his word, pretends to foreſee within ken two imaginarie winds never heard of in the Compaſs, which threaten, if he be caſt overboard, to increaſe the Storm; but that Controverſy divine lot hath ended.

He had rather not rule, then that his people ſhould be ruin'd; and yet above theſe twenty years hath bin ruining the people about the niceties of his ruling. He is accurat to put a difference between the plague of malice, and the ague of miſtakes, the itch of noveltie, and the leproſie of diſloyaltie. But had he as well known how to diſtinguiſh between the venerable gray hairs of antient Religion, and the old ſcurff of Superſtition, between the wholſom heat of well governing, and the feverous rage of tyrannizing, his judgment in State-phyſic had bin of more autoritie.

Much he propheſies, that the credit of thoſe men who have caſt black ſcandals on him ſhall ere long be quite blaſted by the ſame furnace of popular obloquy, wherein they ſought to caſt his name and honour. I believe not that a Romiſh gilded Portrature gives better Oracle then a Babyloniſh gold'n Image could do, to tell us truly who heated that Furnace of obloquy, or who deſerves to be thrown in, Nebuchadnezzar or the three Kingdoms. It gave him great cauſe to ſuſpect his own Innocence, that he was oppos'd by ſo many who profeſt ſingular pietie. But this qualm was ſoon over, and he concluded rather to ſuſpect their Religion then his own innocence, affirming that many with him were both learned and religious above the ordinary ſize. But if his great Seal without the Parlament were not ſufficient to create Lords, his Parole muſt needs be far more unable to create learned and religious men; and who ſhall authorize his unlearned judgment to point them out?

He gueſſes that many well-minded men were by popular Preachers urg'd to oppoſe him. But the oppoſition undoubtedly proceeded and continues from heads far wiſer, and ſpirits of a nobler ſtrain; thoſe Prieſt-led Herodians with thir blind guides are in the Ditch already; travelling, as they thought, to Sion, but moor'd in the Ile of Wight.

He thanks God for his conſtancy to the Proteſtant Religion both abroad and at home. Abroad, his Letter to the Pope; at home, his Innovations in the Church will ſpeak his conſtancy in Religion what it was, without furder credit to this vain boaſt.

His uſing the aſſiſtance of ſome Papiſts, as the cauſe might be, could not hurt his Religion; but in the ſetling of Proteſtantiſm thir aid was both unſeemly and ſuſpicious, and inferr'd that the greateſt part of Proteſtants were againſt him and his obtruded ſettlement.

But this is ſtrange indeed, that he ſhould appear now teaching the Parlament what no man, till this was read, thought ever he had learnt, that difference of perſwaſion in religious matters may fall out where there is the ſameneſs of Allegeance and Subjection. If he thought ſo from the beginning, wherfore was there ſuch compulſion us'd to the Puritans of England, and the whole Realm of Scotland about conforming to a Liturgie? Wherfore no Biſhop no King? Wherfore Epiſcopacie more agreeable to Monarchie, if different perſwaſions in Religion may agree in one Duty and Allegeance? Thus do Court-Maxims like Court-Minions riſe or fall as the King pleaſes.

Not to tax him for want of Elegance as a Courtier in writing Oglio for Olla the Spaniſh word, it might be well affirm'd that there was a greater Medley and diſproportioning of Religions to mix Papiſts with Proteſtants in a religious cauſe, then to entertain all thoſe diverſifi'd Sects, who yet were all Proteſtants, one Religion, though many Opinions.

Neither was it any ſhame to Proteſtants, that he a declar'd Papiſt, if his own Letter to the Pope, not yet renounc'd, bely him not, found ſo few Proteſtants of his Religion, as enforc'd him to call in both the counſel and the aid of Papiſts to help eſtabliſh Proteſtancy, who were led on, not by the ſenſe of thir allegeance, but by the hope of his Apoſtacy to Rome, from diſputing to warring, his owe voluntary and firſt appeal.

His hearkning to evil Counſelors, charg'd upon him ſo oft'n by the Parlament, he puts off as a device of thoſe men who were ſo eager to give him better counſel. That thoſe men were the Parlament, and that he thought to have us'd the counſel of none but thoſe, as a King, is already known. What their civility laid upon evil Counſellors, he himſelf moſt commonly own'd; but the event of thoſe evil Counſels, the Enormities, the Confuſions, the Miſeries, he transfers from the guilt of his own civil broils to the juſt reſiſtance made by Parlament; and imputes what miſcarriages of his they could not yet remove for his oppoſing, as if they were ſome new miſdemeanors of their bringing in, and not the inveterate diſeaſes of his own bad Government; which with a diſeaſe as bad, he falls again to magnifie and commend: and may all thoſe who would be govern'd by his Retractions and Conceſſions, rather then by Laws of Parlament, admire his ſelf-Encomiums, and be flatter'd with that Crown of patience to which he cunningly exhorted them, that his Monarchial foot might have the ſetting it upon thir heads.

That truſt which the Parlament faithfully diſcharg'd in the aſſerting of our Liberties, he calls another artifice to withdraw the people from him to thir deſigns. What piece of Juſtice could they have demanded for the People, which the jealouſie of a King might not have miſcall'd a deſign to diſparage his Government, and to ingratiate themſelves? To be more juſt, religious, wiſe, or magnanimous then the common ſort, ſtirs up in a Tyrant both fear and envy; and ſtraight he cries out Popularitie, which in his account is little leſs then Treaſon. The ſum is, they thought to regulate and limit his Negative voice, and ſhare with him in the Militia, both or either of which he could not poſſibly hold without conſent of the people, and not be abſolutely a Tyrant. He profeſſes to deſire no other liberty then what he envies not his Subjects according to Law; yet fought with might and main againſt his Subjects to have a ſole power over them in his hand, both againſt and beyond Law. As for the Philoſophical Libertie which in vain he talks of, we may conclude him very ill train'd up in thoſe free notions, who to civil Libertie was ſo injurious.

He calls the Conſcience God's ſoveragntie, why then doth he conteſt with God about that ſupreme title? why did he lay reſtraint, and force enlargements upon our Conſciences in things for which we were to anſwer God only and the Church? God bids us be ſubject for Conſcience ſake, that is as to a Magiſtrate, and in the Laws; not uſurping over ſpiritual things, as Lucifer beyond his ſphere.

Finally having laid the fault of theſe Commotions, not upon his own miſgovernment, but upon the ambition of others, the neceſſity of ſome mens fortune, and thirſt after noveltie, he bodes himſelf much honour and reputation, that like the Sun ſhall riſe and recover it ſelf to ſuch a ſplendour, as Owls, Batts, and ſuch fatal Birds ſhall be unable to bear. Poets indeed uſe to vapor much after this manner. But to bad Kings, who without cauſe expect future glory from thir actions, it happ'ns as to bad Poets, who ſit and ſtarve themſelves with a deluſive hope to win Immortality by thir bad lines. For though men ought not to ſpeak evil of Dignities which are juſt, yet nothing hinders us to ſpeak evil, as oft as it is the truth, of thoſe who in thir Dignities do evil; thus did our Saviour himſelf, John the Baptiſt, and Stev'n the Martyr. And thoſe black vails of his own miſdeeds he might be ſure would ever keep his face from ſhining, till he could refute evil ſpeaking with well doing, which grace he ſeems here to pray for; and his Prayer doubtleſs as it was pray'd, ſo it was heard. But ev'n his Prayer is ſo ambitious of Prerogative, that it dares ask away the Prerogative of Chriſt himſelf, To become the head ſtone of the Corner.

XVI. Upon the Ordinance againſt the Common-prayer-Book.

WHAT to think of Liturgies, both the ſenſe of Scripture, and Apoſtolical Practice would have taught him better, then his human reaſonings and conjectures: Nevertheleſs what weight they have, let us conſider. If it be no news to have all Innovations uſher'd in with the name of Reformation, ſure it is leſs news to have all reformation cenſur'd and oppos'd under the name of innovation; by thoſe who being exalted in high place above thir merit, fear all change though of things never ſo ill or ſo unwiſely ſettl'd. So hardly can the dotage of thoſe that dwell upon Antiquitie allow preſent times any ſhare of godlineſs or wiſdom.

The removing of Liturgie he traduces to be done only as a thing plauſible to the People; whoſe rejection of it he lik'ns, with ſmall reverence, to the crucifying of our Saviour; next that it was done to pleaſe thoſe men who gloried in thir extemporary vein, meaning the Miniſters. For whom it will be beſt to anſwer, as was anſwer'd for the man born blind, They are of age, let them ſpeak for themſelves; not how they came blind, but whether it were Liturgie that held them tongue-ti'd.

For the matter contain'd in that Book, we need no better witneſs then King Edward the ſixth, who to the Corniſh Rebels confeſſes it was no other then the old Maſs-Book done into Engliſh, all but ſome few words that were expung'd. And by this argument which King Edward ſo promptly had to uſe againſt that irreligious Rabble, we may be aſſur'd it was the carnal fear of thoſe Divines and Politicians that modell'd the Liturgie no furder off from the old Maſs, leſt by too great an alteration they ſhould incenſe the People, and be deſtitute of the ſame ſhifts to fly to which they had taught the young King.

For the manner of uſing ſet forms, there is no doubt but that wholeſome matter, and good deſires rightly conceav'd in the heart, wholeſome words will follow of themſelves. Neither can any true Chriſtian find a reaſon why Liturgie ſhould be at all admitted, a Preſcription not impos'd or practis'd by thoſe firſt Founders of the Church, who alone had that autority: Without whoſe precept or example, how conſtantly the Prieſt puts on his Gown and Surplice, ſo conſtantly doth his Prayer put on a ſervile yoak of Liturgie. This is evident, that they who uſe no ſet forms of Prayer, have words from thir affections; while others are to ſeek affections fit and proportionable to a certain doſe of prepar'd words; which as they are not rigorouſly forbid to any man's private infirmity, ſo to impriſon and confine by force, into a Pinfold of ſet words, thoſe two moſt unimpriſonable things, our Prayers, and that Divine Spirit of utterance that moves them, is a tyranny that would have longer hands then thoſe Giants who threat'nd bondage to Heav'n. What we may do in the ſame form of words is not ſo much the queſtion, as whether Liturgie may be forc'd, as he forc'd it. It is true that we pray to the ſame God, muſt we therefore always uſe the ſame words? Let us then uſe but one word, becauſe we pray to one God. We profeſs the ſame truths, but the Liturgie comprehends not all truths: we read the ſame Scriptures; but never read that all thoſe ſacred expreſſions, all benefit and uſe of Scripture, as to publick Prayer, ſhould be deny'd us, except what was barrel'd up in a Common-prayer-Book with many mixtures of thir own, and which is worſe, without ſalt. But ſuppoſe them ſavoury words and unmix'd, ſuppoſe them Manna it ſelf, yet if they ſhall be hoarded up and enjoin'd us, while God every morning rains down new expreſſions into our hearts; inſtead of being fit to uſe, they will be found like reſerv'd Manna, rather to breed Worms and ſtink. We have the ſame duties upon us, and feel the ſame wants; yet not always the ſame, nor at all times alike; but with varietie of Circumſtances, which ask varietie of words: Wherof God hath given us plenty; not to uſe ſo copiouſly upon all other occaſions, and ſo niggardly to him alone in our devotions. As if Chriſtians were now in a worſe famin of words fit for Prayer, then was of food at the Seige of Jeruſalem, lem, when perhaps the Prieſts being to remove the ſhew-bread, as was accuſtom'd, were compell'd every Sabbath day, for want of other Loves, to bring again ſtill the ſame. If the Lord's Prayer had bin the warrant or the pattern of ſet Liturgies, as is here affirm'd, why was neither that Prayer, nor any other ſet form ever after us'd, or ſo much as mention'd by the Apoſtles, much leſs commended to our uſe? Why was thir care wanting in a thing ſo uſeful to the Church? ſo full of danger and contention to be left undon by them to other mens penning, of whoſe autority we could not be ſo certain? Why was this forgott'n by them, who declare that they have reveal'd to us the whole Counſel of God; who as he left our affections to be guided by his ſanctifying Spirit, ſo did he likewiſe our words to be put into us without our premeditation; not only thoſe cautious words to be us'd before Gentiles and Tyrants, but much more thoſe filial words, of which we have ſo frequent uſe in our acceſs with freedom of ſpeech to the Throne of Grace. Which to lay aſide for other outward dictates of men, were to injure him and his perfet Gift, who is the Spirit and the giver of our abilitie to pray; as if his miniſtration were incomplete, and that to whom he gave affections, he did not alſo afford utterance to make his Gift of Prayer a perfet Gift.

And although the Gift were only natural, yet voluntary Prayers are leſs ſubject to formal and ſuperficial tempers then ſet forms: For in thoſe, at leaſt for words and matter, he who prays muſt conſult firſt with his heart; which in likelihood may ſtir up his affections; in theſe having both words and matter ready made to his lips, which is anough to make up the outward act of Prayer, his affections grow lazy, and come not up eaſily at the call of words not thir own; the Prayer alſo having leſs intercourſe and ſimpathy with a heart wherin it was not conceav'd, ſaves it ſelf the labour of ſo long a journy downward, and flying up in haſte on the ſpecious wings of formalitie, if it fall not back again headlong, inſtead of a prayer which was expected, preſents God with a ſet of ſtale and empty words.

No doubt but oſtentation and formalitie may taint the beſt duties; we are not therfore to leave duties for no duties, and to turn Prayer into a kind of lurry. Cannot unpremeditated babling be rebuk'd, and reſtrain'd in whom we find they are, but the Spirit of God muſt be forbidd'n in all men? But it is the cuſtom of bad men and Hypocrites to take advantage at the leaſt abuſe of good things, that under that covert they may remove the goodneſs of thoſe things, rather then the abuſe. And how unknowingly, how weakly is the uſing of ſet forms attributed here to conſtancy, as if it were conſtancie in the Cuckoo to be always in the ſame liturgie.

Much leſs can it be lawful that an Engliſht Maſs-Book, compos'd, for ought we know, by men neither learned, nor godly, ſhould juſtle out, or at any time deprive us the exerciſe of that heavenly Gift, which God by ſpecial promiſe pours out dailie upon his Church, that is to ſay, the ſpirit of Prayer. Wherof to help thoſe many infirmities, which he reck'ns up, Rudeneſs, Impertinencie, Flatneſs, and the like, we have a remedy of God's finding out, which is not Liturgie, but his own free Spirit. Though we know not what to pray as we ought, yet he with ſighs unutterable by any words, much leſs by a ſtinted Liturgie dwelling in us, makes interceſſion for us according to the mind and will of God both in private, and in the performance of all Eccleſiaſtical Duties. For it is his promiſe alſo, that where two or three gather'd together in his name ſhall agree to ask him any thing, it ſhall be granted; for he is there in the midſt of them. If then antient Churches to remedy the infirmities of Prayer, or rather the infections of Arian and Pelagian Hereſies, neglecting that ordain'd and promis'd help of the Spirit, betook them almoſt four hundred years after Chriſt to Liturgie thir own invention, we are not to imitate them; nor to diſtruſt God in the removal of that Truant help to our Devotion, which by him never was appointed. And what is ſaid of Liturgie is ſaid alſo of Directory, if it be impos'd: although to forbid the Service-Book there be much more reaſon, as being of it ſelf ſuperſtitious, offenſive, and indeed, though Engliſht, yet ſtill the Maſs-Book: and publick places ought to be provided of ſuch as need not the help of Liturgies or Directories continually, but are ſupported with miniſterial Gifts anſwerable to thir calling.

Laſtly, that the Common-prayer-Book was rejected becauſe it pray'd ſo oft for him, he had no reaſon to object: for what large and laborious Prayers were made for him in the Pulpits, if he never heard, 'tis doubtful they were never heard in Heav'n. We might now have expected that his own following Prayer ſhould add much credit to ſet Forms; but on the contrary we find the ſame imperfections in it, as in moſt before, which he lays here upon extemporal. Nor doth he ask of God to be directed whether Liturgies be lawful, but preſumes, and in a manner would perſwade him that they be ſo; praying that the Church and he may never want them. What could be pray'd worſe extempore?

XVII. Of the differences in point of Church-Government.

THE Government of Church by Biſhops hath bin ſo fully prov'd from the Scriptures to be vitious and uſurp'd, that whether out of Piety or Policy maintain'd, it is not much material: For Pietie grounded upon error, can no more juſtifie King Charles, then it did Queen Mary in the ſight of God or Man. This however muſt not be let paſs without a ſerious Obſervation; God having ſo diſpos'd the Author in this Chapter as to confeſs and diſcover more of Myſterie and combination between Tyranny and fals Religion, then from any other hand would have bin credible. Here we may ſee the very dark roots of them both turn'd up, and how they twine and interweave one another in the Earth, though above ground ſhooting up in two ſever'd Branches. We may have learnt both from ſacred Story, and times of Reformation, that the Kings of this World have both ever hated, and inſtinctively fear'd the Church of God. Whether it be for that thir Doctrin ſeems much to favour two things to them ſo dreadful, Liberty and Equality, or becauſe they are the Children of that Kingdom, which, as antient Propheſies have foretold, ſhall in the end break to pieces and diſſolve all thir great Power and Dominion. And thoſe Kings and Potentates who have ſtrove moſt to rid themſelves of this fear, by cutting off or ſuppreſſing the true Church, have drawn upon themſelves the occaſion of thir own ruin, while they thought with moſt policy to prevent it. Thus Pharaoh when once he began to fear and wax jealous of the Iſraelites, leſt they ſhould multiply and fight againſt him, and that his fear ſtirr'd him up to afflict and keep them under, as the only remedy of what he feard, ſoon found that the evil which before ſlept, came ſuddenly upon him, by the prepoſterous way he took to prevent it. Paſſing by examples between, and not ſhutting wilfully our eyes, we may ſee the like ſtory brought to paſs in our own Land. This King more then any before him, except perhaps his Father, from his firſt entrance to the Crown, harbouring in his mind a ſtrange fear and ſuſpicion of Men moſt religious, and thir Doctrin, which in his own language he here acknowledges, terming it the ſeditious exorbitancie of Miniſters tongues, and doubting leſt they, as he not chriſtianly expreſſes it, ſhould with the Keys of Heav'n let out Peace and Loyaltie from the peoples hearts: though they never preacht or attempted aught that might juſtly raiſe in him ſuch thoughts, he could not reſt or think himſelf ſecure, ſo long as they remain'd in any of his three Kingdoms unrooted out. But outwardly profeſſing the ſame Religion with them, he could not preſently uſe violence as Pharaoh did, and that courſe had with others before but ill ſucceeded. He chooſes therfore a more myſtical way, a newer Method of Antichriſtian Fraud, to the Church more dangerous: and like to Balack the Son of Zippor, againſt a Nation of Prophets thinks it beſt to hire other eſteemed Prophets, and to undermine and wear out the true Church by a fals Eccleſiaſtical Policy. To this drift he found the Government of Biſhops moſt ſerviceable; an Order in the Church, as by men firſt corrupted, ſo mutually corrupting them who receave it, both in judgment and manners. He by conferring Biſhopricks and and great Livings on whom he thought moſt pliant to his will, againſt the known Canons and univerſal practice of the antient Church, wherby thoſe elections were the peoples right, ſought, as he confeſſes, to have greateſt influence upon the Church-men. They on the other ſide finding themſelves in a high Dignity, neither founded by Scripture, nor allow'd by Reformation, nor ſupported by any ſpiritual Gift or Grace of thir own, knew it thir beſt cours to have dependance only upon him: and wrought his fancy by degrees to that degenerate and unkingly perſwaſion of no Biſhop, no King. Whenas on the contrary all Prelates in thir own ſuttle ſenſe are of another mind; according to that of Pius the fourth, remember'd in the Hiſtory of Trent, that Biſhops then grow to be moſt vigorous and potent, when Princes happ'n to be moſt weak and impotent. Thus when both Intereſts of Tyrannie and Epiſcopacie were incorporate into each other, the King whoſe principal ſafety and eſtabliſhment conſiſted in the righteous execution of his civil power, and not in Biſhops and thir wicked Counſels, fatally driv'n on, ſet himſelf to the removal of thoſe men whoſe Doctrin and deſire of Church-Diſcipline he ſo fear'd would be the undoing of his Monarchie. And becauſe no temporal Law could touch the innocence of thir lives, he begins with the perſecution of thir Conſciences, laying ſcandals before them; and makes that the argument to inflict his unjuſt penalties both on thir Bodies and Eſtates. In this War againſt the Church if he hath ſped ſo, as other haughty Monarchs whom God heretofore hath hard'nd to the like enterprize, we ought to look up with praiſes and thankſgiving to the Author of our deliverance, to whom Victory and Power, Majeſtie, Honour and Dominion belongs for ever.

In the mean while from his own words we may perceave eaſily that the ſpecial motives which he had to endear and deprave his judgment to the favouring and utmoſt defending of Epiſcopacy, are ſuch as here we repreſent them: and how unwillingly, and with what mental reſervation he condeſcended againſt his Intereſt to remove it out of the Peers houſe, hath bin ſhown already. The reaſons, which he affirms wrought ſo much upon his judgment, ſhall be ſo far anſwer'd as they be urg'd.

Scripture he pretends, but produces none, and next the conſtant practice of all Chriſtian Churches, till of late years tumult, faction, pride, and covetouſneſs, invented new models under the Title of Chriſt's Government. Could any Papiſt have ſpoke more ſcandalouſly againſt all Reformation? Well may the Parlament and beſt affected People now be troubl'd at his calumnies and reproaches, ſince he binds them in the ſame bundle with all other the reformed Churches; who alſo may now furder ſee, beſides thir own bitter experience, what a cordial and well-meaning helper they had of him abroad, and how true to the Proteſtant Cauſe.

As for Hiſtories to prove Biſhops, the Bible, if we mean not to run into Errors, Vanities, and Uncertainties, muſt be our only Hiſtory. Which informs us that the Apoſtles were not properly Biſhops; next, that Biſhops were not ſucceſſors of Apoſtles, in the function of Apoſtleſhip: And that if they were Apoſtles, they could not be preciſely Biſhops; if Biſhops, they could not be Apoſtles; this being univerſal, extraordinary, and immediate from God; that being an ordinarie, fixt, and particular charge and continual inſpection over a certain Flock. And although an ignorance and deviation of the antient Churches afterward, may with as much reaſon and charitie be ſuppos'd as ſudden in point of Prelaty, as in other manifeſt corruptions, yet that no example ſince the firſt age for 1500 years can be produc'd of any ſetled Church, wherin were many Miniſters and Congregations, which had not ſome Biſhops above them; the Eccleſiaſtical Story, to which he appeals for want of Scripture, proves clearly to be a falſe and overconfident aſſertion. Sozomenus, who wrote above twelve hundred years ago, in his ſeventh Book relates from his own knowledg, that in the Churches of Cyprus and Arabia (places neer to Jeruſalem, and with the firſt frequented by Apoſtles) they had Biſhops in every Village; and what could thoſe be more then Presbyters? The like he tells of other Nations; and that Epiſcopal Churches in thoſe daies did not condemn them. I add that many Weſtern Churches, eminent for thir Faith and good Works, and ſettl'd above four hundred years ago in France, in Piemont and Bohemia, have both taught and practis'd the ſame Doctrine, and not admitted of Epiſcopacy among them. And if we may believe what the Papiſts themſelves have writt'n of theſe Churches which they call Waldenſes, I find it in a Book writt'n almoſt four hundred years ſince, and ſet forth in the Bohemian Hiſtory, that thoſe Churches in Piemont have held the ſame Doctrin and Government, ſince the time that Conſtantine with his miſchievous donations poyſon'd Sylveſter and the whole Church. Others affirm they have ſo continu'd there ſince the Apoſtles: and Theodorus Belvederenſis in his relation of them, confeſſeth that thoſe Hereſies, as he names them, were from the firſt times of Chriſtianity in that place. For the reſt I refer me to that famous teſtimony of Jerom, who upon that very place which he cites here, the Epiſtle to Titus, declares op'nly that Biſhop and Presbyter were one and the ſame thing, till by the inſtigation of Satan partialities grew up in the Church, and that Biſhops rather by cuſtom then any ordainment of Chriſt, were exalted above Presbyters: whoſe interpretation we truſt ſhall be receav'd before this intricate ſtuff tattl'd heer of Timothy and Titus, and I know not whom thir Succeſſors, far beyond Court Element, and as far beneath true edification. Theſe are his fair grounds both from Scripture-canons and Eccleſiaſtical examples; how undivinelike writt'n, and how like a worldly Goſpeller that underſtands nothing of theſe matters, poſterity no doubt will be able to judg, and will but little regard what he calls Apoſtolical, who in his Letter to the Pope calls Apoſtolical the Roman Religion.

Nor let him think to plead, that therfore it was not policy of State, or obſtinacy in him which upheld Epiſcopacy, becauſe the injuries and loſſes which he ſuſtain'd by ſo doing were to him more conſiderable then Epiſcopacy it ſelf; for all this might Pharaoh have had to ſay in his excuſe of detaining the Iſraelites, that his own and his Kingdoms ſafety, ſo much endanger'd by his denial, was to him more deer then all their building labours could be worth to Ægypt. But whom God hard'ns them alſo he blinds.

He indeavours to make good Epiſcopacy not only in Religion, but from the nature of all civil Government, where Parity breeds confuſion and faction. But of faction and confuſion, to take no other then his own teſtimony, where hath more bin ever bred then under the imparity of his own Monarchial Government? Of which to make at this time longer diſpute, and from civil conſtitutions and human conceits to debate and queſtion the convenience of Divine Ordinations, is neither wiſdom nor ſobriety: and to confound Moſaic Prieſthood with Evangelic Presbytery againſt expreſs Inſtitution, is as far from warrantable. As little to purpoſe is it that we ſhould ſtand polling the reformed Churches, whether they equalize in number thoſe of his three Kingdoms, of whom ſo lately the far greater part, what they have long deſir'd to do, have now quite thrown off Epiſcopacy.

Neither may we count it the Language or Religion of a Proteſtant ſo to vilifie the beſt reformed Churches (for none of them but Lutherans retain Biſhops) as to fear more the ſcandalizing of Papiſts, becauſe more numerous, then of our Proteſtant Brethren, becauſe a handful. It will not be worth the while to ſay what Sciſmatics or Heretics have had no Biſhops; yet leſt he ſhould be tak'n for a great Reader, he who prompted him, if he were a Doctor, might have rememberd the foremention'd place in Sozomenus; which affirms that beſides the Cyprians and Arabians who were counted Orthodoxal, the Novatians alſo, and Montaniſts in Phrygia had no other Biſhops then ſuch as were in every Village: and what Presbyter hath a narrower Dioceſs? As for the Aërians we know of no Heretical opinion juſtly father'd upon them, but that they held Biſhops and Presbyters to be the ſame. Which he in this place not obſcurely ſeems to hold a Hereſie in all the reformed Churches; with whom why the Church of England deſir'd conformity, he can find no reaſon with all his charity, but the coming in of the Scots Army; Such a high eſteem he had of the Engliſh.

He tempts the Clergie to return back again to Biſhops, from the fear of tenuity and contempt, and the aſſurance of better thriving under the favour of Princes; againſt which temptations if the Clergie cannot arm themſelves with thir own ſpiritual armour, they are indeed as poor a Carkaſs as he terms them.

Of ſecular Honours and great Revenues added to the dignity of Prelats, ſince the ſubject of that queſtion is now remov'd, we need not ſpend time: But this perhaps will never be unſeaſonable to bear in mind out of Chryſoſtom, that when Miniſters came to have Lands, Houſes, Farms, Coaches, Horſes, and the like Lumber, then Religion brought forth riches in the Church, and the Daughter devour'd the Mother.

But if his judgment in Epiſcopacy may be judg'd by the goodly chois he made of Biſhops, we need not much amuſe our ſelves with the conſideration of thoſe evils which, by his foretelling, will neceſſarily follow their pulling down, until he prove that the Apoſtles, having no certain Dioceſs or appointed place of reſidence, were properly Biſhops over thoſe Presbyters whom they ordain'd, or Churches they planted; wherein oftimes thir labours were both joint and promiſcuous: Or that the Apoſtolic power muſt neceſſarily deſcend to Biſhops, the uſe and end of either function being ſo different. And how the Church hath flouriſht under Epiſcopacy, let the multitude of thir ancient and groſs errors teſtifie, and the words of ſome learnedeſt and moſt zealous Biſhops among them; Nazianzen in a devout paſſion wiſhing Prelaty had never bin; Baſil terming them the Slaves of Slaves; Saint Martin the Enemies of Saints, and confeſſing that after he was made a Biſhop, he found much of that grace decay in him which he had before.

Concerning his Coronation Oath, what it was, and how far it bound him, already hath bin ſpok'n. This we may take for certain, that he was never ſworn to his own particular conſcience and reaſon, but to our conditions as a free people; which requir'd him to give us ſuch Laws as our ſelves ſhould chooſe. This the Scots could bring him to, and would not be baffled with the pretence of a Coronation Oath, after that Epiſcopacy had for many years bin ſetl'd there. Which conceſſion of his to them, and not to us, he ſeeks heer to put off with evaſions that are ridiculous. And to omit no ſhifts, he alleges that the Presbyterian manners gave him no encouragement to like their modes of Government. If that were ſo, yet certainly thoſe men are in moſt likelihood neerer to Amendment, who ſeek a ſtricter Church-Diſcipline then that of Epiſcopacy, under which the moſt of them learnt their manners. If eſtimation were to be made of God's Law by their manners, who leaving Ægypt, receav'd it in the Wilderneſs, it could reap from ſuch an inference as this, nothing but rejection and diſeſteem.

For the Prayer wherewith he cloſes, it had bin good ſome ſafe Liturgie, which he ſo commends, had rather bin in his way; it would perhaps in ſome meaſure have perform'd the end for which they ſay Liturgie was firſt invented, and have hinder'd him both heer, and at other times, from turning his notorious errors into his Prayers.

XVIII. Upon the Uxbridg Treaty, &c.

IF the way of Treaties be look'd upon in general, as a retiring from beſtial force to human reaſon, his firſt Aphoriſm heer is in part deceav'd. For men may treat like Beaſts as well as fight. If ſom fighting were not manlike, then either fortitude were no vertue, or no fortitude in fighting: And as Politicians ofttimes through dilatory purpoſes and emulations handle the matter, there hath bin no where found more beſtialitie then in treating; which hath no more commendation in it, then from fighting to come to undermining, from violence to craft, and when they can no longer do as Lions, to do as Foxes.

The ſincereſt end of treating after War once proclaim'd, is either to part with more, or to demand leſs than was at firſt fought for, rather then to hazard more lives, or worſe miſchiefs. What the Parlament in that point were willing to have don, when firſt after the War begun, they petition'd him at Colebrook to voutſafe a Treaty, is unknown. For after he had tak'n God to witneſs of his continual readineſs to treat, or to offer Treaties to the avoiding of bloodſhed, taking the advantage of a Miſt, the fitteſt weather for deceit and treachery, he follows at the heels thoſe Meſſengers of Peace with a train of covert War; and with a bloody ſurpriſe falls on our ſecure Forces which lay quartering at Brentford in the thoughts and expectation of a Treaty. And although in them who make a trade of War, and againſt a natural Enemy, ſuch an onſet might in the rigor of martial Law have bin excus'd, while Arms were not yet by agreement ſuſpended, yet by a King, who ſeem'd ſo heartily to accept cept of treating, and profeſſes heer, He never wanted either deſire or diſpoſition to it, profeſſes to have greater confidence in his Reaſon then in his Sword, and as a Chriſtian to ſeek Peace and enſue it, ſuch bloody and deceitful advantages would have bin forborn one day at leaſt, if not much longer; in whom there had not bin a thirſt rather then a deteſtation of civil War and Blood.

In the midſt of a ſecond Treaty not long after, ſought by the Parlament, and after much ado obtain'd with him at Oxford, what ſuttle and unpeaceable deſigns he then had in chace, his own Letters diſcover'd: What attemps of treacherous hoſtility ſucceſsful and unſucceſsful he made againſt Briſtow, Scarborow, and other places, the Proceedings of that Treaty will ſoon put us in mind; and how he was ſo far from granting more of reaſon after ſo much of blood, that he deny'd then to grant what before he had offerd; making no other uſe of Treaties pretending Peace, then to gain advantages that might enable him to continue War. What marvel then if he thought it no diminution of himſelf, as oft as he ſaw his time, to be importunate for Treaties, when he ſought them only, as by the upſhot appeard, to get opportunities?

But he infers, as if the Parlament would have compell'd him to part with ſomthing of his honour as a King. What honour could he have, or call his, joyn'd, not only with the offence or diſturbance, but with the bondage and deſtruction of three Nations? wherof though he be careleſs and improvident, yet the Parlament, by our Laws and Freedom, ought to judg, and uſe prevention; our Laws els were but Cobweb Laws. And what were all his moſt rightful honours, but the peoples gift, and the inveſtment of that Luſtre, Majeſty, and Honour, which for the publick good, and no otherwiſe, redounds from a whole Nation into one perſon? So far is any honour from being his to a common miſchief and calamity. Yet ſtill he talks on equal terms with the grand Repreſentative of that people, for whoſe ſake he was a King, as if the general welfare and his ſubſervient Rights were of equal moment or conſideration. His aim indeed hath ever bin to magnifie and exalt his borrow'd Rights and Prerogatives above the Parlament and Kingdom of whom he holds them. But when a King ſets himſelf to bandy againſt the higheſt Court and reſidence of his Regal Autority, he then, in the ſingle perſon of a Man, fights againſt his own Majeſty and Kingſhip, and then indeed ſets the firſt hand to his own depoſing.

The Treaty at Uxbridg, he ſaith, gave the faireſt hopes of a happy compoſure; faireſt indeed, if his inſtructions to bribe our Commiſſioners with the promiſe of Security, Rewards, and Places, were fair: What other hopes it gave no man can tell. There being but three main heads whereon to be treated; Ireland, Epiſcopacy, and the Militia; the firſt was anticipated and foreſtall'd by a Peace at any rate to be haſt'nd with the Iriſh Rebels, ere the Treaty could begin, that he might pretend his word and honour paſt againſt the ſpecious and popular arguments (he calls them no better) which the Parlament would urge upon him for the continuance of that juſt War. Epiſcopacy he bids the Queen be confident he will never quit; which informs us by what Patronage it ſtood: And the Sword he reſolves to clutch as faſt, as if God with his own hand had put it into his. This was the moderation which he brought; this was as far as Reaſon, Honour, Conſcience, and the Queen; who was his Regent in all theſe, would give him leave. Laſtly for compoſure, inſtead of happy, how miſerable it was more likely to have bin, wiſe men could then judg; when the Engliſh, during Treaty, were call'd Rebels, the Iriſh, good and catholic Subjects; and the Parlament before hand, though for faſhions call'd a Parlament, yet by a Jeſuitical ſlight not acknowledg'd though call'd ſo; but privatly in the Council Books inroll'd no Parlament: that if accommodation had ſucceeded, upon what terms ſoever, ſuch a deviliſh fraud was prepar'd, that the King in his own eſteem had bin abſolv'd from all performance, as having treated with Rebels, and no Parlament; and they on the other ſide inſtead of an expected happines, had bin brought under the Hatchet. Then no doubt War had ended, that Maſſacre and Tyranny might begin. Theſe Jealouſies, however rais'd, let all men ſee whether they be diminiſh'd or allayd, by the Letters of his own Cabinet op'nd. And yet the breach of this Treaty is laid all upon the Parlament and their Commiſſioners, with odious Names of Pertinacy, hatred of Peace, Faction, and Covetouſneſs, nay his own Brat Superſtition is laid to their charge; notwithſtanding his heer profeſs'd reſolution to continue both the Order, Maintenance, and Authority of Prelats, as a Truth of God.

And who were moſt to blame in the unſucceſsfulneſs of that Treaty, his appeal is to God's deciſion; beleeving to be very excuſable at that Tribunal. But if ever man gloried in an unflexible ſtifneſs, he came not behind any: and that grand Maxim, always to put ſomthing into his Treaties, which might give colour to refuſe all that was in other things granted, and to make them ſignifie nothing, was his own principal Maxim and particular inſtructions to his Commiſſioners. Yet all, by his own verdit, muſt be conſterd Reaſon in the King, and depraved temper in the Parlament.

That the higheſt Tide of ſucceſs, with theſe principles and deſigns, ſet him not above a Treaty, no great wonder. But that his loweſt Ebb could not be lower then a Fight, was a preſumption that ruin'd him.

He preſag'd the future unſucceſsfulneſs of Treaties by the unwillingneſs of ſom men to treat; and could not ſee what was preſent, that thir unwillingneſs had good cauſe to proceed from the continual experience of his own obſtinacy and breach of word.

His Prayer therefore of forgiveneſs to the guilty of that Treaties breaking, he had good reaſon to ſay heartily over, as including no man in that guilt ſooner then himſelf.

As for that Proteſtation following in his Praier, How oft have I entreated for Peace, but when I ſpeak therof they make them ready to War; unleſs he thought himſelf ſtill in that perfidious miſt between Colebrook and Houndſlow, and thought that miſt could hide him from the eye of Heav'n as well as of Man, after ſuch a bloody recompence giv'n to our firſt offers of Peace, how could this in the ſight of Heav'n without horrours of conſcience be utter'd?

XIX. Upon the various events of the War.

IT is no new or unwonted thing for bad men to claim as much part in God as his beſt ſervants, to uſurp and imitate thir words, and appropriate to themſelves thoſe properties which belong only to the good and righteous. This not only in Scripture is familiarly to be found, but heer alſo in this Chapter of Apocrypha. He tells us much, why it pleas'd God to ſend him Victory or Loſs (although what in ſo doing was the intent of God, he might be much miſtak'n as to his own particular) but we are yet to learn what real good uſe he made thereof in his practice.

Thoſe numbers which he grew to from ſmall beginnings, were not ſuch as out of love came to protect him, for none approv'd his actions as a King, except Courtiers and Prelats, but were ſuch as fled to be protected by him from the fear of that Reformation which the pravity of thir lives would not bear. Such a Snowball he might eaſily gather by rowling through thoſe cold and dark provinces of ignorance and leudneſs, where on a ſudden he became ſo numerous. He imputes that to God's protection, which, to them who perſiſt in a bad cauſe, is either his long-ſuffering, or his hard'ning; and that to wholeſom chaſtiſement, which were the gradual beginnings of a ſevere puniſhment. For if neither God nor nature put civil power in the hands of any whomſoever, but to a lawful end, and commands our obedience to the autority of Law only, not to the tyrannical force of any perſon; and if the Laws of our Land have plac'd the Sword in no mans ſingle hand, ſo much as to unſheath againſt a foren enemie, much leſs upon the native people, but have plac'd it in that elective body of the Parlament, to whom the making, repealing, judging, and interpreting of Law it ſelf was alſo committed, as was fitteſt, ſo long as we intended to be a free Nation, and not the Slaves of one mans will, then was the King himſelf diſobedient and rebellious to that Law by which he raign'd; and by autority of Parlament to raiſe arms againſt him in defence of Law and Libertie, we do not only think, but beleeve and know was juſtifiable both by the Word of God, the Laws of the Land, and all lawful Oaths; and they who ſided with him fought againſt all theſe.

The ſame Allegations which he uſes for himſelf and his Party, may as well fit any Tyrant in the World: for let the Parlament be call'd a Faction when the King pleaſes, and that no Law muſt be made or chang'd either civil or religious, becauſe no Law will content all ſides, then muſt be made or chang'd no Law at all but what a Tyrant, be he Proteſtant or Papiſt, thinks fit. Which tyrannous Aſſertion forc'd upon us by the Sword, he who fights againſt, and dies fighting, if his other ſins overweigh not, dies a Martyr undoubtedly both of the Faith and of the Common-wealth: and I hold it not as the opinion, but as the full belief and perſwaſion of far holier and wiſer Men then Paraſitick Preachers. Who, without their dinner-Doctrin, know that neither King, Law, Civil Oaths, or Religion, was ever eſtabliſh'd without the Parlament: and thir power is the ſame to abrogate as to eſtabliſh: neither is any thing to be thought eſtabliſh'd, which that Houſe declares to be aboliſht. Where the Parlament ſits, there inſeparably ſits the King, there the Laws, there our Oaths, and whatſoever can be civil in Religion. They who fought for the Parlament, in the trueſt ſenſe fought for all theſe; who fought for the King divided from his Parlament, fought for the ſhadow of a King againſt all theſe; and for things that were not, as if they were eſtabliſht. It were a thing monſtrouſly abſurd and contradictory to give the Parlament a Legiſlative Power, and then to upbraid them for tranſgreſſing old Eſtabliſhments.

But the King and his Party having loſt in this Quarrel thir Heav'n upon Earth, begin to make great reck'ning of Eternal Life, and at an eaſy rate in forma Pauperis canonize one another into Heav'n; he them in his Book, they him in the Portrature before his Book: but as was ſaid before, Stage-work will not do it, much leſs the juſtneſs of thir Cauſe, wherein moſt frequently they dy'd in a brutiſh fierceneſs, with Oaths and other damning words in thir mouths; as if ſuch had bin all the Oaths they fought for: which undoubtedly ſent them full ſail on another Voyage then to Heav'n. In the mean while they to whom God gave victory, never brought to the King at Oxford the ſtate of thir Conſciences, that he ſhould preſume without confeſſion, more then a Pope preſumes, to tell abroad what conflicts and accuſations men, whom he never ſpoke with, have in their own thoughts. We never read of any Engliſh King but one that was a Confeſſor, and his name was Edward; yet ſure it paſs'd his skill to know thoughts, as this King takes upon him. But they who will not ſtick to ſlander mens inward Conſciences, which they can neither ſee nor know, much leſs will care to ſlander outward Actions, which they pretend to ſee, though with ſenſes never ſo vitiated.

To judg of his condition conquer'd, and the manner of dying on that ſide, by the ſober men that choſe it, would be his ſmall advantage: it being moſt notorious, that they who were hotteſt in his Cauſe, the moſt of them were men oftner drunk, then by thir good will ſober, and very many of them ſo fought and ſo dy'd.

And that the Conſcience of any man ſhould grow ſuſpicious, or be now convicted by any Pretentions in the Parlament, which are now prov'd fals, and unintended, there can be no juſt cauſe. For neither did they ever pretend to eſtabliſh his Throne without our Liberty and Religion, nor Religion without the Word of God, nor to judg of Laws by thir being eſtabliſht, but to eſtabliſh them by thir being good and neceſſary.

He tells the World he oft'n pray'd that all on his ſide might be as faithful to God and thir own Souls, as to him. But Kings above all other men have in thir hands not to pray only, but to do. To make that Prayer effectual, he ſhould have govern'd as well as pray'd. To pray and not to govern is for a Monk and not a King. Till then he might be well aſſur'd they were more faithful to thir luſt and rapine then to him.

In the wonted predication of his own vertues he goes on to tell us, that to conquer he never deſir'd, but only to reſtore the Laws and Liberties of his People. It had bin happy then he had known at laſt, that by force to reſtore Laws abrogated by the Legiſlative Parlament, is to conquer abſolutely both them and Law it ſelf. And for our Liberties, none ever oppreſs'd them more, both in Peace and War; firſt like a maſter by his arbitrary power, next as an Enemy by hoſtile invaſion.

And if his beſt friends fear'd him, and be himſelf in the temptation of an abſolute Conqueſt, it was not only pious but friendly in the Parlament, both to fear him and reſiſt him; ſince their not yielding, was the only means to keep him out of that temptation wherin he doubted his own ſtrength.

He takes himſelf to be guilty in this War of nothing els, but of confirming the power of ſome men: Thus all along he ſignifies the Parlament, whom to have ſettl'd by an act he counts to be his only guiltineſs. So well he knew that to continue a Parlament, was to raiſe a War againſt himſelf; what were his Actions then and his Government the while? For never was it heard in all our Story, that Parlaments made War on thir Kings, but on thir Tyrants; whoſe modeſty and gratitude was more wanting to the Parlament, then theirs to any of ſuch Kings.

What he yielded was his fear; what he deny'd was his obſtinacy. Had he yielded more, fear might perchance have ſav'd him; had he granted leſs, his obſtinacy had perhaps the ſooner deliver'd us.

To review the occaſions of this War, will be to them never too late, who would be warn'd by his example from the like evils: but to wiſh only a happy concluſion, will never expiate the fault of his unhappy beginnings. 'Tis true, on our ſide the ſins of our lives not ſeldom fought againſt us: but on thir ſide, beſides thoſe, the grand ſin of thir Cauſe.

How can it be otherwiſe, when he deſires here moſt unreaſonably, and indeed ſacrilegiouſly, that we ſhould be ſubject to him, though not furder, yet as far as all of us may be ſubject to God, to whom this expreſſion leaves no precedency? He who deſires from men as much obedience and ſubjection, as we may all pay to God, deſires not leſs then to be a God; a Sacrilege far wors then medling with the Biſhops Lands, as he eſteems it.

His Prayer is a good Prayer and a glorious; but glorying is not good, if it know not that a little leven levens the whole lump. It ſhould have purg'd out the leven of untruth in telling God that the blood of his Subjects by him ſhed was in his juſt and neceſſary defence. Yet this is remarkable; God hath here ſo order'd his Prayer, that as his own lips acquitted the Parlament, not long before his death, of all the blood ſpilt in this War, ſo now his Prayer unwittingly draws it upon himſelf. For God imputes not to any man the blood he ſpills in a juſt cauſe; and no man ever begg'd his not imputing of that which he in his juſtice could not impute: So that now whether purpoſely, or unawares, he hath confeſs'd both to God and Man the blood-guiltineſs of all this War to lie upon his own head.

XX. Upon the Reformation of the times.

THIS Chapter cannot punctually be anſwer'd without more repetitions then now can be excuſable: Which perhaps have already bin more humour'd then was needful. As it preſents us with nothing new, ſo with his exceptions againſt Reformation pitifully old and tatter'd with continual uſing; not only in his Book, but in the words and writings of every Papiſt and Popiſh King. On the Scene he thruſts out firſt an Antimaſque of two bugbears, Noveltie and Perturbation; that the ill looks and noiſe of thoſe two may as long as poſſible drive off all endeavours of a Reformation. Thus ſought Pope Adrian, by repreſenting the like vain terrors, to divert and diſſipate the zeal of thoſe reforming Princes of the age before in Germany. And if we credit Latimer's Sermons, our Papiſts here in England pleaded the ſame dangers and inconveniencies againſt that which was reform'd by Edward the ſixth. Wheras if thoſe fears had bin available, Chriſtianity it ſelf had never bin receav'd. Which Chriſt foretold us, would not be admitted without the cenſure of Noveltie and many great Commotions. Theſe therefore are not to deter us.

He grants Reformation to be a good work, and confeſſes what the indulgence of times and corruption of manners might have deprav'd. So did the fore-mention'd Pope, and our Granſire Papiſts in this Realm. Yet all of them agree in one ſong with this here, that they are ſorry to ſee ſo little regard had to Laws eſtabliſht, and the Religion ſettl'd.

Popular compliance, diſſolution of all order and government in the Church, Schiſms, Opinions, Undecencies, Confuſions, ſacrilegious Invaſions, contempt of the Clergie and thir Liturgie, diminution of Princes; all theſe complaints are to be read in the Meſſages and Speeches almoſt of every Legat from the Pope to thoſe States and Cities which began Reformation. From whence he either learnt the ſame pretences, or had them naturally in him from the ſame ſpirit. Neither was there ever ſo ſincere a Reformation that hath eſcap'd theſe clamours.

He offer'd a Synod or Convocation rightly choſen. So offer'd all thoſe Popiſh Kings heretofore; a cours the moſt unſatisfactory, as matters have bin long carried, and found by experience in the Church liable to the greateſt fraud and packing; no ſolution, or redreſs of evil, but an increaſe rather; deteſted therefore by Nazianzen, and ſome other of the Fathers. And let it be produc'd, what good hath bin done by Synods from the firſt times of Reformation.

Not to juſtifie what Enormities the Vulgar may commit in the rudeneſs of thir zeal, we need but only inſtance how he bemoans the pulling down of Croſſes and other ſuperſtitious Monuments, as the effect of a popular and deceitful Reformation. How little this ſavours of a Proteſtant, is too eaſily perceav'd.

What he charges in defect of Piety, Charity, and Morality, hath bin alſo charg'd by Papiſts upon the beſt reformed Churches: not as if they the Accuſers were not tenfold more to be accus'd, but out of thir Malignity to all endeavour of amendment; as we know who accus'd to God the ſincerity of Job; an accuſation of all others the moſt eaſie, when as there lives not any mortal man ſo excellent, who in theſe things is not always deficient. But the infirmities of beſt men, and the ſcandals of mixt Hypocrites in all times of reforming, whoſe bold intruſion covets to be ever ſeen in things moſt ſacred as they are moſt ſpecious, can lay no juſt blemiſh upon the integritie of others, much leſs upon the purpoſe of Reformation it ſelf. Neither can the evil doings of ſome be the excuſe of our delaying or deſerting that duty to the Church, which for no reſpect of times or carnal policies can be at any time unſeaſonable.

He tells with great ſhew of piety what kind of Perſons publick Reformers ought to be, and what they ought to do. 'Tis ſtrange that in above twenty years, the Church growing ſtill wors and wors under him, he could neither be as he bids others be, nor do as he pretends here ſo well to know; nay, which is worſt of all, after the greateſt part of his Reign ſpent in neither knowing nor doing aught toward a Reformation either in Church or State, ſhould ſpend the reſidue in hindring thoſe by a ſeven years War, whom it concern'd with his conſent or without it to do thir parts in that great performance.

'Tis true that the method of reforming may well ſubſiſt without perturbation of the State; but that it falls out otherwiſe for the moſt part, is the plain Text of Scripture. And if by his own rule he had allow'd us to fear God firſt, and the King in due order, our Allegiance might have ſtill follow'd our Religion in a fit ſubordination. But if Chriſt's Kingdom be tak'n for the true Diſcipline of the Church, and by his Kingdom be meant the violence he us'd againſt it, and to uphold an Antichriſtian Hierarchie, then ſure anough it is, that Chriſt's Kingdom could not be ſet up without pulling down his: And they were beſt Chriſtians who were leaſt ſubject to him. Chriſt's Government, out of queſtion meaning it Prelatical, he thought would confirm his: and this was that which overthrew it.

He profeſſes to own his Kingdom from Chriſt, and to deſire to rule for his glory, and the Churches good. The Pope and the King of Spain profeſs every where as much; and both his practice and all his reaſonings, all his enmitie againſt the true Church we ſee hath bin the ſame with thirs, ſince the time that in his Letter to the Pope he aſſur'd them both of his full compliance. But evil beginnings never bring forth good concluſions: they are his own words, and he ratifi'd them by his own ending. To the Pope he ingag'd himſelf to hazard life and eſtate for the Roman Religion, whether in complement he did it, or in earneſt; and God, who ſtood neerer then he for complementing minded, writ down thoſe words; that according to his reſolution, ſo it ſhould come to paſs. He prays againſt his Hypocriſie and Phariſaical Waſhings, a Prayer to him moſt pertinent, but choaks it ſtraight with other words which pray him deeper into his old Errors and Deluſions.

XXI. Upon his Letters tak'n and divulged.

THE King's Letters taken at the Battel of Naſeby, being of greateſt importance to let the people ſee what Faith there was in all his Promiſes and ſolemn Proteſtations, were tranſmitted to publick view by ſpecial Order of Parlament. They diſcover'd his good affection to the Papiſts and Iriſh Rebels, the ſtrict intelligence he held, the pernicious and diſhonourable Peace he made with them, not ſollicited but rather ſolliciting, which by all invocations that were holy he had in publick abjur'd. They reveal'd his endeavours to bring in forren Forces, Iriſh, French, Dutch, Lorrainers, and our old Invaders the Danes upon us, beſides his ſuttleties and myſterious arts in treating: to ſum up all, they ſhew'd him govern'd by a Woman. All which, though ſuſpected vehemently before, and from good grounds beleev'd, yet by him and his adherents peremptorily deny'd, were by the op'ning of that Cabinet viſible to all men under his own hand.

The Parlament therfore, to clear themſelves of aſperſing him without cauſe, and that the people might no longer be abus'd and cajol'd, as they call it, by Falſities and Court-impudence, in matters of ſo high concernment, to let them know on what terms thir duty ſtood, and the Kingdom's peace, conceav'd it moſt expedient and neceſſary that thoſe Leters ſhould be made publick. This the King affirms was by them done without honour and civilitie: words, which if they contain not in them, as in the language of a Courtier moſt commonly they do not, more of ſubſtance and realitie then Complement, Ceremony, Court-fauning and diſſembling, enter not I ſuppoſe furder then the ear into any wiſe man's conſideration. Matters were not then between the Parlament and a King thir enemie in that ſtate of trifling, as to obſerve thoſe ſuperficial Vanities. But if honour and civilitie mean, as they did of old, diſcretion, honeſty, prudence, and plain truth, it will be then maintain'd againſt any Sect of thoſe Cabaliſts, that the Parlament in doing what they did with thoſe Letters, could ſuffer in thir honour and civilitie no diminution. The reaſons are alreadie heard.

And that it is with none more familiar then with Kings to tranſgreſs the bounds of all honour and civility, there ſhould not want examples good ſtore, if brevity would permit; in point of Letters this one ſhall ſuffice. The Dutcheſs of Burgundie and Heir of Duke Charles, had promis'd to her Subjects that ſhe intended no otherwiſe to govern, then by advice of the three Eſtates; but to Lewis the French King had writt'n Letters, that ſhe had reſolv'd to commit wholly the managing of her affairs to four Perſons, whom ſhe nam'd. The three Eſtates not doubting the ſincerity of her Princely word, ſend Embaſſadors to Lewis, who then beſeig'd Arras belonging to the Dukes of Burgundy. The King taking hold of this occaſion to ſet them at diviſion among themſelves, queſtion'd thir Credence; which when they offer'd to produce with thir Inſtructions, he not only ſhews them the privat Letter of thir Dutcheſs, but gives it them to carry home, wherwith to affront her; which they did, ſhe denying it ſtoutly, till they ſpreading it before her face in a full Aſſembly, convicted her of an open lie. Which although Commines the Hiſtorian much blames, as a deed too harſh and diſhonourable in them who were Subjects, and not at War with thir Princeſs, yet to his Maſter Lewis, who firſt divulg'd thoſe Letters, to the op'n ſhaming of that young Governeſs, he imputes no incivilitie or diſhonour at all, although betraying a certain confidence repoſ'd by that Letter in his Royal Secrecie.

With much more reaſon then may Letters not intercepted only, but won in battle from an Enemie, be made public to the beſt advantages of them that win them, to the diſcovery of ſuch important truth or falſhood. Was it not more diſhonourable in himſelf to fain ſuſpicions and jealouſies, which we firſt found among thoſe Letters, touching the chaſtitie of his Mother, thereby to gain aſſiſtance from the King of Denmark, as in vindication of his Siſter? The Damſel of Burgundie at ſight of her own Letter was ſoon blank, and more ingenuous then to ſtand outfacing; but this man whom nothing will convince, thinks by talking world without end to make good his integrity and fair dealing, contradicted by his own Hand and Seal. They who can pick nothing out of them but phraſes, ſhall be counted Bees: they that diſcern furder both there and heer, that conſtancy to his Wife is ſet in place before Laws and Religion, are in his naturalities no better then Spiders.

He would work the people to a perſwaſion, that if he be miſerable, they cannot be happy. What ſhould hinder them? Were they all born Twins of Hippocrates with him and his fortune, one birth one burial? It were a Nation miſerable indeed, not worth the name of a Nation, but a race of Idiots, whoſe happineſs and welfare depended upon one Man. The happineſs of a Nation conſiſts in true Religion, Piety, Juſtice, Prudence, Temperance, Fortitude, and the contempt of Avarice and Ambition. They in whomſoever theſe vertues dwell eminently, need not Kings to make them happy, but are the Architects of thir own happineſs; and whether to themſelves or others are not leſs then Kings. But in him which of theſe vertues were to be found, that might extend to the making happy, or the well-governing of ſo much as his own houſhold, which was the moſt licentious and ill-govern'd in the whole Land?

But the op'ning of his Letters was deſign'd by the Parlament to make all Reconciliation deſperate. Are the lives of ſo many good and faithful men that dy'd for the freedom of thir Country, to be ſo ſlighted, as to be forgott'n in a ſtupid reconcilement without Juſtice don them? What he fears not by War and Slaughter, ſhould we fear to make deſperate by op'ning his Letters? Which fact he would parallel with Chams revealing of his Father's nakedneſs: When he at that time could be no way eſteem'd the Father of his Countrie but the Deſtroyer; nor had he ever before merited that former title.

He thanks God he cannot only bear this with patience, but with charity forgive the doers. Is not this meer mockery, to thank God for what he can do, but will not? For is it patience to impute Barbariſm and Inhumanity to the op'ning of an Enemies Letter, or is it Charity to clothe them with curſes in his Prayer, whom he hath forgiv'n in his Diſcours? In which Prayer to ſhew how readily he can return good for evil to the Parlament, and that if they take away his Coat, he can let them have his Cloak alſo; for the diſmantling of his Letters he wiſhes they may be cover'd with the Cloak of Confuſion. Which I ſuppoſe they do reſign with much willingneſs, both Livery, Badg, and Cognizance, to them who choſe rather to be his Servants and Vaſſals, then to ſtand againſt him for the Liberty of thir Country.

XXII. Upon his going to the Scots.

THE Kings coming in, whether to the Scots or Engliſh, deſerv'd no thanks: For neceſſity was his Counſellor; and that he hated them both alike, his expreſſions every where manifeſt. Som ſay his purpoſe was to have come to London, till hearing how ſtrictly it was proclaim'd that no man ſhould conceal him, he diverted his courſe. But that had bin a frivolous excuſe: and beſides, he himſelf rehearſing the conſultations had before he took his journey, ſhews us cleerly that he was determin'd to adventure upon thir Loyalty who firſt began his troubles. And that the Scots had notice of it before, hath bin long ſince brought to light. What prudence there could be in it, no man can imagin; Malice there might be by raiſing new jealouſies to divide Friends. For beſides his diffidence of the Engliſh, it was no ſmall diſhonour that he put upon them, when rather than yield himſelf to the Parlament of England, he yielded to a hireling Army of Scots in England, paid for their ſervice heer, not in Scotch coyn, but in Engliſh Silver; nay who from the firſt beginning of theſe troubles, what with brotherly aſſiſtance, and what with monthly pay, have defended thir own Liberty and Conſciences at our charge. However it was a hazardous and raſh journey taken to reſolve riddles in mens Loyalty, who had more reaſon to miſtruſt the riddle of ſuch a diſguiſed yeelding; and to put himſelf in thir hands whoſe Loyalty was a Riddle to him, was not the cours to be reſolv'd of it, but to tempt it. What Providence deni'd to Force, he thought it might grant to Fraud, which he ſtiles Prudence: But Providence was not cozen'd with diſguiſes, neither outward nor inward.

To have known his greateſt danger in his ſuppoſed ſafety, and his greateſt ſafety in his ſuppoſed danger, was to him a fatal riddle never yet reſolv'd; wherein rather to have imploy'd his main skill had been much more to his preſervation.

Had he known when the Game was loſt, it might have ſav'd much conteſt; but the way to give over fairly was not to ſlip out of op'n War into a new diſguiſe. He lays down his Arms, but not his Wiles; nor all his Arms; for in obſtinacy he comes no leſs arm'd then ever, Cap a pè. And what were they but wiles, continually to move for Treaties, and yet to perſiſt the ſame man, and to fortifie his mind before hand, ſtill purpoſing to grant no more then what ſeem'd good to that violent and lawleſs Triumvirate within him, under the falſifi'd names of his Reaſon, Honour, and Conſcience, the old circulating dance of his ſhifts and evaſions?

The words of a King, as they are full of power, in the autority and ſtrength of Law, ſo like Sampſon without the ſtrength of that Nazarites lock, they have no more power in them then the words of another Man.

He adores Reaſon as Domitian did Minerva, and calls her the Divineſt power, thereby to intimate as if at reaſoning, as at his own weapon, no man were ſo able as himſelf. Might we be ſo happy as to know where theſe monuments of his Reaſon may be ſeen; for in his actions and his writing they appear as thinly as could be expected from the meaneſt parts, bred up in the midſt of ſo many ways extraordinary to know ſomthing. He who reads his talk, would think he had left Oxford not without mature deliberation: Yet his Prayer confeſſes that he knew not what to do. Thus is verifi'd that Pſalm; he poureth contempt upon Princes, and cauſeth them to wander in the Wilderneſs where there is no way, Pſal. 107.

XXIII. Upon the Scots delivering the King to the Engliſh.

THAT the Scots in England ſhould ſell thir King, as he himſelf here aſfirms, and for a price ſo much above that, which the covetouſneſs of Judas was contented with to ſell our Saviour, is ſo foul an infamy and diſhonour caſt upon them, as befits none to vindicate but themſelves. And it were but friendly Counſel to wiſh them beware the Son, who comes among them with a firm belief that they ſold his Father. The reſt of this Chapter he ſacrifices to the echo of his Conſcience, out-babling Creeds and Ave's, glorying in his reſolute obſtinacy, and as it were triumphing how evident it is now that not evil Counſellors, but he himſelf hath been the Author of all our Troubles. Herein only we ſhall diſagree to the Worlds end, while he who ſought ſo manifeſtly to have annihilated all our Laws and Liberties, hath the confidence to perſwade us that he hath fought and ſuffer'd all this while in thir defence.

But he who neither by his own Letters and Commiſſions under Hand and Seal, nor by his own actions held as in a Mirror before his face, will be convinc'd to ſee his faults, can much leſs be won upon by any force of words, neither he, nor any that take after him; who in that reſpect are no more to be diſputed with then they who deny principles. No queſtion then, but the Parlament did wiſely in thir decree at laſt, to make no more Addreſſes. For how unalterable his will was, that would have bin our Lord, how uttterly averſe from the Parlament and Reformation during his confinement, we may behold in this Capter. But to be ever anſwering fruitleſs Repetitions, I ſhould become liable to anſwer for the ſame my ſelf. He borrows Davids Pſalms, as he charges the Aſſembly of Divines in his twentieth Diſcourſe, To have ſet forth old Catechiſms and Confeſſions of Faith new dreſt. Had he borrow'd Davids heart, it had bin much the holier theſt. For ſuch kind of borrowing as this, if it be not better'd by the borrower, among good Authors is accounted Plagiarie. However, this was more tolerable then Pamela's Praier ſtol'n out of Sir Philip.

XXIV. Upon the denying him the attendance of his Chaplains.

A CHAPLAIN is a thing ſo diminutive and inconſiderable, that how he ſhould come heer among matters of ſo great concernment to take ſuch room up in the Diſcourſes of a Prince, if it be not wonder'd, is to be ſmil'd at. Certainly by me ſo mean an Argument ſhall not be writt'n; but I ſhall huddle him, as he does Prayers. The Scripture owns no ſuch order, no ſuch function in the Church; and the Church not owning them, they are left, for ought I know, to ſuch a furder examining as the Sons of Sceva the Jew met with; Biſhops or Presbyters we know, and Deacons we know, but what are Chaplains? In State perhaps they may be liſted among the upper ſerving-men of ſome great houſhold, and be admitted to ſom ſuch place, as may ſtile them the Sewers, or the Yeomen Uſhers of Devotion, where the Maſter is too reſtie, or too rich to ſay his own Prayers, or to bleſs his own Table. Wherfore ſhould the Parlament then take ſuch implements of the Court Cupbord into thir conſideration? They knew them to have been the main corrupters at the Kings elbow; they knew the King to have bin always thir moſt attentive Scholar and Imitator, and of a Child to have ſuckt from them and thir Cloſet-work all his impotent Principles of Tyrannie and Superſtition. While therfore they had any hope left of his reclaiming, theſe ſowers of Malignant Tares they kept aſunder from him, and ſent to him ſuch of the Miniſters and other zealous Perſons as they thought were beſt able to inſtruct him, and to convert him. What could Religion her ſelf have don more to the ſaving of a Soul? But when they found him paſt Cure, and that he to himſelf was grown the moſt evil Counſeler of all, they deny'd him not his Chaplains, as many as were fitting, and ſom of them attended him, or els were at his call to the very laſt. Yet heer he makes more Lamentation for the want of his Chaplains, then ſuperſtitious Micah did to the Danites, who had tak'n away his houſhold Prieſt: Te have tak'n away my Gods which I made, and the Prieſt, and what have I more? And perhaps the whole Story of Micah might ſquare not unfitly to this Argument: Now know I, ſaith he, that the Lord will do me good, ſeeing I have a Levite to my Prieſt. Micah had as great a care that his Prieſt ſhould be Moſaical, as the King had that his ſhould be Apoſtolical; yet both in errour touching thir Prieſts. Houſhold and privat Oriſons were not to be officiated by Prieſts; for neither did public Prayer appertain only to thir office. Kings heertofore, David, Salomon, and Jehoſophat, who might not touch the Prieſthood, yet might pray in public, yea in the Temple, while the Prieſts themſelves ſtood and heard. What aild this King then, that he could not chew his own Mattins without the Prieſts Ore tenus? Yet it is like he could not pray at home, who can heer publiſh a whole Prayer-book of his own, and ſignifies in ſome part of this Chapter almoſt as good a mind to be a Prieſt himſelf, as Micah had to let his Son be. There was doubtleſs therfore ſome other matter in it which made him ſo deſirous to have his Chaplains about him, who were not only the contrivers, but very oft the inſtruments alſo of his deſigns.

The Miniſters which were ſent him no marvel he indur'd not; for they preacht repentance to him: the others gave him eaſie confeſſion, eaſie abſolution, nay ſtrengthn'd his hands, and hard'nd his heart, by applauding him in his wilful ways. To them he was an Ahab, to theſe a Conſtantine; it muſt follow then that they to him were as unwelcome as Eliah was to Ahab, theſe as deer and pleaſing as Amaziah the Prieſt of Bethel was to Jeroboam. Theſe had learnt well the leſſon that would pleaſe; Propheſie not againſt Bethel, for it is the Kings Chappel, the Kings Court; and had taught the King to ſay of thoſe Miniſters which the Parlament had ſent, Amos hath conſpir'd againſt me, the Land is not able to bear all his words.

Returning to our firſt Parallel, this King lookt upon his Prelats, as Orphans under the ſacrilegious eyes of many rapacious Reformers: and there was as great fear of Sacrilege between Micah and his Mother, till with thir holy treaſure, about the loſs whereof there was ſuch a curſing, they made a grav'n and a molt'n Image, and got a Prieſt of thir own. To let go his criticizing about the ſound of Prayers, imperious, rude, or paſſionat modes of his own deviſing, we are in danger to fall again upon the flats and ſhallows of Liturgie. Which if I ſhould repeat again, would turn my anſwers into Reſponſories, and beget another Liturgie, having too much of one already.

This only I ſhall add, that if the heart, as he alleges, cannot ſafely join with another mans extemporal ſufficiency, becauſe we know not ſo exactly what they mean to ſay, then thoſe public Prayers made in the Temple by thoſe forenamed Kings, and by the Apoſtles in the Congregation, and by the ancient Chriſtians for above three hundred years before Liturgies came in, were with the people made in vain.

After he hath acknowledg'd that Kings heertofore pray'd without Chaplains, ev'n publicly in the Temple it ſelf, and that every privat Beleever is inveſted with a royal Prieſthood; yet like one that reliſht not what he taſted of the heav'nly gift, and the good word of God, whoſe name he ſo confidently takes into his mouth, he frames to himſelf impertinent and vain reaſons why he ſhould rather pray by the officiating mouth of a Cloſet-Chaplain. Thir Prayers, ſaith he, are more prevalent, they flow from minds more enlightn'd, from affections leſs diſtracted. Admit this true, which is not, this might be ſomthing ſaid as to thir prayers for him, but what avails it to thir praying with him? If his own mind be incumbred with ſecular affairs, what helps it his particular prayer, tho the mind of his Chaplain be not wandring, either after new preferment, or his dinner? The fervencie of one man in prayer cannot ſupererogate for the coldneſs of another; neither can his ſpiritual defects in that duty be made out in the acceptance of God by another mans abilities. Let him endeavour to have more light in himſelf, and not to walk by another mans Lamp, but to get Oyle into his own. Let him caſt from him, as in a Chriſtian warfare, that ſecular incumbrance which either diſtracts or overloads him; his load els will never be the leſs heavie, becauſe another mans is light. Thus theſe pious flouriſhes and colours examin'd throughly, are like the Apples of Aſphaltis, appearing goodly to the ſudden eye, but look well upon them, or at leaſt but touch them, and they turn into Cinders.

In his Prayer he remembers what voices of joy and gladneſs there were in his Chappel, God's Houſe, in his opinion, between the Singing-men and the Organs; and this was unity of ſpirit in the bond of peace; the vanity, ſuperſtition, and miſdevotion of which place, was a ſcandal far and neer: Wherin ſo many things were ſung, and pray'd in thoſe Songs which were not underſtood: and yet he who makes a difficulty how the people can join thir hearts to extemporal Prayers, though diſtinctly heard and underſtood, makes no queſtion how they ſhould join thir hearts in unitie to ſongs not underſtood.

I beleeve that God is no more mov'd with a prayer elaborately pen'd, then men truly charitable, are mov'd with the pen'd ſpeech of a Beggar.

Finally, O ye Miniſters, read here what work he makes among your Gally-pots, your Balms and Cordials; and not only your ſweet Sippets in Widows Houſes, but the huge gobbets wherwith he charges you, to have devour'd houſes and all; the houſes of your Brethren, your King, and your God. Cry him up for a Saint in your Pulpits, while he cries you down for Atheiſts into Hell.

XXV. Upon his penitential Meditations and Vows at Holmby.

IT is not hard for any man who hath a Bible in his hands, to borrow good words and holy ſayings in abundance; but to make them his own, is a work of grace only from above. He borrows here many penitential Verſes out of David's Pſalms. So did many among thoſe Iſraelites, who had revolted from the true Worſhip of God, invent to themſelves inſtruments of muſick like David, and probably Pſalms alſo like his, and yet the Profet Amos complains heavily againſt them. But to prove how ſhort this is of true repentance, I will recite the penitence of others, who have repented, in words not borrow'd, but thir own, and yet by the doom of Scripture it ſelf are judg'd reprobates.

Cain ſaid unto the Lord, My Iniquity is greater then I can bear: behold thou haſt driv'n me this day from the face of the earth, and from thy face ſhall I be hid.

And when Eſau heard the words of his Father, he cry'd with an exceeding bitter cry, and ſaid, Bleſs me, ev'n me alſo O my Father; yet found no place of repentance, though he ſought it carefully with tears, Heb. 12.

And Pharaoh ſaid to Moſes; The Lord is righteous, I and my people are wicked; I have ſin'd againſt the Lord your God, and againſt you.

And Balaam ſaid, Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my laſt end be like his.

And Saul ſaid to Samuel, I have ſin'd, for I have tranſgreſs'd the commandment of the Lord; yet honour me now I pray thee before the Elders of my People.

And when Ahab heard the words of Eliah, he rent his cloaths, and put ſackcloth upon his fleſh, and faſted, and lay in ſackcloth, and went ſoftly.

Jehoram alſo rent his cloaths, and the people look'd, and behold he had ſackcloth upon his fleſh; yet in the very act of his humiliation he could ſay, God do ſo, and more alſo to me, if the head of Eliſhah ſhall ſtand on him this day.

Therfore ſaith the Lord, They have not cry'd unto me with thir heart, when they howl'd upon thir beds. They return, but not to the Moſt High. Hoſea 7.

And Judas ſaid, I have ſin'd in that I have betray'd innocent blood.

And Simon Magus ſaid, Pray ye to the Lord for me that none of theſe things come upon me.

All theſe took the pains both to confeſs and to repent in thir own words, and many of them in thir own tears, not in David's. But tranſported with the vain oſtentation of imitating David's language, not his life, obſerve how he brings a curſe upon himſelf and his Father's houſe (God ſo diſpoſing it) by his uſurp'd and ill-imitated Prayer, Let thy anger I beſeech thee be againſt me and my Father's houſe ; as for theſe Sheep what have they done. For if David indeed ſin'd in numbring the people, of which fault he in earneſt made that confeſſion, and acquitted the whole people from the guilt of that ſin ; then doth this King, uſing the ſame words, bear witneſs againſt himſelf to be the guilty Perſon, and either in his Soul and Conſcience here acquits the Parlament and the People, or els abuſes the words of David, and diſſembles groſly ev'n to the face of God ; which is apparent in the very next line ; wherein he accuſes ev'n the Church it ſelf to God, as if ſhe were the Churches Enemie, for having overcome his Tyranny by the powerful and miraculous might of God's manifeſt arm : For to other ſtrength in the midſt of our diviſions and diſorders, who can attribute our Victories ? Thus had this miſerable man no worſe enemies to ſollicit and mature his own deſtruction, from the haſtn'd ſentence of divine Juſtice, then the obdurate curſes which proceeded againſt himſelf out of his own mouth.

Hitherto his Meditations, now his Vows, which as the Vows of Hypocrites uſe to be, are moſt commonly abſurd, and ſome wicked. Jacob vow'd that God ſhould be his God, if he granted him but what was neceſſary to perform that Vow, life and ſubſiſtence : but the obedience profer'd here is nothing ſo cheap. He who took ſo hainouſly to be offer'd nineteen Propoſitions from the Parlament, capitulates here with God almoſt in as many Articles.

If he will continue that light, or rather that darkneſs, of the Goſpel, which is among his Prelates, ſettle thir Luxuries, and make them gorgeous Biſhops ;

If he will reſtore the grievances and miſchiefs of thoſe obſolet and Popiſh Laws, which the Parlament without his conſent hath abrogated, and will ſuffer Juſtice to be executed according to his ſenſe ;

If he will ſuppreſs the many Schiſms in Church, to contradict himſelf in that which he hath foretold muſt and ſhall come to paſs, and will remove Reformation as the greateſt Schiſm of all, and Factions in the State, by which he means in every leaf the Parlament ;

If he will reſtore him to his Negative voice and the Militia, as much as to ſay, to arbitrary Power, which he wrongfully avers to be the right of his Predeceſſors ;

If he will turn the hearts of his people to thir old Cathedral and Parochial ſervice in the Liturgie, and their Paſſive Obedience to the King ;

If he will quench the Army, and withdraw our Forces from withſtanding the Piracy of Rupert, and the plotted Iriſh Invaſion ;

If he will bleſs him with the freedom of Biſhops again in the Houſe of Peers, and of fugitive Delinquents in the Houſe of Commons, and deliver the honour of Parlament into his hands, from the moſt natural and due protection of the people, that entruſted them with the dangerous enterprize of being faithful to thir Country againſt the rage and malice of his tyrannous oppoſition ;

If he will keep him from that great offence of following the counſel of his Parlament, and enacting what they adviſe him to, which in all reaſon, and by the known Law and Oath of his Coronation he ought to do, and not to call that Sacrilege which Neceſſity through the continuance of his own Civil War hath compell'd them to ; Neceſſity, which made David eat the Shew-bread, made Ezekiah take all the Silver which was found in God's Houſe, and cut off the Gold which overlaid thoſe dores and pillars, and give it to Senacherib ; Neceſſitie, which ofttimes made the Primitive Church to ſell her ſacred Utenſils, ev'n to the Communion-Chalice ;

If he will reſtore him to a capacity of glorifying him by doing that both in Church and State, which muſt needs diſhonour and pollute his Name ;

If he will bring him again with peace, honour and ſafety to his chief City, without repenting, without ſatisfying for the blood ſpilt, only for a few politick Conceſſions which are as good as nothing ;

If he will put again the Sword into his hand, to puniſh thoſe that have deliver'd us, and to protect Delinquents againſt the Juſtice of Parlament ;

Then, if it be poſſible to reconcile Contradictions, he will praiſe him by diſpleaſing him, and ſerve him by diſſerving him.

His glory, in the gaudy Copes and painted Windows, Miters, Rochets, Altars, and the chanted Service-Book, ſhall be dearer to him then the eſtabliſhing his Crown in righteouſneſs, and the ſpiritual power of Religion.

He will pardon thoſe that have offended him in particular, but there ſhall want no ſuttle ways to be ev'n with them upon another ſcore of thir ſuppos'd Offences againſt the Common-wealth; whereby he may at once affect the glory of a ſeeming juſtice, and deſtroy them pleaſantly, while he fains to forgive them as to his own particular, and outwardly bewails them.

Theſe are the conditions of his treating with God, to whom he bates nothing of what he ſtood upon with the Parlament: as if Commiſſions of Array could deal with him alſo. But of all theſe conditions, as it is now evident in our eyes, God accepted none, but that final Petition which he ſo oft, no doubt but by the ſecret judgment of God, importunes againſt his own head; praying God, That his mercies might be ſo toward him, as his reſolutions of truth and peace were toward his people. It follows then, God having cut him off without granting any of theſe mercies, that his reſolutions were as fained, as his Vows are fruſtrate.

XXVI. Upon the Armies ſurpriſal of the King at Holmby.

TO give account to Royaliſts what was done with thir vanquiſht King, yielded up into our hands, is not to be expected from them whom God hath made his Conquerors. And for Brethren to debate and rip up thir falling out in the ear of a common enemy, thereby making him the Judg, or at leaſt the well-pleas'd auditor of thir diſagreement, is neither wiſe nor comely. To the King therfore, were he living, or to his Party yet remaining, as to this action, there belongs no anſwer. Emulations, all men know are incident among military men, and are, if they exceed not, pardonable. But ſome of the former Army, eminent anough for thir own martial deeds, and prevalent in the Houſe of Commons, touch'd with envy to be ſo far outdone by a new model which they contemn'd, took advantage of Presbyterian and Independent Names, and the virulence of ſome Miniſters, to raiſe diſturbance. And the War being then ended, thought ſlightly to have diſcarded them, who had faithfully done the work, without thir due pay, and the reward of thir invincible valour. But they who had the Sword yet in thir hands, diſdaining to be made the firſt objects of ingratitude and oppreſſion, after all that expence of thir blood for Juſtice and the common Liberty, ſeiz'd upon the King thir Priſoner, whom nothing but thir matchleſs deeds had brought ſo low as to ſurrender up his Perſon: though he, to ſtir up new diſcord, choſe rather to give up himſelf a captive to his own Country-men who leſs had won him. This in likelihood might have grown to ſome height of miſchief; partly through the ſtrife which was kindling between our elder and our younger Warriors, but chiefly through the ſeditious tongues of ſome falſe Miniſters, more zealous againſt Sciſms, then againſt thir own Simony and Pluralities, or watchful of the common Enemy, whoſe ſuttle inſinuations had got ſo far in among them, as with all diligence to blow the coles. But it pleas'd God not to embroil and put to confuſion his whole people for the perverſneſs of a few. The growth of our diſſention was either prevented, or ſoon quieted; the Enemy ſoon deceav'd of his rejoicing, and the King eſpecially diſappointed of not the meaneſt morſel that his hope preſented him, to ruin us by our diviſion. And being now ſo nigh the end, we may the better be at leaſure to ſtay a while, and hear him commenting upon his own Captivity.

He ſaith of his ſurpriſal, that it was a motion eccentrick and irregular. What then? his own alluſion, from the Celeſtial bodies, puts us in mind that irregular motions may be neceſſary on earth ſometimes as well as conſtantly in Heaven. That is not always beſt which is moſt regular to writt'n Law. Great Worthies heretofore by diſobeying Law, ofttimes have ſav'd the Common-wealth: and the Law afterward by firm Decree hath approv'd that planetary motion, that unblamable exorbitancy in them.

He means no good to either Independent or Presbyterian, and yet his parable, like that of Balaam, is overrul'd to portend them good, far beſide his intention. Thoſe twins that ſtrove enclos'd in the womb of Rebeccah, were the ſeed of Abraham; the younger undoubtedly gain'd the heavnly Birthright; the elder though ſupplanted in his Similie, ſhall yet no queſtion find a better portion then Eſau found, and far above his uncircumcis'd Prelates.

He cenſures, and in cenſuring ſeems to hope it will be an ill Omen that they who build Jeruſalem divide thir tongues and hands. But his hope fail'd him with his example; for that there were diviſions both of tongues and hands at the building of Jeruſalem, the Story would have certifi'd him; and yet the work proſper'd: and if God will, ſo may this, notwithſtanding all the craft and malignant wiles of Sanballat and Tobiah, adding what fuel they can to our diſſentions; or the indignity of his compariſon, that lik'ns us to thoſe ſeditious Zelots whoſe inteſtine fury brought deſtruction to the laſt Jeruſalem.

It being now no more in his hand to be reveng'd on his oppoſers, he ſeeks to ſatiate his fanſie with the imagination of ſome revenge upon them from above; and like one who in a drowth obſerves the Skie, ſits and watches when any thing will drop, that might ſolace him with the likeneſs of a Puniſhment from Heav'n upon us: which he ſtrait expounds how he pleaſes. No evil can befal the Parlament or City, but he poſitively interprets it a judgment upon them for his ſake; as if the very manuſcript of God's Judgments had bin deliver'd to his cuſtody and expoſition. But his reading declares it well to be a fals copy which he uſes; diſpenſing oft'n to his own bad deeds and ſucceſſes the teſtimony of Divine Favour, and to the good deeds and ſucceſſes of other men, Divine Wrath and Vengeance. But to counterfet the hand of God is the boldeſt of all Forgery: And he who without warrant, but his own fantaſtick ſurmiſe, takes upon him perpetually to unfold the ſecret and unſearchable Myſteries of high Providence, is likely for the moſt part to miſtake and ſlander them; and approaches to the madneſs of thoſe reprobate thoughts, that would wreſt the Sword of Juſtice out of God's own hand, and imploy it more juſtly in his own conceit. It was a ſmall thing to contend with the Parlament about the ſole power of the Militia, when we ſee him doing little leſs then laying hands on the weapons of God himſelf, which are his judgments, to weild and manage them by the ſway and bent of his own frail Cogitations. Therefore they that by Tumults firſt occaſion'd the raiſing of Armies, in his doom muſt needs be chaſtn'd by thir own Army for new Tumults.

Firſt note here his confeſſion, that thoſe Tumults were the firſt occaſion of raiſing Armies, and by conſequence that he himſelf rais'd them firſt againſt thoſe ſuppoſed Tumults. But who occaſion'd thoſe Tumults, or who made them ſo, being at firſt nothing more then the unarmed and peaceable concourſe of people, hath bin diſcuſt already. And that thoſe pretended Tumults were chaſtiz'd by thir own Army for new Tumults, is not prov'd by a Game at tic-tack with words; Tumults and Armies, Armies and Tumults, but ſeems more like the method of a Juſtice irrational then divine.

If the City were chaſt'nd by the Army for new Tumults, the reaſon is by himſelf ſet down evident and immediate, thir new Tumults. With what ſenſe can it be referr'd then to another far-fetch'd and imaginary cauſe that happn'd ſo many years before, and in his ſuppoſition only as a cauſe? Manlius defended the Capitol and the Romans from thir enemies the Gauls: Manlius for ſedition afterward was by the Romans thrown headlong from the Capitol, therefore Manlius was puniſh'd by divine Juſtice for defending the Capitol, becauſe in that place puniſh'd for ſedition, and by thoſe whom he defended. This is his Logick upon Divine Juſtice; and was the ſame before upon the death of Sir John Hotham. And here again, ſuch as were content to ſee him driv'n away by unſuppreſſed Tumults, are now forc'd to fly to an Army. Was this a judgment? was it not a mercy rather that they had a noble and victorious Army ſo near at hand to fly to?

From God's Juſtice he comes down to Man's Juſtice. Thoſe few of both Houſes who at firſt withdrew with him from the vain pretence of Tumults, were counted Deſertors; therſore thoſe many muſt be alſo Deſertors who withdrew afterwards from real Tumults: as if it were the place that made a Parlament, and not the end and cauſe. Becauſe it is deny'd thoſe were Tumults from which the King made ſhew of being driv'n, is it therſore of neceſſity impli'd, that there could be never any Tumults for the future? If ſome men fly in craft, may not other men have cauſe to fly in earneſt? But mark the difference between thir flight and his; they ſoon return'd in ſafety to thir places, he not till after many years, and then a Captive to receive his puniſhment. So that thir flying, whether the cauſe be conſider'd or the event, or both, neither juſtifi'd him, nor condemn'd themſelves.

But he will needs have vengeance to purſue and overtake them; though to bring it in, it coſt him an inconvenient and obnoxious compariſon, As the Mice and Rats overtook a German Biſhop. I would our Mice and Rats had bin as orthodoxal here, and had ſo purſu'd all his Biſhops out of England; then vermin had rid away vermin, which now hath loſt the lives of too many thouſand honeſt men to do.

He cannot but obſerve this Divine Juſtice yet with ſorrow and pity. But ſorrow and pity in a weak and overmaſter'd Enemy, is lookt upon no otherwiſe then as the Aſhes of his revenge burnt out upon it ſelf; or as the damp of a cool'd fury when we ſay it gives. But in this manner to ſit ſpelling and obſerving Divine Juſtice upon every accident and ſlight diſturbance that may happ'n humanly to the affairs of Men, is but another fragment of his brok'n revenge; and yet the ſhrewdeſt and the cunningeſt Obloquie that can be thrown upon thir Actions. For if he can perſwade men that the Parlament and thir cauſe is purſu'd with Divine Vengeance, he hath attain'd his end, to make all men forſake them, and think the worſt that can be thought of them.

Nor is he only content to ſuborn Divine Juſtice in his cenſure of what is paſt, but he aſſumes the perſon of Chriſt himſelf to prognoſticate over us what he wiſhes would come. So little is any thing or perſon ſacred from him, no not in Heav'n, which he will not uſe, and put on, if it may ſerve him plauſibly to wreck his ſpleen, or eaſe his mind upon the Parlament. Although if ever fatal blindneſs did both attend and puniſh wilfulneſs, if ever any enjoi'd not comforts for neglecting counſel belonging to thir peace, it was in none more evidently brought to paſs then in himſelf: and his Predictions againſt the Parlament and thir Adherents have for the moſt part bin verify'd upon his own head, and upon his chief Counſellors.

He concludes with high praiſes of the Army. But praiſes in an Enemy are ſuperfluous, or ſmell of craft; and the Army ſhall not need his praiſes, nor the Parlament fare worſe for his accuſing prayers that follow. Wherin as his Charity can be no way comparable to that of Chriſt, ſo neither can his aſſurance that they whom he ſeems to pray for, in doing what they did againſt him, knew not what they did. It was but arrogance therfore, and not charity, to lay ſuch ignorance to others in the ſight of God, till he himſelf had bin infallible, like him whoſe peculiar words he overweeningly aſſumes.

XXVII. Intitl'd to the Prince of Wales.

WHAT the King wrote to his Son, as a Father, concerns not us; what he wrote to him as a King of England, concerns not him; God and the Parlament having now otherwiſe diſpos'd of England. But becauſe I ſee it done with ſome artifice and labour, to poſſeſs the people that they might amend thir preſent condition, by his or by his Son's reſtorement, I ſhall ſhew point by point, that although the King had bin reinſtall'd to his deſire, or that his Son admitted, ſhould obſerve exactly all his Father's Precepts, yet that this would be ſo far from conducing to our happineſs, either as a remedy to the preſent diſtempers, or a prevention of the like to come, that it would inevitably throw us back again into all our paſt and fulfill'd miſeries; would force us to fight over again all our tedious Wars, and put us to another fatal ſtruggling for Libertie and Life, more dubious then the former. In which as our ſucceſs hath bin no other then our cauſe; ſo it will be evident to all poſteritie, that his miſfortunes were the meer conſequence of his perverſe Judgment.

Firſt he argues from the experience of thoſe troubles which both he and his Son have had, to the improvement of thir piety and patience: and by the way bears witneſs in his own words, that the corrupt education of his youth, which was but glanc'd at only in ſome former paſſages of this Anſwer, was a thing neither of mean conſideration, nor untruly charg'd upon him or his Son: himſelf confeſſing here that Court-delights are prone either to root up all true vertue and honour, or to be contented only with ſome leavs and withering formalities of them, without any real fruits tending to the publick good: Which preſents him ſtill in his own words another Rehoboam, ſoft'nd by a far worſe Court then Salomon's, and ſo corrupted by flatteries, which he affirms to be unſeparable, to the overturning of all peace, and the loſs of his own Honour and Kingdoms. That he came therefore thus bred up and nurtur'd to the Throne, far worſe then Rehoboam, unleſs he be of thoſe who equaliz'd his Father to King Salomon, we have here his own confeſſion. And how voluptuouſly, how idely raigning in the hands of other men, he either tyranniz'd or trifl'd away thoſe ſeventeen years of peace, without care or thought, as if to be a King had bin nothing elſe in his apprehenſion, but to eat and drink, and have his will, and take his pleaſure; though there be who can relate his domeſtick life to the exactneſs of a diary, there ſhall be here no mention made. This yet we might have then foreſeen, that he who ſpent his leiſure ſo remiſly and ſo corruptly to his own pleaſing, would one day or other be worſe buſied and imploy'd to our ſorrow. And that he acted in good earneſt what Rehoboam did but threat'n, to make his little finger heavier than his Father's loins, and to whip us with his two-twiſted Scorpions, both temporal and ſpiritual Tyranny, all his Kingdoms have felt. What good uſe he made afterward of his adverſitie, both his impenitence and obſtinacy to the end (for he was no Manaſſeh) and the ſequel of theſe his meditated reſolutions, abundantly expreſs; retaining, commending, teaching to his Son all thoſe putrid and pernicious documents both of State and of Religion, inſtill'd by wicked Doctors, and receiv'd by him as in a Veſſel nothing better ſeaſon'd, which were the firſt occaſion both of his own and all our miſeries. And if he in the beſt maturity of his years and underſtanding made no better uſe to himſelf or others of his ſo long and manifold afflictions, either looking up to God, or looking down upon the reaſon of his own affairs, there can be no probability that his Son, bred up, not in the ſoft effeminacies of Court only, but in the rugged and more boiſtrous licence of undiſciplin'd Camps and Gariſons, for years unable to reflect with judgment upon his own condition, and thus ill inſtructed by his Father, ſhould give his mind to walk by any other rules then theſe bequeath'd him as on the death-bed of his Father, and as the choiſeſt of all that experience, which his moſt ſerious obſervation and retirement in good or evil days, had taught him. David indeed by ſuffering without juſt cauſe, learnt that meekneſs and that wiſdom by adverſity, which made him much the fitter man to raign. But they who ſuffer as Oppreſſors, Tyrants, violaters of Law, and perſecuters of Reformation, without appearance of repenting, if they once get hold again of that dignity and power which they had loſt, are but whetted and inrag'd by what they ſuffer'd, againſt thoſe whom they look upon as them that caus'd thir ſuffrings.

How he hath bin ſubject to the ſcepter of God's Word and Spirit, though acknowledg'd to be the beſt Government, and what his diſpenſation of civil power hath bin, with what Juſtice, and what honour to the public Peace, it is but looking back upon the whole catalogue of his deeds, and that will be ſufficient to remember us. The Cup of Gods Phyſic, as he calls it, what alteration it wrought in him to a firm healthfulneſs from any ſurfet or exceſs whereof the people generally thought him ſick, if any man would go about to prove, we have his own teſtimony following heer, that it wrought none at all.

Firſt, he hath the ſame fix'd opinion and eſteem of his old Epheſian Goddeſs, call'd the Church of England, as he had ever, and charges ſtrictly his Son after him to perſevere in that Anti-Papal Sciſm (for it is not much better) as that which will be neceſſary both for his Soul's and the Kingdoms peace. But if this can be any foundation of the Kingdoms peace, which was the firſt cauſe of our diſtractions, let common ſenſe be Judg. It is a rule and principle worthy to be known by Chriſtians, that no Scripture, no nor ſo much as any ancient Creed, binds our Faith, or our obedience to any Church whatſoever, denominated by a particular name; far leſs, if it be diſtinguiſht by a ſeveral Government from that which is indeed catholic. No man was ever bid be ſubject to the Church of Corinth, Rome, or Aſia, but to the Church without addition, as it held faithful to the rules of Scripture, and the Government eſtabliſht in all places by the Apoſtles; which at firſt was univerſally the ſame in all Churches and Congregations; not differing or diſtinguiſht by the diverſity of Countries, Territories, or civil bounds. That Church that from the name of a diſtinct place takes autority to ſet up a diſtinct Faith or Government, is a Schiſm and Faction, not a Church. It were an injury to condemn the Papiſt of abſurdity and contradiction for adhering to his Catholic Romiſh Religion, if we, for the pleaſure of a King and his politic conſiderations, ſhall adhere to a Catholic Engliſh.

But ſuppoſe the Church of England were as it ought to be, how is it to us the ſafer by being ſo nam'd and eſtabliſht, whenas that very name and eſtabliſhment, by his contriving or approbation, ſerv'd for nothing els but to delude us and amuſe us, while the Church of England was almoſt chang'd into the Church of Rome? Which as every man knows in general to be true, ſo the particular Treaties and Tranſactions tending to that concluſion are at large diſcover'd in a Book intitl'd the Engliſh Pope. But when the people, diſcerning theſe abuſes, began to call for Reformation, in order to which the Parlament demanded of the King to uneſtabliſh that Prelatical Government, which without Scripture had uſurpt over us, ſtrait, as Pharaoh accus'd of Idleneſs the Iſraelites that ſought leave to go and ſacrifice to God, he lays faction to thir charge. And that we may not hope to have ever any thing reform'd in the Church either by him or his Son, he forewarns him, That the Devil of Rebellion doth moſt commonly turn himſelf into an Angel of Reformation; and ſays anough to make him hate it, as the worſt of evils, and the bane of his Crown; nay he counſels him to let nothing ſeem little or deſpicable to him, ſo as not ſpeedily and effectually to ſuppreſs Errors and Sciſms. Wherby we may perceave plainly that our conſciences were deſtin'd to the ſame ſervitude and perſecution, if not wors then before, whether under him, or if it ſhould ſo happ'n, under his Son; who count all Proteſtant Churches erroneous and ſciſmatical, which are not Epiſcopal. His next precept is concerning our civil Liberties, which by his ſole voice and predominant will muſt be circumſcrib'd, and not permitted to extend a hands breadth furder then his interpretation of the Laws already ſettl'd. And although all human Laws are but the offspring of that frailty, that fallibility and imperfection which was in thir Authors, whereby many Laws in the change of ignorant and obſcure Ages, may be found both ſcandalous and full of greevance to thir Poſterity that made them, and no Law is furder good then mutable upon juſt occaſion; yet if the removing of an old Law, or the making of a new would ſave the Kingdom, we ſhall not have it unleſs his arbitrary voice will ſo far ſlack'n the ſtiff curb of his Prerogative, as to grant it us; who are as free born to make our own Laws, as our Fathers were who made theſe we have. Where are then the Engliſh Liberties which we boaſt to have bin left us by our Progenitors? To that he anſwers, that Our Liberties conſiſt in the enjoyment of the fruits of our Induſtry, and the benefit of thoſe Laws to which we our ſelves have conſented. Firſt, for the injoyment of thoſe fruits which our induſtry and labours have made our own upon our own, what privilege is that above what the Turks, Jews, and Moors enjoy under the Turkiſh Monarchy? For without that kind of Juſtice, which is alſo in Argiers, among Theeves and Pirats between themſelves, no kind of Government, no Societie, juſt or unjuſt, could ſtand; no combination or conſpiracy could ſtick together. Which he alſo acknowledges in theſe words: That if the Crown upon his head be ſo heavy as to oppreſs the whole body, the weakneſs of inferiour members cannot return any thing of ſtrength, honour, or ſafety to the head; but that a neceſſary debilitation muſt follow. So that this Liberty of the Subject concerns himſelf and the ſubſiſtence of his own regal power in the firſt place, and before the conſideration of any right belonging to the Subject. We expect therfore ſomthing more that muſt diſtinguiſh free Government from ſlaviſh. But inſtead of that, this King, though ever talking and proteſting as ſmooth as now, ſuffer'd it in his own hearing to be preacht and pleaded without controul or check, by them whom he moſt favour'd and upheld, that the Subject had no property of his own Goods, but that all was the Kings right.

Next, for the benefit of theſe Laws to which we our ſelves have conſented, we never had it under him; for not to ſpeak of Laws ill executed, when the Parlament, and in them the People, have conſented to divers Laws, and according to our ancient Rights, demanded them, he took upon him to have a Negative will, as the tranſcendent and ultimate Law above all our Laws; and to rule us forcibly by Laws to which we our ſelves did not conſent, but complain'd of. Thus theſe two heads, wherein the utmoſt of his allowance heer will give our Liberties leave to conſiſt, the one of them ſhall be ſo far only made good to us, as may ſupport his own Intereſt and Crown from ruin or debilitation; and ſo far Turkiſh Vaſſals enjoy as much liberty under Mahomet and the Grand Signior: the other we neither yet have enjoy'd under him, nor were ever like to do under the Tyranny of a Negative voice, which he claims above the unanimous conſent and power of a whole Nation virtually in the Parlament.

In which Negative voice to have bin caſt by the doom of War, and put to death by thoſe who vanquiſht him in thir own defence, he reck'ns to himſelf more then a Negative Martyrdom. But Martyrs bear witneſs to the truth, not to themſelves. If I bear witneſs of my ſelf, ſaith Chriſt, my witneſs is not true. He who writes himſelf Martyr by his own inſcription, is like an ill Painter, who by writing on the ſhapeleſs Picture which he hath drawn, is fain to tell paſſengers what ſhape it is; which els no man could imagin: no more then how a Martyrdom can belong to him, who therfore dies for his Religion becauſe it is eſtabliſht. Certainly if Agrippa had turn'd Chriſtian, as he was once turning, and had put to death Scribes and Phariſees for obſerving the Law of Moſes, and refuſing Chriſtianitie, they had di'd a truer Martyrdom. For thoſe Laws were eſtabliſht by God and Moſes, theſe by no warrantable authors of Religion, whoſe Laws in all other beſt reformed Churches are rejected. And if to die for an eſtabliſhment of Religion be Martyrdom, then Romiſh Prieſts executed for that which had ſo many hundred years bin eſtabliſht in this Land, are no wors Martyrs then he. Laſtly, if to die for the teſtimony of his own conſcience be anough to make him Martyr, what Heretic dying for direct Blaſphemie, as ſom have don conſtantly, may not boaſt a Martyrdom? As for the conſtitution or repeal of civil Laws, that power lying only in the Parlament, which he by the very Law of his Coronation was to grant them, not to debar them, nor to preſerve a leſſer Law with the contempt and violation of a greater, it will conclude him not ſo much as in a civil and metaphorical ſenſe to have di'd a Martyr of our Laws, but a plain Tranſgreſſor of them. And ſhould the Parlament, endu'd with Legiſlative power, make our Laws, and be after to diſpute them piece-meal with the reaſon, conſcience, humour, paſſion, fanſie, folly, obſtinacy, or other ends of one man, whoſe ſole word and will ſhall baffle and unmake what all the wiſdom of a Parlament hath been deliberatly framing, what a ridiculous and contemptible thing a Parlament would ſoon be, and what a baſe unworthy Nation we, who boaſt our freedom, and ſend them with the manifeſt peril of thir lives to preſerve it, they who are not mark'd by deſtiny for Slaves, may apprehend. In this ſervile condition to have kept us ſtill under hatches, he both reſolves heer to the laſt, and ſo inſtructs his Son.

As to thoſe offer'd condeſcentions of charitable connivence or toleration, if we conſider what went before, and what follows, they moulder into nothing. For what with not ſuffering ever ſo little to ſeem a deſpicable ſciſm, without effectual ſuppreſſion, as he warn'd him before, and what with no oppoſition of Law, Government, or eſtabliſht Religion to be permitted, which is his following proviſo, and wholly within his own conſtruction, what a miſerable and ſuſpected toleration, under Spies and haunting Promooters we ſhould enjoy, is apparent. Beſides that it is ſo far beneath the honour of a Parlament and free Nation to beg and ſupplicate the Godſhip of one frail man, for the bare and ſimple toleration of what they all conſent to be moſt juſt, pious, and beſt pleaſing to God, while that which is erroneous, unjuſt and miſcheivous in the Church or State, ſhall by him alone againſt them all be kept up and eſtabliſht, and they cenſur'd the while for a covetous, ambitious, and ſacrilegious Faction.

Another bait to allure the people, is the charge he laies upon his Son to be tender of them. Which if we ſhould beleeve in part, becauſe they are his Herd, his Cattel, the Stock upon his ground, as he accounts them, whom to waſt and deſtroy would undo himſelf, yet the inducement which he brings to move him renders the motion it ſelf ſomthing ſuſpicious. For if Princes need no Palliations, as he tells his Son, wherfore is it that he himſelf hath ſo oft'n us'd them? Princes, of all other men, have not more change of Rayment in thir Wardrobes, then variety of Shifts and Palliations in thir ſolemn actings and pretences to the People.

To try next if he can inſnare the prime men of thoſe who have oppos'd him, whom, more truly then his meaning was, he calls the Patrons and Vindicators of the People, he gives out Indemnity, and offers Acts of oblivion. But they who with a good conſcience and upright heart did thir civil duties in the ſight of God, and in thir ſeveral places, to reſiſt Tyranny and the violence of Superſtition banded both againſt them, he may be ſure will never ſeek to be forgiv'n that, which may be juſtly attributed to thir immortal praiſe; nor will aſſent ever to the guilty blotting out of thoſe actions before men, by which thir Faith aſſures them they chiefly ſtand approv'd, and are had in remembrance before the throne of God.

He exhorts his Son not to ſtudy revenge. But how far he, or at leaſt they about him intend to follow that exhortation, was ſeen lately at the Hague, and by what attempts were likewiſe made in other places. How implacable they would be, it will be wiſdom and our ſafety to beleeve rather, and prevent, then to make trial. And it will concern the multitude, tho courted heer, to take heed how they ſeek to hide or colour thir own fickleneſs and inſtability with a bad repentance of thir well-doing, and thir fidelity to the better cauſe, to which at firſt ſo cheerfully and conſcientiouſly they joyn'd themſelves.

He returns again to extol the Church of England, and again requires his Son by the joint autority of a Father and a King, not to let his heart receive the leaſt check or diſaffection againſt it. And not without cauſe, for by that means having ſole influence upon the Clergy, and they upon the people, after long ſearch and many diſputes, he could not poſſibly find a more compendious and politic way to uphold and ſettle Tyranny, then by ſubduing firſt the Conſciences of vulgar men with the inſenſible poyſon of thir ſlaviſh Doctrin: for then the body and beſotted mind without much reluctancy was likelieſt to admit the Yoke.

He commends alſo Parlaments held with freedom and with honour. But I would ask how that can be, while he only muſt be the ſole free Perſon in that number? and would have the power with his unaccountable denial to diſhonour them by rejecting all thir counſels, to confine thir Law-giving power, which is the Foundation of our freedom, and to change at his pleaſure the very name of a Parlament into the name of a Faction.

The concluſion therfore muſt needs be quite contrary to what he concludes; that nothing can be more unhappy, more diſhonourable, more unſafe for all, then when a wiſe, grave, and honourable Parlament ſhall have labour'd, debated, argu'd, conſulted, and as he himſelf ſpeaks, contributed for the public good all thir Counſels in common, to be then fruſtrated, diſappointed, deny'd and repuls'd by the ſingle whiff of a Negative, from the mouth of one wilful man; nay to be blaſted, to be ſtruck as mute and motionleſs as a Parlament of Tapeſtrie in the Hangings; or els after all thir pains and trouble to be diſſolv'd, and caſt away like ſo many Naughts in Arithmetick, unleſs it be to turn the O of thir inſignificance into a lamentation with the people who had ſo vainly ſent them. For this is not to enact all things by public conſent, as he would have us be perſwaded, this is to enact nothing but by the privat conſent and leave of one not negative Tyrant; this is miſchief without remedy, a ſtifling and obſtructing evil that hath no vent, no outlet, no paſſage through: Grant him this, and the Parlament hath no more freedom, then if it ſate in his Nooſe, which when he pleaſes to draw together with one twitch of his Negative, ſhall throttle a whole Nation, to the wiſh of Caligula, in one neck. This with the power of Militia in his own hands over our bodies and eſtates, and the Prelats to enthral our conſciences either by fraud or force, is the ſum of that happineſs and liberty we were to look for, whether in his own reſtitution, or in theſe precepts giv'n to his Son. Which unavoidably would have ſet us in the ſame ſtate of miſery wherein we were before; and have either compell'd us to ſubmit like bond-ſlaves, or put us back to a ſecond wandring over that horrid Wilderneſs of diſtraction and civil ſlaughter, which, not without the ſtrong and miraculous hand of God aſſiſting us, we have meaſur'd out, and ſurviv'd. And who knows, if we make ſo ſlight of this incomparable deliverance which God hath beſtow'd upon us, but that we ſhall like thoſe fooliſh Iſraelites, who depos'd God and Samuel to ſet up a King, cry out one day becauſe of our King, which we have bin mad upon, and then God, as he foretold them, will no more deliver us?

There remains now but little more of his diſcours, wherof yet to take a ſhort view will not be amiſs. His words make ſemblance as if he were magnanimouſly exerciſing himſelf, and ſo teaching his Son to want as well as to wear a Crown; and would ſeem to account it not worth taking up or enjoying upon ſordid, diſhonourable, and irreligious terms; and yet to his very laſt did nothing more induſtriouſly then ſtrive to take up and enjoy again his ſequeſterd Crown upon the moſt ſordid, diſloyal, diſhonourable, and irreligious terms, not of making peace only, but of joining and incorporating with the murdrous Iriſh, formerly by himſelf declar'd againſt, for wicked and deteſtable Rebels, odious to God and all good Men. And who but thoſe Rebels now are the chief ſtrength and confidence of his Son; while the Presbyter Scot that woes and ſollicits him, is neglected and put off, as if no terms were to him him ſordid, irreligious and diſhonourable, but the Scotiſh and Presbyterian.

He bids his Son keep to the true principles of piety, vertue, and honour, and he ſhall never want a Kingdom. And I ſay, People of England, keep ye to thoſe principles, ye ſhall never want a King. Nay after ſuch a fair deliverance as this, with ſo much fortitude and valour ſhewn againſt a Tyrant, that people that ſhould ſeek a King, claiming what this Man claims, would ſhew themſelves to be by nature Slaves and arrant Beaſts, not fit for that Liberty which they cri'd out and bellow'd for, but fitter to be led back again into thir old bondage, like a ſort of clamouring and fighting brutes broke looſe, that know not how to uſe or poſſeſs the liberty which they fought for.

The laſt ſentence whereon he ſeems to venture the whole waight of all his former reaſons and argumentations, That Religion to thir God, and loyalty to thir King cannot be parted, without the ſin and infelicity of a People, is contrary to the plain teaching of Chriſt, that no man can ſerve two Maſters, but if he hold to the one, he muſt reject and forſake the other. If God then, and earthly Kings be for the moſt part not ſeveral only, but oppoſite Maſters, it will as oft happ'n, that they who will ſerve thir King muſt forſake thir God, and they who will ſerve God muſt forſake thir King; which then will neither be thir ſin nor thir infelicity, but thir wiſdom, thir piety, and thir true happineſs, as to be deluded by theſe unſound and ſuttle oſtentations here, would be thir miſery.

XXVIII. Intitl'd Meditations upon Death.

IT might be well thought by him who reads no furder then the Title of this laſt Eſſay, that it requir'd no anſwer. For all other human things are diſputed, and will be variouſly thought of to the World's end. But this buſineſs of Death is a plain caſe, and admits no controverſy: In that center all Opinions meet. Nevertheleſs, ſince out of thoſe few mortifying hours that ſhould have bin intireſt to themſelves, and moſt at peace from all paſſion and diſquiet, he can afford ſpare time to inveigh bitterly againſt that Juſtice which was don upon him, it will be needful to ſay ſomthing in defence of thoſe Proceedings; tho briefly, in regard ſo much on this Subject hath been writt'n lately.

It happn'd once, as we find in Eſdras and Joſephus, Authors not leſs believ'd then any under ſacred, to be a great and ſolemn debate in the Court of Darius, what thing was to be counted ſtrongeſt of all other. He that could reſolve this in reward of his excelling wiſdom, ſhould be clad in Purple, drink in Gold, ſleep on a Bed of Gold, and ſit next to Darius. None but they doubtleſs who were reputed wiſe, had the Queſtion propounded to them: Who after ſome reſpit giv'n them by the King to conſider, in full Aſſembly of all his Lords and graveſt Counſellors, return'd ſeverally what they thought. The firſt held that Wine was ſtrongeſt; another that the King was ſtrongeſt. But Zorobabel Prince of the Captive Jews, and Heir to the Crown of Judah, being one of them, prov'd Women to be ſtronger then the King, for that he himſelf had ſeen a Concubin take his Crown from off his head to ſet it upon her own: And others beſides him have lately ſeen the like Feat done, and not in jeſt. Yet he prov'd on, and it was ſo yeilded by the King himſelf, and all his Sages, that neither Wine, nor Women, nor the King, but Truth, of all other things was the ſtrongeſt. For me, though neither ask'd, nor in a Nation that gives ſuch rewards to wiſdom, I ſhall pronounce my ſentence ſomwhat different from Zorobabel; and ſhall defend, that either Truth and Juſtice are all one, for Truth is but Juſtice in our knowledg, and Juſtice is but Truth in our practiſe; and he indeed ſo explains himſelf in ſaying that with Truth is no accepting of Perſons, which is the property of Juſtice: or els, if there be any odds, that Juſtice, though not ſtronger then Truth, yet by her office is to put forth and exhibit more ſtrength in the affairs of mankind. For Truth is properly no more then Contemplation; and her utmoſt efficiency is but teaching: but Juſtice in her very eſſence is all ſtrength and activity; and hath a Sword put into her hand, to uſe againſt all violence and oppreſſion on the earth. She it is moſt truly, who accepts no Perſon, and exempts none from the ſeverity of her ſtroke. She never ſuffers injury to prevail, but when falſhood firſt prevails over Truth; and that alſo is a kind of Juſtice done on them who are ſo deluded. Though wicked Kings and Tyrants counterfet her Sword, as ſome did that Buckler, fabl'd to fall from Heav'n into the Capitol, yet ſhe communicates her power to none but ſuch as like her ſelf are juſt, or at leaſt will do juſtice. For it were extream partialitie and injuſtice, the flat denial and overthrow of her ſelf, to put her own authentick Sword into the hand of an unjuſt and wicked Man, or ſo far to accept and exalt one mortal Perſon above his equals, that he alone ſhall have the puniſhing of all other men tranſgreſſing, and not receive like puniſhment from men, when he himſelf ſhall be found the higheſt Tranſgreſſor.

We may conclude therfore, that Juſtice, above all other things, is and ought to be the ſtrongeſt: She is the Strength, the Kingdom, the Power, and Majeſtie of all Ages. Truth her ſelf would ſubſcribe to this, though Darius and all the Monarchs of the World ſhould deny. And if by ſentence thus writt'n, it were my happineſs to ſet free the minds of Engliſh men from longing to return poorly under that Captivity of Kings, from which the ſtrength and ſupream Sword of Juſtice hath deliver'd them, I ſhall have done a work not much inferior to that of Zorobabel: who by well praiſing and extolling the force of Truth, in that contemplative ſtrength conquer'd Darius; and freed his Country and the people of God from the Captivity of Babylon. Which I ſhall yet not deſpair to do, if they in this Land whoſe minds are yet Captive, be but as ingenuous to acknowledg the ſtrength and ſupremacie of Juſtice, as that Heathen King was to confeſs the ſtrength of Truth: or let them but as he did, grant that, and they will ſoon perceave that Truth reſigns all her outward ſtrength to Juſtice: Juſtice therfore muſt needs be ſtrongeſt, both in her own and in the ſtrength of Truth. But if a King may do among men whatſoever is his will and pleaſure, and notwithſtanding be unaccountable to men, then contrary to this magnifi'd wiſdom of Zorobabel, neither Truth nor Juſtice, but the King is ſtrongeſt of all other things: which that Perſian Monarch himſelf in the midſt of all his pride and glory durſt not aſſume.

Let us ſee therfore what this King hath to affirm, why the ſentence of Juſtice and the weight of that Sword which ſhe delivers into the hands of men, ſhould be more partial to him offending, then to all others of human race. Firſt he pleads that no Law of God or Man gives to Subjects any power of judicature without or againſt him. Which aſſertion ſhall be prov'd in every part to be moſt untrue. The firſt expreſs Law of God giv'n to mankind, was that to Noah, as a Law in general to all the ſons of men. And by that moſt antient and univerſal Law, Whoſoever ſheddeth man's blood, by man ſhall his blood be ſhed; we find here no exception. If a King therfore do this, to a King, and that by men alſo, the ſame ſhall be done. This in the Law of Moſes, which came next, ſeveral times is repeated, and in one place remarkably, Numb. 35. Ye ſhall take no ſatisfaction for the life of a murderer, but he ſhall ſurely be put to death: the Land cannot be cleanſed of the blood that is ſhed therein, but by the blood of him that ſhed it. This is ſo ſpok'n as that which concern'd all Iſrael, not one man alone, to ſee perform'd; and if no ſatisfaction were to be tak'n, then certainly no exception. Nay the King, when they ſhould ſet up any, was to obſerve the whole Law, and not only to ſee it don, but to do it; that his heart might not be lifted up above his Brethren, to dream of vain and reaſonleſs Prerogatives or Exemptions, wherby the Law it ſelf muſt needs be founded in unrighteouſneſs.

And were that true, which is moſt falſe, that all Kings are the Lords Anointed, it were yet abſurd to think that the Anointment of God ſhould be as it were a charm againſt Law; and give them privilege who puniſh others, to ſin themſelves unpuniſhably. The high Prieſt was the Lord's Anointed as well as any King, and with the ſame conſecrated oil: yet Salomon had put to death Abiather, had it not bin for other reſpects then that anointment. If God himſelf ſay to Kings, Touch not mine anointed, meaning his choſ'n people, as is evident in that Pſalm, yet no man will argue thence, that he protects them from Civil Laws if they offend; then certainly, though David as a private Man, and in his own cauſe, fear'd to lift his hand againſt the Lord's Anointed, much leſs can this forbid the Law, or diſarm Juſtice from having legal power againſt any King. No other ſupream Magiſtrate, in what kind of Government ſoever, laies claim to any ſuch enormous Privilege; wherfore then ſhould any King who is but one kind of Magiſtrate, and ſet over the People for no other end then they?

Next in order of time to the Laws of Moſes, are thoſe of Chriſt, who declares profeſſedly his Judicature to be ſpiritual, abſtract from civil managements, and therfore leaves all Nations to thir own particular Laws, and way of Government. Yet becauſe the Church hath a kind of Juriſdiction within her own bounds, and that alſo, though in proceſs of time much corrupted and plainly turn'd into a corporal Judicature, yet much approv'd by this King, it will be firm anough and valid againſt him, if Subjects, by the Laws of Church alſo, be inveſted with a power of judicature both without and againſt thir King, though pretending, and by them acknowledg'd next and immediately under Chriſt ſupream Head and Governour. Theodoſius the Emperor having made a ſlaughter of the Theſſalonians for ſedition, but too cruelly, was excommunicated to his face by Saint Ambroſe, who was his ſubject; and Excommunion is the utmoſt of Eccleſiaſtical Judicature, a ſpiritual putting to death. But this, ye will ſay, was only an example. Read then the Story, and it will appear, both that Ambroſe avouch'd it for the Law of God, and Theodoſius confeſt it of his own accord to be ſo; and that the Law of God was not to be made void in him, for any reverence to his Imperial Power. From hence, not to be tedious, I ſhall paſs into our own Land of Brittain; and ſhow that Subjects here have exercis'd the utmoſt of ſpiritual Judicature, and more then ſpiritual againſt thir Kings, his Predeceſſours. Vortiger for committing inceſt with his Daughter, was by Saint German, at that time his Subject, curs'd and condemn'd in a Britiſh Council about the year 448; and thereupon ſoon after was depos'd. Mauricus a King in Wales for breach of Oath, and the murder of Cynetus, was excommunicated and curſt, with all his Offspring, by Oudoceus Biſhop of Landaff in full Synod, about the year 560; and not reſtor'd till he had repented. Morcant another King in Wales having ſlain Frioc his Unkle, was fain to come in Perſon, and receave judgment from the ſame Biſhop and his Clergie; who upon his penitence acquitted him, for no other cauſe then leſt the Kingdom ſhould be deſtitute of a Succeſſor in the Royal Line. Theſe Examples are of the Primitive, Britiſh, and Epiſcopal Church; long e're they had any Commerce or Communion with the Church of Rome. What power afterward of depoſing Kings, and ſo conſequently of putting them to death, was aſſum'd and practis'd by the Canon Law, I omit as a thing generally known. Certainly if whole Councils of the Romiſh Church have in the midſt of thir dimneſs diſcern'd ſo much of truth, as to decree at Conſtance, and at Baſil, and many of them to avouch at Trent alſo, that a Council is above the Pope, and may judg him, though by them not deny'd to be the Vicar of Chriſt, we in our clearer light may be aſham'd not to diſcern furder, that a Parlament is by all equity and right above a King, and may judg him, whoſe reaſons and pretenſions to hold of God only, as his immediate Vicegerent, we know how far fetch'd they are, and inſufficient.

As for the Laws of man, it would ask a volume to repeat all that might be in this point againſt him from all Antiquity. In Greece, Oreſtes the Son of Agamemnon, and by ſucceſſion King of Argos, was in that Country judg'd and condemn'd to death for killing his Mother: whence eſcaping, he was judg'd again, though a ſtranger, before the great Council of Areopagus in Athens. And this memorable act of Judicature, was the firſt that brought the Juſtice of that grave Senate into fame and high eſtimation over all Greece for many ages after. And in the ſame City Tyrants were to undergo legal ſentence by the Laws of Solon. The Kings of Sparta, though deſcended lineally from Hercules eſteem'd a God among them, were oft'n judg'd, and ſometimes put to death by the moſt juſt and renowned Laws of Lycurgus; who, though a King, thought it moſt unequal to bind his Subjects by any Law, to which he bound not himſelf. In Rome the Laws made by Valerius Publicola, and what the Senate decreed againſt Nero, that he ſhould be judg'd and puniſh'd according to the Laws of thir Anceſtors, and what in like manner was decreed againſt other Emperors, is vulgarly known. And that the Civil Law warrants like power of Judicature to Subjects againſt Tyrants, is writt'n clearly by the beſt and famouſeſt Civilians. For if it was decreed by Theodoſius, and ſtands yet firm in the Code of Juſtinian, that the Law is above the Emperor, then certainly the Emperor being under Law, the Law may judg him, and if judg him, may puniſh him proving tyrannous: how els is the Law above him, or to what purpoſe? Theſe are neceſſary deductions; and thereafter hath bin don in all Ages and Kingdoms, oftner then to be here recited.

But what need we any furder ſearch after the Laws of other Lands, for that which is ſo fully and ſo plainly ſet down lawful in our own? Where antient Books tell us, Bracton, Fleta, and others, that the King is under Law, and inferiour to his Court of Parlament; that although his place to do Juſtice be higheſt, yet that he ſtands as liable to receave Juſtice, as the meaneſt of his Kingdom. Nay Alfred the moſt worthy King, and by ſome accounted firſt abſolute Monarch of the Saxons here, ſo ordain'd; as is cited out of an antient Law-book call'd the Mirror; in Rights of the Kingdom, p. 31. where it is complain'd on, as the ſovran abuſe of all, that the King ſhould be deem'd above the Law, whereas he ought be ſubject to it by his Oath. Of which Oath antiently it was the laſt cauſe, that the King ſhould be as liable, and obedient to ſuffer right, as others of his people. And indeed it were but fond and ſenſleſs, that the King ſhould be accountable to every petty Suit in leſſer Courts, as we all know he was, and not be ſubject to the Judicature of Parlament in the main matters of our common ſafety or deſtruction; that he ſhould be anſwerable in the ordinary cours of Law for any wrong done to a private Perſon, and not anſwerable in Court of Parlament for deſtroying the whole Kingdom. By all this, and much more that might be added as in an argument overcopious rather then barren, we ſee it manifeſt that all Laws both of God and Man are made without exemption of any perſon whomſoever; and that if Kings preſume to overtop the Law by which they raign for the publick good, they are by Law to be reduc'd into order; and that can no way be more juſtly, then by thoſe who exalted them to that high place. For who ſhould better underſtand thir own Laws, and when they are tranſgreſt, then they who are govern'd by them, and whoſe conſent firſt made them? And who can have more right to take knowledg of things done within a free Nation then they within themſelves?

Thoſe objected Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy we ſwore, not to his Perſon, but as it was inveſted with his Autority; and his Autority was by the People firſt giv'n him conditionally, in Law, and under Law, and under Oath alſo for the Kingdom's good, and not otherwiſe: the Oaths then were interchang'd, and mutual; ſtood and fell together; he ſwore fidelity to his truſt; not as a deluding Ceremony, but as a real condition of their admitting him for King; and the Conqueror himſelf ſwore it ofter then at his Crowning: they ſwore Homage and Fealty to his Perſon in that truſt. There was no reaſon why the Kingdom ſhould be furder bound by Oaths to him, then he by his Coronation Oath to us, which he hath every way brok'n: and having brok'n, the antient Crown Oath of Alfred above-mention'd, conceals not his Penalty.

As for the Cov'nant, if that be meant, certainly no diſcreet Perſon can imagin it ſhould bind us to him in any ſtricter ſenſe then thoſe Oaths formerly. The acts of Hoſtility which we receiv'd from him, were no ſuch dear obligements that we ſhould owe him more fealty and defence for being our Enemy, then we could before when we took him only for a King. They were accus'd by him and his Party to pretend Liberty and Reformation, but to have no other end then to make themſelves great, and to deſtroy the King's Perſon and Autority. For which reaſon they added that third Article, teſtifying to the World, that as they were reſolv'd to endeavour firſt a Reformation in the Church, to extirpate Prelacy, to preſerve the Rights of Parlament, and the Liberties of the Kingdom, ſo they intended, ſo far as it might conſiſt with the preſervation and defence of theſe, to preſerve the King's Perſon and Autority; but not otherwiſe. As far as this comes to, they covnant and ſwear in the ſixth Article to preſerve and defend the Perſons and Autority of one another, and all thoſe that enter into that League; ſo that this Covnant gives no unlimitable exemption to the King's Perſon, but gives to all as much defence and preſervation as to him, and to him as much as to thir own Perſons, and no more; that is to ſay, in order and ſubordination to thoſe main ends for which we live and are a Nation of Men join'd in ſociety either chriſtian, or at leaſt humane. But if the Covnant were made abſolute, to preſerve and defend any one whomſoever, without reſpect had, either to the true Religion, or thoſe other ſuperiour things to be defended and preſerv'd however, it cannot then be doubted, but that the Covnant was rather a moſt fooliſh, haſty, and unlawful Vow, then a deliberate and well-weigh'd Covnant; ſwearing us into labyrinths and repugnances, no way to be ſolv'd or reconcil'd, and therefore no way to be kept: as firſt offending againſt the Law of God, to vow the abſolute preſervation, defence, and maintaining of one Man, though in his ſins and offences never ſo great and hainous againſt God or his Neighbour; and to except a Perſon from Juſtice, whereas his Law excepts none. Secondly, it offends againſt the Law of this Nation, wherein, as hath bin prov'd, Kings in receiving Juſtice, and undergoing due trial, are not differenc'd from the meaneſt Subject. Laſtly, it contradicts and offends againſt the Covnant it ſelf, which vows in the fourth Article to bring to op'n trial and condign puniſhment all thoſe that ſhall be found guilty of ſuch Crimes and Delinquencies, wherof the King by his own Letters and other undeniable Teſtimonies not brought to light till afterward, was found and convicted to be the chief actor in what they thought him at the time of taking that Covnant, to be overrul'd only by evil Counſellers; and thoſe, or whomſoever they ſhould diſcover to be principal, they vow'd to try, either by thir own ſupream Judicatories, for ſo ev'n then they call'd them, or by others having power from them to that effect. So that to have brought the King to condign Puniſhment hath not broke the Covnant, but it would have broke the Covnant to have ſav'd him from thoſe Judicatories, which both Nations declar'd in that Covnant to be ſupreme againſt any perſon whatſoever. And if the Covnant ſwore otherwiſe to preſerve him then in the preſervation of true Religion and our Liberties, againſt which he fought, if not in Arms, yet in Reſolution to his dying day, and now after death ſtill fights againſt in this his Book, the Covnant was better brok'n, then he ſav'd. And God hath teſtifi'd by all popitious and evident ſigns, wherby in theſe latter times he is wont to teſtifie what pleaſes him, that ſuch a ſolemn and for many ages unexampl'd act of due puniſhment, was no mockery of Juſtice, but a moſt grateful and well-pleaſing Sacrifice. Neither was it to cover thir perjury as he accuſes, but to uncover his perjury to the Oath of his Coronation.

The reſt of his diſcourſe quite forgets the Title; and turns his Meditations upon death into obloquie and bitter vehemence againſt his Judges and Accuſers; imitating therein, not our Saviour, but his Grandmother Mary Queen of Scots, as alſo in the moſt of his other ſcruples, exceptions and evaſions; and from whom he ſeems to have learnt, as it were by heart, or els by kind, that which is thought by his admirers to be the moſt vertuous, moſt manly, moſt chriſtian, and moſt martyr-like both of his words and ſpeeches here, and of his anſwers and behaviour at his Trial.

It is a ſad fate, he ſaith, to have his Enemies both Accuſers, Parties, and Judges. Sad indeed, but no ſufficient Plea to acquit him from being ſo judg'd. For what Malefactor might not ſomtimes plead the like? If his own crimes have made all men his Enemies, who els can judg him? They of the Powder-plot againſt his Father might as well have pleaded the ſame. Nay at the Reſurrection it may as well be pleaded, that the Saints who then ſhall judg the Word, are both Enemies, Judges, Parties, and Accuſers.

So much he thinks to abound in his own defence, that he undertakes an unmeaſurable task; to beſpeak the ſingular care and protection of God over all Kings, as being the greateſt Patrons of Law, Juſtice, Order, and Religion on earth. But what Patrons they be, God in the Scripture oft anough hath expreſt; and the earth it ſelf hath too long groan'd under the burd'n of thir injuſtice, diſorder, and irreligion. Therfore to bind thir Kings in chains, and thir Nobles with links of Iron, is an honour belonging to his Saints; not to build Babel, which was Nimrod's work, the firſt King, and the beginning of his Kingdom was Babel, but to deſtroy it, eſpecially that ſpiritual Babel: and firſt to overcome thoſe European Kings, which receive thir power, not from God, but from the beaſt; and are counted no better then his ten horns. Theſe ſhall hate the great Whore, and yet ſhall give thir Kingdoms to the Beaſt that carries her; they ſhall commit Fornication with her, and yet ſhall burn her with fire, and yet ſhall lament the fall of Babylon, where they fornicated with her.

Thus ſhall they be to and fro, doubtful and ambiguous in all thir doings, until at laſt, joining thir Armies with the Beaſt, whoſe power firſt rais'd them, they ſhall periſh with him by the King of Kings againſt whom they have rebell'd; and the Fowls ſhall eat thir Fleſh. This is thir doom writt'n, and the utmoſt that we find concerning them in theſe latter days; which we have much more cauſe to beleeve, then his unwarranted Revelation here, propheſying what ſhall follow after his death, with the ſpirit of Enmity, not of Saint John.

He would fain bring us out of conceit with the good ſucceſs which God hath voutſaf'd us. We meaſure not our cauſe by our ſucceſs, but our ſucceſs by our cauſe. Yet certainly in a good Cauſe ſucceſs is a good confirmation; for God hath promis'd it to good men almoſt in every leaf of Scripture. If it argue not for us, we are ſure it argues not againſt us; but as much or more for us, then ill ſucceſs argues for them; for to the wicked God hath denounc'd ill ſucceſs in all that they take in hand.

He hopes much of thoſe ſofter tempers, as he calls them, and leſs advantag'd by his ruin, that thir Conſciences do already gripe them. 'Tis true, there be a ſort of moodie, hot-braind, and always unedify'd Conſciences; apt to engage thir Leaders into great and dangerous affairs paſt retirement, and then upon a ſudden qualm and ſwimming of thir Conſcience, to betray them baſely in the midſt of what was chiefly undertak'n for thir ſakes. Let ſuch men never meet with any faithful Parlament to hazard for them; never with any noble Spirit to conduct and lead them out, but let them live and die in ſervile Condition and thir ſcrupulous queaſineſs, if no inſtruction will confirm them. Others there be in whoſe Conſciences the loſs of gain, and thoſe advantages they hop'd for, hath ſprung a ſudden leak. Theſe are they that cry out the Covnant brok'n, and to keep it better ſlide back into neutrality, or join actually with Incendiaries and Malignants. But God hath eminently begun to puniſh thoſe, firſt in Scotland, then in Ulſter, who have provok'd him with the moſt hateful kind of mockerie, to break his Covnant under pretence of ſtricteſt keeping it; and hath ſubjected them to thoſe Malignants, with whom they ſcrupl'd not to be aſſociates. In God therefore we ſhall not fear what thir fals fraternity can do againſt us.

He ſeeks again with cunning words to turn our ſucceſs into our ſin. But might call to mind that the Scripture ſpeaks of thoſe alſo, who when God ſlew them, then ſought him; yet did but flatter him with thir mouth, and ly'd to him with thir tongues; for thir heart was not right with him. And there was one who in the time of his affliction treſpaſs'd more againſt God; This was that King Ahaz.

He glories much in the forgivneſs of his Enemies; ſo did his Grandmother at her death. Wiſe men would ſooner have beleev'd him had he not ſo oft'n told us ſo. But he hopes to erect the Trophies of his Charity over us. And Trophies of Charity no doubt will be as glorious as Trumpets before the Alms of Hypocrites; and more eſpecially the Trophies of ſuch an aſpiring Charitie as offers in his Prayer to ſhare victory with God's compaſſion, which is over all his Works. Such Prayers as theſe may perhaps catch the people, as was intended: but how they pleaſe God, is to be much doubted, though pray'd in ſecret, much leſs writt'n to be divulg'd. Which perhaps may gain him after death a ſhort, contemptible, and ſoon fading reward; not what he aims at, to ſtir the conſtancy and ſolid firmneſs of any wiſe Man, or to unſettle the conſcience of any knowing Chriſtian, if he could ever aim at a thing ſo hopeleſs, and above the genius of his Cleric Elocution, but to catch the worthleſs approbation of an inconſtant, irrational, and Image-doting rabble. The reſt, whom perhaps ignorance without malice, or ſome error, leſs then fatal, hath for the time miſled on this ſide Sorcery or Obduration, may find the grace and good guidance to bethink themſelves and recover.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

WHereas in page 450. preceding, the Author mentions a Prayer commonly believ'd to be pen'd by K. Charles I. which as ſuch was deliver'd by himſelf to Dr. Juxon then Biſhop of London, and as well twice printed among his Works in Folio, as in the ſecond Edition of Eikon Baſilike by Mr. Royſton; but plainly appears to have been ſtoln, without any conſiderable variation, from the mouth of Pamela, an imaginary Lady, to a Heathen Deity, in Sir Philip Sidney's Arcadia: it is judg'd not improper, for the ſatisfaction of the Curious, to add here both the ſaid Prayers ſet parallel to one another, that this piece of Royal Plagiariſm, or (to be more charitable) of his Chaplain's Prieſtcraft may evidently appear to all the World.

The Prayer of K. Charles, ſtil'd A Prayer in time of Captivity. K Charles's Works, pag. 93. Edit. 1687.

O Powerful, O Eternal God, to whom nothing is ſo great that it may reſiſt, or ſo ſmall that it is contemned; look upon my miſery with thine eye of Mercy, and let thine infinite Power vouchſafe to limit out ſome proportion of Deliverance unto me, as to thee ſhall ſeem moſt convenient: Let not Injury, O Lord, triumph over me, and let my Fault by thy Hand be corrected; and make not my unjuſt Enemies the Miniſters of thy Juſtice. But yet, my God, if in thy Wiſdom this be the apteſt Chaſtiſement for my unexcuſable Tranſgreſſions; if this ungrateful Bondage be fitteſt for my over-high Deſires; if the Pride of my (not enough humble) Heart be thus to be broken, O Lord, I yield unto thy Will, and cheerfully embrace what Sorrow thou wilt have me ſuffer; only thus much let me crave of thee (let my craving, O Lord, be accepted of, ſince it even proceeds from Thee) that by thy Goodneſs which is thy ſelf, thou wilt ſuffer ſome Beam of thy Majeſty ſo to ſhine in my Mind, that I, who in my greateſt Afflictions acknowledg it my nobleſt Title to be thy Creature, may ſtill depend confidently on Thee. Let Calamity be the Exerciſe, but not the Overthrow of my Vertue; O let not their prevailing Power be to my Deſtruction; and if it be thy Will that they more and more vex me with Puniſhment, yet, O Lord, never let their Wickedneſs have ſuch a hand but that I may ſtill carry a pure Mind and ſtedfaſt Reſolution ever to ſerve thee without Fear or Preſumption, yet with that humble confidence, which may beſt pleaſe thee; ſo that at the laſt I may come to thy eternal Kingdom, through the Merits of thy Son our alone Saviour, Jeſus Chriſt. Amen.

The Prayer of Pamela, being under Impriſonment, to a Heathen Deity. Arcadia, pag. 248. Edit. 1674.

O All-ſeeing Light, and eternal Life of all things, to whom nothing is either ſo great that it may reſiſt, or ſo ſmall that it is contemned; look upon my Miſery with thine eye of Mercy, and let thine infinite Power vouchſafe to limit out ſome proportion of deliverance unto me, as to thee ſhall ſeem moſt convenient: Let not Injury, O Lord, triumph over me, and let my Faults by thy hand be corrected; and make not mine unjuſt Enemy the Miniſter of thy Juſtice. But yet, my God, if in thy Wiſdom this be the apteſt Chaſtiſement for my unexcuſable Folly; if this low Bondage be fitteſt for my over-high Deſires; if the Pride of my not-enough humble Heart be thus to be broken, O Lord, I yield unto thy Will, and joyfully embrace what ſorrow thou wilt have me ſuffer; only thus much let me crave of thee (let my craving, O Lord, be accepted of thee, ſince even that proceeds from thee) let me crave even by the nobleſt Title which in my greateſt Affliction I may give my ſelf, that I am thy Creature, and by thy Goodneſs, which is thy ſelf, that thou wilt ſuffer ſome Beam of thy Majeſty to ſhine into my Mind, that it may ſtill depend confidently on thee. Let Calamity be the Exerciſe, but not the overthrow of my Vertue; let their power prevail, but prevail not to Deſtruction; let my greatneſs be their Prey: Let my Pain be the ſweetneſs of their Revenge; Let them (if ſo it ſeem good unto thee) vex me with more and more Puniſhment; but, O Lord, let never their Wickedneſs have ſuch a hand, but that I may carry a pure Mind in a pure Body. And pauſing a while; And O moſt gracious Lord, ſaid ſhe, whatever becomes of me, preſerve the vertuous Muſidorus.

IN pag. 485. beforegoing, our Author charges K. Charles I. with a Commiſſion under the Great Seal of Scotland, impowering the Popiſh Iriſh, as was before agreed between them, to riſe in arms, and to ſeize not only all defenſible Places, but likewiſe the Eſtates and Perſons of all the Engliſh Proteſtants in Ireland. Thoſe Barbarians (the method being left to their Diſcretion) thought they could not better ſecure the Engliſh than by cutting their throats, which they inhumanly perform'd in cold blood, to almoſt the number of two hundred thouſand Souls. Whoever would, beſides the Confeſſion of the Rebels themſelves, ſee further Reaſons to believe the ſaid Commiſſion Genuin (for in this Affair we determin nothing) may peruſe the Iriſh Remonſtrance, and Dr. Jones's Book, both publiſh'd by Authority of Parliament; and alſo a Piece entitl'd, The Myſtery of Iniquity, p. 35, 36. printed in 1643. likewiſe Viccar's Chronicle, Part 3. p. 70. wherein this Commiſſion is inſerted at large, as it is here ſubjoin'd.

CHARLES by the grace of God, King of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c. To all our Catholique Subjects within our Kingdom of Ireland, Greeting: Know ye that We for the ſafeguard and preſervation of our Perſon, have been enforced to make our abode and reſidence in our Kingdom of Scotland for a long ſeaſon, occaſioned by reaſon of the obſtinat and diſobedient carriage of our Parliament in England againſt Us; who have not only preſumed to take upon them the Government and diſpoſing of thoſe Princely Rights and Prerogatives that have juſtly deſcended upon Us from our Predeceſſors both Kings and Queens of the ſaid Kingdom, for many hundred years paſt, but alſo have poſſeſſed themſelves of the whole Strength of the ſaid Kingdom, in appointing Governours, Commanders, and Officers in all parts and places therein, at their own wills and pleaſures, without Our conſent, whereby we are deprived of Our Soveraignty, and left naked without defence. And for as much as we are (in our ſelf) very ſenſible that theſe ſtorms blow aloft, and are very likely to be carried by the vehemencie of the * Proteſtant Partie into our Kingdom of Ireland, and endanger our Regal Power and Authoritie there alſo: Know ye therefore that We repoſing much care and truſt in your duties and obedience, which we have for many years paſt found; Do hereby give unto you full power and autoritie to aſſemble and meet together with all the ſpeed and diligence that a buſineſs of ſo great conſequence doth require, and to adviſe and conſult together by ſufficient and diſcreet numbers at all times, days, and places which you ſhall in your judgments hold moſt convenient and material, for the ordering, ſetling, and effecting of this great work (mentioned and directed unto you in Our Letters) And to uſe all politick ways and means poſſible to poſſeſs your ſelves (for Our uſe and ſafety) of all the Forts, Caſtles, and places of ſtrength and defence within the ſaid Kingdom (except the Places, Perſons, and Eſtates of our loyal and loving Subjects the Scots:) And alſo to arreſt and ſeize the Goods, Eſtates, and Perſons of all the Engliſh Proteſtants within the ſaid Kingdom to Our uſe. And in your care and ſpeedy performance of this Our will and pleaſure, We ſhall perceive your wonted Duty and Allegiance unto us, which We ſhall accept and reward in due time.

* Puritan in another Copy.

Witneſs Our ſelf at Edenbrough the firſt day of October in the ſeventeenth year of our Raign.

FOR a clearer ground, That the Commiſſion to the Iriſh Papiſts is genuin (which here we take not upon us to prove) it is further confirmed by King Charles the Second's Letter to the Iriſh Council, 1663, in favour of the Marqueſs of Antrim, in which he declares in expreſs terms that the Marqueſs was innocent from any malice or rebellious purpoſe againſt the Crown, and that his Tranſactions with the Iriſh Rebels was by the Inſtructions of his Royal Father, and for his Service; and that his ſaid Father was well pleas'd with what the Marqueſs did after he had done it, and approv'd the ſame. Notwithſtanding this ſurpriſing Letter eight Articles were undeniably prov'd againſt the Marqueſs; and we prefix them here to the Letter, for the more eaſy determining which of the three is moſt Innocent or Guilty, King Charles I. his Son, or the Marqueſs.

1. That the Marqueſs of Antrim was to have a hand in ſurprizing the Caſtle of Dublin, in the year 1641.
2. That he was of the Rebels party before the 15th of September, 1643. which was made appear by his hourly and frequent intercourſe with Renny O Moore, and many others; being himſelf the moſt notorious of the ſaid Rebels.
3. That he entred into the Roman-Catholick-Confederacy before the Peace in 1643.
4. That he conſtantly adhered to the Nuntio's Party, in oppoſition to his Majeſties Authority.
5. That he ſate from time to time in the Supream Council of Kilkenny.
6. That he ſigned that execrable Oath of Aſſociation.
7. That he was Commiſſionated, and acted as Lieutenant General, from the ſaid Aſſembly at Kilkenny.
8. That he declared, by ſeveral Letters of his own penning, himſelf in Conjunction with Owen Ro Oneale, and a conſtant Oppoſer to the ſeveral Peaces made by the Lord Lieutenant with the Iriſh.

King Charles the Second's Letter.

CHARLES R.

“Right truſty and well-beloved Couſins and Counſellors, &c. We greet you well. How far we have been from interpoſing on the behalf of any of our Iriſh Subjects, who by their miſcarriages in the late Rebellion in that Kingdom of Ireland had made themſelves unworthy of Our Grace and Protection, is notorious to all men; and We were ſo jealous in that particular, that ſhortly after our return into this Our Kingdom, when the Marqueſs of Antrim came hither to preſent his duty to Us, upon the information We received from thoſe Perſons who then attended Us, by a Deputation from Our Kingdom of Ireland, or from thoſe who at that time owned our Authority there, that the Marqueſs of Antrim had ſo miſ-behaved himſelf towards Us, and Our late Royal Father of bleſſed memory, that he was in no degree worthy of the leaſt Countenance from Us, and that they had manifeſt and unqueſtionable Evidence of ſuch his guilt. Wherupon We refuſed to admit the ſaid Marqueſs ſo much as into Our Preſence, but on the contrary committed him Priſoner to Our Tower of London; where after he had continued ſeveral Months under a ſtrict reſtraint, upon the continued Information of the ſaid Perſons, We ſent him into Ireland, without interpoſing the leaſt on his behalf, but left him to undergo ſuch a Tryal and Puniſhment, as by the Juſtice of that Our Kingdom ſhould be found due to his Crime, expecting ſtill that ſome heinous Matter would be objected and proved againſt

“ him, to make him uncapable, and to deprive him of that Favour and Protection from Us, which we knew his former Actions and Services had merited. After many months attendance there, and (We preſume) after ſuch Examinations as were requiſite, he was at laſt diſmiſſed without any Cenſure, and without any tranſmiſſion of Charge againſt him to Us, and with a Licence to tranſport himſelf into this Kingdom. We concluded that it was then time to give him ſome inſtance of Our Favour, and to remember the many Services he had done, and the Sufferings he had undergone, for his Affections and Fidelity to Our Royal Father and Our Self, and that it was time to redeem him from thoſe Calamities, which yet do lie as heavy upon him ſince, as before our happy Return: And thereupon We recommend him to you Our Lieutenant, that you ſhould move Our Council there, for preparing a Bill to be tranſmitted to Us, for the re-inveſting him the ſaid Marqueſs into the Poſſeſſion of his Eſtate in that Our Kingdom, as had been done in ſome other Caſes. To which Letter, you Our ſaid Lieutenant returned us anſwer, That you had informed Our Council of that Our Letter, and that you were upon conſideration thereof, unanimouſly of Opinion, that ſuch a Bill ought not to be tranſmited to Us, the Reaſon whereof would forthwith be preſented to Us from Our Council. After which time We received the incloſed Petition from the ſaid Marqueſs, which We referred to the conſiderations and examinations of the Lords of Our Privy Council, whoſe Names are mentioned in that Our Reference, which is annexed to the ſaid Petition, who thereupon met together, and after having heard the Marqueſs of Antrim, did not think fit to make any Report to Us, till they might ſee and underſtand the Reaſons which induced you not to tranſmit the Bill We had propoſed, which Letter was not then come to Our Hands: After which time We have received your Letter of the 18th of March, together with ſeveral Petitions which had been preſented to you, as well from the Old Souldiers and Adventurers, as from the Lady Marchioneſs of Antrim, all which we likewiſe tranſmitted to the Lords Referees: Upon a ſecond Petition preſented to Us by the Lord Marqueſs, which is here likewiſe encloſed, commanding Our ſaid Referees to take the ſame into their ſerious conſideration, and to hear what the Petitioner had to offer in his own Vindication, and to report the whole matter to Us, which upon a third Petition herein likewiſe incloſed, We required them to expedite with what ſpeed they could. By which deliberate Proceedings of ours you cannot but obſerve, that no importunity, how juſt ſoever, could prevail with Us to bring Our Self to a Judgment in this Affair, without very ample Information. Our ſaid Referees, after ſeveral Meetings, and peruſal of what hath been offered to them by the ſaid Marqueſs, have reported unto Us, That they have ſeen ſeveral Letters, all of them the hand-writing of Our Royal Father to the ſaid Marqueſs, and ſeveral Inſtructions concerning his treating and joining with the Iriſh, in order to the King's Service, by reducing to their Obedience, and by drawing ſome Forces from them for the Service of Scotland. That beſides the Letters and Orders under his Majeſties Hand, they have received ſufficient Evidence and Teſtimony of ſeveral private Meſſages and Directions ſent from Our Royal Father, and from Our Royal Mother, with the privity and with the Directions of the King Our Father; by which they are perſwaded that whatever Intelligence, Correſpondence or Actings, the ſaid Marqueſs had with the Confederate Iriſh Catholicks, was directed or allowed by the ſaid Letters, Inſtructions and Directions; and that it manifeſtly appears to them, that the King our Father was well pleaſed with what the Marqueſs did, after he had done it, and approved the ſame.

“ This being the true ſtate of the Marqueſs his Caſe, and there being nothing proved upon the firſt Information againſt him, nor any thing contained againſt him in your Letter of March 18. but that you were informed, he had put in his Claim before the Commiſſioners appointed for executing the Act of Settlement; and that if his innocency be ſuch as is alledged, there is no need of tranſmitting ſuch a Bill to Us as is deſired; and that if he be Nocent, it conſiſts not with the Duty which you owe to Us, to tranſmit ſuch a Bill, as if it ſhould paſs into a Law, muſt needs draw a great Prejudice upon ſo many Adventurers and Souldiers, which are, as is alledged, to be therein concerned. We have conſidered of the Petition of the Adventurers and Souldiers, which was tranſ-

“ mitted to Us by you, the Equity of which conſiſts in nothing, but that they “ have been peaceably in Poſſeſſion for the ſpace of ſeven or eight years, of “ thoſe Lands which were formerly the Eſtate of the Marqueſs of Antrim, and “ others, who were all engaged in the late Iriſh Rebellion; and that they ſhall “ ſuffer very much, and be ruined, if thoſe Lands ſhould be taken from them.
“ And We have likewiſe conſidered another Petition from ſeveral Citizens of “ London, near ſixty in number, directed to Our Self, wherein they deſire, That
“ the Marqueſs his Eſtate may be made liable to the paiment of his juſt Debts, “ that ſo they may not be ruined in the favour of the preſent Poſſeſſors, who “ (they ſay) are but a few Citizens and Souldiers, who have disburſed very “ ſmall ſums thereon. Upon the whole matter no man can think We are leſs “ engaged by Our Declaration, and by the Act of Settlement, to protect thoſe
“ who are innocent, and who have faithfully endeavoured to ſerve the Crown,
“ how unfortunate ſoever, than to expoſe to Juſtice thoſe who have been really “ and maliciouſly guilty. And therefore we cannot in Juſtice, but upon the “ Petition of the Marqueſs of Antrim, and after the ſerious and ſtrict Inquiſition “ into his Actions, declare unto you, That We do find him innocent from “ any malice or rebellious purpoſe againſt the Crown; and that what he did
“ by way of Correſpondence or Compliance with the Iriſh Rebels, was in order
“ to the Service of Our Royal Father, and warranted by his Inſtructions,
“ and the Truſt repoſed in him; and that the benefit thereof accrued to the Service “ of the Crown, and not to the particular advantage and benefit of the “ Marqueſs. And as We cannot in juſtice deny him this Teſtimony, ſo We require
“ you to tranſmit Our Letter to Our Commiſſioners, that they may know “ Our Judgments in this Caſe of the Lord of Antrim, and proceed accordingly.
“ And ſo We bid you heartily farewel.

Given at Our Court at White-Hall, July 10, in the 15th Year of Our Reign, 1663.

By his Majeſty's Command,

To Our Right Truſty and Right entirely Well-beloved Couſin and Counſellor, James Duke of Ormond, Our Lieutenant General, and General Governour of Our Kingdom of Ireland; and to the Lords of Our Council of that Our Kingdom.

WHAT our Author had ingeniouſly render'd ſuſpicious (not to ſay very probable) by reaſonable Conſequences or Preſumptions, and by Arguments drawn from the Book it ſelf, has been ſince his Death moſt clearly prov'd from ſeveral undeniable Matters of Fact by the late Reverend Dr. Walker of Eſſex, viz. That K. Charles the Firſt was not the real Author of Eikon Baſilike, but Dr. Gauden, then Biſhop of Exeter. We therefore refer the inquiſitive Reader to the ſaid Dr. Walker's Account of the true Author of Eikon Baſilike, and to the other Papers publiſh'd on this occaſion; but we cannot forbear inſerting in this place the following Memorandum of the late Noble Arthur Earl of Angleſey under his own Hand, which was found in his Library prefixt to a printed Copy of one of theſe Books. Now if the Declaration of two Kings, and thoſe his own Sons, deſerve any regard or credit, it plainly appears how much Dr. Gauden impos'd upon the World, and abus'd the Memory of that unfortunate Prince.

THE TENURE OF Kings and Magiſtrates:

PROVING,

That it is Lawfull, and hath been held ſo through all Ages, for any, who have the Power, to call to account a TYRANT, or wicked KING, and after due Conviction, to depoſe, and put him to Death; if the ordinary MAGISTRATE have neglected, or deny'd to doe it.

And that they, who of late ſo much blame Depoſing, are the Men that did it themſelves.

IF Men within themſelves would be govern'd by reaſon, and not generally give up their underſtanding to a double tyrannie, of cuſtome from without, and blind affections within, they would diſcerne better what it is to favour and uphold the Tyrant of a Nation. But being ſlaves within doores, no wonder that they ſtrive ſo much to have the public State conformably govern'd to the inward vitious rule, by which they govern themſelves. For indeed none can love freedom heartilie, but good men; the reſt love not freedom, but licence; which never hath more ſcope or more indulgence then under Tyrants. Hence is it that Tyrants are not oft offended, nor ſtand much in doubt of bad men, as being all naturally ſervile; but in whom vertue and true worth moſt is eminent, them they feare in earneſt, as by right their Maſters, againſt them lies all their hatred and ſuſpicion. Conſequentlie neither doe bad men hate Tyrants, but have been alwaies readieſt with the falſifi'd names of Loyalty and Obedience, to colour over their baſe compliances. And although ſometimes for ſhame, and when it comes to their owne grievances, of Purſe eſpecially, they would ſeeme good Patriots, and ſide with the better cauſe, yet when others for the deliverance of their Countrie, endu'd with fortitude and heroick vertue, to feare nothing but the curſe written againſt thoſe that doe the worke of the Lord negligently, would goe on to remove, not onely the calamities and thraldomes of a people, but the roots and cauſes whence they ſpring; ſtreight theſe men, and ſure helpers at need, as if they hated onely the miſeries but not the miſchiefes, after they have juggl'd and palter'd with the World, bandied and borne arms againſt their King, deveſted him, diſanointed him, nay curs'd him all over in thir Pulpits, and their Pamphlets, to the ingaging of ſincere and reall men, beyond what is poſſible or honeſt to retreat from, not onely turne revolters from thoſe Principles, which onely could at firſt move them, but lay the ſtaine of diſloyaltie, and worſe, on thoſe proceedings, which are the neceſſarie conſequences of their owne former actions; nor diſlik'd by themſelves, were they manag'd to the intire advantages of their owne Faction; not conſidering the while that he toward whom they boaſted thir new fidelitie, counted them acceſſory, and by thoſe Statutes and Laws which they ſo impotently brandiſh againſt others, would have doom'd them to a trayors death for what they have done alreadie. 'Tis true, that moſt men are apt anough to civill Wars and Commotions as a noveltie, and for a flaſh, hot and active; but through ſloth or inconſtancie, and weakneſs of ſpirit, either fainting ere there owne pretences, though never ſo juſt, be half attain'd, or through an inbred falſhood and wickedneſſe, betray oft times to deſtruction with themſelves, men of nobleſt temper join'd with them for cauſes which they in their raſh undertakings were not capable of. If God and a good Cauſe give them Victory, the proſecution whereof for the moſt part, inevitably draws after it the alteration of Jer. 48. 1.

Lawes, change of Government, downfall of Princes with their Families; then comes the task to thoſe Worthies which are the ſoule of that Enterprize, to bee ſwett and labour'd out amidſt the throng and noiſes of vulgar and irrationall men. Some conteſting for Privileges, Cuſtomes, Formes, and that old intanglement of iniquitie, their gibriſh Lawes, though the badge of their ancient ſlavery. Others who have been fierceſt againſt their Prince, under the notion of a Tyrant, and no meane incendiaries of the Warre againſt him, when God out of his providence and high diſpoſall hath deliver'd him into the hand of their Brethren, on a ſuddaine and in a new garbe of Allegiance, which their doings have long ſince cancell'd; they plead for him, pity him, extoll him, proteſt againſt thoſe that talke of bringing him to the tryall of Juſtice, which is the Sword of God, ſuperiour to all mortall things, in whoſe hand ſoever by apparent ſignes his teſtified will is to put it. But certainely, if we conſider who and what they are, on a ſuddaine growne ſo pitifull, wee may conclude, their pity can be no true and Chriſtian commiſeration, but either levitie and ſhallowneſſe of minde, or elſe a carnall admiring of that worldly pompe and greatneſs, from whence they ſee him fall'n; or rather laſtly, a diſſembl'd and ſeditious pity, fain'd of induſtry to beget new commotions. As for mercy, if it bee to a Tyrant, under which name they themſelves have cited him ſo oft in the hearing of God, of Angels, and the holy Church aſſembl'd, and there charg'd him with the ſpilling of more innocent blood by farre, then ever Nero did, undoubtedly the mercy which they pretend, is the mercy of wicked men; and Prov. 12.10. their mercies, wee read, are cruelties; hazarding the welfare of a whole Nation, to have ſav'd one whom ſo oft they have tearm'd Agag, and villifying the blood of many Jonathans that have ſav'd Iſrael; inſiſting with much niceneſſe on the unneceſſarieſt clauſe of their Covnant, wherein the feare of change, and the abſurd contradiction of a flattering hoſtilitie had hampered them, but not ſcrupling to give away for complements, to an implacable revenge, the heads of many thouſand Chriſtians more.

Another ſort there is, who comming in the courſe of theſe affairs, to have thir ſhare in great actions above the forme of Law or Cuſtome, at leaſt to give thir voice and approbation, begin to ſwerve and almoſt ſhiver at the majeſty and grandeur of ſom noble deed, as if they were newly enter'd into a great ſin; diſputing preſidents, formes, and circumſtances, when the Commonwealth nigh periſhes for want of deeds in ſubſtance, don with juſt and faithfull expedition. To theſe I wiſh better inſtruction, and vertue equall to their calling; the former of which, that is to ſay Inſtruction, I ſhall indeavour, as my dutie is, to beſtow on them; and exhort them not to ſtartle from the juſt and pious reſolution of adhering with all thir aſſiſtance to the preſent Parlament and Army, in the glorious way wherein Juſtice and Victorie hath ſet them; the onely warrants through all ages, next under immediate Revelation, to exerciſe ſupreame power; in thoſe proceedings which hitherto appear equall to what hath been don in any age or Nation heretofore, juſtly or magnanimouſlie. Nor let them be diſcourag'd or deterr'd by any new Apoſtate Scar-crowes, who under ſhow of giving counſell, ſend out their barking Monitories and Memento's, emptie of ought elſe but the ſpleene of a fruſtrated Faction. For how can that pretended counſell, bee either ſound or faithfull, when they that give it, ſee not for madneſſe and vexation of thir ends loſt, that thoſe Statutes and Scriptures which both falſly and ſcandalouſly they wreſt againſt their Friends and Aſſociates, would by ſentence of the common adverſarie, fall firſt and heavieſt upon their owne heads? Neither let milde and tender diſpoſitions be fooliſhly ſoftn'd from their dutie and perſeverance with the unmaſculine Rhetorick of any puling Prieſt or Chaplain, ſent as a friendly Letter of advice, for faſhion-ſake in private, and forthwith publiſh't by the Sender himſelfe, that wee may know how much of Friend there was in it, to caſt an odious envie upon them to whom it was pretended to be ſent in charitie. Nor let any man bee deluded by either the ignorance or the notorious hypocriſie and ſelf-repugnance of our dancing Divines, who have the conſcience and the boldneſſe, to come with Scripture in their mouthes, gloſs'd and fitted for thir turnes with a double contradictory ſenſe, transforming the ſacred veritie of God, to an Idol with two faces, looking at once two ſeveral ways; and with the ſame quotations to charge others, which in the ſame caſe they made ſerve to juſtifie themſelves. For while the hope to bee made Claſſic and Provinciall Lords led them on, while pluralities greas'd them thick and deepe, to the ſhame and ſcandall of Religion, more then all the Sects and Hereſies they exclaime againſt, then to fight againſt the Kings perſon, and no leſſe a party of his Lords and Commons, or to put force upon both the Houſes was good, was lawfull, was no reſiſting of Superiour powers; they onely were powers not to be reſiſted, who countenanc'd the good and puniſh't the evill. But now that thir cenſorious domineering is not ſuffer'd to be univerſall, truth and conſcience to be freed, Tithes and Pluralities to be no more, though competent allowance provided, and the warme experience of large gifts, and they ſo good at taking them; yet now to exclude and ſeize on impeach't Members, to bring Delinquents without exemption to a faire Tribunall by the common Nationall Law againſt murder, is now to be no leſſe then Corah, Dathan, and Abiram. He who but erewhile in the Pulpits was a curſed Tyrant, an enemie to God and Saints, laden with all the innocent blood ſpilt in three Kingdoms, and ſo to bee fought againſt, is now though nothing penitent or alter'd from his firſt principles, a lawfull Magiſtrate, a Sovrane Lord, the Lords Annointed, not to bee touch'd, though by themſelves impriſon'd. As if this onely were obedience, to preſerve the meere uſeleſſe bulke of his perſon, and that onely in priſon, not in the field, and to diſobey his commands, denie him his dignitie and office, every where to reſiſt his power but where they thinke it onely ſurviving in thir owne faction.

But who in particular is a Tyrant cannot be determind in a generall diſcourſe otherwiſe then by ſuppoſition; his particular charge, and the ſufficient proofe of it muſt determine that: which I leave to Magiſtrates, at leaſt to the uprighter ſort of them, and of the people, though in number leſſe by many, in whom Faction leaſt hath prevaild above the Law of nature and right reaſon, to judge as they finde cauſe. But this I dare owne as part of my faith, that if ſuch a one there be, by whoſe Commiſſion, whole maſſacres have been committed on his faithfull Subjects, his Provinces offered to pawne or alienation, as the hire of thoſe whom he had ſollicited to come in and deſtroy whole Cities and Countries; be hee King, or Tyrant, or Emperour, the Sword of Juſtice is above him; in whoſe hand ſoever is found ſufficient power to avenge the effuſion, and ſo great a deluge of innocent blood. For if all human power to execute, not accidentally but intendedly, the wrath of God upon evil doers without exception, be of God; then that power, whether ordinary, or if that faile, extraordinary ſo executing that intent of God, is lawfull, and not to be reſiſted. But to unfold more at large this whole Queſtion, though with all expedient brevity, I ſhall here ſet downe, from firſt beginning, the originall of Kings; how and wherefore exalted to that dignitie above thir Brethren; and from thence ſhall prove, that turning to tyranny they may bee as lawfully depoſed and puniſhd, as they were at firſt elected: This I ſhall doe by autorities and reaſons, not learnt in corners among Schiſmes and Heriſies, as our doubling Divines are ready to calumniate, but fetch't out of the midſt of choiceſt and moſt authentic learning, and no prohibited Authors, nor many Heathen, but Moſaical, Chriſtian, Orthodoxal, and which muſt needs be more convincing to our Adverſaries, Presbyterial.

No man who knows ought, can be ſo ſtupid to deny that all men naturally were born free, being the image and reſemblance of God himſelfe, and were by privilege above all the creatures, borne to command and not to obey: and that they livd ſo, till from the root of Adams tranſgreſſion, falling among themſelves to doe wrong and violence, and foreſeeing that ſuch courſes muſt needs tend to the deſtruction of them all, they agreed by common league to bind each other from mutual injury, and joyntly to defend themſelves againſt any that gave diſturbance or oppoſition to ſuch agreement. Hence came Cities, Towns and Common-wealths. And becauſe no faith in all was found ſufficiently binding, they ſaw it needfull to ordaine ſome Autoritie, that might reſtraine by force and puniſhment what was violated againſt peace and common right: This autoritie and power of ſelf-defence and preſervation being originally and naturally in every one of them, and unitedly in them all, for eaſe, for order; and leaſt each man ſhould be his owne partial judge, they communicated and deriv'd either to one, whom for the eminence of his wiſdom and integritie they choſe above the reſt, or to more then one whom they thought of equal deſerving: the firſt was called a King; the other Magiſtrates. Not to be their Lords and Maiſters (though afterward thoſe names in ſom places were giv'n voluntarily to ſuch as had bin authors of ineſtimable good to the people) but to be thir Deputies and Commiſſioners, to execute, by vertue of thir intruſted power, that juſtice which elſe every man by the bond of Nature and of Cov'nant muſt have executed for himſelfe, and for one another. And to him that ſhall conſider well why among free perſons, one man by civill right ſhould beare autority and juriſdiction over another, no other end or reaſon can be imaginable. Theſe for a while governd well, and with much equitie decided all things at thir owne arbitrement: till the temptation of ſuch a power left abſolute in thir hands, perverted them at length to injuſtice and partialitie. Then did they who now by tryall had found the danger and inconveniences of committing arbitrary power to any, invent Lawes either fram'd or conſented to by all, that ſhould confine and limit the autority of whom they choſe to govern them: that ſo Man of whoſe failing they had proof, might no more rule over them, but Law and Reaſon abſtracted as much as might be from perſonal errors and frailties. When this would not ſerve, but that the Law was either not executed, or miſapply'd, they were conſtrained from that time, the onely remedy left them, to put conditions and take Oaths from all Kings and Magiſtrates at their firſt inſtalment to doe impartial juſtice by Law: who upon thoſe termes and no other, receav'd Allegeance from the people, that is to ſay, Bond or Covnant to obey them in execution of thoſe Lawes which they the people had themſelves made or aſſented to. And this oft times with expreſs warning, that if the King or Magiſtrate prov'd unfaithfull to his truſt, the people would be diſingag'd. They added alſo Counſelors and Parlaments, not to be onely at his beck, but with him or without him, at ſet times, or at all times, when any danger threatn'd, to have care of the public ſafety. Therefore ſaith Claudius Seſell a French Stateſman, The Parlament was ſet as a bridle to the King; which I inſtance rather, becauſe that Monarchy is granted by all to be a farre more abſolute then ours. That this and the reſt of what hath hitherto been ſpok'n is moſt true, might be copiouſly made appeare throughout all Stories Heathen and Chriſtian; ev'n of thoſe Nations where Kings and Emperours have ſought meanes to aboliſh all ancient memory of the peoples right by their encroachments and uſurpations. But I ſpare long inſertions, appealing to the German, French, Italian, Arrogonian, Engliſh, and not leaſt the Scottiſh Hiſtories: not forgetting this onely by the way, that William the Norman though a Conqueror, and not unſworne at his Coronation, was compelld a ſecond time to take Oath at S. Albanes, ere the people would be brought to yeild obedience.

It being thus manifeſt that the power of Kings and Magiſtrates is nothing elſe, but what is onely derivative, transferrd and committed to them in truſt from the People to the Common good of them all, in whom the power yet remaines fundamentally, and cannot be tak'n from them, without a violation of thir natural Birthright; and ſeeing that from hence Ariſtotle, and the beſt of Political Writers have defin'd a King, him who governs to the good and profit of his People, and not for his owne ends; it follows from neceſſary cauſes that that the Titles of Sovran Lord, Natural Lord, and the like, are either arrogancies, or flatteries, not admitted by Emperors and Kings of beſt note, and diſlikt by the Church both of Jews, Iſai. 26. 13. and ancient Chriſtians, as appears by Tertullian and others. Although generally the People of Aſia, and with them the Jews alſo, eſpecially ſince the time they choſe a King, againſt the advice and counſel of God, are noted by wiſe Authors much inclinable to Slavery.

Secondly, that to ſay, as is uſual, the King hath as good right to his Crown and Dignitie, as any Man to his Inheritance, is to make the Subject no better then the Kings Slave, his Chattell, or his Poſſeſſion that may be bought and ſould: And doubtleſs, if hereditary Title were ſufficiently inquir'd, the beſt foundation of it would be found but either in courteſie or convenience. But ſuppoſe it to be of right hereditarie, what can be more juſt and legal, if a Subject for certaine crimes be to forfet by Law from himſelfe and Poſterity, all his Inheritance to the King, then that a King for crimes proportionall, ſhould forfet all his title and inheritance to the people? unleſs the people muſt be thought created all for him, he not for them, and they all in one body inferior to him ſingle; which were a kind of treaſon againſt the dignity of mankind to affirm.

Thirdly, it ſollowes, that to ſay Kings are accountable to none but God, is the overturning of all Law and Government. For if they may refuſe to give account, then all Covnants made with them at Coronation, all Oathes are in vaine, and meer mockeries; all Lawes which they ſweare to keep, made to no purpoſe; for if the King feare not God, as how many of them doe not? we hold then our lives and eſtates: by the tenure of his meer grace and mercy, as from a God, not a mortal Magiſtrate; a Poſition that none but Court-paraſites or Men beſotted would maintain. And no Chriſtian Prince, not drunk with high Mind, and prouder then thoſe Pagan Caſars that deifi'd themſelves, would arrogate ſo unreaſonably above human condition, or derogate ſo baſely from a whole Nation of men his brethren, as if for him onely ſubſiſting, and to ſerve his glory, valuing them in compariſon of his owne brute will and pleaſure no more then ſo many beaſts, or vermine under his feet, not to be reaſon'd with, but to be injurd; among whom there might be found ſo many thouſand men for wiſdom, vertue, nobleneſs of mind, and all other reſpects but the fortune of his dignity, far above him. Yet ſome would perſwade us that this abſurd opinion was King Davids, becauſe in the 51 Pſalm he cries out to God, Againſt thee only have I ſinn'd; as if David had imagind that to murder Uriah and adulterate his Wife had bin no ſinne againſt his Neighbour, when as that law of Moſes was to the King expreſly, Deut. 17. not to think ſo highly of himſelf above his Brethren. David therefore by thoſe words could mean no other, then either that the depth of his guiltineſs was known to God onely, or to ſo few as had not the will or power to queſtion him, or that the Sin againſt God was greater beyond compare then againſt Uriah. What ever his meaning were, any wiſe man will ſee that the patheticall words of a Pſalme can be no certaine deciſion to a point that hath abundantly more certaine rules to goe by. How much more rationally ſpake the Heathen King Demophoon in a Tragedy of Euripides then theſe interpreters would put upon King David, I rule not my People by Tyranny as if they were Barbarians, but am my ſelf liable, if I doe unjuſtly, to ſuffer juſtly. Not unlike was the ſpeech of Traian the worthy Emperor, to one whom he made General of his Prætorian Forces: Take this drawne ſword, ſaith he, to uſe for me, if I reigne well; if not, to uſe againſt me. Thus Dion relates. And not Traian onely, but Theodoſius the younger a Chriſtian Emperor and one of the beſt, cauſd it to be enacted as a rule undenyable and fit to be acknowledgd by all Kings and Emperors, that a Prince is bound to the Laws; that on the autority of Law the autority of a Prince depends, and to the Laws ought ſubmit. Which Edict of his remaines yet unrepeald in the Code of Juſtinian, l. 1. tit. 24. as a ſacred conſtitution to all the ſucceeding Emperors. How then can any King in Europe maintaine and write himſelfe accountable to none but God, when Emperors in their owne imperiall Statutes have writt'n and decreed themſelves accountable to Law? And indeed where ſuch account is not fear'd, he that bids a man reigne over him above Law, may bid as well a ſavage beaſt.

It follows laſtly, that ſince the King or Magiſtrate holds his autoritie of the people, both originally and naturally for their good in the firſt place, and not his owne, then may the people as oft as they ſhall judge it for the beſt, either chooſe him or reject him, retaine him or depoſe him though no Tyrant, meerly by the libertie and right of free born men to be govern'd as ſeems to them beſt. This, though it cannot but ſtand with plain reaſon, ſhall be made good alſo by Scripture, Deut. 17. 24. When thou art come into the Land which the Lord thy God giveth thee, and ſhall ſay I will ſet a King over mee, like as all the Nations about mee. Theſe words confirme us that the right of chooſing, yea of changing thir owne Goverment, is by the grant of God himſelf in the people. And therefore when they deſir'd a King, though then under another forme of Goverment, and though thir changing diſpleaſd him, yet he that was himſelf thir King, and rejected by them, would not be a hindrance to what they intended, furder then by perſwaſion, but that they might doe therein as they ſaw good, 1 Sam. 8. onely he reſerv'd to himſelf the nomination of who ſhould reign over them. Neither did that exempt the King as if hee were to God onely accountable, though by his eſpeciall command anointed. Therefore David firſt made a Covnant with the Elders of Iſrael, and ſo was by them anointed King, 1 Chron. 11. And Jehoiada the Prieſt making Jehoaſh King, made a Cov'nant between him and the people, 2 Kings 11. 17. Therefore when Roboam at his comming to the Crowne, rejected thoſe conditions which the Iſraelites brought him, heare what they anſwer him, what portion have we in David, or inheritance in the Son of Jeſſe? See to thine owne Houſe David. And for the like conditions not perform'd, all Iſrael before that time depoſed Samuell; not for his own default, but for the miſgoverment of his Sons. But ſom will ſay to both theſe examples, it was evilly don. I anſwer, that not the latter, becauſe it was expreſſely allow'd them in the Law to ſet up a King if they pleas'd; and God himſelf joynd with them in the work; though in ſome ſort it was at that time diſpleaſing to him, in reſpect of old Samuell who had governd them uprightly. As Livy praiſes the Romans who took occaſion from Tarquinius a wicked Prince to gaine their libertie, which to have extorted, ſaith hee, from Numa or any of the good Kings before had not bin ſeaſonable. Nor was it in the former example don unlawfully; for when Roboam had prepar'd a huge Army to reduce the Iſraelites, he was forbidd'n by the Profet, 1 Kings 12. 24. Thus ſaith the Lord, yee ſhall not goe up, nor fight againſt your brethren, for this thing is from me. He calls them thir Brethren, not Rebels, and forbidds to be proceeded againſt them, owning the thing himſelfe, not by ſingle providence, but by approbation, and that not onely of the act, as in the former example, but of the fitt ſeaſon alſo; he had not otherwiſe forbidd to moleſt them. And thoſe grave and wiſe Counſellors whom Rehoboam firſt adviſ'd with, ſpake no ſuch thing, as our old gray headed Flatterers now are wont, ſtand upon your birth-right, ſcorne to capitulate, you hold of God, and not of them; for they knew no ſuch matter, unleſs conditionally, but gave him politic counſel, as in a civil tranſaction. Therfore Kingdom and Magiſtracy, whether ſupreme or ſubordinat, is calld a human Ordinance, 1 Pet. 2. 13, &c. which we are there taught is the will of God wee ſhould ſubmitt to, ſo farr as for the puniſhment of evil doers, and the encouragement of them that doe well, Submitt, ſaith he, as free men. And there is no power but of God, ſaith Paul, Rom. 13. as much as to ſay, God put it into mans heart to find out that way at firſt for common peace and preſervation, approving the exerciſe thereof; els it contradicts Peter, who calls the ſame autority an Ordinance of man. It muſt be alſo underſtood of lawfull and juſt power, els we read of great power in the Affaires and Kingdomes of the World permitted to the Devill: for ſaith he to Chriſt, Luke 4. 6. all this power will I give thee and the glory of them, for it is deliverd to me, and to whomſoever I will, I give it: neither did hee ly, or Chriſt gainſay what he affirm'd; for in the thirteenth of the Revelation wee read how the Dragon gave to the Beaſt his power, his ſeat, and great autority: which Beaſt ſo autoriz'd moſt expound to be the tyrannical Powers and Kingdomes of the Earth. Therfore Saint Paul in the forecited Chapter tells us, that ſuch Magiſtrates he meanes, as are not a terror to the good but to the evill, ſuch as beare not the ſword in vaine, but to puniſh offenders, and to encourage the good. If ſuch onely be mentiond here as powers to be obeyd, and our ſubmiſſion to them onely requird, then doubtleſs thoſe powers that doe the contrary, are no powers ordaind of God; and by conſequence no obligation laid upon us to obey or not to reſiſt them. And it may be well obſervd that both theſe Apoſtles, whenever they give this Precept, expreſs it in termes not concret but abſtract, as Logicians are wont to ſpeake; that is they mention the ordinance, the power, the autoritie before the perſons that execute it; and what that power is, leſt we ſhould be deceavd, they deſcribe exactly. So that if the power be not ſuch, or the perſon execute not ſuch power, neither the one nor the other is of God, but of the Devill, and by conſequence to bee reſiſted. From this expoſition Chryſoſtome alſo on the ſame place diſſents not; explaining that theſe words were not writt'n in behalf of a Tyrant. And this is verify'd by David, himſelf a King, and likelieſt to be Author of the Pſalm 94. 20. which ſaith, Shall the throne of iniquity have fellowſhip with thee? And it were worth the knowing, ſince Kings, and that by Scripture, boaſt the juſtneſs of thir Title, by holding it immediately of God, yet cannot ſhow the time when God ever ſet on the Throne them or thir forefathers, but onely when the people choſe them; why by the ſame reaſon, ſince God aſcribes as oft to himſelf the caſting down of Princes from the Throne, it ſhould not be thought as lawful, and as much from God when none are ſeen to do it but the people, and that for juſt cauſes. For if it needs muſt be a ſin in them to depoſe, it may as likely be a ſin to have elected. And contrary if the peoples act in election be pleaded by a King, as the act of God, and the moſt juſt title to enthrone him, why may not the peoples act of rejection, be as well pleaded by the people as the act of God, and the moſt juſt reaſon to depoſe him? So that we ſee the title and juſt right of reigning or depoſing in reference to God, is found in Scripture to be all one; viſible onely in the people, and depending meerly upon juſtice and demerit. Thus farr hath bin conſiderd briefly the power of Kings and Magiſtrates; how it was, and is originally the peoples, and by them conferrd in truſt onely to bee imployd to the common peace and benefit; with libertie therefore and right remaining in them to reaſſume it to themſelves, if by Kings or Magiſtrates it be abus'd; or to diſpoſe of it by any alteration, as they ſhall judge moſt conducing to the public good.

Wee may from hence with more eaſe, and force of argument determin what a Tyrant is, and what the people may doe againſt him. A Tyrant whether by wrong or by right comming to the Crowne, is he who regarding neither Law nor the common good, reigns onely for himſelf and his Faction: Thus St. Baſil among others defines him. And becauſe his power is great, his will boundleſs and exorbitant, the fulfilling whereof is for the moſt part accompanied with innumerable wrongs and oppreſſions of the people, Murders, Maſſacres, Rapes, Adulteries, Deſolation, and Subverſion of Cities and whole Provinces; look how great a good and happineſs a juſt King is, ſo great a miſcheiſe is a Tyrant; as hee the public Father of his Countrie, ſo this the common Enemie. Againſt whom what the people lawfully may doe, as againſt a common peſt, and deſtroyer of mankinde, I ſuppoſe no man of cleare judgement need goe furder to be guided then by the very principles of nature in him. But becauſe it is the vulgar folly of men to deſert thir owne reaſon, and ſhutting thir eyes to think they ſee beſt with other mens, I ſhall ſhew by ſuch examples as ought to have moſt waight with us, what hath bin don in this caſe heretofore. The Greeks and Romans, as thir prime Authors witneſs, held it not onely lawfull, but a glorious and heroic Deed, rewarded publicly with Statues and Garlands, to kill an infamous Tyrant at any time without tryal; and but reaſon, that he who trod down all Law, ſhould not be voutſaf'd the benefit of Law. Inſomuch that Seneca the Tragedian brings in Hercules the grand ſuppreſſor of Tyrants thus ſpeaking,

——— Victima haud ulla amplior
Poteſt, magiſque opima mactari Jovi
Quam Rex iniquus ———
——— There can be ſlaine
No ſacrifice to God more acceptable
Then an unjuſt and wicked King ———

But of theſe I name no more, leſt it be objected they were Heathen; and come to produce another ſort of men that had the knowledge of true Religion. Among the Jews this cuſtome of Tyrant-killing was not unuſual. Firſt Ehud, a man whom God had rayſd to deliver Iſrael from Eglon King of Moab, who had conquer'd and rul'd over them eighteen Years, being ſent to him as an Ambaſſador with a preſent, ſlew him in his owne Houſe. But he was a forren Prince, an Enemie, and Ehud beſides had ſpecial warrant from God. To the firſt I anſwer, it imports not whether forren or native: For no Prince ſo native but profeſſes to hold by Law; which when he himſelſe overturnes, breaking all the Covnants and Oaths that gave him title to his dignity, and were the bond and alliance between him and his people, what differs he from an Outlandiſh King or from an Enemie? For looke how much right the King of Spaine hath to govern us at all, ſo much right hath the King of England to govern us tyrannically. If he, though not bound to us by any league, comming from Spaine in perſon to ſubdue us, or to deſtroy us, might lawfully by the people of England either bee ſlaine in Fight, or put to death in Captivity, what hath a native King to plead, bound by ſo many Covnants, Benefits and Honours to the welfare of his people? why he through the contempt of all Laws and Parlaments, the onely tie of our obedience to him, for his owne wills ſake, and a boaſted Prærogative unaccountable, after ſev'n Years warring and deſtroying of his beſt Subjects, overcom, and yeilded priſoner, ſhould think to ſcape unqueſtionable, ſtionable, as a thing divine, in reſpect of whom ſo many thouſand Chriſtians deſtroy'd ſhould lye unaccounted for, polluting with thir ſlaughterd Carcaſſes all the Land over, and crying for vengeance againſt the living that ſhould have righted them? Who knows not that there is a mutual bond of amity and brotherhood between man and man over all the World, neither is it the Engliſh Sea that can ſever us from that duty and relation: a ſtraiter bond yet there is between fellow-ſubjects, neighbours, and friends; But when any of theſe do one to another ſo as hoſtility could do no worſe, what doth the Law decree leſs againſt them, then open enemies and invaders? or if the Law be not preſent, or too weake, what doth it warrant us to leſs then ſingle defence or civil Warr? and from that time forward the Law of civill defenſive Warr differs nothing from the Law of forren hoſtility. Nor is it diſtance of place that makes enmitie, but enmity that makes diſtance. He therefore that keeps peace with me neer or remote, of whatſoever Nation, is to me as far as all civil and human Offices an Engliſhman and a Neighbour, but if an Engliſhman forgetting all Laws, human, civil and religious, offend againſt life and libertie, to him offended and to the Law in his behalf, though born in the ſame Womb, he is no better then a Turk, a Saraſin, a Heathen. This is Goſpel, and this was ever Law among equals; how much rather then in force againſt any King whatſoever, who in reſpect of the people is confeſsd inferiour and not equal: to diſtinguiſh therfore of a Tyrant by Outlandiſh, or Domeſtic is a weak evaſion. To the ſecond that he was an Enemie, I anſwer, what Tyrant is not? yet Eglon by the Jews had bin acknowledgd as thir Sovran, they had ſervd him eighteen years, as long almoſt as we our William the Conqueror, in all which time he could not be ſo unwiſe a Stateſman but to have tak'n of them Oaths of Fealty and Allegeance, by which they made themſelves his proper ſubjects, as thir homage and preſent ſent by Ehud teſtifyd. To the third, that he had ſpecial warrant to kill Eglon in that manner, it cannot be granted, becauſe not expreſsd; tis plain that he was rayſd by God to be a Deliverer, and went on juſt principles, ſuch as were then and ever held allowable, to deale ſo by a Tyrant that could no otherwiſe be dealt with. Neither did Samuell though a Profet, with his own hand abſtain from Agag; a forren enemie no doubt; but mark the reaſon, As thy Sword hath made women childleſs; a cauſe that by the ſentence of Law it ſelf nullifies all relations. And as the Law is between Brother and Brother, Father and Son, Maiſter and Servant, wherefore not between King or rather Tyrant and People? And whereas Jehu had ſpecial command to ſlay Jehoram a ſucceſſive and hereditarie Tyrant, it ſeems not the leſs imitable for that; for where a thing grounded ſo much on naturall reaſon hath the addition of a command from God, what does it but eſtabliſh the lawfulneſs of ſuch an act? Nor is it likely that God, who had ſo many ways of puniſhing the houſe of Ahab, would have ſent a Subject againſt his Prince, if the fact in it ſelf as don to a Tyrant had bin of bad example. And if David refuſd to lift his hand againſt the Lords anointed, the matter between them was not tyranny, but private enmity, and David as a private perſon had bin his owne revenger, not ſo much the peoples; but when any Tyrant at this day can ſhew to be the Lords anointed, the only mention'd reaſon why David withheld his hand, he may then, but not till then, preſume on the ſame privilege.

We may paſs therefore hence to Chriſtian Times. And firſt our Saviour himſelf, how much he favourd Tyrants, and how much intended they ſhould be found or honourd among Chriſtians, declares his mind not obſcurely; accounting thir abſolute autoritie no better then Gentiliſme, yea though they flouriſhd it over with the ſplendid name of Benefactors; charging thoſe that would be his Diſciples to uſurp no ſuch dominion; but that they who were to be of moſt autoritie among them, ſhould eſteem themſelves Miniſters and Servants to the public. Mat. 20. 25. The Princes of the Gentiles exerciſe Lordſhip over them; and Mark 10. 42. They that ſeem to rule, ſaith he, either ſlighting or accounting them no lawful rulers; but ye ſhall not be ſo, but the greateſt among you ſhall be your Servant. And although he himſelf were the meekeſt, and came on Earth to be ſo, yet to a Tyrant we hear him not voutſafe an humble word: but Tell that Fox, Luk. 13. And wherefore did his Mother the Virgin Mary give ſuch praiſe to God in her profetic Song, that he had now by the comming of Chriſt, Cut down Dynaſta's, or proud Monarchs from the Throne, if the Church, when God manifeſts his power in them to do ſo, ſhould rather chooſe all miſerie and vaſſalage to ſerve them, and let them ſtill ſit on thir potent ſeats to be ador'd for doing miſchief. Surely it is not for nothing that Tyrants by a kind of natural inſtinct both hate and feare none more then the true Church and Saints of God, as the moſt dangerous enemies and ſubverters of Monarchy, though indeed of Tyranny; hath not this bin the perpetual cry of Courtiers, and Court-Prelates? whereof no likelier cauſe can be alleg'd, but that they well diſcern'd the mind and principles of moſt devout and zealous men, and indeed the very diſcipline of Church, tending to the diſſolution of all Tyranny. No marvel then if ſince the Faith of Chriſt receav'd, in purer or impurer times, to depoſe a King and put him to death for Tyranny hath bin accounted ſo juſt and requiſit, that neighbour Kings have both upheld and tak'n part with Subjects in the action. And Ludovicus Pius, himſelf an Emperor, and Son of Charles the Great, being made Judge, Du Haillan is my author, between Milegaſt King of the Vultzes and his Subjects who had depos'd him, gave his verdit for the Subjects, and for him whom they had choſ'n in his room. Note here that the right of electing whom they pleaſe, is by the impartial teſtimony of an Emperor in the people. For, ſaid he, A juſt Prince ought to be preferr'd before an unjuſt, and the end of Goverment before the prerogative. And Conſtantinus Leo, another Emperor in the Byzantine Laws ſaith, That the end of a King is for the general good, which he not performing, is but the counterfet of a King. And to prove that ſome of our own Monarchs have acknowledg'd that thir high office exempted them not from puniſhment, they had the Sword of St. Edward born before them by an Officer who was calld Earl of the Palace ev'n at the times of thir higheſt pomp and ſolemnity, to mind them, ſaith Mathew Paris, the beſt of our Hiſtorians, that if they err'd, the Sword had power to reſtrain them. And what reſtraint the Sword comes to at length, having both edg and point, if any Sceptic will needs doubt, let him feel. It is alſo affirm'd from diligent ſearch made in our ancient books of Law, that the Peers and Barons of England had a legall right to judge the King: which was the cauſe moſt likely, for it could be no ſlight cauſe, that they were call'd his Peers, or Equals. This however may ſtand immovable, ſo long as man hath to deale with no better then man; that if our Law judge all men to the loweſt by thir Peers, it ſhould in all equity aſcend alſo, and judge the higheſt. And ſo much I find both in our own and forren Story, that Dukes, Earls, and Marqueſſes were at firſt not hereditary, not empty and vain titles, but names of truſt and office, and with the office ceaſing; as induces me to be of opinion, that every worthy man in Parlament, for the word Baron imports no more, might for the public good be thought a fit Peer and Judge of the King; without regard had to petty Caveats, and Circumſtances, the chief impediment in high affairs, and ever ſtood upon moſt by circumſtantial men. Whence doubtleſs our Anceſtors, who were not ignorant with what rights either Nature or ancient Conſtitution had endow'd them, when Oaths both at Coronation, and renew'd in Parlament would not ſerve, thought it no way illegal to depoſe and put to death thir Tyrannous Kings. Inſomuch that the Parlament drew up a charge againſt Richard the Second, and the Commons requeſted to have judgement decreed againſt him, that the Realm might not be endanger'd. And Peter Martyr a Divine of formoſt rank, on the third of Judges approves thir doings. Sir Thomas Smith alſo, a Proteſtant and a Stateſman, in his Commonwealth of England putting the Queſtion, whether it be lawful to riſe againſt a Tyrant? anſwers, that the vulgar judge of it according to the event, and the learned according to the purpoſe of them that do it. But far before thoſe days Gildas the moſt ancient of all our Hiſtorians, ſpeaking of thoſe times wherein the Roman Empire decaying, quitted and relinquiſh'd what right they had by Conqueſt to this Iland, and reſign'd it all into the peoples hands, teſtifies that the people thus re-inveſted with thir own original right, about the year 446, both elected them Kings, who they thought beſt (the firſt Chriſtian Brittiſh Kings that ever raign'd here ſince the Romans) and by the ſame right, when they apprehended cauſe, uſually depos'd and put them to death. This is the moſt fundamental and ancient tenure that any King of England can produce or pretend to; in compariſon of which, all other titles and pleas are but of yeſterday. If any object that Gildas condemns the Britanes for ſo doing, the anſwer is as ready; that he condemns them no more for ſo doing, then he did before for chooſing ſuch, for ſaith he, They anointed them Kings, not of God, but ſuch as were more bloody then the reſt. Next he condemns them not at all for depoſing or putting them to death, but for doing it over haſtily, without tryal or well examining the cauſe, and for electing others worſe in thir room. Thus we have here both domeſtic and moſt ancient Examples that the people of Britain have depos'd and put to death thir Kings in thoſe primitive Chriſtian times. And to couple reaſon with example, if the Church in all Ages, Primitive, Romiſh, or Proteſtant, held it ever no leſs thir duty then the power of thir Keys, though without expreſs warrant of Scripture, to bring indifferently both King and Peaſant under the utmoſt rigor of thir Canons and Cenſures Eccleſiaſtical, ev'n to the ſmiting him with a final Excommunion, if he perſiſt impenitent, what hinders but that the temporal Law both may and ought, though without a ſpecial Text or Preſident, extend with like indifference the civil Sword, to the cutting off, without exemption, him that capitally offends? Seeing that Juſtice and Religion are from the ſame God, and works of Juſtice ofttimes more acceptable. Yet becauſe that ſome lately with the Tongues and Arguments of Malignant Backſliders have writt'n that the proceedings now in Parlament againſt the King, are without Preſident from any Proteſtant State or Kingdom, the Examples which follow ſhall be all Proteſtant, and chiefly Presbyterian.

In the Year 1546. The Duke of Saxonie, Lantgrave of Heſſen, and the whole Proteſtant League rais'd open War againſt Charles the Fifth thir Emperor, ſent him a Defiance, renounc'd all Faith and Allegeance toward him, and debated long in Counſell whether they ſhould give him ſo much as the title of Cæſar. Sleidan. l. 17. Let all men judge what this wanted of depoſing or of killing, but the power to do it.

In the Year 1559. The Scotch Proteſtants claiming promiſe of thir Queen-Regent for liberty of Conſcience, ſhe anſwering that promiſes were not to be claim'd of Princes beyond what was commodious for them to grant, told her to her face in the Parlament then at Sterling, that if it were ſo, they renounc'd thir obedience; and ſoon after betook them to Arms. Buchanan Hiſt. l. 16. Certainly when Allegeance is renounc'd, that very hour the King or Queen is in effect depos'd.

In the Year 1564. John Knox a moſt famous Divine, and the Reformer of Scotland to the Presbyterian Diſcipline, at a General Aſſembly maintain'd op'nly in a diſpute againſt Lethington the Secretary of State, that Subjects might and ought execute Gods Judgements upon thir King; that the Fact of Jehu and others againſt thir King, having the ground of Gods ordinary Command to put ſuch and ſuch offenders to death, was not extraordinary, but to be imitated of all that preferr'd the honour of God to the affection of Fleſh and wicked Princes; that Kings, if they offend, have no privilege to be exempted from the puniſhments of Law more than any other ſubject: ſo that if the King be a Murderer, Adulterer, or Idolater, he ſhould ſuffer not as a King, but as an offender; and this Poſition he repeates again and again before them. Anſwerable was the opinion of John.Craig another learned Divine, and that Laws made by the tyranny of Princes, or the negligence of People, thir Poſterity might abrogate, and reform all things according to the original inſtitution of Commonwealths. And Knox being commanded by the Nobility to write to Calvin and other learned men for thir judgements in that Queſtion, refus'd; alleging that both himſelf was fully reſolv'd in Conſcience, and had heard thir Judgements, and had the ſame opinion under hand-writing of many the moſt godly and moſt learned that he knew in Europe; that if he ſhould move the Queſtion to them again, what ſhould he do but ſhew his own forgetfulneſs or inconſtancy. All this is far more largely in the Eccleſiaſtic Hiſtory of Scotland l. 4. with many other paſſages to this effect all the Book over, ſet out with diligence by Scotchmen of beſt repute among them at the beginning of theſe Troubles; as if they labour'd to inform us what we were to do, and what they intended upon the like occaſion.

And to let the world know that the whole Church and Proteſtant State of Scotland in thoſe pureſt times of Reformation were of the ſame beleif, three years after, they met in the feild Mary thir lawful and hereditary Queen, took her Priſoner, yeilding before Fight, kept her in Priſon, and the ſame year depos'd her. Buchan. Hiſt. l. 18.

And four years after that, the Scots in juſtification of thir depoſing Queen Mary,

Mary, ſent Embaſſadors to Queen Elizabeth, and in a writt'n Declaration alleag'd that they had uſ'd towards her more lenity then ſhe deſerv'd; that thir Anceſtors had heretofore puniſhd thir Kings by death or baniſhment; that the Scots were a free Nation, made King whom they freely choſe, and with the ſame freedom un-king'd him if they ſaw cauſe, by right of ancient Laws and Ceremonies yet remaining, and old Cuſtoms yet among the High-landers in chooſing the head of thir Clanns, or Families; all which, with many other arguments bore witneſs that Regal power was nothing elſe but a mutuall Covnant or ſtipulation between King and People. Buch. Hiſt. l. 20. Theſe were Scotchmen and Presbyterians: but what meaſure then have they lately offerd, to think ſuch liberty leſs beſeeming us then themſelves, preſuming to put him upon us for a Maiſter whom thir Law ſcarce allows to be thir own Equall? If now then we heare them in another ſtraine then heretofore in the pureſt times of thir Church, we may be confident it is the voice of Faction ſpeaking in them, not of Truth and Reformation.

In the Year 1581. the States of Holland in a general Aſſembly at the Hague, abjur'd all obedience and ſubjection to Philip King of Spaine; and in a Declaration juſtifie thir ſo doing; for that by his tyrannous Goverment, againſt Faith ſo oft'n giv'n and brok'n, he had loſt his right to all the Belgic Provinces; that therefore they depos'd him, and declar'd it lawful to chooſe another in his ſtead. Thuan. l. 74. From that time to this, no State or Kingdom in the World hath equally proſperd: But let them remember not to look with an evil and prejudicial eye upon thir neighbours walking by the ſame rule.

But what need theſe examples to Presbyterians, I mean to thoſe who now of late would ſeem ſo much to abhorr depoſing, whenas they to all Chriſtendom have giv'n the lateſt and the livelieſt example of doing it themſelves. I queſtion not the lawfulneſs of raiſing War againſt a Tyrant in defence of Religion, or civil Liberty; for no Proteſtant Church from the firſt Waldenſes of Lyons and Languedoc to this day, but have don it round, and maintaind it lawfull. But this I doubt not to affirm, that the Presbyterians, who now ſo much condemn depoſing, were the men themſelves that depos'd the King, and cannot with all thir ſhifting and relapſing, waſh off the guiltineſs from thir own hands. For they themſelves, by theſe thir late doings have made it guiltineſs, and turnd thir own warrantable actions into Rebellion.

There is nothing that ſo actually makes a King of England, as rightful Poſſeſſion and Supremacy in all Cauſes both Civil and Eccleſiaſtical: and nothing that ſo actually makes a Subject of England, as thoſe two Oaths of Allegeance and Supremacy obſervd without equivocating, or any mental reſervation. Out of doubt then when the King ſhall command things already conſtituted in Church or State, Obedience is the true eſſence of a Subject, either to do, if it be lawful, or if he hold the thing unlawful, to ſubmit to that Penalty which the Law impoſes, ſo long as he intends to remain a Subject. Therfore when the people, or any part of them, ſhall riſe againſt the King and his Autority, executing the Law in any thing eſtabliſh'd, Civil or Ecclesiaſtical, I do not ſay it is Rebellion, if the thing commanded though eſtabliſh'd be unlawful, and that they ſought firſt all due means of redreſs (and no man is furder bound to Law) but I ſay it is an abſolute renouncing both of Supremacy and Allegeance, which in one word is an actual and total depoſing of the King, and the ſetting up another ſupreme Autority over them. And whether the Presbyterians have not don all this and much more, they will not put me, I ſuppoſe, to reck'n up a ſeven years ſtory freſh in the memory of all men. Have they not utterly broke the Oath of Allegeance, rejecting the Kings Command and Autority ſent them from any part of the Kingdom whether in things lawful or unlawful? Have they not abjur'd the Oath of Supremacy by ſetting up the Parlament without the King, ſupreme to all thir Obedience; and though thir Vow and Covnant bound them in general to the Parlament, yet ſomtimes adhering to the leſſer part of Lords and Commons that remain'd faithful, as they term it, and ev'n of them, one while to the Commons without the Lords, another while to the Lords without the Commons? Have they not ſtill declar'd thir meaning, whatever thir Oath were, to hold them onely for ſupreme whom they found at any time moſt yeilding to what they petition'd? Both theſe Oaths which were the ſtraiteſt bond of an Engliſh Subject in reference to the King, being thus broke and made void; it follows undeniably that the King from that time was by them in fact abſolutely depos'd, and they no longer in reality to be thought his Subjects, notwithſtanding thir fine Clauſe in the Covnant to preſerve his Perſon, Crown and Dignity, ſet there by ſome dodging Caſuiſt with more craft then ſincerity, to mitigate the matter in caſe of ill ſucceſs, and not tak'n I ſuppoſe by any honeſt man, but as a Condition ſubordinate to every the leaſt Particle that might more concern Religion, Liberty, or the Public Peace.

To prove it yet more plainly that they are the Men who have depos'd the King, I thus argue. We know that King and Subject are Relatives, and relatives have no longer being then in the relation; the relation between King and Subject can be no other than Regal Autority and Subjection. Hence I infer paſt thir defending, that if the Subject who is one relative, takes away the Relation, of force he takes away alſo the other relative: but the Presbyterians who were one Relative, that is to ſay Subjects, have for this ſev'n years tak'n away the Relation; that is to ſay, the Kings Autority, and thir Subjection to it; therfore the Presbyterians for theſe ſev'n years have remov'd and extinguiſht the other Relative, that is to ſay the King; or to ſpeak more in brief, have depos'd him; not only by depriving him the execution of his Autority, but by conferring it upon others. If then thir Oaths of Subjection brok'n, new Supremacy obey'd, new Oaths and Covnants tak'n, notwithſtanding frivolous evaſions, have in plain terms unking'd the King, much more then hath thir ſev'n years War, not depos'd him only, but outlaw'd him, and defi'd him as an Alien, a Rebel to Law, an Enemy to the State. It muſt needs be clear to any man not averſe from Reaſon, that Hoſtility and Subjection are two direct and poſitive Contraries, and can no more in one Subject ſtand together in reſpect of the ſame King, then one perſon at the ſame time can be in two remote places. Againſt whom therfore the Subject is in act of Hoſtility we may be confident that to him he is in no Subjection: and in whom Hoſtility takes place of Subjection, for they can by no means conſiſt together, to him the King can be not only no King, but an Enemy. So that from hence we ſhall not need diſpute whether they have depos'd him, or what they have defaulted towards him as no King, but ſhew manifeſtly how much they have don toward the killing him. Have they not levied all theſe Warrs againſt him whether offenſive or defenſive (for defence in Warr equally offends, and moſt prudently beforehand) and giv'n Commiſſion to ſlay where they knew his Perſon could not be exempt from danger? And if chance or flight had not ſav'd him, how oft'n had they killd him, directing thir Artillery without blame or prohibition to the very place where they ſaw him ſtand? Have they not converted his Revenue to other uſes, and detain'd from him all means of livelyhood, ſo that for them long ſince he might have periſht, or have ſtarv'd? Have they not hunted and purſu'd him round about the Kingdom with ſword and fire? Have they not formerly deny'd to treat with him, and thir now recanting Miniſters preach'd againſt him, as a Reprobate incurable, an Enemy to God and his Church, markt for deſtruction, and therefore not to be treated with? Have they not beſeig'd him, and to thir power forbid him Water and Fire, ſave what they ſhot againſt him to the hazard of his life? Yet while they thus aſſaulted and endangerd it with hoſtile deeds, they ſwore in words to defend it with his Crown and Dignity; not in order, as it ſeems now, to a firm and laſting Peace, or to his repentance after all this blood; but ſimply, without regard, without remorſe or any comparable value of all the miſeries and calamities ſufferd by the poor people, or to ſuffer hereafter through his obſtinacy or impenitence. No underſtanding man can be ignorant that Covnants are ever made according to the preſent ſtate of perſons and of things; and have ever the more general Laws of Nature and of Reaſon included in them, though not expreſs'd. If I make a voluntary Covnant as with a man to do him good, and he prove afterward a Monſter to me, I ſhould conceave a diſobligement. If I covnant, not to hurt an enemy, in favor of him and forbearance, and hope of his amendment, and he, after that, ſhall do me tenfold injury and miſchief to what he had don when I ſo covnanted, and ſtill be plotting what may tend to my deſtruction, I queſtion not but that his after-actions releaſe me; nor know I Covnant ſo ſacred that withholds me from demanding Juſtice on him. Howbeit, had not thir diſtruſt in a good Cauſe, and the faſt and loos of our prevaricating Divines overſway'd, it had bin doubtleſs better, not to have inſerted in a Covnant unneceſſary obligations, gations, and words, not works, of a ſupererogating Allegeance to thir enemy; no way advantageous to themſelves, had the King prevail'd, as to thir coſt many would have felt; but full of ſnare and diſtraction to our friends, uſefull only, as we now find, to our adverſaries, who under ſuch a latitude and ſhelter of ambiguous interpretation have ever ſince been plotting and contriving new opportunities to trouble all again. How much better had it bin, and more becomming an undaunted Vertue to have declard op'nly and boldly whom and what power the people were to hold Supreme, as on the like occaſion Proteſtants have don before, and many conſcientious men now in theſe times have more then once beſought the Parlament to do, that they might go on upon a ſure foundation, and not with a ridling Covnant in thir mouths, ſeeming to ſwear counter, almoſt in the ſame breath, Allegeance and no Allegeance; which doubtleſs had drawn off all the minds of ſincere men from ſiding with them, had they not diſcern'd thir actions farr more depoſing him then thir words upholding him; which words made now the ſubject of cavillous interpretations, ſtood ever in the Covnant, by judgment of the more diſcerning ſort, an evidence of thir feare not of thir fidelity. What, ſhould I return to ſpeak on, of thoſe attempts for which the King himſelf hath oft'n charg'd the Presbyterians of ſeeking his life, whenas in the due eſtimation of things they might without a fallacy be ſayd to have don the deed outright. Who knows not that the King is a name of dignity and office, not of perſon: Who therefore kills a King, muſt kill him while he is a King. Then they certainly who by depoſing him have long ſince tak'n from him the life of a King, his office and his dignity, they in the trueſt ſence may be ſaid to have killd the King: nor only by thir depoſing and waging Warr againſt him, which beſides the danger to his perſonal life, ſet him in the fardeſt oppoſite point from any vital function of a King, but by thir holding him in priſon vanquiſhed and yeilded into thir abſolute and deſpotic power, which brought him to the loweſt degradement and incapacity of the Regal name. I ſay not by whoſe matchleſs valour next under God, leſt the ſtory of thir ingratitude thereupon carry me from the purpoſe in hand, which is to convince them that they, which I repeat again, were the men who in the trueſt ſenſe killd the King, not only as is provd before, but by depreſſing him thir King farr below the rank of a Subject to the condition of a Captive, without intention to reſtore him, as the Chancellour of Scotland in a ſpeech told him plainly at Newcaſtle, unleſs he granted fully all thir Demands, which they knew he never meant. Nor did they treat or think of treating with him, till thir hatred to the Army that deliverd them, not thir love or duty to the King, joyn'd them ſecretly with men ſentenc'd ſo oft for Reprobates in thir own mouths, by whoſe ſuttle inſpiring they grew mad upon a moſt tardy and improper Treaty. Whereas if the whole bent of thir actions had not bin againſt the King himſelf, but againſt his evill Councel, as they fain'd, and publiſh'd, wherefore did they not reſtore him all that while to the true life of a King, his Office, Crown and Dignity, when he was in thir power, and they themſelves his neereſt Counſelers? The truth therefore is, both that they would not, and that indeed they could not without their own certain deſtruction, having reduc'd him to ſuch a final paſs, as was the very death and burial of all in him that was regal, and from whence never King of England yet reviv'd, but by the new re-inforcement of his own party, which was a kind of reſurrection to him. Thus having quite extinguiſht all that could be in him of a King, and from a total privation clad him over like another ſpecifical thing with formes and habitudes deſtructive to the former, they left in his perſon dead as to Law and all the civil right either of King or Subject the life only of a Priſner, a Captive and a Malefactor. Whom the equal and impartial hand of Juſtice finding, was no more to ſpare then another ordinary man; not only made obnoxious to the doome of Law by a charge more then once drawn up againſt him, and his own confeſſion to the firſt Article at Newport, but ſummond and arraignd in the ſight of God and his people, curſt and devoted to perdition worſe then any Ahab, or Antiochus, with exhortation to curſe all thoſe in the Name of God that made not War againſt him, as bitterly as Meroz was to be curs'd, that went not out againſt a Canaanitiſh King, almoſt in all the Sermons, Prayers, and Fulminations that have bin utterd this ſev'n years by thoſe clov'n Tongues of falſhood and diſſention, who now, to the ſtirring up of new diſcord, acquit him; and againſt thir own diſcipline, which they boaſt to be the Throne and Scepter of Chriſt, abſolve him, unconfound him, though unconverted, unrepentant, unſenſible of all thir pretious Saints and Martyrs whoſe blood they have ſo oft layd upon his head: and now again with a new ſovran anointment can waſh it all off, as if it were as vile, and no more to be reckn'd for then the blood of ſo many Dogs in a time of Peſtilence: giving the moſt opprobrious lye to all the acted zeal that for theſe many years hath fill'd thir bellies, and fed them fat upon the fooliſh People. Miniſters of Sedition, not of the Goſpel, who while they ſaw it manifeſtly tend to civil Warr and Bloodſhed, never ceas'd exaſperating the people againſt him; and now that they ſee it likely to breed new commotion, ceaſe not to incite others againſt the people that have ſav'd them from him, as if Sedition were thir only aime whether againſt him or for him. But God, as we have cauſe to truſt, will put other thoughts into the people, and turn them from looking after theſe firebrands, of whoſe fury, and falſe prophecies, we have anough experience; and from the murmurs of new diſcord will incline them to heark'n rather with erected minds to the voice of our ſupreme Magiſtracy, calling us to liberty, and the flouriſhing deeds of a reform'd Commonwealth; with this hope that as God was heretofore angry with the Jews who rejected him and his form of Government to chooſe a King, ſo that he will bleſs us, and be propitious to us who reject a King to make him only our Leader, and ſupreme Governour in the conformity as neer as may be of his own ancient Government; if we have at leaſt but ſo much worth in us to entertaine the ſenſe of our future happineſs, and the courage to receave what God voutſafes us: wherein we have the honour to preceed other Nations who are now labouring to be our followers. For as to this queſtion in hand, what the people by thir juſt right may do in change of Government, or of Governour, we ſee it cleerd ſufficiently; beſides other ample Autority ev'n from the mouths of Princes themſelves. And ſurely they that ſhall boaſt, as we do, to be a free Nation. and not have in themſelves the power to remove, or to aboliſh any Governour ſupreme, or ſubordinate with the Government it ſelf upon urgent cauſes, may pleaſe thir fancy with a ridiculous and painted freedom, fit to coz'n babies; but are indeed under tyranny and ſervitude; as wanting that power, which is the root and ſourſe of all liberty, to diſpoſe and œconomize in the Land which God hath giv'n them, as Maiſters of Family in thir own Houſe and free Inheritance. Without which natural and eſſential power of a free Nation, though bearing high thir heads, they can in due eſteem be thought no better then ſlaves and vaſſals born, in the tenure and occupation of another inheriting Lord. Whoſe Government, though not illegal, or intolerable, hangs over them as a Lordly ſcourge, not as a free Government; and therefore to be abrogated. How much more juſtly then may they fling off Tyranny, or Tyrants? who being once depos'd can be no more then private men, as ſubject to the reach of Juſtice and Arraignment as any other Tranſgreſſors? And certainly if men, not to ſpeak of Heathen, both wiſe and religious, have don juſtice upon Tyrants what way they could ſooneſt, how much more mild and human then is it to give them fair and op'n tryall? To teach lawleſs Kings, and all that ſo much adore them, that not mortal man, or his imperious Will, but Juſtice is the only true Sovran and ſupreme Majeſty upon Earth. Let men ceaſe therfore out of Faction and Hypocriſy to make outcrys and horrid things of things ſo juſt and honorable. And if the Parlament and Military Councel do what they do without preſident, if it appear thir duty, it argues the more wiſdom, vertue, and magnanimity, that they know themſelves able to be a preſident to others. Who perhaps in future ages, if they prove not too degenerate, will look up with honour and aſpire toward theſe exemplary, and matchleſs deeds of thir Anceſtors, as to the higheſt top of thir civil glory and emulation. Which heretofore in the purſuance of fame and forren dominion, ſpent it ſelf vain-gloriouſly abroad; but henceforth may learn a better fortitude to dare execute higheſt Juſtice on them that ſhall by force of Arms endeavour the oppreſſing and bereaving of Religion and thir Liberty at home: that no unbridl'd Potentate or Tyrant, but to his ſorrow for the future, may preſume ſuch high and irreſponſible licence over mankind, to havock and turn upſide-down whole Kingdoms of men, as though they were no more in reſpect of his perverſe Will then a Nation of Piſmires. As for the party calld Presbyterian, of whom I beleive very many to be good and faithful Chriſtians, though miſled by ſom of turbulent Spirit, I wiſh them earneſtly and calmly not to fall off from thir firſt Principles, nor to affect rigor and ſuperiority over men not under them; not to compell unforcible things in Religion eſpecially, which if not voluntary, becomes a ſin; nor to aſſiſt the clamor and malicious drifts of men whom they themſelves have judg'd to be the worſt of men, the obdurate enemies of God and his Church: nor to dart againſt the actions of thir brethren, for want of other argument thoſe wreſted Laws and Scriptures thrown by Prelats and Malignants againſt thir own ſides, which though they hurt not otherwiſe, yet tak'n up by them to the condemnation of thir own doings give ſcandal to all men, and diſcover in themſelves either extreme paſſion or apoſtacy. Let them not oppoſe thir beſt friends and aſſociats who moleſt them not at all, infringe not the leaſt of thir Liberties, unleſs they call it thir liberty to bind other mens Conſciences, but are ſtill ſeeking to live at peace with them and brotherly accord. Let them beware an old and perfet Enemy, who though he hope by ſowing Diſcord to make them his Inſtruments, yet cannot forbear a minute the op'n threatning of his deſtin'd Revenge upon them when they have ſerv'd his purpoſes. Let them feare therefore, if they be wiſe, rather what they have don already, then what remains to do, and be warn'd in time they put no confidence in Princes whom they have provok'd, leſt they be added to the Examples of thoſe that miſerably have taſted the event. Stories can inform them how Chriſtiern the ſecond, King of Denmark, not much above a hundred years paſt, driv'n out by his Subjects, and receav'd again upon new Oaths and Conditions, broke through them all to his moſt bloody Revenge, ſlaying his cheif Oppoſers when he ſaw his time, both them and thir children invited to a feaſt for that purpoſe. How Maximilian dealt with thoſe of Bruges, though by mediation of the German Princes reconcil'd to them by ſolem and public writings drawn and ſeal'd. How the Maſſacre at Paris was the effect of that credulous Peace which the French Proteſtants made with Charles the Ninth thir King: and that the main viſible cauſe which to this day hath ſav'd the Netherlands from utter ruin, was thir final not beleiving the prefidious cruelty which as a conſtant maxim of State hath bin us'd by the Spaniſh Kings on thir Subjects that have tak'n arms and after truſted them; as no latter age but can teſtify, heretofore in Belgia it ſelf, and this very year in Naples. And to conclude with one paſt Exception, though farr more ancient, David after once he had tak'n arms, never after that truſted Saul, though with Tears and much relenting he twiſe promis'd not to hurt him. Theſe Inſtances, few of many, might admoniſh them, both Engliſh and Scotch, not to let thir own ends, and the driving on of a Faction, betray them blindly into the ſnare of thoſe Enemies whoſe Revenge looks on them as the men who firſt begun, fomented, and carri'd on beyond the cure of any ſound or ſafe accommodation, all the evil which hath ſince unavoidably befall'n them and thir King.

I have ſomething alſo to the Divines, though brief to what were needfull; not to be diſturbers of the civil affairs, being in hands better able and more belonging to manage them; but to ſtudy harder, and to attend the office of good Paſtors, knowing] that he whoſe Flock is leaſt among them, hath a dreadful charge, not perform'd by mounting twiſe into the chair with a formal Preachment huddl'd up at the odd hours of a whole lazy week, but by inceſſant pains and watching in ſeaſon and out of ſeaſon, from houſe to houſe over the Souls of whom they have to feed. Which if they ever well conſider'd, how little leaſure would they find to be the moſt pragmatical Sideſmen of every popular Tumult and Sedition? And all this while are to learn what the true end and reaſon is of the Goſpel which they teach; and what a world it differs from the cenſorious and ſupercilious lording over Conſcience. It would be good alſo they liv'd ſo as might perſwade the people they hated Covetouſneſs, which worſe then Hereſy, is Idolatry; hated Pluralities, and all kind of Simony; left rambling from Benefice to Benefice, like ravnous Wolves ſeeking where they may devour the biggeſt. Of which if ſom, well and warmely ſeated from the beginning, be not guilty, 'twere good they held not converſation with ſuch as are: let them be ſorry that being call'd to aſſemble about reforming the Church, they fell to progging and ſolliciting the Parlament, though they had renounc'd the name of Prieſts, for a new ſetling of thir Tithes and Oblations; and double lin'd themſelves with ſpiritual places of commodity beyond the poſſible diſcharge of thir duty. Let them aſſemble in Conſiſtory with thir Elders and Deacons, according to ancient Eccleſiaſtical rule, to the preſerving of Church-diſcipline, each in his ſeveral charge, and not a pack of Clergy-men by themſelves to belly-chear in thir preſumptuous Sion, or to promote deſigns, abuſe and gull the ſimple Laity, and ſtir up Tumult, as the Prelats did, for the maintenance of thir pride and avarice. Theſe things if they obſerve and waite with patience, no doubt but all things will go well without thir importunities or exclamations: and the Printed Letters which they ſend ſubſcrib'd with the oſtentation of great Characters and little moment, would be more conſiderable then now they are. But if they be the Miniſters of Mammon inſtead of Chriſt, and ſcandalize his Church with the filthy love of Gain, aſpiring alſo to ſit the cloſeſt and the heavieſt of all Tyrants, upon the Conſcience, and fall notoriouſly into the ſame Sins, whereof ſo lately and ſo loud they accus'd the Prelates; as God rooted out thoſe immediately before, ſo will he root out them thir imitators: and to vindicate his own Glory and Religion, will uncover thir hypocriſy, to the open world; and viſit upon thir own heads that curſe ye Meroz, the very Motto of thir Pulpits, wherewith ſo frequently, not as Meroz, but more like Atheiſts they have mock'd the vengeance of God, and the zeal of his People.

A PROCLAMATION.

ORMOND,

WHEREAS Articles of Peace are made, concluded, accorded and agreed upon, by and between Us, JAMES Lord Marqueſs of ORMOND, Lord Lieut, General, and General Governour of His Majeſties Kingdom of Ireland, by Virtue of the Authority wherewith We are intruſted, for, and on the behalf of His Moſt Excellent Majeſty of the one Part, and the General Aſſembly of the Roman Catholics of the ſaid Kingdom, for and on the behalf of His Majeſties Roman Catholic Subjects of the ſame, on the other Part; a true Copy of which Articles of Peace is hereunto annexed. We the Lord Lieut. do by this Proclamation, in His Majeſties Name publiſh the ſame, and do in His Majeſties Name ſtrictly Charge and Command all His Majeſties Subjects, and all others inhabiting or reſiding within His Majeſties ſaid Kingdom of Ireland to take notice thereof, and to render due Obedience to the ſame in all the Parts thereof.

And as his Majeſty hath been induced to this Peace, out of a deep ſenſe of the Miſeries and Calamities brought upon this his Kingdom and People, and out of a Hope conceived by His Majeſty, that it may prevent the further Effuſion of His Subjects Blood, redeem them out of all the Miſeries and Calamities under which they now ſuffer, reſtore them to all Quietneſs and Happineſs under His Majeſties moſt Gracious Government, deliver the Kingdom in general from thoſe Slaughters, Depredations, Rapines and Spoils which always accompany a War, encourage the Subjects and others with Comfort to betake themſelves to Trade, Traffic, Commerce, Manufacture and all other things, which uninterrupted, may increaſe the Wealth and Strength of the Kingdom, beget in all His Majeſties Subjects of this Kingdom a perfect Unity amongſt themſelves, after the too long continued Diviſion amongſt them: So his Majeſty aſſures himſelf that all His Subjects of this His Kingdom (duly conſidering the great and ineſtimable Benefits which they may find in this Peace) will with all Duty render due Obedience thereunto. And We in His Majeſties Name, do hereby declare, That all Perſons ſo rendering due Obedience to the ſaid Peace, ſhall be protected, cheriſhed, countenanced and ſupported by His Majeſty, and his Royal Authority, according to the true Intent and Meaning of the ſaid Articles of Peace.

Articles of Peace, made, concluded, accorded and agreed upon, by and between His Excellency JAMES Lord Marqueſs of ORMOND, Lord Lieutenant General, and General of His Majeſties Kingdom of Ireland, for, and on the behalf of His Moſt Excellent Majeſty, by Virtue of the Authority wherewith the ſaid Lord Lieutenant is intruſted, on the one Part: And the General Aſſembly of the Roman Catholics of the ſaid Kingdom, for, and on the behalf of His Majeſties Roman Catholic Subjects of the ſame, on the other Part.

H*IS Majeſties* Roman Catholic Subjects, as thereunto bound by Allegiance, Duty and Nature, do moſt humbly and freely Acknowledg and Recognize their Soveraign Lord King Charles to be lawful and undoubted King of this Kingdom of Ireland, and other His Highneſs's Realms and Dominions: And His Majeſties ſaid Roman Catholic Subjects, apprehending with a deep ſenſe the ſad Condition whereunto His Majeſty is reduced, as a further Teſtimony of their Loyalty, do declare, that they and their Poſterity for ever, to the utmoſt of their Power, even to the Expence of their Blood and Fortunes, will maintain and uphold His Majeſty, His Heirs and lawful Succeſſors, their Rights, Prerogatives, Government and Authority, and thereunto freely and heartily will render all due Obedience.

Of which faithful and Loyal Recognition and Declaration ſo ſeaſonably made by the ſaid Roman Catholics, His Majeſty is graciouſly pleas'd to accept, and accordingly to own them His loyal and dutiful Subjects: And is further graciouſly pleas'd to extend unto them the following Graces and Securities.

I. I*MPRIMIS*, It is concluded, accorded and agreed upon, by and between the ſaid Lord Lieutenant, for, and on the behalf of His Moſt Excellent Majeſty, and the ſaid General Aſſembly, for, and on the behalf of the ſaid Roman Catholic Subjects; and His Majeſty is graciouſly pleas'd, That it ſhall be enacted by ACT to be paſſed in the next Parliament to be held in this Kingdom, that all and every the Profeſſors of the Roman Catholic Religion within the ſaid Kingdom, ſhall be free and exempt from all Mulcts, Penalties, Reſtraints and Inhibitions, that are or may be impos'd upon them by any Law, Statute, Uſage or Cuſtom whatſoever, for, or concerning, the free exerciſe of the Roman Catholic Religion: And that it ſhall be likewiſe Enacted, that the ſaid Roman Catholics or any of them, ſhall not be queſtion'd or moleſted in their Perſons, Goods or Eſtates, for any Matter or Cauſe whatſoever, for, concerning, or by reaſon of the free Exerciſe of their Religion, by Virtue of any Power, Authority, Statute, Law or Uſage whatſoever: And that it ſhall be further Enacted, that no Roman Catholic in this Kingdom ſhall be compelled to exerciſe any Religion, Form of Devotion, or Divine Service, other then ſuch as ſhall be agreeable to their Conſcience; and that they ſhall not be prejudiced or moleſted in their Perſons, Goods or Eſtates for not obſerving, uſing or hearing the Book of Common-Prayer, or any other Form of Devotion tion or Divine Service by Virtue of any Colour or Statute made in the ſecond year of Queen Elizabeth, or by Virtue or Colour of any other Law, Declaration of Law, Statute, Cuſtom, or Uſage whatſoever, made or declared, or to be made or declared: And that it ſhall be further Enacted, that the Profeſſors of the Roman Catholic Religion, or any of them, be not bound or obliged to take the Oath commonly call'd the Oath of Supremacy expreſſed in the Statute of 2 Elizabeth, c. 1. or in any other Statute or Statutes: And that the ſaid Oath ſhall not be tendered unto them, and that the Refuſal of the ſaid Oath ſhall not redound to the Prejudice of them, or any of them, they taking the Oath of Allegiance in hac verba, viz. I A. B. Do hereby acknowledg, profeſs, teſtify and declare in my Conſcience, before God and the World, that our Soveraign Lord King CHARLES is Lawful and Rightful King of this Realm, and of other his Majeſties Dominions and Countries; and I will bear Faith and true Allegiance to His Majeſty, and His Heirs and Succeſſors, and Him and them will defend to the uttermoſt of my power againſt all Conſpiracies and Attempts whatſoever which ſhall be made againſt His or their Crown and Dignity; and do my beſt endeavour to diſcloſe and make known to His Majeſty, His Heirs and Succeſſors, or to the Lord Deputy, or other His Majeſties Chief Governour or Governours for the time being, all Treaſon or traiterous Conſpiracies which I ſhall know or hear to be intended againſt His Majeſty, or any of them: and I do make this Recognition and Acknowledgment, heartily, willingly and truly, upon the true Faith of a Chriſtian; ſo help me God, &c. Nevertheleſs, the ſaid Lord Lieutenant doth not hereby intend that any thing in theſe Conceſſions contain'd ſhall extend, or be conſtrued to extend to the granting of Churches, Church-Livings, or the exerciſe of Juriſdiction, the Authority of the ſaid Lord Lieutenant not extending ſo far; yet the ſaid Lord Lieutenant is authoriz'd to give the ſaid Roman Catholics full Aſſurance, as hereby the ſaid Lord Lieutenant doth give unto the ſaid Roman Catholics full Aſſurance, that they or any of them ſhall not be moleſted in the Poſſeſſion which they have at preſent of the Churches and Church-Livings, or of the Exerciſe of their reſpective Juriſdictions, as they now exerciſe the ſame, until ſuch time as His Majeſty upon a full Conſideration of the Deſires of the ſaid Roman Catholics in a free Parliament to be held in this Kingdom ſhall declare His further Pleaſure.

II. Item, It is concluded, accorded and agreed upon by and between the ſaid Parties, and His Majeſty is further graciouſly pleaſ'd that a free Parliament ſhall be held in this Kingdom within ſix Months after the Date of theſe Articles of PEACE, or as ſoon after as Thomas Lord Viſcount Dillon of Coſtologh Lord Preſident of Connaght, Donnogh Lord Viſcount Muskerry, Francis Lord Baron of Athunry, Alexander Mac Donnel Eſquire, Sir Lucas Dillon Knight, Sir Nicholas Plunket Knight, Sir Richard Barnwall Baronet, Jeffery Brown, Donnogh O Callaghan, Tyrlah O Neile, Miles Reily and Gerrald Fennell, Eſquires, or the major part of them will deſire the ſame, ſo that by poſſibility it may be held; and that in the mean time, and until the Articles of theſe Preſents, agreed to be paſs'd in Parlament be accordingly paſs'd, the ſame ſhall be inviolably obſerv'd as to the Matters therein contain'd, as if they were enacted in Parliament: And that in caſe a Parliament be not call'd and held in this Kingdom within two years next after the Date of theſe Articles of Peace, then His Majeſties Lord Lieutenant, or other His Majeſties chief Governour or Governours of this Kingdom for the time being, will at the requeſt of the ſaid Thomas Lord Viſcount Dillon of Coſtologh Lord Preſident of Connaght, Donnogh Lord Viſcount Muskerry, Francis Lord Baron of Athunry, Alexander Mac Donnel Eſquire, Sir Lucas Dillon Knight, Sir Nicholas Plunket Knight, Sir Richard Barnwall, Baronet, Jeffery Brown, Donnogh O Callaghan, Tyrlah O Neile, Miles Reily and Gerrald Fennell, Eſquires, or the major part of them, call a General Aſſembly of the Lords and Commons of this Kingdom, to attend upon the ſaid Lord Lieutenant or other His Majeſties chief Governour or Governours of this Kingdom for the time being, in ſome convenient Place, for the better ſettling of the Affairs of the Kingdom. And it is further concluded, accorded and agreed by and between the ſaid Parties, that all Matters that by theſe Articles are agreed upon to be paſs'd in Parliament, ſhall be tranſmitted into ENGLAND, according to the uſual Form, to be paſs'd in the ſaid Parliament, and that the ſaid Acts ſo agreed upon, and ſo to be paſs'd, ſhall receive no Disjunction or Alteration here or in England; provided that nothing ſhall be concluded by both or either of the ſaid Houſes of Parliament, which may bring prejudice to any of His Majeſties Proteſtant Party, or their Adherents, or to his Majeſties Roman Catholic Subjects or their Adherents, other then ſuch things as upon this Treaty are concluded to be done, or ſuch things as may be proper for the Committee of Privileges of either or both Houſes, to take Cognizance of, as in ſuch Caſes heretofore hath been accuſtom'd, and other then ſuch Matters as His Majeſty will be graciouſly pleas'd to declare His further pleaſure in, to be paſs'd in Parliament for the Satisfaction of his Subjects, and other then ſuch things as ſhall be propounded to either or both Houſes by his Majeſties Lord Lieutenant or other chief Governour or Governours of this Kingdom for the time being, during the ſaid Parliament, for the Advancement of his Majeſties Service, and the Peace of the Kingdom; which Clauſe is to admit no Conſtruction which may trench upon the Articles of Peace or any of them; and that both Houſes of Parliament may conſider what they ſhall think convenient touching the Repeal or Suſpenſion of the Statute commonly call'd, Poynings ACT, Entituled, An ACT that no Parliament be holden in that Land, until the ACTS be certifyed into ENGLAND.

III. Item, It is further concluded, accorded and agreed upon, by and between the ſaid Parties, and his Majeſty is graciouſly pleaſed, that all Acts, Ordinances and Orders made by both or either Houſes of Parliament, to the blemiſh, diſhonour or prejudice of his Majeſties Roman Catholic Subjects of this Kingdom, or any of them ſithence the 7th of Auguſt 1641. ſhall be vacated; and that the ſame and all Exemplifications and other Acts which continue the memory of them be made void by Act to be paſs'd in the next Parliament to be held in this Kingdom; and that in the mean time the ſaid Acts or Ordinances, or any of them, ſhall be no Prejudice to the ſaid Roman Catholics, or any of them.

IV. Item, It is alſo concluded, and agreed upon, and his Majeſty is likewiſe graciouſly pleas'd, that all Indictments, Attainders, Outlawries in this Kingdom, and all the Proceſſes and other Proceedings thereupon, and all Letters, Patents, Grants, Leaſes, Cuſtoms, Bonds, Recognizances, and all Records, Act or Acts, Office or Offices, Inquiſitions, and all other things depending upon, or taken by reaſon of the ſaid Indictments, Attainders or Outlawries, ſithence the 7th day of Auguſt, 1641. in prejudice of the ſaid Catholics, their Heirs, Executors, Adminiſtrators or Aſſigns, or any of them, or the Widows of them, or any of them, ſhall be vacated and made void in ſuch ſort as no Memory ſhall remain thereof, to the blemiſh, diſhonour or prejudice of the ſaid Catholics, their Heirs, Executors, Adminiſtrators or Aſſigns, or any of them, or the Widows of them, or any of them; and that to be done when the ſaid Thomas Lord Viſcount Dillon of Caſtolegh Lord Preſident of Connaght, Donnogh Lord Viſcount Muskerry, Francis Lord Baron of Athunry, Alexander Mac Donnel Eſquire, Sir Lucas Dillon Knight, Sir Nicholas Plunket Knight, Sir Richard Barnwall Baronet, Jeffery Brown, Donnogh O Callaghan, Tyrlah O Neal, Miles Reilie and Gerrald Fennell Eſquires, or the major part of them ſhall deſire the ſame, ſo that by poſſibility it may be done; and in the mean time that no ſuch Indictments, Attainders, Outlawries, Proceſſes or any other Proceedings thereupon, or any Letters Patents, Grants, Leaſes, Cuſtodiums, Bonds, Recognizances, or any Record or Acts, Office or Offices, Inquiſitions, or any other thing depending upon, or by reaſon of the ſaid Indictments, Attainders or Outlawries, ſhall in any ſort prejudice the ſaid Roman Catholics, or any of them, but that they and every of them ſhall be forthwith upon Perfection of theſe Articles, reſtor'd to their reſpective Poſſeſſions and Hereditaments reſpectively; provided, that no Man ſhall be queſtion'd by reaſon hereof, for Meaſne Rates or Waſtes, ſaving wilful Waſtes committed after the firſt day of May laſt paſt.

V. Item, It is likewiſe concluded, accorded and agreed, and his Majeſty is graciouſly pleaſed, that as ſoon as poſſible may be, all Impediments which may hinder the ſaid Roman Catholics, to ſit or vote in the next intended Parliament, or to chooſe, or to be choſen Knights and Burgeſſes, to ſit or vote there, ſhall be removed, and that before the ſaid Parliament.

VI. Item, It is concluded, accorded and agreed upon, and his Majeſty is further graciouſly pleaſed, that all Debts ſhall remain as they were upon the 23d of October, 1641. Notwithſtanding any Diſpoſition made, or to be made, by Virtue or Colour of any Attainder, Outlawry, Fugacy, or other Forfeiture; and that no Diſpoſition or Grant made, or to be made of any ſuch Debts, by Virtue of any Attainder, Outlawry, Fugacy, or other Forfeiture, ſhall be of force; and this to be paſſed as an Act in the next Parliament.

VII. Item, It is further concluded, accorded and agreed upon, and his Majeſty is graciouſly pleaſed, that for the ſecuring of the Eſtates or reputed Eſtates of the Lords, Knights, Gentlemen and Freeholders, or reputed Freeholders, as well of Connaght, and County of Clare, or Country of Thomond, as of the Counties of Limerick and Tipperary, the ſame to be ſecured by Act of Parliament, according to the Intent of the 25*th* Article of the Graces granted in the fourth year of his Majeſties Reign, the Tenor whereof for ſo much as concerneth the ſame, doth enſue in theſe words, viz. We are graciouſly pleaſed, that for the Inhabitants of Connaght and Country of Thomond and County of Clare, that their ſeveral Eſtates ſhall be confirmed unto them and their Heirs againſt us, and our Heirs and Succeſſors, by Act to be paſſed in the next Parliament to be holden in Ireland, to the end the ſame may never hereafter be brought into any further Queſtion by Us, or our Heirs and Succeſſors. In which Act of Parliament ſo to be paſſed, you are to take care that all Tenures in Capite, and all Rents and Services as are now due, or which ought to be anſwered unto us out of the ſaid Lands and Premiſes, by any Letters Patents paſt thereof ſince the firſt year of King HENRY the Eight, or found by any Office taken from the ſaid firſt year of King HENRY the VIII. until the 21*ſt* of July 1645. whereby our late dear Father, or any his Predeceſſors actually received any Profit by Wardſhip, Liveries, Primer-ſeiſins, Meaſne Rates, Ouſterlemains or Fines of Alienations without Licence, be again reſerved unto us, our Heirs and Succeſſors, and all the reſt of the Premiſes to be holden of our Caſtle of Athlone by Knights Service, according to our ſaid late Fathers Letters, notwithſtanding any Tenures in Capite found for Us by Office, ſince the 21*ſt* of July 1615. and not appearing in any ſuch Letters Patents, or Offices; within which Rule His Majeſty is likewiſe graciouſly pleaſed, That the ſaid Lands in the Counties of Limerick and Tipperary be included, but to be held by ſuch Rents and Tenures only, as they were in the fourth year of his Majeſties Reign; provided always, that the ſaid Lords, Knights, Gentlemen and Freeholders of the ſaid Province of Connaght, County of Clare, and Country of Thomond, and Counties of Tipperary and Limerick, ſhall have and enjoy the full Benefit of ſuch Compoſition and Agreement which ſhall be made with his moſt Excellent Majeſty, for the Court of Wards, Tenures, Reſpits and Iſſues of Homage, any Clauſe in this Article to the contrary notwithſtanding. And as for the Lands within the Counties of Kilkenny and Wickloe, unto which his Majeſty was intituled by Offices, taken or found in the time of the Earl of Strafford's Government in this Kingdom, His Majeſty is further graciouſly pleaſed, That the State thereof ſhall be conſidered in the next intended Parliament, where his Majeſty will aſſent unto that which ſhall be juſt and honourable; and that the like Act of Limitation of his Majeſties Titles, for the Security of the Eſtates of his Subjects of this Kingdom be paſſed in the ſaid Parliament as was Enacted in the 21*ſt* year of his late Majeſty King JAMES his Reign in ENGLAND.

VIII. Item, It is further concluded, accorded and agreed upon, and his Majeſty is further graciouſly pleaſed, that all Incapacities impoſed upon the Natives of this Kingdom or any of them, as Natives, by any Act of Parliament, Proviſos in Patents or otherwiſe, be taken away by Act to be paſſed in the ſaid Parliament; and that they may be enabled to erect one or more Inns of Court in or near the City of Dublin or elſewhere, as ſhall be thought fit by his Majeſties Lord Lieutenant, or other Chief Governour or Governours of this Kingdom for the time being; and in caſe the ſaid Inns of Court ſhall be erected before the firſt day of the next Parliament, then the ſame ſhall be in ſuch Place as his Majeſties Lord Lieutenant, or other Chief Governour or Governours of this Kingdom for the time being, by and with the Advice and Conſent of the ſaid Thomas Lord Viſcount Dillon of Coſtelogh Lord Preſident of Connaght, Donnogh Lord Viſcount Muskerry, Francis Lord Baron of Athunry, Alexander Mac Donnel Eſquire, Sir Lucas Dillon Knight, Sir Nicholas Plunket Knight, Sir Richard Barnwall Baronet, Jeffery Brown, Donnogh O Gallaghan, Tyr- lah O Neile, Miles Reily, Gerrald Fennel Eſquires, or any ſeven or more of them ſhall think fit; and that ſuch Students, Natives of this Kingdom, as ſhall be therein, may take and receive the uſual Degrees accuſtom'd in any Inns of Court, they taking the enſuing Oath; viz. I A.B. Do hereby acknowledg, profeſs, teſtify and declare in my Conſcience before God and the World, that our Soveraign Lord King Charles is Lawful and Rightful King of this Realm, and of other his Majeſties Dominions and Countries; and I will bear Faith and true Allegiance to his Majeſty, and his Heirs and Succeſſors, and him and them will defend to the utmoſt of my Power againſt all Conſpiracies and Attempts whatſoever, which ſhall be made againſt his or their Crown and Dignity; and do my beſt endeavour to diſcloſe and make known to his Majeſty, his Heirs and Succeſſors, or to the Lord Deputy, or other his Majeſties Chief Governour or Governours for the time being, all Treaſon or traiterous Conſpiracies which I ſhall know or hear to be intended againſt his Majeſty or any of them. And I do make this Recognition and Acknowledgment heartily, willingly and truly, upon the true Faith of a Chriſtian; ſo help me God, &c. And his Majeſty is further graciouſly pleaſed, that his Majeſties Roman Catholic Subjects may erect and keep free Schools for Education of Youths in this Kingdom, any Law or Statute to the contrary notwithſtanding; and that all the matters aſſented unto in this Article be paſſed as Acts of Parliament in the ſaid next Parliament.

IX. Item, It is further concluded, accorded, and agreed upon, by and between the ſaid Parties, and his Majeſty is graciouſly pleaſed, that Places of Command, Honour, Profit and Truſt in his Majeſties Armies in this Kingdom ſhall be upon Perfection of theſe Articles actually and by particular Inſtances conferred upon his Roman Catholic Subjects of this Kingdom; and that upon the diſtribution, conferring and diſpoſing of the Places of Command, Honour, Profit and Truſt in his Majeſties Armies in this Kingdom, for the future no Difference ſhall be made between the ſaid Roman Catholics, and other his Majeſties Subjects; but that ſuch Diſtribution ſhall be made with equal Indifferency according to their reſpective Merits and Abilities: and that all his Majeſties Subjects of this Kingdom, as well Roman Catholics as others, may for his Majeſties Service and their own Security, arm themſelves the beſt they may, wherin they ſhall have all fitting Incouragement. And it is further concluded, accorded and agreed upon, by and between the ſaid Parties, and his Majeſty is further graciouſly pleas'd; That Places of Command, Honour, Profit and Truſt in the Civil Government in this Kingdom, ſhall be upon paſſing of the Bills in theſe Articles mentioned in the next Parliament, actually and by particular Inſtances conferred upon his Majeſties Roman Catholic Subjects of this Kingdom; and that in the diſtribution, conferring and diſpoſal of the Places of Command, Honour, Profit and Truſt in the Civil Government, for the future no Difference ſhall be made between the ſaid Roman Catholics, and other his Majeſties Subjects, but that ſuch Diſtribution ſhall be made with equal Indifferency, according to their reſpective Merits and Abilities; and that in the Diſtribution of Miniſterial Offices or Places, which now are, or hereafter ſhall be void in this Kingdom, equality ſhall be us'd to the Roman Catholic Natives of this Kingdom, as to other his Majeſties Subjects; and that the Command of Forts, Caſtles, Gariſon-Towns, and other Places of Importance of this Kingdom, ſhall be conferred upon His Majeſties Roman Catholic Subjects of this Kingdom upon Perfection of theſe Articles actually and by particular Inſtances; and that in the diſtribution, conferring and diſpoſal of the Forts, Caſtles, Gariſon-Towns, and other Places of Importance in this Kingdom, no difference ſhall be made between his Majeſties Roman Catholic Subjects of this Kingdom, and other his Majeſties Subjects, but that ſuch diſtribution ſhall be made with equal Indifferency, according to their reſpective Merits and Abilities; and that until full Settlement in Parliament fifteen thouſand Foot, and two thouſand and five hundred Horſe of the Roman Catholics of this Kingdom ſhall be of the Standing Army of this Kingdom: And that until full Settlement in Parliament as aforeſaid, the ſaid Lord Lieutenant or other Chief Governour or Governours of this Kingdom for the time being, and the ſaid Thomas Lord Viſc. Dillon of Coſtologh Lord Preſident of Connaght, Donnogh Lord Viſc. Muskerry, Francis Lord Baron of Athunry, Alexander Mac Donnel Eſq; Sir Lucas Dillon Kt. Sir Nicholas Plunket Kt. Sir Richard Barnwall Bar. Jeffery Brown, Donnogh O Calagha, laghan, Tyrlah O Neile, Miles Reily and Gerrald Fennel Eſq; or any ſeven or more of them, the ſaid Thomas Lord Viſcount Dillon of Coſtelogh Lord Preſident of Connaght, Donnogh Lord Viſcount Muskerry, Francis Lord Baron of Athunry, Alexander Mac Donnel Eſq; Sir Lucas Dillon Kt. Sir Nicholas Plunket Kt. Sir Richard Barnwall Baronet, Jeffery Brown, Donnogh O Callaghan, Tyrlah O Neile, Miles Reily and Gerrald Fennell, Eſquires, ſhall diminiſh or add unto the ſaid Number, as they ſhall ſee cauſe from time to time.

X. Item, It is further concluded, accorded and agreed upon, by and between the ſaid Parties, and his Majeſty is further graciouſly pleaſed, that his Majeſty will accept of the yearly Rent, or annual Sum of twelve thouſand pounds Sterling, to be applotted with Indifferency and Equality, and conſented to be paid to his Majeſty, his Heirs and Succeſſors in Parliament, for and in lieu of the Court of Wards in this Kingdom, Tenures in Capite, Common Knights-Service, and all other Tenures within the Cognizance of that Court, and for, and in lieu of all Wardſhips, Primer-ſeizins, Fines, Ouſterlemains, Liveries, Intruſions, Alienations, Meaſne Rates, Releaſes and all other Profits within the Cognizance of the ſaid Court, or incident to the ſaid Tenures, or any of them, or Fines to accrue to his Majeſty by reaſon of the ſaid Tenures or any of them, and for and in lieu of Reſpits and Iſſues of Homage and Fines for the ſame. And the ſaid yearly Rent being ſo applotted and conſented unto in Parliament as aforeſaid, then a Bill is to be agreed on in the ſaid Parliament to be paſſed as an Act for the ſecuring of the ſaid yearly Rent, or annual Sum of twelve thouſand Pounds to be applotted as aforeſaid, and for the Extinction and taking away of the ſaid Court, and other Matters aforeſaid in this Article contained. And it is further agreed, that reaſonable Compoſitions ſhall be accepted for Wardſhips fallen ſince the 23*d* of October 1641. and already granted, and that no Wardſhips fallen and not granted, or that ſhall fall, ſhall be paſſed until the Succeſs of this Article ſhall appear; and if his Majeſty be ſecured as aforeſaid, then all Wardſhips fallen ſince the ſaid 23*d* of October, are to be included in the Agreement aforeſaid, upon Compoſition to be made with ſuch as have Grants as aforeſaid; which Compoſition to be made with the Grantees ſince the time aforeſaid, is to be left to indifferent Perſons, and the Umpirage to the ſaid Lord Lieutenant.

XI. Item, It is further concluded, accorded and agreed upon, by and between the ſaid Parties, and his Majeſty is further graciouſly pleas'd, That no Nobleman or Peer of this Realm, in Parliament, ſhall be hereafter capable of more Proxies then two, and that blank Proxies ſhall be hereafter totally diſallowed; and that if ſuch Noble Men or Peers of this Realm, as have no Eſtates in this Kingdom, do not within five years, to begin from the concluſion of theſe Articles, purchaſe in this Kingdom as followeth, viz. A Lord Baron 200 l. per annum, a Lord Viſcount 400 l. per annum, and an Earl 600 l. per annum, a Marqueſs 800 l. per annum, a Duke 1000 l. per annum, ſhall loſe their Votes in Parliament until ſuch time as they ſhall afterwards acquire ſuch Eſtates reſpectively; and that none be admitted in the Houſe of Commons, but ſuch as ſhall be eſtated and reſident within this Kingdom.

XII. Item, It is further concluded, accorded and agreed upon, by and between the ſaid Parties, and his Majeſty is further graciouſly pleas'd, That as for and concerning the Independency of the Parliament of Ireland on the Parliament of England, his Majeſty will leave both Houſes of Parliament in this Kingdom to make ſuch Declaration therein as ſhall be agreeable to the Laws of the Kingdom of Ireland.

XIII. Item, It is further concluded and agreed upon, by and between the ſaid Parties, and his Majeſty is further graciouſly pleas'd, That the Council-Table ſhall contain it ſelf within its proper Bounds, in handling Matters of State and Weight fit for that Place; amongſt which the Patents of Plantation, and the Offices whereupon thoſe Grants are founded to be handled, as Matters of State, and to be heard and determined by his Majeſties Lord Lieutenant, or other Chief Governour or Governours for the time being, and the Council publickly at the Council-Board, and not otherwiſe, but Titles between Party and Party grown after theſe Patents granted, are to be left to the ordinary Courſe of Law; and that the Council-Table do not hereafter intermeddle with common Buſineſs, that is within the Cognizance of the ordinary Courts, nor with the altering of Poſſeſſions of Lands, nor make, nor uſe, private Orders, Hearings or References concerning any ſuch matter, nor grant any Injunction or Order for ſtay of any Suits in any Civil Cauſe: And that Parties griev'd for or by reaſon of any Proceedings formerly had there, may commence their Suits, and proſecute the ſame in any of his Majeſties Courts of Juſtice or Equity for remedy of their pretended Rights, without any Reſtraint or Interruption from his Majeſty, or otherwiſe, by the Chief Governour or Governours and Council of this Kingdom: And that the Proceedings in the reſpective Precedency Courts ſhall be purſuant, and according to his Majeſties printed Book of Inſtructions, and that they ſhall contain themſelves within the Limits preſcribed by that Book, when the Kingdom ſhall be reſtored to ſuch a degree of Quietneſs, as they be not neceſſarily enforced to exceed the ſame.

XIV. Item, It is further concluded, accorded and agreed upon by and between the ſaid Parties, and his Majeſty is further graciouſly pleas'd, That as for and concerning one Statute made in this Kingdom, in the eleventh year of the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, Intituled, An ACT for ſtaying of Wool, Flocks, Tallow and other Neceſſaries within this Realm: And another Statute made in the ſaid Kingdom in the twelfth year of the Reign of the ſaid Queen, Intituled, An ACT and one other Statute made in the ſaid Kingdom, in the 13*th* year of the Reign of the ſaid late Queen, Intituled, An Exemplanation of the Act made in a Seſſion of this Parliament for the ſtaying of Wool, Flocks, Tallow, and other Wares and Commodities mention'd in the ſaid Act, and certain Articles added to the ſame Act, all concerning ſtaple or native Commodities of this Kingdom, ſhall be repealed, if it ſhall be ſo thought fit in the Parliament (excepting for Wool and Wool-fells) and that ſuch indifferent Perſons as ſhall be agreed on by the ſaid Lord Lieutenant, and the ſaid Thomas Lord Viſcount Dillon of Coſtelogh Lord Preſident of Connaght, Donnogh Lord Viſcount Muskerry, Francis Lord Baron of Athunry, Alexander Mac Donnel Eſq; Sir Lucas Dillon Kt. Sir Nicholas Plunket Kt. Sir Richard Barnwall Baronet, Jeffery Brown, Donnogh O Callaghan, Tyrlah O Neile, Miles Reily and Gerrald Fennell Eſquires, or any ſeven or more of them ſhall be authorized by Commiſſion under the Great Seal, to moderate and aſcertain the Rates of Merchandize, to be exported or imported out of, or into this Kingdom, as they ſhall think fit.

XV. Item. It is concluded, accorded and agreed, by and between the ſaid Parties, and his Majeſty is graciouſly pleas'd, That all and every Perſon and Perſons within this Kingdom, pretending to have ſuffered by Offices found of ſeveral Countries, Territories, Lands and Hereditaments in the Province of Ulſter, and other Provinces of this Kingdom, in or ſince the firſt year of King James his Reign, or by Attainders or Forfeitures, or by Pretence and Colour thereof, ſince the ſaid 1*ſt* year of King James, or by other Acts depending on the ſaid Offices, Attainders and Forfeitures, may petition his Majeſty in Parliament for Relief and Redreſs; and if after examination it ſhall appear to his Majeſty, the ſaid Perſons, or any of them have been injured, then his Majeſty will preſcribe a Courſe to repair the Perſon or Perſons ſo ſuffering according to Juſtice and Honour.

XVI. Item, It is further concluded, accorded and agreed upon, by and between the ſaid Parties, and his Majeſty is graciouſly pleas'd, that as to the particular Caſes of Maurice Lord Viſcount de Rupe and Fermoy, Arthur Lord Viſc. Iveagh, Sir Edward Fitz Gerrald of Cloangliſh Baronet, Charles Mac Carty Reag, Roger Moore, Anthony Mare, William Fitz Gerrald, Anthony Linch, John Lacy, Collo Mac Brien Mac Mahowne, Daniel Caſtigni, Edmond Fitz Gerrald of Ballimartir, Lucas Keating, Theobald Roch Fitz Miles, Thomas Fitz Gerrald of the Vally, John Bourke of Loghmaske, Edmond Fitz Gerrald of Ballimallo, James Fitz William Gerrald of Glinane, and Edward Sutton, they may petition his Majeſty in the next Parliament, whereupon his Majeſty will take ſuch Conſideration of them as ſhall be juſt and fit.

XVII. Item, It is likewiſe concluded, accorded and agreed upon, by and between the ſaid Parties, and his Majeſty is graciouſly pleas'd, That the Citizens, Freemen, Burgeſſes and former Inhabitants of the City of Cork, Towns of Youghall and Downegarven ſhall be forthwith upon Perfection of theſe Articles, reſtored to their reſpective Poſſeſſions and Eſtates in the ſaid City and Towns, reſpectively, where the ſame extends not to the endangering of the ſaid Gariſons in the ſaid City and Towns. In which caſe ſo many of the ſaid Citizens and Inhabitants, as ſhall not be admitted to the preſent Poſſeſſion of their Houſes within the ſaid City and Towns, ſhall be afforded a valuable annual Rent for the ſame, until Settlement in Parliament, at which time they ſhall be reſtor'd to thoſe their Poſſeſſions. And it is further agreed, and his Majeſty is graciouſly pleas'd, That the ſaid Citizens, Freemen, Burgeſſes and Inhabitants of the ſaid City of Cork, and Towns of Youghall and Downegarven, reſpectively, ſhall be enabled in convenient time before the next Parliament to be held in this Kingdom, to chooſe and return Burgeſſes into the ſame Parliament.

XVIII. Item, It is further concluded, accorded and agreed upon, by and between the ſaid Parties, and his Majeſty is further graciouſly pleas'd, That an ACT of Oblivion be paſt in the next Parliament, to extend to all his Majeſties Subjects of this Kingdom, and their Adherents, of all Treaſons and Offences, capital, criminal and perſonal, and other Offences of what nature, kind or quality ſoever, in ſuch manner, as if ſuch Treaſons or Offences had never been committed, perpetrated or done: That the ſaid Act do extend to the Heirs, Children, Kindred, Executors, Adminiſtrators, Wives, Widows, Dowagers, or Aſſigns of ſuch of the ſaid Subjects and their Adherents who dy'd on, before, or ſince, the 23*d* of October, 1641. that the ſaid Act do relate to the firſt day of the next Parliament; that the ſaid Act do extend to all Bodies Politic and Corporate, and their reſpective Succeſſors, and unto all Cities, Burroughs, Counties, Baronies, Hundreds, Towns, Villages, Thitlings, and every of them within this Kingdom, for and concerning all and every of the ſaid Offences, or any other Offence or Offences in them, or any of them committed or done by his Majeſties ſaid Subjects, or their Adherents, or any of them, before, in, or ſince the 23*d* of October, 1641. Provided this Act ſhall not extend to be conſtrued to pardon any Offence or Offences, for which any Perſon or Perſons have been convicted or attainted on Record at any time before the 23*d* day of October, in the year of our Lord, 1641. That this Act ſhall extend to Piracies, and all other Offences committed upon the Sea by his Majeſties ſaid Subjects, or their Adherents or any of them; that in this Act of Oblivion, Words of releaſe, acquittal and diſcharge be inſerted, that no Perſon or Perſons, Bodies Politic or Corporate, Counties, Cities, Burroughs, Baronies, Hundreds, Towns, Villages, Thitlings, or any of them within this Kingdom, included within the ſaid Act, be troubled, impeached, ſued, inquieted or moleſted, for, or by reaſon of any Offence, Matter or thing whatſoever, compriſed within the ſaid Act: And the ſaid Act ſhall extend to all Rents, Goods and Chattels taken, detained or grown due to the Subjects of the one Party from the other ſince the 23*d* of October, 1641. to the Date of theſe Articles of Peace; and alſo to all Cuſtoms, Rents, Arrears of Rents, to Prizes, Recognizances, Bonds, Fines, Forfeitures, Penalties, and to all other Profits, Perquiſits and Dues which were due, or did, or ſhould accrew to his Majeſty on, before, or ſince the 23*d* of October, 1641. until the Perfection of theſe Articles, and likewiſe to all Meaſne Rates, Fines of what nature ſoever, Recognizances, Judgments, Executions thereupon, and Penalties whatſoever, and to all other Profits due to his Majeſty ſince the ſaid 23*d* of October and before, until the Perfection of theſe Articles, for, by reaſon, or which lay within the Survey or Recognizance of the Court of Wards; and alſo to all Reſpits, Iſſues of Homage and Fines for the ſame: provided this ſhall not extend to diſcharge or remit any of the King's Debts or Subſidies due before the ſaid 23*d* of October, 1641, which were then or before levyed, or taken by the Sheriffs, Commiſſioners, Receivers or Collectors, and not then or before accounted for, or ſince diſpoſed to the publick Uſe of the ſaid Roman Catholic Subjects, but that ſuch Perſons may be brought to account for the ſame after full Settlement in Parliament, and not before, unleſs by and with the Advice and Conſent of the ſaid Thomas Lord Viſcount Dillon of Coſtologh Lord Preſident of Connaght, Donnogh Lord Viſcount Muskerry, Francis Lord Baron of Athunry, Alexander Mac Donnel Eſq; Sir Lucas Dillon Kt. Sir Nicholas Plunket Kt. Sir Richard Barnwall Baronet, Jeffery Brown, Donnogh O Callaghan, Tyrlah O Neil, Miles Reily and Gerrald Fennell Eſquires, or any ſeven or more of them, as the ſaid Lord Lieutenant otherwiſe ſhall think fit; provided, that ſuch barbarous and inhuman Crimes as ſhall be particulariz'd and agreed upon by the ſaid Lord Lieutenant, and the ſaid Thomas Lord Viſcount Dillon of Coſtologh Lord Preſident of Connaght, Donnogh Lord Viſcount Muskerry, Francis Lord Baron of Athunry, Alexander Mac Donnell Eſq; Sir Lucas Dillon Kt. Sir Nicholas Plunket Kt. Sir Richard Barnwall Baronet, Jeffery Brown, Donnogh O Callaghan, Tyrlah O Neil, Miles Reily and Gerrald Fennell Eſquires, or any ſeven or more of them, as to the Actors and Procurers thereof, be left to be tried and adjudged by ſuch indifferent Commiſſioners as ſhall be agreed upon by the ſaid Lord Lieutenant, and the ſaid Thomas Lord Viſcount Dillon of Coſtologh Lord Preſident of Connaght, Donnogh Lord Viſcount Muskerry, Francis Lord Baron of Athunry, Alexander Mac Donnell Eſq; Sir Lucas Dillon Kt. Sir Nicholas Plunket Kt. Sir Richard Barnwall Baronet, Jeffery Brown, Donnogh O Callaghan, Tyrlah O Neil, Miles Reily and Gerrald Fennell Eſquires, or any ſeven or more of them; and that the Power of the ſaid Commiſſioners ſhall continue only for two years next enſuing the Date of their Commiſſion, which Commiſſion is to iſſue within ſix Months after the Date of theſe Articles; provided alſo that the Commiſſioners to be agreed on for trial of the ſaid particular Crimes to be excepted, ſhall hear, order and determin all Caſes of Truſt, where relief may or ought in equity to be afforded againſt all manner of Perſons, according to the Equity and Circumſtances of every ſuch Caſes; and his Majeſties Chief Governour or Governours, and other Magiſtrates for the time being, in all his Majeſties Courts of Juſtice, and other his Majeſties Officers of what Condition or Quality ſoever, be bound and requir'd to take notice of, and purſue the ſaid Act of Oblivion without pleading or ſuit to be made for the ſame; and that no Clerk or other Officers do make out or write out any manner of Writs, Proceſſes, Summons or other Precept, for, concerning, or by reaſon of any Matter, Cauſe or Thing whatſoever releaſed, forgiven, diſcharged, or to be forgiven by the ſaid Act, under pain of 20 l. Sterling, and that no Sheriff or other Officer, do execute any ſuch Writ, Proceſs, Summons or Precept; and that no Record, Writing or Memory, do remain of any Offence or Offences, releaſed or forgiven, or mentioned to be forgiven by this Act; and that all other Clauſes uſually inſerted in Acts of General Pardon or Oblivion, enlarging his Majeſties Grace and Mercy, not herein particularized, be inſerted and comprized in the ſaid Act, when the Bill ſhall be drawn up with the Exceptions already expreſſed, and none other. Provided always, that the ſaid Act of Oblivion ſhall not extend to any Treaſon, Felony or other Offence or Offences, which ſhall be committed or done from or after the Date of theſe Articles, until the firſt Day of the before mentioned next Parliament, to be held in this Kingdom. Provided alſo, that any Act or Acts, which ſhall be done by Virtue, Pretence, or in Purſuance of theſe Articles of Peace agreed upon, or any Act or Acts which ſhall be done by Virtue, Colour or Pretence of the Power or Authority uſed or exerciſed by and amongſt the Confederate Roman Catholics after the Date of the ſaid Articles, and before the ſaid Publication, ſhall not be accounted, taken, conſtrued, or to be, Treaſon, Felony, or other Offence to be excepted out of the ſaid Act of Oblivion; provided likewiſe, that the ſaid Act of Oblivion ſhall not extend unto any Perſon or Perſons, that will not obey and ſubmit unto the Peace concluded and agreed on by theſe Articles; provided further, that the ſaid Act of Oblivion, or any thing in this Article contained, ſhall not hinder or interrupt the ſaid Thomas Lord Viſcount Dillon of Coſtologh Lord Preſident of Connaght, Donnogh Lord Viſcount Muskerry, Francis Lord Baron of Athunry, Alexander Mac Donnel Eſq; Sir Lucas Dillon Kt. Sir Nicholas Plunket Kt. Sir Richard Barnwall Baronet, Jeffery Brown, Donnogh O Callaghan, Tyrlah O Neile, Miles Reily and Gerrald Fennell, Eſquires, or any ſeven or more of them, to call to an Account, and proceed againſt the Council and Congregation, and the reſpective ſupream Councils, Commiſſioners general, appointed hitherto from time to time by the Confederate Catholics to manage their Affairs, or any other Perſon or Perſons accomptable to an Accompt for their reſpective Receipts and Diſburſements, ſince the beginning of their reſpective Imploiments under the ſaid Confederate Catholics, or to acquit or releaſe any Arrears of Exciſes, Cuſtoms, or public Taxes to be accounted for ſince the 23*d* of October 1641. and not diſpos'd of hitherto, to the public Uſe, but that the Parties therein concern'd may be call'd to an Account for the ſame as aforeſaid, by the ſaid Thomas Lord Viſcount Dillon of Coſtologh Lord Preſident of Connaght, Donnogh Lord Viſc. Muskerry, Francis Lord Baron of Athunry, Alexander Mac Donnel Eſquire, Sir Lucas Dillon Kt. Sir Nicholas Plunket Kt. Sir Richard Barnwall Baronet, Jeffery Brown, Donnogh O Callaghan, Tyrlah O Neile, Miles Reily and Gerrald Fennell, Eſquires, or any ſeven or more of them, the ſaid ACT or any thing therein contain'd to the contrary notwithſtanding.

XIX. Item, It is further concluded, accorded and agreed upon, by and between the ſaid Parties, and his Majeſty is graciouſly pleas'd, that an ACT be paſs'd in the next Parliament, prohibiting, That neither the Lord Deputy, or other Chief Governour or Governours, Lord Chancellor, Lord High Treaſurer, Vice Treaſurer, Chancellor, or any of the Barons of the Exchequer, Privy Council, or Judges of the four Courts, be Farmers of his Majeſties Cuſtoms within this Kingdom.

XX. Item, It is likewiſe concluded, accorded and agreed, and his Majeſty is graciouſly pleas'd, that an ACT of Parliament paſs in this Kingdom againſt Monopolies, ſuch as was enacted in England 21 Jacobi Regis, with a further Clauſe of repealing of all Grants of Monopolies in this Kingdom; and that Commiſſioners be agreed upon by the ſaid Lord Lieutenant, and the ſaid Thomas Lord Viſcount Dillon of Coſtologh Lord Preſident of Connaght, Donnogh Lord Viſcount Muskerry, Francis Lord Baron of Athunry, Alexander Mac Donnel Eſq; Sir Lucas Dillon Kt. Sir Nicholas Plunket Kt. Sir Richard Barnwall Bar. Jeffery Brown, Donnogh O Callaghan, Tyrlah O Neile, Miles Reily and Gerrald Fennell Eſquires, or any ſeven or more of them, to ſet down the Rates for the Cuſtom and Impoſition to be laid on Aquavita, Wine, Oil, Yarn and Tobacco.

XXI. Item, It is concluded, accorded and agreed, and his Majeſty is graciouſly pleas'd, that ſuch Perſons as ſhall be agreed on by the ſaid Lord Lieutenant, and the ſaid Thomas Lord Viſcount Dillon of Coſtologh Lord Preſident of Connaght, Donnogh Lord Viſcount Muskerry, Francis Lord Baron of Athunry, Alexander Mac Donnel Eſquire, Sir Lucas Dillon Knight, Sir Nicholas Plunket Knight, Sir Richard Barnwall Baronet, Jeffery Brown, Donnogh O Callaghan, Tyrlah O Neile, Miles Reilie and Gerrald Fennell Eſquires, or any ſeven or more of them, ſhall be as ſoon as may be authoriz'd by Commiſſion under the Great Seal to regulate the Court of Caſtle-chamber, and ſuch Cauſes as ſhall be brought into, and cenſur'd in the ſaid Court.

XXII. Item, It is concluded, accorded and agreed upon, and his Majeſty is graciouſly pleas'd, that two Acts lately paſs'd in this Kingdom, one prohibiting the plowing with Horſes by the Tail, and the other prohibiting the burning of Oats in the Straw, be repeal'd.

XXIII. Item, It is further concluded, accorded and agreed upon, by and between the ſaid Parties, and his Majeſty is further graciouſly pleas'd, for as much as upon Application of Agents from this Kingdom unto his Majeſty in the fourth year of his Reign, and lately upon humble Suit made unto his Majeſty, by a Committee of both Houſes of the Parliament of this Kingdom, order was given by his Majeſty for redreſs of ſeveral Grievances, and for ſo many of thoſe as are not expreſs'd in the Articles, whereof both Houſes in the next enſuing Parliament ſhall deſire the benefit of his Majeſties ſaid former Directions for Redreſs therein, that the ſame be afforded them, yet ſo, as for prevention of Inconveniences to his Majeſties Service, that the Warning mention'd in the 24*th* Article of the Graces in the fourth year of his Majeſties Reign be ſo underſtood, that the Warning being left at the Perſons Dwelling-houſes be held ſufficient Warning; and as to the 22*d* Article of the ſaid Graces, the Proceſs hitherto us'd in the Court of Wards do ſtill continue, as hitherto it hath done in that, and hath been us'd in other Engliſh Courts; but the Court of Wards being compounded for, ſo much of the aforeſaid Anſwer as concerns Warning and Proceſs ſhall be omitted.

XXIV. Item, It is further concluded, accorded and agreed upon, by and between the ſaid Parties, and his Majeſty is further graciouſly pleas'd, That Maritine Cauſes may be determin'd in this Kingdom, without driving of Merchants or others to appeal and ſeek Juſtice elſewhere: and if it ſhall fall out that there be Cauſe of an Appeal, the Party griev'd is to appeal to his Majeſty in the Chancery of IRELAND; and that Sentence thereupon to be given by the Delegates, to be definitive, and not to be queſtion'd upon any further Appeal, except it be in the Parliament of this Kingdom, if the Parliament ſhall then be ſitting, otherwiſe not, this to be by ACT of Parliament; and until the ſaid Parliament, the Admiralty and Maritine Cauſes ſhall be order'd and ſettl'd by the ſaid Lord Lieutenant, or other Chief Governour or Governours of this Kingdom for the time being, by and with the Advice and Conſent of the ſaid Thomas Lord Viſcount Dillon of Coſtelogh Lord Preſident of Connaght, Donnogh Lord Viſcount Muskerry, Francis Lord Baron of Athunry, Alexander Mac Donnel Eſq; Sir Lucas Dillon Kt. Sir Nicholas Plunket Kt. Sir Richard Barnwall Baronet, Jeffery Brown, Donnogh O Callaghan, Tyrlah O Neile, Miles Reily and Gerrald Fennell Eſquires, or any ſeven or more of them.

XXV. Item, It is further concluded, accorded and agreed upon, by and between the ſaid Parties, and his Majeſty is graciouſly pleas'd, That his Majeſties Subjects of this Kingdom be eas'd of all Rents and increaſe of Rents lately raiſ'd on the Commiſſion or defective Titles in the Earl of Strafford's Government, this to be by ACT of Parliament; and that in the mean time the ſaid Rents or encreaſe of Rents ſhall not be written for by any Proceſs, or the paiment thereof in any ſort procur'd.

XXVI. Item, It is further concluded, accorded and agreed upon, by and between the ſaid Parties, and his Majeſty is further graciouſly pleas'd, that by ACT to be paſs'd in the next Parliament, all the Arrears of Intereſt-Mony, which did accrue and grow due by way of Debt, Mortgage or otherwiſe, and yet not ſo ſatisfy'd ſince the 23*d* of October 1641. until the Perfection of theſe Articles, ſhall be fully forgiven and be releas'd; and that for and during the ſpace of three years next enſuing, no more ſhall be taken for Uſe or Intereſt of Money then five Pounds per Centum. And in Caſes of Equity ariſing through Diſability, occaſion'd by the Diſtempers of the Times, the Conſiderations of Equity to be like unto both Parties; but as for Mortgages contracted between his Majeſties Roman Catholic Subjects and others of that Party, where Entry hath been made by the Mortgagers againſt Law, and the Condition of their Mortgages, and detain'd wrongfully by them without giving any Satisfaction to the Mortgagees, or where any ſuch Mortgagers have made Profit of the Lands mortgaged above Country Charges, yet anſwer no Rent, or other Conſideration to the Mortgagees, the Parties griev'd reſpectively to be left for relief to a Courſe of Equity therein.

XXVII. Item, It is further concluded, accorded and agreed upon, and his Majeſty is further graciouſly pleas'd, that immediately upon Perfection of theſe Articles, the ſaid Thomas Lord Viſcount Dillon of Coſtologh Lord Preſident of Connaght, Donnogh Lord Viſcount Muskerry, Francis Lord Baron of Athunry, Alexander Mac Donnel Eſq; Sir Lucas Dillon Kt. Sir Nicholas Plunket Kt. Sir Richard Barnwall Baronet, Jeffery Brown, Donnogh O Callaghan, Tyrlah O Neile, Miles Reily, Gerrald Fennel Eſquires, ſhall be authoriz'd by the ſaid Lord Lieutenant to proceed in, hear, determin and execute, in and throughout this Kingdom, the enſuing Particulars, and all the Matters thereupon depending; and that ſuch Authority and other the Authorities hereafter mention'd ſhall remain of force without revocation, alteration or diminution, until Acts of Parliament be paſs'd, according to the purport and intent of theſe Articles; and that in caſe of Death, Miſcarriage, Diſability to ſerve by reaſon of Sickneſs or otherwiſe of any the ſaid Thomas Lord Viſcount Dillon of Coſtologh Ld Preſident of Connaght, Donnogh Ld Viſc. Muskerry, Francis Ld Bar. of Athunry, Alexander Mac Donnell Eſq; Sir Lucas Dillon Kt. Sir Nicholas Plunket Kt. Sir Richard Barnwall Baronet, Jeffery Brown, Donnogh O Callaghan, Tyrlah O Neile, Miles Reily and Gerrald Fennell Eſquires, and his Majeſties Lord Lieutenant, or other Chief Governour or Governours of this Kingdom for the time being, ſhall name and authorize another in the Place of ſuch as ſhall be ſo dead or ſhall miſcarry himſelf, or be ſo diſabled, and that the ſame ſhall be ſuch Perſon as ſhall be allow'd of by the ſaid Thomas Lord Viſcount Dillon of Coſtologh, Lord Preſident of Connaght, Donnogh Lord Viſcount Muskerry, Francis Lord Baron of Athunry, Alexander Mac Donnell Eſq; Sir Lucas Dillon Kt. Sir Nicholas Plunket Kt. Sir Richard Barnwall Baronet, Jeffery Brown, Donnogh O Callaghan, Tyrlah O Neile, Miles Reily and Gerrald Fennell Eſquires, or any ſeven or more of them then living. And that the ſaid Thomas Lord Viſcount Dillon of Coſtologh

Lord Preſident of Connaght, Donnogh Lord Viſcount Muskerry, Francis Lord Baron of Athunry, Alexander Mac Donnel Eſq; Sir Lucas Dillon Kt. Sir Nicholas Plunket Kt. Sir Richard Barnwall Baronet, Jeffery Brown, Donnogh O Callaghan, Tyrlah O Neile, Miles Reily and Gerrald Fennell Eſquires, or any ſeven or more of them, ſhall have Power to applot, raiſe and levy Means with Indifferency and Equality by way of Exciſe or otherwiſe, upon all his Majeſties Subjects within the ſaid Kingdom, their Perſons, Eſtates and Goods, towards the Maintenance of ſuch Army or Armies as ſhall be thought fit to continue, and be in Pay for his Majeſties Service, the Defence of the Kingdom, and other the neceſſary public Charges thereof, and towards the Maintenance of the Forts, Caſtles, Gariſons and Towns, until there ſhall be a Settlement in Parliament of both or either party, other than ſuch of the ſaid Forts, Gariſons and Caſtles, as from time to time ſhall be thought fit, by his Majeſties Chief Governour or Governours of this Kingdom for the time being, by and with the Advice and Conſent of the ſaid Thomas Lord Viſc. Dillon of Coſtologh Lord Preſident of Connaght, Donnogh Lord Viſc. Muskerry, Francis Ld Baron of Athunry, Alexander Mac Donnel Eſq; Sir Lucas Dillon Kt. Sir Nicholas Plunket Kt. Sir Richard Barnwall Baronet, Jeffery Brown, Donnogh O Callaghan, Tyrlah O Neile, Miles Reily and Gerrald Fennell Eſquires, or any ſeven or more of them, not to be maintained at the Charge of the Public, provided that his Majeſties Lord Lieutenant or other Chief Governour or Governours of this Kingdom for the time being, be firſt made acquainted with ſuch Taxes, Levies and Exciſes as ſhall be made, and the manner of levying thereof, and that he approve the ſame; and to the end that ſuch of the Proteſtant Party as ſhall ſubmit to the Peace, may in the ſeveral Countries where any of their Eſtates lieth, have Equality and Indifferency in the Aſſeſſments and Levies that ſhall concern their Eſtates in the ſaid ſeveral Counties.

It is concluded, accorded and agreed upon, and his Majeſty is graciouſly pleaſed, That in the Directions which ſhall iſſue to any ſuch County, for the applotting, ſubdividing and levying of the ſaid Public Aſſeſſments, ſome of the ſaid Proteſtant Party ſhall be joined with others of the Roman Catholic Party to that purpoſe, and for effecting that Service; and the ſaid Thomas Lord Viſcount Dillon of Coſtologh Lord Preſident of Connaght, Donnogh Lord Viſcount Muskerry, Francis Lord Baron of Athunry, Alexander Mac Donnel Eſq; Sir Lucas Dillon Kt. Sir Nicholas Plunket Kt. Sir Richard Barnwall Baronet, Jeffery Brown, Donnogh O Callaghan, Tyrlah O Neile, Miles Reily and Gerrald Fennel Eſqs; or any ſeven or more of them, ſhall have power to levy the Arrears of all Exciſes and other publick Taxes impoſed by the Confederate Roman Catholics, and yet unpaid, and to call Receivers and other Accomptants of all former Taxes and all public Dues to a juſt and ſtrict Account, either by themſelves, or by ſuch as they or any ſeven or more of them ſhall name or appoint; and that the ſaid Lord Lieutenant, or any other Chief Governour or Governours of this Kingdom for the time being, ſhall from time to time iſſue Commiſſions to ſuch Perſon and Perſons as ſhall be named and appointed by the ſaid Thomas Lord Viſcount Dillon of Coſtologh Lord Preſident of Connaght, Donnogh Lord Viſcount Muskerry, Francis Lord Baron of Athunry, Alexander Mac Donnel Eſq; Sir Lucas Dillon Kt. Sir Nicholas Plunket Kt. Sir Richard Barnwall Baronet, Jeffery Brown, Donnogh O Callaghan, Tyrlah O Neile, Miles Reily, Gerrald Fennell Eſquires, or any ſeven or more of them, and to be diſpoſed of, and the ſaid Frigats to be imployed for his Majeſties Service, and the public Uſe and Benefit of this Kingdom of Ireland; and that the ſaid Thomas Lord Viſcount Dillon of Coſtologh Lord Preſident of Connaght, Donnogh Lord Viſcount Muskerry, Francis Lord Baron of Athunry, &c. or any ſeven or more of them, ſhall have power to applot, raiſe and levy Means with Indifferency and Equality, by way of Exciſe or otherwiſe, in the ſeveral Cities, Corporate Towns, Counties and part of Counties, now within the Quarters and only upon the Eſtates of the ſaid Confederate Roman Catholics, all ſuch Sum and Sums of Money as ſhall appear to the ſaid Thomas Lord Viſcount Dillon of Coſtologh Lord Preſident of Connaght, Donnogh Lord Viſcount Muskerry, Francis Lord Baron of Athunry, &c. or any ſeven or more of them, to be really due, for and in the Diſcharge of the publick Engagements of the ſaid Confederate Catholics, incurred and grown due before the Concluſion of theſe Articles; and that the ſaid Thomas Lord Viſcount Dillon of Coſtologh Lord Preſident of Connaght, Donnogh Lord Viſcount Muskerry, Francis Lord Baron of Athunry, &c. or any ſeven or more of them, ſhall be authoriz'd to appoint Receivers, Collectors and all other Officers, for ſuch Monies as ſhall be aſſeſſed, taxed or applotted, in purſuance of the Authorities mention'd in this Article, and for the Arrears of all former Applotments, Taxes and other public Dues yet unpaid; And that the ſaid Thomas Lord Viſcount Dillon of Coſtologh Lord Preſident of Connaght, Donnogh Lord Viſcount Muskerry, Francis Lord Baron of Athunry, &c. or any ſeven or more of them, in caſe of Refractories or Delinquency, may diſtrain and impriſon, and cauſe ſuch Delinquents to be diſtrained and impriſoned. And the ſaid Thomas Lord Viſcount Dillon of Coſtologh Lord Preſident of Connaght, Donnogh Lord Viſcount Muskerry, Francis Lord Baron of Athunry, &c. or any ſeven or more of them make perfect Books of all ſuch Monies as ſhall be applotted, raiſed or levy'd, out of which Books they are to make ſeveral and reſpective Abſtracts, to be delivered under their hands, or the hands of any ſeven or more of them, to the ſeveral and reſpective Collectors, which ſhall be appointed to levy and receive the ſame. And that a Duplicate of the ſaid Books, under the hands of the ſaid Thomas Lord Viſcount Dillon of Coſtologh Lord Preſident of Connaght, Donnogh Lord Viſcount Muskerry, Francis Lord Baron of Athunry, &c. or any ſeven or more of them, be delivered unto his Majeſties Lord Lieutenant, or other Chief Governour or Governours of this Kingdom for the time being, whereby a perfect Account may be given; and that the ſaid Thomas Lord Viſcount Dillon of Coſtologh Lord Preſident of Connaght, Donnogh Lord Viſcount Muskerry, Francis Lord Baron of Athunry, &c. or any ſeven or more of them, ſhall have Power to call the Council and Congregation, and the reſpective ſupream Councils, and Commiſſioners General, appointed hitherto from time to time, by the ſaid Confederate Roman Catholics, to manage their public Affairs, and all other Perſons accountable, to an Account for all their Receipts and Disburſements ſince the beginning of their reſpective Imploiments, under the Confederate Roman Catholics.

XXVIII. Item, It is concluded, accorded and agreed, by and between the ſaid Parties, and his Majeſty is graciouſly pleas'd, That for the Preſervation of the Peace and Tranquillity of the Kingdom, the ſaid Lord Lieutenant, and the ſaid Thomas Lord Viſcount Dillon of Coſtologh Lord Preſident of Connaght, Donnogh Lord Viſcount Muskerry, Francis Lord Baron of Athunry, &c. or any ſeven or more of them, ſhall for the preſent agree upon ſuch Perſons, who are to be authorized by Commiſſion under the Great Seal, to be Commiſſioners of the Peace, Oyer and Terminer, Aſſizes and Goal-delivery, in, and throughout the Kingdom, to continue during pleaſure, with ſuch Power as Juſtices of the Peace, Oyer and Terminer, Aſſizes and Goal-delivery in former time of Peace have uſually had, which is not to extend unto any Crime or Offence committed before the firſt of May laſt paſt, and to be qualify'd with Power to hear and determin all Civil Cauſes coming before them, not exceeding ten Pounds; provided that they ſhall not intermeddle with Titles of Lands; provided likewiſe, the Authority of ſuch Commiſſioners ſhall not extend to queſtion any Perſon or Perſons, for any Shipping, Cattle or Goods, heretofore taken by either Party from the other, or other Injuries done contrary to the Articles of Ceſſation, concluded by and with the ſaid Roman Catholic Party in, or ſince May laſt, but that the ſame ſhall be determined by ſuch indifferent Perſons, as the Lord Lieutenant, by the Advice and Conſent of the ſaid Thomas Lord Viſcount Dillon of Coſtologh Lord Preſident of Connaght, Donnogh Lord Viſcount Muskerry, Francis Lord Baron of Athunry, &c. or any ſeven or more of them ſhall think fit, to the end that ſpeedy and equal Juſtice may be done to all Parties grieved; and the ſaid Commiſſioners are to make their Eſtreats as accuſtomed of Peace and ſhall take the enſuing Oath, viz. You ſhall ſwear, That as Juſtice of the Peace, Oyer and Terminer, Aſſizes and Goal-delivery in the Counties of A. B. in all Articles to the Commiſſion to you directed, you ſhall do equal Right to the poor, and to the rich after your Cunning and Wit and Power, and after the Laws and Cuſtoms of the Realm, and in purſuance of theſe Articles; and you ſhall not be of Counſel of any Quarrel hanging before you; and the Iſſues, Fines and Amerciaments which ſhall happen to be made, and all Forſeitures which ſhall happen before you, you ſhall cauſe to be entred without any concealment or imbezling, and ſend to the Court of Exchequer, or to ſuch other Place as his Majeſties Lord Lieutenant, or other Chief Governour or Governours of this Kingdom ſhall appoint, until there may be acceſs unto the ſaid Court of Exchequer: You ſhall not let for Gift or other Cauſe, but well and truly you ſhall do your Office of Juſtice of Peace, Oyer and Terminer, Aſſizes and Goal-delivery in that behalf, and that you take nothing for your Office of Juſtice of the Peace, Oyer and Terminer, Aſſizes and Goal-delivery to be done, but of the King, and Fees accuſtomed; and you ſhall not direct, or cauſe to be directed, any Warrant by you, to be made to the Parties, but you ſhall direct them to the Sheriffs and Bayliffs of the ſaid Counties reſpectively, or other the King's Officers or Miniſters, or other indifferent Perſons to do execution thereof. So help you God, &c.

And that as well in the ſaid Commiſſion, as in all other Commiſſions and Authorities to be iſſued in purſuance of the preſent Articles, this Clauſe ſhall be inſerted, viz. That all Officers, Civil and Martial, ſhall be required to be aiding and aſſiſting and obedient unto the ſaid Commiſſioners, and other Perſons to be authorized as aboveſaid in the execution of their reſpective Powers.

XXIX. Item, It is further concluded, accorded and agreed upon, by and between the ſaid Parties, and his Majeſty is further graciouſly pleas'd, That his Majeſties Roman Catholic Subjects, do continue the Poſſeſſion of ſuch of his Majeſties Cities, Gariſons, Towns, Forts and Caſtles which are within their now Quarters, until Settlement by Parliament, and to be commanded, ruled and governed in chief, upon occaſion of neceſſity (as to the Martial and Military Affairs) by ſuch as his Majeſty, or his Chief Governour or Governours of this Kingdom for the time being, ſhall appoint; and the ſaid Appointment to be by and with the Advice and Conſent of the ſaid Thomas Lord Viſcount Dillon of Coſtologh Lord Preſident of Connaght, Donnogh Lord Viſcount Muskerry, Francis Lord Baron of Athunry, &c. or any ſeven or more of them; and his Majeſties Chief Governour or Governours, is to iſſue Commiſſions accordingly, to ſuch Perſons as ſhall be ſo named and appointed as aforeſaid, for the executing of ſuch Command, Rule or Government, to continue until all the Particulars in theſe preſent Articles agreed on to paſs in Parliament, ſhall be accordingly paſſed; only in caſe of Death or Miſbehaviour, ſuch other Perſon or Perſons to be appointed for the ſaid Command, Rule and Government, to be named and appointed in the place or places, of him or them, who ſhall ſo die or miſbehave themſelves, as the Chief Governour or Governours for the time being, by the Advice and Conſent of the ſaid Thomas Lord Viſcount Dillon of Coſtologh Lord Preſident of Connaght, Donnogh Lord Viſcount Muskerry, Francis Lord Baron of Athunry, &c. or any ſeven or more of them ſhall think fit, and to be continued until a Settlement in Parliament as aforeſaid.

XXX. Item, It is further concluded, accorded and agreed upon, by and between the ſaid Parties, and his Majeſty is further graciouſly pleaſed, That all Cuſtoms and Tenths of Prizes belonging to his Majeſty, which from the Perfection of theſe Articles ſhall fall due within this Kingdom, ſhall be paid unto his Majeſties Receipt, or until recourſe may be had thereunto in the ordinary legal Way, unto ſuch Perſon or Perſons, and in ſuch place or places, and under ſuch Controuls as the Lord Lieutenant ſhall appoint to be diſpoſed of, in order to the Defence and Safety of the Kingdom, and the defraying of other the neceſſary public Charges thereof, for the Eaſe of the Subjects in other their Levyes, Charges and Applotments. And that all and every Perſon or Perſons, who are at preſent inſtruſted and imploied by the ſaid Roman Catholics, in the Entries, Receipts, Collections, or otherwiſe, concerning the ſaid Cuſtoms and Tenths of Prizes, do continue their reſpective Imploiments in the ſame, until full Settlement in Parliament, accountable to his Majeſties Receipts, or until recourſe may be had thereunto; as the ſaid Lord Lieutenant ſhall appoint as aforeſaid, other than to ſuch, and ſo many of them, as to the Chief Governour or Governours for the time being, by and with the Advice and Conſent of the ſaid Thomas Lord Viſcount Dillon of Coſtologh Lord Preſident of Connaght, Donnogh Lord Viſc. Muskerry, Francis Lord Baron of Athunry, &c. or any ſeven or more of them, ſhall be thought fit to be altered; and then, and in ſuch caſe, or in caſe of Death, Fraud or Miſbehaviour, or other Alteration of any ſuch Perſon or Perſons, then ſuch other Perſon or Perſons to be employed therein, as ſhall be thought fit by the Chief Governour or Governours for the time being, by and with the Advice and Conſent of the ſaid Thomas Lord Viſcount Dillon of Coſtologh Lord Preſident of Connaght, Donnogh Lord Viſcount Muskerry, Francis Lord Baron of Athunry, &c. or any ſeven or more of them; and when it ſhall appear that any Perſon or Perſons, who ſhall be found faithful to his Majeſty, hath right to any of the Offices or Places about the ſaid Cuſtoms, whereunto he or they may not be admitted until Settlement in Parliament as aforeſaid, that a reaſonable Compenſation ſhall be afforded to ſuch Perſon or Perſons for the ſame.

XXXI. Item, As for and concerning his Majeſties Rents, payable at Eaſter next, and from thenceforth to grow due, until a Settlement in Parliament, it is concluded, accorded and agreed upon, by and between the ſaid Parties, and his Majeſty is graciouſly pleas'd, That the ſaid Rents be not written for, or levyed, until a full Settlement in Parliament; and in due time upon Application to be made to the ſaid Lord Lieutenant, or other Chief Governour or Governours of this Kingdom, by the ſaid Thomas Lord Viſcount Dillon of Coſtologh Lord Preſident of Connaght, Donnogh Lord Viſcount Muskerry, Francis Lord Baron of Athunry, &c. or any ſeven or more of them, for remittal of thoſe Rents, the ſaid Lord Lieutenant, or any other Chief Governour or Governours of this Kingdom for the time being, ſhall intimate their Deſires, and the Reaſon thereof to his Majeſty, who upon conſideration of the preſent Condition of this Kingdom will declare his gracious Pleaſure therein, as ſhall be juſt and honourable, and ſatisfactory to the reaſonable Deſires of his Subjects.

XXXII. Item, It is concluded, accorded and agreed, by and between the ſaid Parties, and his Majeſty is graciouſly pleas'd, That the Commiſſioners of Oyer and Terminer and Goal-delivery to be named as aforeſaid, ſhall have Power to hear and determin all Murders, Manſlaughters, Rapes, Stealths, burning of Houſes and Corn in Rick or Stack, Robberies, Burglaries, forcible Entries, Detainers of Poſſeſſions, and other Offences committted or done, and to be committed and done ſince the firſt day of May laſt paſt, until the firſt day of the next Parliament, theſe preſent Articles, or any thing therein contained to the contrary notwithſtanding; provided, that the Authority of the ſaid Commiſſioners ſhall not extend to queſtion any Perſon or Perſons, for doing or committing mitting any Act whatſoever, before the Concluſion of this Treaty, by Virtue or Colour of any Warrant or Direction from thoſe in public Authority among the Confederate Roman Catholics, nor unto any Act which ſhall be done after the perfecting and concluding of theſe Articles, by Virtue or Pretence of any Authority which is now by theſe Articles agreed on; provided alſo that the ſaid Commiſſion ſhall not continue longer than the firſt day of the next Parliament.

XXXIII. Item, It is concluded, accorded, by and between the ſaid Parties, and his Majeſty is further graciouſly pleas'd, That for the determining ſuch differences which may ariſe between his Majeſties Subjects within this Kingdom, and the prevention of Inconvenience and Diſquiet which through want of due Remedy in ſeveral Cauſes may happen, there ſhall be Judicatures eſtabliſh'd in this Kingdom,and that the Perſons to be authorized in them, ſhall have Power to do all ſuch things as ſhall be proper and neceſſary for them to do; and the ſaid Lord Lieutenant, by and with the Advice and Conſent of the ſaid Thomas Lord Viſcount Dillon of Coſtologh Lord Preſident of Connaght, Donnogh Lord Viſcount Muskerry, Francis Lord Baron of Athunry, &c. or any ſeven or more of them, ſhall name the ſaid Perſons ſo to be authorized, and do all other things incident unto, and neceſſary for the ſettling of the ſaid intended Judicatures.

XXXIV. Item, At the Inſtance, humble Suit and earneſt deſire of the General Aſſembly of the Confederate Roman Catholics; it is concluded, accorded and agreed upon, that the Roman Catholic Regular Clergy of this Kingdom, behaving themſelves conformable to theſe Articles of Peace, ſhall not be moleſted in the Poſſeſſions, which at preſent they have of, and in the Bodies, Sites and Precincts of ſuch Abbies and Monaſteries belonging to any Roman Catholic within the ſaid Kingdom, until Settlement by Parliament; and that the ſaid Clergy ſhall not be moleſted in the enjoying ſuch Penſions, as hitherto ſince the Wars they enjoyed for their reſpective Lively-hoods from the ſaid Roman Catholics: and the Sites and Precincts hereby intended, are declared to be the Body of the Abby, one Garden and Orchard to each Abby, if any there be, and what elſe is contained within the Walls, Meers or antient Fences or Ditch, that doth ſupply the Wall thereof, and no more.

XXXV. Item, It is concluded, accorded and agreed, by and between the ſaid Parties, that as to all other demands of the ſaid Roman Catholics, for or concerning all or any the matters propoſed by them, not granted or aſſented unto in and by the aforeſaid Articles, the ſaid Roman Catholics be referred to his Majeſties gracious Favour and further Conceſſions. In Witneſs whereof the ſaid Lord Lieutenant, for and on the behalf of his moſt Excellent Majeſty, to the one Part of theſe Articles remaining with the ſaid Roman Catholics, hath put his Hand and Seal: And Sir Richard Blake Kt. in the Chair of the General Aſſembly of the ſaid Roman Catholics, by Order, Command and unanimous Conſent of the ſaid Catholics in full Aſſembly, to the other Part thereof remaining with the ſaid Lord Lieutenant, hath put to his Hand and the Public Seal, hitherto us'd by the ſaid Roman Catholics, the 17th of January, 1648. and in the 24th Year of the Reign of our Soveraign Lord CHARES, by the Grace of God King of Great Britain, France and Ireland, &c.

SIR,

I HAVE not thus long forborn to invite you with thoſe under your Command, to a Submiſſion to his Majeſties Authority in me, and a Conjunction with me, in the ways of his Serviee, out of any the leaſt Averſion I had to you, or any of them, or out of any diſ-eſteem I had to your Power, to advance or impede the ſame, but out of my Fear, whiles thoſe that have of late uſurped Power over the Subjects of England, held forth the leaſt colourable Shadow of Moderation in their Intentions towards the Settlement of Church or State, and that in ſome tolerable Way with relation to Religion, the Intereſt of the King and Crown, the Freedom of Parliament, the Liberties of the Subject, any Addreſſes from me propoſing the withdrawing of that Party from thoſe thus profeſſing, from whom they have received ſome, and expected further ſupport, would have been but coldly received, and any Determination thereupon deferred in hope and expectation of the forementioned Settlement, or that you your ſelf, who certainly have not wanted a foreſight of the ſad Confuſion now covering the Face of England, would have declared with me, the Lord Inchequeen, and the Proteſtant Army in Munſter, in prevention thereof; yet my fear was, it would have been as difficult for you, to have carried with you the main Body of the Army under your Command (not ſo clear-ſighted as your ſelf) as it would have been dangerous to you, and thoſe with you well enclined to have attempted it without them; but now that the Mask of Hypocriſy, by which the Independent Army hath enſnared and enſlaved all Eſtates and Degrees of Men is laid aſide, now that barefaced, they evidently appear to be the Subverters of true Religion, and to be the Protectors and Inviters not only of all falſe Ones, but of Irreligion and Atheiſm, now that they have barbarouſly and inhumanly laid violent, ſacrilegious hands upon, and murthered God's Anointed, and our King, not as heretofore ſome Patricides have done, to make room for ſome Uſurper, but in a way plainly manifeſting their Intentions, to change the Monarchy of England into Anarchy, unleſs their Aim be firſt to conſtitute an elective Kingdom; and CROMWEL or ſome ſuch John of Leiden being elected, then by the ſame Force, by which they have thus far compaſſed their Ends, to eſtabliſh a perfect Turkiſh Tyranny; now that of the three Eſtates of King, Lords and Commons, whereof in all Ages Parliaments have conſiſted, there remains only a ſmall number, and they the Dregs and Scum of the Houſe of Commons, pick'd and aw'd by the ARMY, a wicked Remnant, left for no other end, than yet further if it be poſſible to delude the People with the Name of a Parliament: The King being murther'd, the Lords and the reſt of the Commons being by unheard of violence at ſeveral times forc'd from the Houſes, and ſome impriſon'd. And now that there remains no other Liberty in the Subject but to profeſs blaſphemous Opinions, to revile and tread under foot Magiſtracy, to murther Magiſtrates, and oppreſs and undo all that are not like-minded with them. Now I ſay, that I cannot doubt but that you and all with you under your command will take this Opportunity to act and declare againſt ſo monſtrous and unparallel'd a Rebellion, and that you and they will cheerfully acknowledg, and faithfully ſerve and obey our Gracious King CHARES the II. undoubted Heir of his Fathers Crown and Vertues; under whoſe Right and Conduct we may by God's Aſſiſtance reſtore Proteſtant Religion to Purity, and therein ſettle it, Parliaments to their Freedom, good Laws to their Force, and our Fellow-Subjects to their juſt Liberties; wherein how glorious and bleſſed a thing it will be, to be ſo conſiderably inſtrumental, as you may now make your ſelf, I leave to you now to conſider. And though I conceive there are not any Motives relating to ſome particular Intereſt to be mentioned after theſe ſo weighty Conſiderations, which are ſuch as the World hath not been at any time furniſh'd with, yet I hold it my part to aſſure you that as there is nothing you can reaſonably propoſe for the ſafety, ſatisfaction or advantage of your ſelf, or of any that ſhall adhere to you in what I deſire, that I ſhall not to the uttermoſt of my Power provide for; ſo there is nothing I would, nor ſhall more induſtriouſly avoid, than thoſe Neceſſities ariſing from my Duty to God and Man, that may by your rejecting this Offer force me to be a ſad Inſtrument of ſhedding Engliſh Blood, which in ſuch Caſe muſt on both ſides happen. If this Overture find place with you, as I earneſtly wiſh it may, let me know with what poſſible ſpeed you can, and if you pleaſe by the Bearer in what way you deſire, it ſhall be drawn on to a Concluſion. For in that, as well as in the Subſtance, you ſhall find all ready compliance from me, that deſire to be

My LORD,

YOUR Lordſhip's of the ninth, I receiv'd the twelfth inſtant, and therein have I your Lordſhip's Invitation to a Conjunction with your ſelf (I ſuppoſe) as Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and with others now united with the Iriſh, and with the Iriſh themſelves alſo.

As I underſtand not how your Lordſhip ſhould be inveſted with that Power pretended, ſo am I very well aſſur'd, that it is not in the Power of any without the Parliament of England to give and aſſure pardon to thoſe bloody Rebels, as by the ACT to that end paſs'd may appear more fully. I am alſo well aſſur'd, that the Parliament of England would never aſſent to ſuch a PEACE (ſuch as is that of your Lordſhips with the Rebels) wherein is little or no Proviſion made either for the Proteſtants or the Proteſtant Religion. Nor can I underſtand how the Proteſtant Religion ſhould be ſettled and reſtor'd to its Purity by an Army of Papiſts, or the Proteſtant Intereſts maintain'd by thoſe very Enemies by whom they have been ſpoil'd and there ſlaughter'd: And very evident it is, that both the Proteſtants and Proteſtant Religion are in that your Lordſhips Treaty, left as in the Power of the Rebels, to be by them born down and rooted out at pleaſure.

As for that Conſideration by your Lordſhip offer'd of the preſent and late Proceedings in England, I ſee not how it may be a ſufficient Motive to me (or any other in like Truſt for the Parliament of England in the Service of this Kingdom) to join with thoſe Rebels upon any the Pretences in that your Lordſhip's Letter mention'd; for therein were there a manifeſt betraying that Truſt repos'd in me in deſerting the Service and Work committed to me, in joyning with thoſe I ſhall oppoſe, and in oppoſing whom I am oblig'd to ſerve.

Neither conceive I it any part of my Work and Care to take notice of any whatſoever Proceedings of STATE, foreign to my Charge and Truſt here, eſpecially they being found hereunto apparently deſtructive.

Moſt certain it is, and former Ages have approved it, that the intermedling of Governours and Parties in this Kingdom, with Sidings and Parties in ENGLAND, have been the very betraying of this Kingdom to the Iriſh, whiles the Britiſh Forces here had been thereupon call'd off, and the Place therein laid open, and as it were given up to the common ENEMY.

It is what your Lordſhip might have obſerv'd in your former Treaty with the Rebels, that upon your Lordſhip's thereupon withdrawing, and ſending hence into England the moſt conſiderable part of the Engliſh Army then commanded by you; thereby was the remaining Britiſh Party not long after overpower'd, and your Quarters by the Iriſh over-run to the Gates of DUBLIN, your ſelf alſo reduced to that low Condition, as to be beſieg'd in this very City (the Metropolis and principal Citadel of the Kingdom) and that by thoſe very Rebels, who till then could never ſtand before you: and what the end hath been of that Party, alſo ſo ſent by your Lordſhip into England (although the Flower and Strength of the Engliſh Army here, both Officers and Souldiers) hath been very obſervable.

And how much the Dangers are at preſent (more than in former Ages) of hazarding the Engliſh Intereſt in this Kingdom, by ſending any Parties hence into any other Kingdom upon any Pretences whatſoever, is very apparent, as in the generality of the Rebellion, now more than formerly; ſo conſidering your Lordſhips preſent Concluſions with, and Conceſſions to the Rebels, wherein they are allowed the continued Poſſeſſion of all the Cities, Forts and Places of Strength, whereof they ſtood poſſeſs'd at the time of their Treaty with your Lordſhip, and that they are to have a Standing Force (if I well remember) of 15000 Foot and 2500 Horſe (all of their own Party, Officers and Souldiers) and they (with the whole Kingdom) to be regulated by a major part of Iriſh Truſtees, choſen by the Rebels themſelves, as Perſons for their Intereſts and Ends, to be by them confided in, without whom nothing is to be acted. Therein I cannot but mind your Lordſhip of what hath been ſometimes by your ſelf delivered, as your ſenſe in this particular; that the Engliſh Intereſt in Ireland muſt be preſerv'd by the Engliſh, and not by Iriſh; and upon that ground (if I be not deceiv'd) did your Lordſhip then capitulate with the Parliament of ENGLAND, from which clear Principle I am ſorry to ſee your Lordſhip now receding.

As to that by your Lordſhip menac'd us here, of Blood and Force, if diſſenting from your Lordſhip's Ways and Deſigns, for my particular I ſhall (my Lord) much rather chooſe to ſuffer in ſo doing (for therein ſhall I do what is becoming, and anſwerable to my Truſt) than to purchaſe my ſelf on the contrary the ignominious Brand of Perfidy, by any Allurements of whatſoever Advantages offer'd me.

But very confident I am of the ſame Divine Power which hath ſtill followed me in this WORK, and will ſtill follow me; and in that Truſt doubt I nothing of thus giving your Lordſhip plainly this my Reſolution in that Particular: So I remain,

DUBLIN,
March 14.
1648.

Your Lordſhip's humble Servant.

Signed, MIC. JONES.

ORMOND,

WHEREAS our late Soveraign Lord King CHARLES of happy Memory hath been lately by a Party of his rebellious Subjects of ENGLAND moſt traiterouſly, maliciouſly, and inhumanly put to death and murthered; and foraſmuch as his Majeſty that now is, Charles by the Grace of GOD King of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, is Son and Heir of his ſaid late Majeſty, and therefore by the Laws of the Land, of Force, and practis'd in all Ages, is to inherit. We therefore in diſcharge of the Duty we owe unto God, our Allegiance and Loyalty to our Soveraign, holding it fit him ſo to proclaim in and through this his Majeſties Kingdom, do by this our preſent Proclamation declare and manifeſt to the World, That Charles the II. Son and Heir of our late Soveraign Lord King Charles the I. of happy Memory, is, by the Grace of GOD, the undoubted KING of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, Defender of the FAITH, &c.

Given at CARRICK Feb. 26. 1648.

GOD SAVE THE KING.

A neceſſary Repreſentation of the preſent Evils, and eminent Dangers to Religion, Laws and Liberties, ariſing from the late and preſent Practices of the Sectarian Party in ENGLAND: Together with an Exhortation to Duties relating to the Covenant, unto all within our Charge; and to all the Well-affected within this Kingdom, by the Presbytery at BELFAST, February the 15th, 1649.

WHEN we ſeriouſly conſider the great and many Duties which we owe unto God and his People, over whom he hath made us Overſeers, and for whom we muſt give an Account; and when we behold the laudable Examples of the worthy Miniſters of the Province of London, and of the Commiſſioners of the General Aſſembly of the Church of Scotland, in their free and faithful Teſtimonies againſt the Inſolencies of the Sectarian Party in England. Conſidering alſo the Dependency of this Kingdom upon the Kingdom of England, and remembring how againſt ſtrong Oppoſitions we were aſſiſted by the Lord the laſt year in diſcharge of the like Duty, and how he puniſh'd the Contempt of our Warning upon the Deſpiſers thereof: We find our ſelves as neceſſitated, ſo the more encourag'd to caſt in our Mite in the Treaſury, leſt our Silence ſhould involve us in the Guilt of Unfaithfulneſs, and our People in Security and neglect of Duties.

In this Diſcharge of the Truſt put upon us by God, we would not be looked upon as Sowers of Sedition, or Broachers of National and diviſive Motions; our Record is in Heaven, that nothing is more hateful unto us, nor leſs intended by us, and therefore we ſhall not fear the malicious and wicked Aſperſions which we know Satan by his Inſtruments is ready to caſt, not only upon us, but on all who ſincerely endeavour the Advancement of Reformation.

What of late have been, and now are, the inſolent and preſumptious Practices of the Sectaries in England, is not unknown to the World: For, Firſt, notwithſtanding their ſpecious Pretences for Religion and Liberties, yet their late and preſent Actings being therewith compar'd, do clearly evidence that they love a rough Garment to deceive; ſince they have with a high Hand deſpis'd the OATH, in breaking the Covenant, which is ſo ſtrong a Foundation to both, whilſt they loaden it with ſlighting Reproaches, calling it a bundle of particular and contrary Intereſts, and a Snare to the People; and likewiſe labour to eſtabliſh by Laws an univerſal Toleration of all Religions, which is an Innovation overturning of Unity in Religion, and ſo directly repugnant to the Word of God, the two firſt Articles of our ſolemn Covenant, which is the greateſt Wickedneſs in them to violate, ſince many of the chiefeſt of themſelves have, with their hands teſtify'd to the moſt High God, ſworn and ſeal'd it.

Moreover, their great Diſaffection to the Settlement of Religion, and ſo their future breach of Covenant, doth more fully appear by their ſtrong oppoſitions to Presbyterial Government (the Hedg and Bulwark of Religion) whilſt they expreſs their hatred to it more then to the worſt of Errors; by excluding it under the name of Compulſion; when they embrace even Paganiſm and Judaiſm in the Arms of Toleration. Not to ſpeak of their Aſperſions upon it, and the Aſſertors thereof as Antichriſtian and Popiſh, though they have deeply ſworn to maintain the ſame Government in the firſt Article of the Covenant, as it is eſtabliſhed in the Church of SCOTLAND, which they now ſo deſpite and fully blaſpheme.

Again, It is more than manifeſt, that they ſeek not the Vindication, but the Extirpation of Laws and Liberties, as appears by their ſeizing on the Perſon of the King, and at their pleaſures removing him from place to place, not only without the Conſent, but (if we miſtake not) againſt a direct Ordinance of Parliament: Their violent ſurpriſing, impriſoning and ſecluding many of the moſt worthy Members of the Honorable Houſe of Commons, directly againſt a declared Privilege of Parliament, (an Action certainly without Parallel in any Age) and their Purpoſes of aboliſhing Parliamentary Power for the future, and eſtabliſhing of a Repreſentative (as they call it) inſtead thereof. Neither hath their Fury ſtay'd here, but without all Rule or Example, being but private Men, they have proceeded to the Trial of the King, againſt both the Intereſt and Proteſtation of the Kingdom of Scotland, and the former public Declarations of both Kingdoms (beſides the violent haſte, rejecting the hearing of any Defences) with cruel Hands have put him to Death; an Act ſo horrible, as no Hiſtory, divine or human, hath laid a Precedent of the like.

Theſe and many other their deteſtable Inſolencies, may abundantly convince every unbyas'd Judgment, that the preſent Practice of the Sectaries and their Abettors, do directly overturn the Laws and Liberties of the Kingdoms, root out lawful and ſupream Magiſtracy (the juſt Privileges whereof we have ſworn to maintain) and introduce a fearful Confuſion and lawleſs Anarchy.

The Spirit of God by Solomon tells us, Prov. 30. 21. That a Servant to reign, is one of the four things for which the Earth is diſquieted, and which it cannot bear: We wonder nothing that the Earth is diſquieted for theſe things; but we wonder greatly, if the Earth can bear them. And albeit the Lord ſo permit, that Folly be ſet in great Dignity, and they which ſit in low place; That Servants ride upon Horſes, and Princes walk as Servants upon the Earth, Eccleſ. 10. ver. 6, 7. Yet the ſame Wiſe Man ſaith, Prov. 19. 10. Delight is not ſeemly for a Fool, much leſs for a Servant to have Rule over Princes.

When we conſider theſe things, we cannot but declare and manifeſt our utter diſlike and deteſtation of ſuch unwarrantable Practices, directly ſubverting our Covenant, Religion, Laws and Liberties. And as Watchmen in SION warn all the Lovers of Truth and well-affected to the Covenant, carefully to avoid Compliance with, or not bearing witneſs againſt horrid Inſolences, leſt partaking with them in their Sins, they alſo be Partakers of their Plagues. Therefore in the Spirit of Meekneſs, we earneſtly intreat, and in the Authority of Jeſus Chriſt (whoſe Servants we are) charge and obteſt all who reſolve to adhere unto Truth and the Covenant, diligently to obſerve and conſcientiouſly to perform theſe following Duties.

Firſt, That according to our ſolemn Covenant, every one ſtudy more to the Power of Godlineſs and perſonal Reformation of themſelves and Families; becauſe for the great Breach of this part of the Covenant, God is highly offended with theſe Lands, and juſtly provoked to permit Men to be the Inſtruments of our Miſery and Afflictions.

Secondly, That every one in their Station and Calling earneſtly contend for the Faith which was once delivered to the Saints, Jude 3. And ſeek to have their Hearts eſtabliſhed with Grace, that they be not unſtable and wavering, carried about with every Wind of Doctrine; but that they receive the Truth in Love, avoiding the Company of ſuch as withdraw from and vilifie the public Ordinances; ſpeak evil of Church-Government; invent damnable Errors, under the ſpecious Pretence of a Goſpel-way and new Light; and highly extol the Perſons and Courſes of notorious Sectaries, leſt God give them over to ſtrong Deluſions (the Plague of theſe Times) that they may believe Lies, and be damned.

Thirdly, That they would not be drawn by Counſel, Command or Example, to ſhake off the antient and fundamental Government of theſe Kingdoms by King and Parliament, which we are ſo deeply ingaged to preſerve by our ſolemn Covenant, as they would not be ſound guilty of the great Evil of theſe Times (condemned by the Holy Ghoſt) the deſpiſing of Dominion, and ſpeaking Evil of Dignities.

Fourthly, That they do cordially endeavour the Preſervation of the Union amongſt the well-affected in the Kingdoms, not being ſwayed by any National Reſpect: Rememb'ring that part of the Covenant; That we ſhall not ſuffer our ſelves directly nor indirectly, by whatſoever Combination, Perſwaſion, or Terror, to be divided, or withdrawn from this bleſſed Union and Conjunction.

And Finally, Albeit there be more preſent Hazard from the Power of Sectaries (as were from Malignants the laſt year) yet we are not ignorant of the evil Purpoſes of Malignants, even at this time, in all the Kingdoms, and particularly in this; and for this Cauſe, we exhort every one with equal Watchfulneſs to keep themſelves free from aſſociating with ſuch, or from ſwerving in their Judgments to malignant Principles; and to avoid all ſuch Perſons as have been from the beginning known Oppoſers of Reformation, Refuſers of the Covenant, combining themſelves with Papiſts and other notorious Malignants, eſpecially ſuch who have been chief Promoters of the late Engagement againſt England, Calumniators of the Work of Reformation, in reputing the Miſeries of the preſent Times unto the Advancers thereof; and that their juſt hatred to Sectaries incline not their Minds to favour Malignants, or to think, that becauſe of the Power of Sectaries, the Cauſe of God needs the more to fear the Enmity, or to ſtand in need of the help of Malignants.

OBSERVATIONS

UPON

The Articles of Peace with the Iriſh Rebels, on the Letter of Ormond to Col. Jones, and the Repreſentation of the Presbytery at Belfaſt.

ALthough it be a Maxim much agreeable to wiſdom, that juſt deeds are the beſt anſwer to injurious words, and actions, of whatever ſort, thir own plaineſt Interpreters; yet ſince our enemies can find the leiſure both ways to offend us, it will be requiſite we ſhould be found in neither of thoſe ways neglectfull of our juſt defence. To let them know, that ſincere and upright intentions can certainly with as much eaſe deliver themſelves into words as into deeds.

Having therefore ſeen of late thoſe Articles of Peace granted to the Papiſt Rebels of Ireland, as ſpeciall graces and favours from the late King, in reward, moſt likely, of thir work don, and in his name and authority confirm'd and ratifi'd by James Earl of Ormond; together with his Letter to Col. Jones, Governour of Dublin, full of contumely and diſhonour, both to the Parlament and Army: And on the other ſide, an inſolent and ſeditious Repreſentation from the Scotch Presbytery at Belfaſt in the North of Ireland, no leſs diſhonourable to the State, and much about the ſame time brought hither; there will be needfull as to the ſame ſlanderous aſperſions but one and the ſame Vindication againſt them both. Nor can we ſever them in our notice and reſentment, though one part intitl'd a Presbytery, and would be thought a Proteſtant Aſſembly, ſince thir own unexampl'd virulence hath wrapt them into the ſame guilt, made them accomplices and aſſiſtants to the abhorred Iriſh Rebels, and with them as preſent to advance the ſame intereſt: if we conſider both thir calumnies, thir hatred, and the pretended Reaſons of thir hatred to be the ſame; the time alſo, and the place concurring, as that there lacks nothing but a few formall words, which may be eaſily diſſembl'd, to make the perfeteſt conjunction; and between them to divide that Iland.

As for theſe Articles of Peace made with thoſe inhuman Rebels and Papiſts of Ireland by the late King, as one of his laſt Maſter-pieces, We may be confidently perſwaded, that no true born Engliſh-man can ſo much as barely read them without indignation and diſdain, that thoſe bloody Rebels, and ſo proclaim'd and judg'd of by the King himſelf, after the mercileſſe and barbarous Maſſacre of ſo many thouſand Engliſh, (who had us'd thir right and title to that Country with ſuch tenderneſs and moderation, and might otherwiſe have ſecur'd themſelves with eaſe againſt thir Treachery) ſhould be now grac'd and rewarded with ſuch freedoms and enlargements, as none of thir Anceſtors could ever merit by thir beſt obedience, which at beſt was alwaies treachrous; to be infranchiz'd with full liberty equall to thir Conquerours, whom the juſt revenge of antient Pyracies, cruel Captivities, and the cauſleſs infeſtation of our Coaſt, had warrantably call'd over, and the long preſcription of many hundred years; beſides what other titles are acknowledg'd by thir own Iriſh Parlaments, had fixt and ſeated in that ſoile with as good a right as the meereſt Natives.

Theſe therefore, by thir own foregoing demerits and provocations juſtly made our vaſſalls, are by the firſt Article of this Peace advanc'd to a Condition of freedom ſuperior to what any Engliſh Proteſtants durſt have demanded. For what elſe can be the meaning to diſcharge them the Common Oath of Supremacy, eſpecially being Papiſts (for whom principally that Oath was intended) but either to reſign them the more into thir own power, or to ſet a mark of diſhonour upon the Britiſh Loyalty; by truſting Iriſh Rebels for one ſingle Oath of Allegeance, as much as all his Subjects of Brittaine for the double ſwearing both of Allegeance and Supremacy?

The ſecond Article puts it into the hands of an Iriſh Parlament to repeale, or to ſuſpend, if they think convenient, that act uſually call'd Poynings Act, which was the main, and yet the civilleſt and moſt moderate acknowledgment impos'd of thir dependance on the Crown of England; whereby no Parlament could be ſummond there, no Bill be paſt, but what was firſt to be tranſmitted and allow'd under the great Seal of England. The recalling of which Act, tends openly to inveſt them with a Law-giving power of thir own, enables them by degrees to throw off all ſubjection to this Realm, and renders them, who by thir endleſs treaſons and revolts have deſerv'd to hold no Parlament at all, but to be govern'd by Edicts and Gariſons, as abſolute and ſupream in that Aſſembly as the People of England in thir own Land. And the 12th Article grants them in expreſs words, that the Iriſh Parlament ſhall be no more dependent on the Parlament of England, then the Iriſh themſelves ſhall declare agreeable to the Laws of Ireland.

The two and twentieth Article, more ridiculous then dangerous, coming eſpecially from ſuch a ſerious knot of Lords and Politicians, obtains that thoſe Acts prohibiting to plow with Horſes by the Tayl, and burn Oates in the Straw, be repeal'd ; anough, if nothing elſe, to declare in them a diſpoſition not only ſottiſh, but indocible, and averſe from all Civility and Amendment : and what hopes they give for the future, who rejecting the ingenuity of all other Nations to improve and wax more civill by a civilizing Conqueſt, though all theſe many years better ſhown and taught, preferr thir own abſurd and ſavage Cuſtoms before the moſt convincing evidence of reaſon and demonſtration : a Teſtimony of thir true Barbariſm and obdurate wilfulneſs, to be expected no leſs in other matters of greateſt moment.

Yet ſuch as theſe and thus affected, the ninth Article entruſts with the Militia ; a Truſt which the King ſwore by God at New-Market, he would not commit to his Parlament of England, no not for an hour. And well declares the confidence he had in Iriſh Rebels, more then in his Loyalleſt Subjects. He grants them moreover, till the performance of all theſe Articles, that 15000 Foot and 2500 Horſe, ſhall remain a ſtanding Army of Papiſts at the beck and command of Dillon, Muskery and other Arch-Rebels, with power alſo of adding to that number as they ſhall ſee cauſe. And by other Articles allows them the conſtituting of Magiſtrates and Judges in all Cauſes, whom they think fit : and till a ſettlement to thir own minds, the poſſeſſion of all thoſe Townes and Countries within thir now Quarters, being little leſs then all the Iland, beſides what thir Cruelty hath diſpeopl'd and lay'd waſt. And laſtly, the whole managing both of Peace and War is committed to Papiſts, and the chief Leaders of that Rebellion.

Now let all men judg what this wants of utter alienating and acquitting the whole Province of Ireland from all true fealty and obedience to the Commonwealth of England. Which act of any King againſt the Conſent of his Parlament, though no other Crime were layd againſt him, might of it ſelf ſtrongly conduce to the diſ-inthrowning him of all. In France Henry the Third, demanding leave in greateſt exigencies to make Sale of ſome Crown-Lands only, and that to his Subjects, was anſwerd by the Parlament then at Blois, that a King in no caſe, though of extreameſt neceſſity, might alienate the Patrimony of his Crown, whereof he is but only Uſu-fructuary, as Civilians term it, the propriety remaining ever to the Kingdom, not to the King. And in our own Nation, King John, for reſigning though unwillingly his Crown to the Popes Legate, with little more hazard to his Kingdom then the payment of 1000 Marks, and the unſightlineſs of ſuch a Ceremony, was depos'd by his Barons, and Lewis the French Kings Son elected in his room. And to have carried only the Jewells, Plate, and Treaſure into Ireland without conſent of the Nobility, was one of thoſe impeachments that condemn'd Richard the Second to loſe his Crown.

But how petty a Crime this will ſeem to the alienating of a whole Kingdom, which in theſe Articles of Peace we ſee as good as done by the late King, not to Friends, but to mortall Enemies, to the accompliſhment of his own intereſts and ends, wholly ſeparate from the Peoples good, may without aggravation be eaſily conceiv'd. Nay by the Covenant it ſelf, ſince that ſo cavillouſly is urg'd againſt us, we are enjoyn'd in the fourth Article, with all faithfulneſs to endeavour the bringing all ſuch to public Triall and condigne Puniſhment, as ſhall divide one Kingdom from another. And what greater dividing then by a pernicious and hoſtile Peace, to diſſalliege a whole Feudary Kingdom from the ancient Dominion of England? Exception we find thereof no perſon whatſoever; and if the King who hath actually done this, or any for him claim a Privilege above Juſtice, it is again demanded by what expreſs Law, either of God or Man, and why he whoſe office is to execute Law and Juſtice upon all others, ſhould ſit himſelf like a Demigod in lawleſs and unbounded Anarchy; refuſing to be accountable for that Autority over men naturally his Equals, which God himſelf without a reaſon giv'n is not wont to exerciſe over his Creatures? And if God the neerer to be acquainted with mankind and his frailties, and to become our Prieſt, made himſelf a man, and ſubject to the Law, we gladly would be inſtructed why any mortal man for the good and welfare of his brethren being made a King, ſhould by a clean contrary motion make himſelf a God, exalted above Law; the readieſt way to become utterly unſenſible, both of his human condition, and his own duty.

And how ſecurely, how ſmoothly, with how little touch or ſenſe of any commiſeration, either princely or ſo much as human, he hath ſold away that juſtice ſo oft demanded, and ſo oft by himſelf acknowledg'd to be due for the blood of more then 200000 of his Subjects, that never hurt him, never diſobey'd him, aſſaſſinated and cut in pieces by thoſe Iriſh Barbarians, to give the firſt promoting, as is more then thought, to his own tyrannicall deſigns in England, will appear by the 18th Article of his Peace; wherein without the leaſt regard of Juſtice to avenge the dead, while he thirſts to be aveng'd upon the living, to all the Murders, Maſſacres, Treaſons, Pyracies, from the very fatall day wherein that Rebellion firſt broke out, he grants an Act of Oblivion. If this can be juſtified, or not puniſht in whomſoever, while there is any Faith, any Religion, any Juſtice upon Earth, there can no reaſon be alleg'd why all things are not left to Confuſion. And thus much be obſerv'd in brief concerning theſe Articles of Peace made by the late King with his Iriſh Rebells.

The Letter of Ormond ſent to Col. Jones Governour of Dublin, attempting his fidelity, which the diſcretion and true worth of that Gentleman hath ſo well anſwer'd and repulſt, and paſs'd here without mention, but that the other part of it not content to do the errand of Treaſon, roves into a long digreſſion of evill and reproachfull language to the Parlament and Army of England. Which though not worth thir notice, as from a Crew of Rebells whoſe inhumanities are long ſince become the horrour and execration of all that hear them, yet in the purſuance of a good endeavour, to give the world all due ſatisfaction of the preſent doings, no fit opportunity ſhall be omitted.

He accuſed firſt That we are the Subverters of true Religion, the Protectors and Inviters not only of all falſe ones, but of Irreligion and Atheiſm. An Accuſation that no man living could more unjuſtly uſe then our Accuſer himſelf; and which without a ſtrange beſottedneſs, he could not expect but to be retorted upon his own head. All men who are true Proteſtants, of which number he gives out to be one, know not a more immediate and killing Subverter of all true Religion then Antichriſt, whom they generally believe to be the Pope and Church of Rome, he therefore who makes Peace with this grand Enemy and Perſecutor of the true Church, he who joyns with him, ſtrengthens him, gives him root to grow up and ſpread his Poyſon, removing all Oppoſition againſt him, granting him Schools, Abbyes, and Revenues, Gariſons, Fortreſſes, Towns, as in ſo many of thoſe Articles may be ſeen, he of all Proteſtants may be call'd moſt juſtly the Subverter of true Religion, the Protecter and Inviter of Irreligion and Atheiſm, whether it be Ormond, or his Maiſter. And if it can be no way prov'd, that the Parlament hath countenanc'd Popery or Papiſts, but have every where brok'n thir Temporall Power, thrown down thir public Superſtitions, and confin'd them to the bare enjoyment of that which is not in our reach, thir Conſciences; if they have encourag'd all true Miniſters of the Goſpel, that is to ſay, afforded them favour and protection in all places where they preacht, and although they think not Money or Stipend to be the beſt encouragement of a true Paſtor, yet therein alſo have not bin wanting nor intend to be, they doubt not then to affirm themſelves, not the Subverters, but the Maintainers and Defenders of true Religion; which of it ſelf and by Conſequence is the ſureſt and the ſtrongeſt Subverſion, not only of all falſe ones, but of Irreligon and Atheiſm. For the Weapons of that Warfare, as the Apoſtle teſtifies who beſt knew, are not carnall, but mighty through God to the pulling down of ſtrong holds, and all reaſonings, and every high thing exalted againſt the knowledg of God, ſurpriſing every thought unto the obedience of Chriſt, and eaſily revenging all diſobedience, 2 Cor. 10. What Miniſter or Clergy-man that either underſtood his high calling, or ſought not to erect a ſecular and carnall Tyranny over ſpirituall things, would neglect this ample and ſublime power confered upon him, and come a begging to the weak hand of Magiſtracy for that kind of ayd which the Magiſtrate hath no Commiſſion to afford him, and in the way he ſeeks it hath bin alwayes found helpleſs and unprofitable. Neither is it unknown, or by wiſeſt Men unobſerv'd, that the Church began then moſt apparently to degenerate, and go to ruin, when ſhe borrow'd of the Civill Power more then fair encouragement and protection; more then which Chriſt himſelf and his Apoſtles never requir'd. To ſay therefore that We protect and invite all falſe Religions, with Irreligion alſo and Atheiſm, becauſe we lend not, or rather miſapply not the temporall power to help out, though in vain, the ſloth, the ſpleen, the inſufficiency of Church-men, in the execution of ſpirituall diſcipline, over thoſe within thir Charge, or thoſe without, is an imputation that may be layd as well upon the beſt regulated States and Governments through the World. Who have bin ſo prudent as never to imploy the Civill Sword further then the edg of it could reach; that is, to Civill Offences only; proving always againſt objects that were ſpirituall a ridiculous weapon. Our protection therefore to men in Civill Matters unoffenſive we cannot deny; thir Conſciences we leave, as not within our Cogniſance, to the proper cure of inſtruction, praying for them. Neverthe leſs, if any be found among us declar'd Atheiſts, malicious Enemies of God, and of Chriſt; The Parlament, I think, profeſſes not to tolerate ſuch, but with all befitting endeavours to ſuppreſs them. Otherwaies to protect none that in a larger ſenſe may be tax'd of Irreligion or Atheiſm, may perhaps be the ready way to exclude none ſooner out of protection, then thoſe themſelves that moſt accuſe it to be ſo generall to others. Laſtly, that we invite ſuch as theſe, or incourage them, is a meer ſlander without proof.

He tells us next, that they have murder'd the King. And they deny not to have juſtly and undauntedly, as became the Parlament of England, for more bloodſhed and other hainous Crimes then ever King of this Land was guilty of, after op'n tryall, puniſht him with death. A matter which to men whoſe ſerious conſideration thereof hath left no certain precept, or example undebated, is ſo farr from giving offence, that we implore and beſeech the Divine Majeſty ſo to uphold and ſupport thir ſpirits with like Fortitude and Magnanimity, that all thir enſuing actions may correſpond and prove worthy that impartiall and noble piece of Juſtice, wherein the Hand of God appear'd ſo evidently on our ſide. We ſhall not then need to feare what all the rout and faction of men baſely principl'd can do againſt us.

The end of our proceedings, which he takes upon him to have diſcover'd; The changing forſooth of Monarchy into Anarchy, ſounds ſo like the ſmattering of ſome raw Polititian, and the overworne objection of every triviall Talker, that we leave him in the number. But ſeeing in that which follows he contains not himſelf, but contrary to what a Gentleman ſhould know of Civility, proceeds to the contemptuous naming of a Perſon, whoſe valour and high merit many enemies more noble then himſelf have both honour'd and fear'd, to aſſert his good name and reputation, of whoſe ſervice the Common-wealth receaves ſo ample ſatiſfaction, 'tis anſwerd in his behalf, that Cromwell whom he couples with a name of ſcorn, hath done in few years more eminent and remarkable Deeds whereon to found Nobility in his Houſe, though it were wanting, and perpetuall Renown to Poſterity, then Ormond and all his Aunceſtors put together can ſhew from any Record of thir Iriſh Exploits, the wideſt Scene of thir Glory.

He paſſes on his groundleſs conjectures, that the aim of this Parlament may be perhaps to ſet up firſt an elective Kingdom, and after that a perfet Turkiſh Tyranny. Of the former we ſuppoſe the late Act againſt Monarchy will ſuffice to acquit them. Of the latter certainly there needed no other pattern then that Tyranny which was ſo long modelling by the late King himſelf, with Strafford, and that Arch-Prelat of Canterbury, his chief Inſtruments; whoſe deſigns God hath diſſipated. Neither is it any new project of the Monarchs, and thir Courtiers in theſe days, though Chriſtians they would be thought, to endeavour the introducing of a plain Turkiſh Tyranny. Witneſs that Conſultation had in the Court of France under Charles the Ninth at Blois, wherein Poncet, a certain Court-projector, brought in ſecretly by the Chancellor Biragha, after many praiſes of the Ottoman Government, propoſes means and ways at large in preſence of the King, the Queen-Regent, and Anjou the Kings Brother, how with beſt expedition, and leaſt noyſe the Turkiſh Tyranny might be ſet up in France. It appears therefore that the deſign of bringing in that Tyranny, is a Monarchicall deſign, and not of thoſe who have diſſolv'd Monarchy.

As for Parlaments by three Eſtates, we know that a Parlament ſignifies no more then the Supream and Generall Councell of a Nation, conſiſting of whomſoever, chos'n and aſſembl'd for the public good; which was ever practis'd, and in all ſorts of Government, before the word Parlament, or the formality, or the poſſibility of thoſe three Eſtates, or ſuch a thing as a Titular Monarchy had either name or being in the World. The Originall of all which we could produce to be far newer then thoſe all Ages which he vaunts of, and by ſnch firſt invented and contriv'd, whoſe authority, tho it were Charles Martell, ſtands not ſo high in our repute, either for himſelf, or the age he liv'd in, but that with as good warrant we may recede from what he ordain'd, as he ordain what before was not.

But whereas beſides he is bold to allege that of the three Eſtates there remains only a ſmall number, and they the Dreggs and Scum of the Houſe of Commons; this reproach and in the mouth of an Iriſh Man concerns not them only, but redounds to apparent diſhonour of the whole Engliſh Nation. Doubtleſs there muſt be thought a great ſcarcity in England of perſons honourable and deſerving, or elſe of Judgment, or ſo much as Honeſty in the People, if thoſe whom they eſteem worthy to ſit in Parlament be no better then Scum and Dreggs in the Iriſh Dialect. But of ſuch like ſtuff we meet not any where with more excreſcence then in his own laviſh Pen; which feeling it ſelf looſe without the reins of diſcretion, rambles for the moſt part beyond all Soberneſs and Civility. In which Torrent he goes on negotiating and cheapning the Loyalty of our Faithfull Governour of Dublin, as if the known and try'd Conſtancy of that valiant Gentleman were to be bought with Court fumes.

He lays before him that there remains now no other liberty in the Subject but to profeſs blaſphemous opinions, to revile and tread under foot Magiſtracy, to murther Magiſtrates, to oppreſs and undo all that are not like minded with us. Forgetting in the mean while himſelf to be in the head of a mixt Rabble, part Papiſts, part Fugitives, and part Savages, guilty in the higheſt degree of all theſe Crimes. What more blaſphemous, not opinion, but whole Religion, then Popery, plung'd into Idolatrous and Ceremoniall Superſtition, the very death of all true Religion; figur'd to us by the Scripture it ſelf in the ſhape of that Beaſt, full of the names of Blaſphemy, which we mention to him as to one that would be counted Proteſtant, and had his breeding in the houſe of a Biſhop? And who are thoſe that have trod under foot Magiſtracy, murder'd Magiſtrates, oppreſs'd and undone all that ſyded not with them, but the Iriſh Rebels, in that horrible Conſpiracy, for which Ormond himſelf hath either bin or ſeem'd to be thir Enemy, though now thir Ringleader. And let him ask the Jeſuites about him whether it be not thir known Doctrine and alſo Practiſe, not by fair and due proceſs of Juſtice to puniſh Kings and Magiſtrates, which we diſavow not, but to murder them in the baſeſt and moſt aſſaſſinons manner, if thir Church-Intereſt ſo require. There will not need more words to this Windy Railer, convicted opn'ly of all thoſe Crimes which he ſo confidently, and yet falſly, charges upon others.

We have now to deal, though in the ſame Country, with another ſort of Adverſaries, in ſhow far different, in ſubſtance much what the ſame. Theſe write themſelves the Presbytery of Belfaſt, a place better known by the name of a late Barony, then by the Fame of theſe Mens Doctrine or Eccleſiaſticall Deeds; whoſe obſcurity till now never came to our hearing. And ſurely we ſhould think this thir Repreſentment farr beneath conſiderable, who have neglected and paſt over the like unadviſedneſs of thir fellows in other places more neer us, were it not to obſerve in ſome particulars the Sympathy, good Intelligence, and joynt pace which they go in the North of Ireland, with thir Copartning Rebels in the South, driving on the ſame Intereſt to looſe us that Kingdom, that they may gain it themſelves, or at leaſt ſhare in the ſpoil: though the other be op'n Enemies, theſe pretended Brethren.

The Introduction of their Manifeſt out of doubt muſt be zealous; Their Duty, they ſay, to God and his People, over whom he hath made them Overſeers, and for whom they muſt give accompt. What mean theſe Men? Is the Presbytery of Belfaſt, a ſmall Town in Ulſter, of ſo large extent that thir Voices cannot ſerve to teach Duties in the Congregation which they overſee, without ſpreading and divulging to all parts far beyond the Dioceſs of Patrick or Columba, thir writt'n Repreſentation, under the ſuttle pretence of feeding thir own Flock? Or do they think to overſee or undertake to give an accompt for all to whom thir Paper ſends greeting? St. Paul to the Elders of Epheſus thinks it ſufficient to give charge, That they take heed to themſelves, and to the Flock, over which they were made Overſeers; beyond thoſe Bounds he enlarges not thir Commiſſion. And ſurely when we put down Biſhops, and put up Presbyters, which the moſt of them have made uſe of to enrich and exalt themſelves, and turn the firſt heel againſt their Benefactors, we did not think that one Claſſick Fraternity ſo obſcure and ſo remote, ſhould involve us, and all State-Affairs, within the Cenſure and Juriſdiction of Belfaſt, upon pretence of overſeeing thir own Charge.

We very well know that Church-Cenſures are limited to Church-Matters, and theſe within the compaſs of thir own Province, or to ſay more truly of thir own Congregation: that Affairs of State are not for thir medling, as we could urge ev'n from their own Invectives and Proteſtations againſt the Biſhops, wherein they tell them with much fervency, that Miniſters of the Goſpel, neither by that by Function, nor any other which they ought accept, have the leaſt Warrant to be Pragmatical in the State.

And ſurely in vain were Biſhops for theſe and other Cauſes forbid to ſit and vote in the Houſe, if theſe Men out of the Houſe, and without Vote ſhall claim and be permitted more licenſe on their Prysbyterial Stools, to breed continual diſturbance by interpoſing in the Commonwealth. But ſeeing that now, ſince thir heaving out the Prelats to heave in themſelves, they deviſe new ways to bring both ends together which will never meet; that is to ſay, their former Doctrine with their preſent Doings, as that they cannot elſe teach Magiſtrates and Subjects their Duty, and that they have beſides a Right themſelves to ſpeak as Members of the Commonwealth. Let them know that there is a wide difference between the general exhortation to Juſtice and Obedience, which in this point is the utmoſt of thir Duty, and the State-diſputes wherein they are now grown ſuch Buſybodies, to preach of Titles, Intereſts, and Alterations in Government; more then our Saviour himſelf, or any of his Apoſtles ever took upon them, though the Title both of Cæſar and of Herod, and what they did in matters of State, might have then admitted Controverſy anough.

Next, for their Civil Capacities, we are ſure that Pulpits and Church-Aſſemblies, whether Claſſical or Provincial, never were intended or allow'd by wiſe Magiſtrates, no nor by him that ſent them, to advance ſuch purpoſes, but that as Members of the Commonwealth they ought to mix with other Commoners, and in that temporal Body to aſſume nothing above other private Perſons, or otherwiſe then in a uſual and legal manner: not by diſtinct Remonſtrances and Repreſentments, as if they were a Tribe and Party by themſelves, which is the next immediate way to make the Church lift a Horn againſt the State, and claim an abſolute and undepending Juriſdiction, as from like advantage and occaſion (to the trouble of all Chriſt'ndom) the Pope hath for many Ages done; and not only our Biſhops were climing after him, but our Presbyters alſo, as by late Experiment we find. Of this Repreſentation therfore we can eſteem and judge no other then of a ſlanderous and ſeditious Libel, ſent abroad by a ſort of Incendiaries, to delude and make the better way under the cunning and plauſible name of a Presbytery.

A ſecond Reaſon of thir Repreſenting is, that they conſider the dependance of that Kingdom upon England, which is another ſhameleſs untruth that ever they conſider'd; as thir own Actions will declare, by conniving, and in thir ſilence partaking with thoſe in Ulſter, whoſe obedience by what we have yet heard, ſtands dubious, and with an eye of Conformity rather to the North, then to that part where they owe thir ſubjection; and this in all likelihood by the inducement and inſtigation of theſe Repreſenters: who are ſo far from conſidering thir dependance on England, as to preſume at every word to term proceedings of Parlament, the Inſolencies of a Sectarian party, and of private men. Deſpiſing dominion, and ſpeaking evill of dignities, which hypocritically they would ſeem to diſſwade others from; and not fearing the due correction of thir Superiors, that may in fit ſeaſon overtake them. When as the leaſt conſideration of thir dependance on England would have kept them better in thir Duty.

The third Reaſon which they uſe, makes againſt them; The remembrance how God puniſht the contempt of thir warning laſt year upon the Breakers of Covnant, whenas the next year after they forget the warning of that puniſhment hanging over thir own heads for the very ſame tranſgreſſion, thir manifeſt breach of Covnant by this ſeditious Repreſentation accompanied with the doubtful obedience of that Province which repreſents it.

And thus we have thir Preface ſupported with three Reaſons; two of them notorious falſities, and the third againſt themſelves; and two examples, the Province of London, and the Commiſſioners of the Kirk-Aſſembly. But certain, if Canonical Examples bind not, much leſs do Apocryphal.

Proceeding to avouch the truſt put upon them by God, which is plainly prov'd to be none of this nature, They would not be look'd upon as ſowers of Sedition, or Authors of diviſive Motions; thir Record, they ſay, is in Heaven, and thir Truth and Honeſty no Man knows where. For is not this a ſhameleſs Hypocriſie, and of meer Wolves in Sheeps cloathing, to ſow Sedition in the Ears of all Men, and to face us down in the very Act, that they are Authors of no ſuch matter? But let the ſequel both of thir Paper, and the obedience of the place wherein they are, determine.

Nay while we are yet writing theſe things, and foretelling all men the Rebellion which was even then deſign'd in the cloſe purpoſe of theſe unhallow'd Prieſtlings, at the very time when with thir Lips they diſclaim'd all ſowing of Sedition, News is brought, and too true, that the Scottiſh Inhabitants of that Province are actually revolted, and have not only beſieg'd in London-Derry thoſe Forces which were to have fought againſt Ormond, and the Iriſh Rebels; but have in a manner declar'd with them, and begun op'n War againſt the Parlament; and all this by the incitement and illuſions of that unchriſtian Synagogue at Belfaſt, who yet dare charge the Parlament, that notwithſtanding ſpecious pretences, yet thir actings do evidence that they love a rough Garment to deceive. The Deceit we own not, but the Compariſon, by what at firſt ſight may ſeem alluded, we accept: For that hairy roughneſs aſſum'd won Jacob the Birthright both Temporal and Eternal; and God we truſt hath ſo diſpos'd the mouth of theſe Balaams, that comming to Curſe, they have ſtumbled into a kind of Bleſſing, and compar'd our actings to the faithful Act of that Patriarch.

But if they mean, as more probably thir meaning was, that rough Garment ſpok'n of Zach. 13.4. we may then behold the pittiful ſtore of learning and theology, which theſe deceivers have thought ſufficient to uphold thir credit with the People, who, though the rancour that levens them have ſomewhat quickn'd the common drawling of thir Pulpit elocution, yet for want of ſtock anough in Scripture-phraſe to ſerve the neceſſary uſes of thir Malice, they are become ſo liberall, as to part freely with thir own Budg-gowns from off thir backs, and beſtow them on the Magiſtrate as a rough Garment to deceive; rather then not be furniſh'd with a reproach, though never ſo improper, never ſo obvious to be turn'd upon themſelves. For but with half an eye caſt upon that Text, any man will ſoon diſcern that rough Garment to be thir own Coat, thir own Livery, the very Badg and Cogniſance of ſuch falſe Prophets as themſelves. Who, when they underſtand, or ever ſeriouſly mind the beginning of that 4th verſe, may be aſham'd every one of his lying Viſion, and may juſtly fear that foregoing denouncement to ſuch as ſpeak Lies in the name of the Lord, verſ. 3. lurking under the rough Garment of outward rigor and formality, whereby they cheat the ſimple. So that this rough Garment to deceive, we bring ye once again, Grave Sirs, into your own Veſtry; or with Zachary ſhall not think much to fit it to your own Shoulders. To beſtow ought in good earneſt on the Magiſtrate, we know your claſſic Prieſtſhip is too gripple, for ye are always begging: and for this rough Gown to deceave, we are confident ye cannot ſpare it; it is your Sundays Gown, your every day Gown, your only Gown, the Gown of your Faculty; ty ; your divining Gown ; to take it from ye were Sacrilege. Wear it therefore, and poſſeſs it your ſelves, moſt grave and reverend Carmelites, that all Men both young and old, as we hope they will ſhortly, may yet better know ye and diſtinguiſh ye by it ; and give to your rough Gown, where ever they meet it, whether in Pulpit, Claſſis, or Provincial Synod, the precedency, and the preeminence of deceaving.

They charge us next that we have brok'n the Cov'nant, and load'n it with ſlighting Reproaches. For the reproaching, let them anſwer that are guilty, whereof the State we are ſure cannot be accus'd. For the breaking, let us hear wherein. In labouring, ſay they, to eſtabliſh by Law a univerſal toleration of all Religions. This touches not the State ; for certainly were they ſo minded, they need not labour it, but do it, having power in thir hands ; and we know of no act as yet paſt to that purpoſe. But ſuppoſe it done, wherein is the Covnant broke ? The Covnant enjoyns us to endeavor the extirpation firſt of Popery and Prelacy, then of Hereſy, Schiſm, and Prophaneſs, and whatſoever ſhall be found contrary to ſound Doctrin and the power of Godlineſs. And this we ceaſe not to do by all effectual and proper means: But theſe Divines might know, that to extirpate all theſe things can be no work of the Civil Sword, but of the Spiritual, which is the Word of God.

No Man well in his wits, endeavoring to root up Weeds out of his Ground, inſtead of uſing the Spade will take a Mallet or a Beetle. Nor doth the Covnant any way engage us to extirpate, or to proſecute the Men, but the Hereſies and Errors in them, which we tell theſe Divines and the reſt that underſtand not, belongs chiefly to thir own Function, in the diligent preaching and inſiſting upon ſound Doctrin, in the confuting not the railing down Errors, encountring both in publick and private Conference, and by the power of truth, not of perſecution, ſubduing thoſe Authors of Heretical Opinions, and laſtly in the ſpiritual execution of Church diſcipline within thir own Congregations. In all theſe ways we ſhall aſſiſt them, favour them, and as far as appertains to us joyn with them, and moreover not tolerate the free exerciſe of any Religion, which ſhall be found abſolutely contrary to ſound Doctrin or the Power of Godlineſs; for the Conſcience, we muſt have patience till it be within our verge. And thus doing we ſhall believe to have kept exactly all that is requir'd from us by the Covnant. Whilſt they by thir ſeditious practiſes againſt us, then which nothing for the preſent can add more aſſiſtance or advantage to thoſe bloody Rebels and Papiſts in the South, will be found moſt pernicious Covnant-breakers themſelves, and as deep in that guilt as thoſe of thir own Nation the laſt year; the warning of whoſe ill ſucceſs, like men hardn'd for the ſame Judgment, they miſerably pervert to an incouragement in the ſame offence, if not a far worſe: For now they have joyn'd Intereſt with the Iriſh Rebels, who have ever fought againſt the Covnant, whereas thir Country-men the year before made the Covnant thir Plea. But as it is a peculiar Mercy of God to his People, while they remain his, to preſerve them from wicked Confederations: ſo it is a mark and puniſhment of Hypocrites to be driv'n at length to mix thir Cauſe, and the Intereſt of thir Covnant with God's Enemies.

And whereas they affirm that the tolerating of all Religions in the manner that we tolerate them, is an innovation ; we muſt acquaint them that we are able to make it good, if need be, both by Scripture and the Primitive Fathers, and the frequent aſſertion of whole Churches and Proteſtant States in thir Remonſtrances and Expoſtulations againſt the Popiſh Tyranny over Souls. And what force of argument do theſe Doctors bring to the contrary ? But we have long obſerv'd to what paſs the bold ignorance and ſloth of our Clergy tends no leſs now then in the Biſhops days, to make thir bare ſayings and cenſures authentic with the People, though deſtitute of any proof or argument. But thanks be to God they are diſcern'd.

Thir next impeachment is, that we oppoſe the Presbyterial Government, the Hedg and Bulwark of Religion. Which all the Land knows to be a moſt impudent falſhood, having eſtabliſh'd it with all freedom, wherever it hath bin deſir'd. Nevertheleſs as we perceave it aſpiring to be a compulſive power upon all without exception in Parochial, Claſſical, and Provincial Hierarchies, or to require the fleſhly arm of Magiſtracy in the execution of a ſpiritual Diſcipline, to puniſh and amerce by any corporal infliction thoſe whoſe Conſciences cannot be edifi'd by what autority they are compell'd, we hold it no more to be the Hedg and Bulwark of Religion, then the Popiſh and Prelatical Courts, or the Spaniſh Inquiſition.

But we are told, We imbrace Paganiſm and Judaiſm in the arms of Toleration. A moſt audacious calumny! And yet while we deteſt Judaiſm, we know our ſelves commanded by St. Paul, Rom. 11. to reſpect the Jews, and by all means to endeavor thir converſion.

Neither was it ever ſworn in the Covnant to maintain a univerſal Presbytery in England, as they falſly allege, but in Scotland againſt the Common Enemy, if our aid were call'd for: being left free to reform our own Country according to the Word of God, and the example of beſt reformed Churches; from which rule we are not yet departed.

But here, utterly forgetting to be Miniſters of the Goſpel, they preſume to op'n thir mouths not in the Spirit of Meekneſs, as like diſſemblers they pretend, but with as much deviliſh malice, impudence and falſhood as any Iriſh Rebel could have utter'd; and from a barbarous nook of Ireland brand us with the extirpation of Laws and Liberties; things which they ſeem as little to underſtand as ought that belongs to good Letters or Humanity.

That we ſeiz'd on the Perſon of the King; who was ſurrendred into our hands an Enemy and Captive by our own ſubordinate and paid Army of Scots in England. Next, our impriſoning many Members of the Houſe. As if it were impoſſible they ſhould deſerve it, conſpiring and bandying againſt the publick good; which to the other part appearing, and, with the power they had, not reſiſting, had bin a manifeſt deſertion of their Truſt and Duty. No queſtion but it is as good and neceſſary to expel rott'n Members out of the Houſe, as to baniſh Delinquents out of the Land: and the reaſon holds as well in forty as in five. And if they be yet more, the more dangerous is thir number. They had no privilege to ſit there, and vote home the Author, the impenitent Author of all our Miſeries to Freedom, Honour and Royalty, for a few fraudulent, if not deſtructive Conceſſions. Which that they went about to do, how much more clear it was to all men, ſo much the more expedient, and important to the Common-wealth was their ſpeedy ſeizure and excluſion; and no breach of any juſt privilege, but a breach of their knotted faction. And here they cry out, An Action without parallel in any Age. So heartily we wiſh all men were unprejudic'd in all our Actions, as theſe illiterate denouncers never parallel'd ſo much of any Age as would contribute to the tithe of a Century. That we aboliſh Parlamentary Power, and eſtabliſh a Repreſentative inſtead thereof. Now we have the hight of them; theſe profound Inſtructors in the midſt of thir Repreſentation, would know the Engliſh of a Repreſentative, and were perhaps of that Claſſis, who heretofore were as much ſtagger'd at Triennial.

Thir grand Accuſation is our Juſtice don on the King, which that they may prove to be without rule or example, they venture all the credit they have in divine and human Hiſtory; and by the ſame deſperate boldneſs detect themſelves to be egregious Liars and Impoſtors, ſeeking to abuſe the multitude with a ſhow of that gravity and learning which never was thir Portion. Had thir knowledg bin equal to the knowledg of any ſtupid Monk, or Abbot, they would have known at leaſt, though ignorant of all things elſe, the life and acts of him, who firſt inſtituted thir Order: But theſe blockiſh Presbyters of Clandeboy know not that John Knox, who was the firſt founder of Presbytery in Scotland, taught profeſſedly the Doctrine of depoſing, and of killing Kings. And thus while they deny that any ſuch rule can be found, the rule is found in thir own Country, giv'n them by thir own firſt Presbyterian Inſtitutor; and they themſelves, like irregular Friers walking contrary to the rule of thir own Foundation, deſerve for ſo groſs an ignorance and tranſgreſſion to be diſciplin'd upon thir own Stools. Or had thir reading in Hiſtory bin any, which by this we may be confident is none at all, or thir Malice not hightn'd to a blind rage, they never would ſo raſhly have thrown the Dice to a palpable diſcovery of thir ignorance and want of ſhame. But wherefore ſpend we two ſuch pretious things as time and reaſon upon Prieſts, the moſt prodigal miſ-ſpenders of time, and the ſcarceſt owners of reaſon? 'Tis ſufficient we have publiſh'd our defences, giv'n reaſons, giv'n examples of our Juſtice done; Books alſo have bin writt'n to the ſame purpoſe for Men to look on that will; that no Nation under Heav'n but in one age or other hath don the like. The difference only is, which rather ſeems to us matter of glory, that they for the moſt part have without Form of Law don the deed by a kind of martial Juſtice, we by the deliberat and well-weihg'd Sentence of a legal Judicature.

But they tell us, It was againſt the intereſt and proteſtation of the Kingdom of Scotland. And did exceeding well to joyn thoſe two together: hereby informing us what credit or regard need be giv'n in England to a Scotch Proteſtation, uſher'd in by a Scotch Intereſt: certainly no more then we ſee is giv'n in Scotland to an Engliſh Declaration, declaring the Intereſt of England. If then our intereſt move not them, why ſhould theirs move us? If they ſay, we are not all England; we reply they are not all Scotland: nay, were the laſt year ſo inconſiderable a part of Scotland as were beholding to this which they now term the Sectarian Army, to defend and reſcue them at the charges of England from a ſtronger party of thir own Countrymen, in whoſe eſteem they were no better then Sectarians themſelves. But they add, It was againſt the former Declarations of both Kingdoms, to ſeize, or proceed againſt the King. We are certain that no ſuch Declarations of both Kingdoms, as derive not thir full force from the ſenſe and meaning of the Covnant, can be produc'd.

And if they plead againſt us the Covnant, To preſerve and defend his Perſon; we ask them briefly whether they take the Covnant to be abſolute or conditional? If abſolute, then ſuppoſe the King to have committed all prodigious Crimes and Impieties againſt God, or Nature, or whole Nations, he muſt nevertheleſs be ſacred from all violent touch. Which abſurd opinion, how it can live in any Mans reaſon, either natural or rectifi'd, we much marvel: Since God declar'd his anger as impetuous for the ſaving of King Benhadad, though ſurrendring himſelf at mercy, as for the killing of Naboth. If it be conditional, in the preſervation and defence of Religion, and the People's Liberty, then certainly to take away his life, being dangerous, and pernicious to both theſe, was no more a breach of the Covnant, then for the ſame reaſon at Edinburrow to behead Gordon the Marqueſs Huntley. By the ſame Covnant we made vow to aſſiſt and to defend all thoſe that ſhould enter with us into this League; not abſolutely, but in the maintenance and purſuing thereof. If therefore no Man elſe ever were ſo mad as to claim from hence an impunity from all Juſtice, why ſhould any for the King? Whoſe Life by other Articles of the ſame Covnant was forfet. Nay if common ſenſe had not led us to ſuch a clear Interpretation, the Scotch Commiſſioners themſelves might boaſt to have bin our firſt teachers: who when they drew to the malignance which brought forth that perfidious laſt years irruption againſt all the bands of Covnant or Chriſtian Neighbourhood, making thir hollow Plea the defence of His Majeſties Perſon, they were conſtrain'd by thir own guiltineſs to leave out that following morſel that would have choak'd them, the preſervation and defence of true Religion, and our Liberties. And queſtionleſs in the preſervation of theſe, we are bound as well, both by the Covnant, and before the Covnant, to preſerve and defend the Perſon of any private Man, and the Perſon and Authority of any inferior Magiſtrate: So that this Article, objected with ſuch vehemence againſt us, contains not an exception of the Kings Perſon, and Autority, to do by privilege what wickedneſs he liſt, and be defended, as ſom fancy, but an expreſs teſtification of our Loyalty; and the plain words without wreſting will bear as much, that we had no thoughts againſt his perſon, or juſt power, provided they might conſiſt with the preſervation and defence of true Religion and our Liberties. But to theſe how hazardous his life was, will be needleſs to repeat ſo oft'n. It may ſuffice that while he was in Cuſtody, where we expected his Repentance, his remorſe at laſt, and compaſſion of all the innocent blood ſhed already, and hereafter likely to be ſhed for his meer wilfulneſs, he made no other uſe of our continual forbearance, our humbleſt Petitions and Obteſtations at his feet, but to ſit contriving and fomenting new Plots againſt us, and as his own phraſe was, playing his own Game upon the Miſeries of his People: Of which we deſire no other view at preſent then theſe Articles of Peace with the Rebels, and the rare Game likely to enſue from ſuch a caſt of his Cards. And then let Men reflect a little upon the ſlanders and reviles of theſe wretched Prieſts, and judg what Modeſty, what Truth, what Conſcience, what any thing fit for Miniſters, or we might ſay reaſonable men, can harbour in them. For what they began in ſhameleſneſs and malice, they conclude in frenzy: throwing out a ſudden rapſody of Proverbs quite from the purpoſe; and with as much comlineſs as when Saul propheci'd.

For caſting off, as he did his Garments, all modeſty and meekneſs wherewith the Language of Miniſters ought to be cloath'd, ſpeaking eſpecially to thir ſupreme Magiſtrate, they talk at random of Servants raigning, Servants riding, and wonder how the Earth can bear them. Either theſe men imagin themſelves to be marvellouſly high ſet and exalted in the Chair of Belfaſt, to voutſafe the Parlament of England no better ſtile then Servants, or elſe thir high notion, which we rather believe, falls as low as Court-paraſitiſm; ſuppoſing all Men to be Servants, but the King. And then all thir pains tak'n to ſeem ſo wiſe in proverbing, ſerves but to conclude them down-right Slaves: and the edg of thir own Proverb falls reverſe upon themſelves. For as Delight is not ſeemly for Fools, much leſs high Words to come from baſe Minds. What they are for Miniſters, or how they crept into the fold, whether at the Window, or through the Wall, or who ſet them there ſo haughty in the Pontifical See of Belfaſt, we know not. But this we rather have cauſe to wonder if the Earth can bear this unſufferable inſolency of upſtarts; who from a ground, which is not thir own, dare ſend ſuch defiance to the ſovran Magiſtracy of England, by whoſe autority and in whoſe right they inhabit there. By thir actions we might rather judg them to be a generation of High-land Theevs and Red-ſhanks, who being neighbourly admitted, not as the Saxons by merit of thir Warfare againſt our Enemies, but by the courteſy of England to hold poſſeſſions in our Province, a Country better then thir own, have, with worſe Faith then thoſe Heathen, prov'd ingrateful and treacherous Gueſts to thir beſts Friends and Entertainers. And let them take heed, leſt while thir ſilence, as to theſe matters, might have kept them blameleſs and ſecure under thoſe proceedings which they ſo fear'd to partake in, that theſe thir treaſonous attempts and practiſes have not involv'd them in a far worſe guilt of Rebellion; and (notwithſtanding that fair dehortatory from joyning with Malignants) in the appearance of a co-intereſt and partaking with the Iriſh Rebels. Againſt whom, though by themſelves pronounc'd to be the Enemies of God, they go not out to battel, as they ought, but rather by theſe thir doings aſſiſt and become aſſociates.

A
OF THE # People of England,
In ANSWER to
Salmaſius's DEFENCE of the KING.

The PREFACE.

ALTHO I fear, leſt, if in defending the People of England, I ſhould be as copious in Words, and empty of Matter, as moſt Men think Salmaſius has been in his Defence of the King, I might ſeem to deſerve juſtly to be accounted a verboſe and ſilly Defender; yet ſince no Man thinks himſelf obliged to make ſo much haſte, tho in the handling but of any ordinary Subject, as not to premiſe ſome Introduction at leaſt, according as the weight of his Subject requires; if I take the ſame courſe in handling almoſt the greateſt Subject that ever was, (without being too tedious in it) I am in hopes of attaining two things, which indeed I earneſtly deſire. The one, not to be at all wanting, as far as in me lies, to this moſt Noble Cauſe, and moſt worthy to be recorded to all future Ages: The other, That I may appear to have avoided my ſelf, that frivolouſneſs of Matter, and redundancy of Words, which I blame in my Antagoniſt. For I am about to diſcourſe of Matters, neither inconſiderable nor common, but how a moſt Potent King, after he had trampled upon the Laws of the Nation, and given a ſhock to its Religion, and begun to rule at his own Will and Pleaſure, was at laſt ſubdu'd in the Field by his own Subjects, who had undergone a long Slavery under him; how afterwards he was caſt into Priſon, and when he gave no ground, either by Words or Actions, to hope better things of him, he was finally by the Supreme Council of the Kingdom condemned to dye, and beheaded before the very Gates of the Royal Palace. I ſhall likewiſe relate, (which will much conduce to the eaſing mens minds of a great Superſtition) by what Right, eſpecially according to our Law, this Judgment was given, and all theſe Matters tranſacted; and ſhall eaſily defend my Valiant and Worthy Countrymen (who have extremely well deſerved of all Subjects and Nations in the World) from the moſt wicked Calumnies both of Domeſtick and Foreign Railers, and eſpecially from the Reproaches of this moſt vain and empty Sophiſter, who ſets up for a Captain and Ringleader to all the reſt. For what King's Majeſty ſitting upon an Exalted Throne, ever ſhone ſo brightly, as that of the People of England then did, when ſhaking off that old Superſtition, which had prevailed a long time, they gave Judgment upon the King himſelf, or rather upon an Enemy who had been their King, caught as it were in a Net by his own Laws (who alone of all Mortals challenged to himſelf impunity by a Divine Right) and ſcrupled not to inflict the ſame puniſhment upon him, being guilty, which he would have inflicted upon any other. But why do I mention theſe things as performed by the People, which almoſt open their Voice themſelves, and teſtify the Preſence of God throughout? Who, as often as it ſeems good to his Infinite Wiſdom, uſes to throw down proud and unruly Kings, exalting themſelves above the Condition of Humane Nature, and utterly to extirpate them and all their Family. By his manifeſt Impulſe being ſet on work to recover our almoſt loſt Liberty, following him as our Guide, and adoring the impreſſes of his Divine Power manifeſted upon all occaſions, we went on in no obſcure, but an illuſtrious Paſſage, pointed out and made plain to us by God himſelf. Which things, if I ſhould ſo much as hope by any diligence or ability of mine, ſuch as it is, to diſcourſe of as I ought to do, and to commit them ſo to writing, as that perhaps all Nations and all Ages may read them, it would be a very vain thing in me. For what ſtile can be auguſt and magnificent enough, what man has parts ſufficient to undertake ſo great a Task? Since we find by Experience, that in ſo many Ages as are gone over the World, there has been but here and there a man found, who has been able worthily to recount the Actions of Great Heroes, and Potent States; Can any man have ſo good an opinion of his own Talents, as to think himſelf capable to reach theſe glorious and wonderful Works of Almighty God, by any Language, by any Stile of his? Which Enterprize, though ſome of the moſt Eminent Perſons in our Commonwealth have prevailed upon me by their Authority to undertake, and would have it be my buſineſs to vindicate with my Pen againſt Envy and Calumny (which are proof againſt Arms) thoſe Glorious Performances of theirs (whoſe opinion of me I take as a very great honour, that they ſhould pitch upon me before others to be ſerviceable in this kind to thoſe moſt Valiant Deliverers of my Native Countrey; and true it is, that from my very youth I have been bent extremely upon ſuch ſort of Studies, as inclin'd me, if not to do great things my ſelf, at leaſt to celebrate thoſe that did) yet as having no confidence in any ſuch Advantages, I have recourſe to the Divine Aſſiſtance; and invoke the Great and Holy God, the Giver of all good Gifts, that I may as ſubſtantially, and as truly, diſcuſs and refute the Sawcineſs and Lies of this Foreign Declamator, as our Noble Generals piouſly and ſucceſsfully by force of Arms broke the King's Pride, and his unruly Domineering, and afterwards put an end to both by inflicting a memorable Puniſhment upon himſelf, and as throughly as a ſingle perſon did with eaſe but of late confute and confound the King himſelf, riſing as it were from the Grave, and recommending himſelf to the People in a Book publiſh'd after his death, with new Artifices and Allurements of Words and Expreſſions. Which Antagoniſt of mine, though he be a Foreigner, and, though he deny it a thouſand times over, but a poor Grammarian; yet not contented with the Salary due to him in that Capacity, choſe to turn a Pragmatical Coxcomb; and not only to intrude in State-Affairs, but into the Affairs of a Foreign State: tho he brings along with him neither Modeſty, nor Underſtanding, nor any other Qualification requiſite in ſo great an Arbitrator, but Sawcineſs, and a little Grammar only. Indeed, if he had publiſh'd here, and in Engliſh, the ſame things that he has now wrote in Latin ſuch as it is, I think no man would have thought it worth while to return an Anſwer to them, but would partly deſpiſe them as common, and exploded over and over already, and partly abhor them as ſordid and tyrannical Maxims, not to be endured even by the moſt abject of Slaves: Nay, Men that have ſided with the King, would have had theſe thoughts of his Book. But ſince he has ſwol'n it to a conſiderable bulk, and diſpers'd it amongſt Foreigners, who are altogether ignorant of our Affairs and Conſtitution; it's fit that they who miſtake them, ſhould be better informed; and that he, who is ſo very forward to ſpeak ill of others, ſhould be treated in his own kind. If it be asked, why we did not then attack him ſooner, why we ſuffered him to triumph ſo long, and pride himſelf in our ſilence? For others I am not to anſwer; for my ſelf I can boldly ſay, That I had neither Words nor Arguments long to ſeek for the defence of ſo good a Cauſe, if I had enjoyed ſuch a meaſure of health, as would have endur'd the fatigue of writing. And being but yet weak in Body, I am forced to write by piece-meal, and break off almoſt every hour, though the Subject be ſuch as requires an unintermitted ſtudy and intenſeneſs of mind. But though this bodily Indiſpoſition may be a hindrance to me in ſetting forth the juſt Praiſes of my moſt worthy Countreymen, who have been the Saviours of their Native Country, and whoſe Exploits, worthy of Immortality, are already famous all the World over; yet I hope it will be no difficult matter for me to defend them from the Inſolence of this ſilly little Scholar, and from that ſawcy Tongue of his, at leaſt. Nature and Laws would be in an ill caſe, if Slavery ſhould find what to ſay for it ſelf, and Liberty be mute: and if Tyrants ſhould find men to plead for them, and they that can maſter and vanquiſh Tyrants, ſhould not be able to find Advocates. And it were a deplorable thing indeed, if the Reaſon Mankind is endu'd withal, and which is the gift of God, ſhould not furniſh more Arguments for mens Preſervation, for their Deliverance, and, as much as the nature of the thing will bear, for making them equal to one another, than for their oppreſſion, and for their utter ruine under the Domineering Power of One ſingle Perſon. Let me therefore enter upon this Noble Cauſe with a chearfulneſs, grounded upon this Aſſurance, That my Adverſary's Cauſe is maintain'd by nothing but Fraud, Fallacy, Ignorance and Barbarity; whereas mine has Light, Truth, Reaſon, the Practice and the Learning of the beſt Ages of the World, of its ſide.

But now, having ſaid enough for an Introduction, ſince we have to do with Criticks; let us in the firſt place conſider the Title of this Choice Piece: Defenſio Regia pro Car. Primo, ad Car. Secundum. A Royal Defence (or the King's Defence) for Charles the Firſt to Charles the Second. You undertake a wonderful piece of work, whoever you are; to plead the Father's Cauſe before his own Son: a hundred to one but you carry it. But I ſummon you, Salmaſius, who heretofore ſculk'd under a wrong name, and now go by no name at all, to appear before another Tribunal, and before other Judges, where perhaps you may not hear thoſe little Applauſes, which you uſe to be ſo fond of in your School. But why this Royal Defence dedicated to the King's own Son? We need not put him to the torture; he confeſſes why. At the King's charge, ſays he. O mercenary and chargeable Advocate! could you not afford to write a Defence for Charles the Father, whom you pretend to have been the beſt of Kings, to Charles the Son, the moſt indigent of all Kings, but it muſt be at the poor King's own Charge? But though you are a Knave, you would not make your ſelf ridiculous, in calling it the King's Defence; for you having ſold it, it is no longer yours, but the King's indeed: who bought it at the price of a hundred Jacobuſſes, a great Sum for a poor King to diſburſe. I know very well what I ſay: and 'tis well enough known who brought the Gold, and the Purſe wrought with Beads: We know who ſaw you reach out greedy fiſts, under pretence of embracing the King's Chaplain, who brought the Preſent, but indeed to embrace the Preſent it ſelf, and by accepting it to exhauſt almoſt all the King's Treaſury.

But now the man comes himſelf, the Door creaks; the Actor comes upon the Stage.

In ſilence now, and with attention wait,
That ye may learn what th' Eunuch has to prate. Terent.

For whatever the matter's with him, he bluſters more than ordinary. A horrible meſſage had lately ſtruck our Ears, but our Minds more, with a heinous wound concerning a Parricide committed in England in the Perſon of a King by a wicked Conſpiracy of Sacrilegious men. Indeed that horrible Meſſage muſt either have had a much longer Sword than that which Peter drew, or thoſe Ears muſt have been of a wonderful length, that it could wound at ſuch a diſtance; for it could not ſo much as in the leaſt offend any Ears but thoſe of an Aſs. For what harm is it to you, that are Foreigners? are any of you hurt by it, if we amongſt our ſelves put our own Enemies, our own Traytors to death, be they Commoners, Noble-men, or Kings? Do you, Salmaſius, let alone what does not concern you: for I have a horrible Meſſage to bring of you too; which I'm miſtaken if it ſtrike not a more heinous wound into the Ears of all Grammarians and Criticks, provided they have any Learning and Delicacy in them, to wit, your crowding ſo many barbarous Expreſſions together in one period in the perſon of (Ariſtarchus) a Grammarian; and that ſo great a Critick as you, hired at the King's charge to write a Defence of the King his Father, ſhould not only ſet ſo fulſome a Preface before it, much like thoſe lamentable Ditties that uſed to be ſung at Funerals, and which can move compaſſion in none but a Coxcomb; but in the very firſt ſentence ſhould provoke your Readers to laughter with ſo many Barbariſms all at once. Perſona Regia, you cry. Where do you find any ſuch Latin? Or are you telling us ſome tale or other of a Perkin Warbeck, who taking upon him the Perſon of a King, has, forſooth, committed ſome horrible Parricide in England? Which expreſſion, though dropping careleſly from your Pen, has more truth in it, than you are aware of. For a Tyrant is but like a King upon a Stage, a man in a Vizor, and acting the part of a King in a Play; he is not really a King. But as for theſe Galliciſms, that are ſo frequent in your Book, I won't laſh you for them my ſelf, for I am not at leiſure; but ſhall deliver you over to your fellow-Grammarians, to be laught to ſcorn and whipt by them. What follows is much more heinous, that what was decreed by our Supreme Magiſtrates to be done to the King, ſhould be ſaid by you to have been done by a wicked Conſpiracy of Sacrilegious perſons. Have you the impudence, you Rogue, to talk at this rate of the Acts and Decrees of the chief Magiſtrates of a Nation, that lately was a moſt Potent Kingdom, and is now a more Potent Commonwealth? Whoſe proceedings no King ever took upon him by word of mouth, or otherwiſe, to vilifie and ſet at nought. The Illuſtrious States of Holland therefore, the Genuine Off-ſpring of thoſe Deliverers of their Country, have deſervedly by their Edict condemn'd to utter darkneſs this Defence of Tyrants, ſo pernicious to the Liberty of all Nations; the Author of which every free State ought to forbid their Country, or to baniſh out of it; and that State particularly that feeds with a Stipend ſo ungrateful and ſo ſavage an Enemy to their Commonwealth, whoſe very Fundamentals, and the cauſes of their becoming a free State, this Fellow endeavours to undermine as well as ours, and at one and the ſame time to ſubvert both; loading with Calumnies the moſt worthy Aſſerters of Liberty there, under our Names. Conſider with your ſelves, ye moſt Illuſtrious States of the United Netherlands, who it was that put this Aſſerter of Kingly Power upon ſetting Pen to Paper? who it was, that but lately began to play Rex in your Country? what Counſels were taken, what endeavours uſed, and what diſturbances enſued thereupon in Holland? and to what paſs things might have been brought by this time? how Slavery and a new Maſter were ready prepar'd for you; and how near expiring that Liberty of yours, aſſerted and vindicated by ſo many years War and Toil, would have been e're now, if it had not taken breath again by the timely death of a certain raſh young GENTLEMAN. But our Author begins to ſtrut again, and to feign wonderful Tragedies; Whomſoever this dreadful news reacht (to wit, the news of Salmaſius's Parricidial Barbariſms) all of a ſudden, as if they had been ſtruck with lightning, their hair ſtood an end, and their tongues clove to the roof of their mouth. Which let Natural Philoſophers take notice of (for this ſecret in nature was never diſcovered before) that lightning makes mens hair ſtand an end. But who knows not that little effeminate minds are apt to be amaz'd at the news of any extraordinary great Action; and that then they ſhow themſelves to be, what they really were before, no better than ſo many Stocks? Some could not refrain from tears; ſome little Women at Court, I ſuppoſe, or if there be any more effeminate than they, of whoſe number Salmaſius himſelf being one, is by a new Metamorphoſis become a Fountain near a-kin to his Name (Salmacis) and with his counterfeit flood of tears prepared over night, endeavours to emaſculate generous minds: I adviſe therefore, and wiſh them to have a care;

——Infamis nè quem malè fortibus undis
Salmacis Enervet.——
——Ne, ſi vir cum venerit, exeat indè
Semivir, & tactis ſubitò molleſcat in undis.

Abſtain, as Manhood you eſteem,
From Salmacis pernicious Stream:
If but one moment there you ſtay,
Too dear you'l for your Bathing pay.——
Depart nor Man nor Woman, but a Sight
Diſgracing both, a loath'd Hermaphrodite.

They that had more courage (which yet he expreſſes in miſerable bald Latin, as if he could not ſo much as ſpeak of Men of Courage and Magnanimity in proper words) were ſet on fire with indignation to that degree, that they could hardly contain them-

themſelves. Thoſe furious Hectors we value not of a ruſh. We have been accuſtomed to rout ſuch Bullies in the Field with a true ſober courage; a courage becoming men that can contain themſelves, and are in their right Wits. There were none that did not curſe the Authors of ſo horrible a Villany. But yet, you ſay, their tongues clove to the roof of their mouths; and if you mean this of our Fugitives only, I wiſh they had clove there to this day; for we know very well that there's nothing more common with them, than to have their mouths full of Curſes and Imprecations, which indeed all good men abominate, but withal deſpiſe. As for others, it's hardly credible, that when they heard the news of our having inflicted a Capital Puniſhment upon the King, there ſhould any be found, eſpecially in a Free State, ſo naturally adapted to Slavery as either to ſpeak ill of us, or ſo much as to cenſure what we had done. Nay, 'tis highly probable that all good men applauded us, and gave God thanks for ſo illuſtrious, ſo exalted a piece of Juſtice; and for a Caution ſo very uſeful to other Princes. In the mean time, as for thoſe fierce, thoſe ſteel-hearted men, that, you ſay, take on for, and bewail ſo pitifully, the lamentable and wonderful death of I know not who; them, I ſay, together with their tinkling Advocate, the dulleſt that ever appeared ſince the name of a King was born and known in the World, we ſhall e'en let whine on, till they cry their eyes out. But in the mean time, what School-boy, what little inſignificant Monk could not have made a more elegant Speech for the King, and in better Latin than this Royal Advocate has done? But it would be folly in me to make ſuch particular Animadverſions upon his Childiſhneſs and Frenzies throughout his Book, as I do here upon a few in the beginning of it; which yet I would be willing enough to do (for we hear that he is ſwell'd with Pride and Conceit to the utmoſt degree imaginable) if the undigeſted and immethodical bulk of his Book did not protect him. He was reſolved to take a courſe like the Soldier in Terence, to ſave his Bacon; and it was very cunning in him to ſtuff his Book with ſo much Puerility, and ſo many ſilly Whimſies, that it might nauſeate the ſmarteſt man in the World to death to take notice of 'em all. Only I thought it might not be amiſs to give a Specimen of him in the Preface; and to let the ſerious Reader have a taſte of him at firſt, that he might gueſs by the firſt diſh that's ſerv'd up, how noble an Entertainment the reſt are like to make; and that he may imagine with himſelf what an infinite number of Fooleries and Impertinencies muſt needs be heaped up together in the body of the Book, when they ſtand ſo thick in the very Entrance into it, where of all other places they ought to have been ſhunned. His tittle-tattle that follows, and his Sermons fit for nothing but to be worm-eaten, I can eaſily paſs by; as for any thing in them relating to us, we doubt not in the leaſt, but that what has been written and publiſhed by Authority of Parliament, will have far greater weight with all wiſe and ſober men, than the Calumnies and Lies of one ſingle impudent little Fellow: who being hired by our Fugitives, their Countrey's Enemies, has ſcrap'd together, and not ſcrupled to publiſh in Print, whatever little Story any one of them that employed him, put into his head. And that all men may plainly ſee how little conſcience he makes of ſetting down any thing right or wrong, good or bad, I deſire no other Witneſs than Salmaſius himſelf. In his book, entituled, Apparatus contra Primatum Papæ, he ſays, ‘There are moſt weighty Reaſons why the Church ought to lay aſide Epiſcopacy, and return to the Apoſtolical Inſtitution of Presbyters: That a far greater miſchief has been introduced into the Church by Epiſcopacy, than the Schiſms themſelves were, which were before apprehended: That the Plague which Epiſcopacy introduced, depreſſed the whole body of the Church under a miſerable Tyranny; nay, had put a yoke even upon the necks of Kings and Princes: That it would be more beneficial to the Church, if the whole Hierarchy it ſelf, were extirpated, than if the Pope only, who is the Head of it, were laid aſide, page 160. ‘That it would be very much for the good of the Church, if Epiſcopacy were taken away, together with the Papacy: That if Epiſcopacy were once taken down, the Papacy would fall of it ſelf, as being founded upon it, page 171. He ſays, ‘he can ſhew very good reaſons why Epiſcopacy ought to be put down in thoſe Kingdoms that have renounced the Pope's Supremacy; but that he can ſee no reaſon for retaining it there: That a Reformation is not entire, that is defective in this point: That no reaſon can be alledged, no probable cauſe aſſigned, why the Supremacy of the Pope being once diſowned, Epiſcopacy ſhould notwithſtanding

‘ be retained, page 197. Tho he had wrote all this, and a great deal more to this effect, but four years ago, he is now become ſo vain and ſo impudent withal, as to accuſe the Parliament of England, ‘ for not only turning the Biſhops out ‘ of the Houſe of Lords, but for aboliſhing Epiſcopacy it ſelf. Nay, he perſwades us to receive Epiſcopacy, and defends it by the very ſame Reaſons and Arguments, which with a great deal of earneſtneſs he had confuted himſelf in that former Book; to wit, ‘ That Biſhops were neceſſary, and ought to have ‘ been retained, to prevent the ſpringing up of a Thouſand pernicious Sects and ‘ Hereſies. Crafty Turn-coat! Are you not aſham'd to ſhift hands thus in things that are Sacred, and (I had almoſt ſaid) to betray the Church; whoſe moſt ſolemn Inſtitutions you ſeem to have aſſerted and vindicated with ſo much noiſe, that when it ſhould ſeem for your intereſt to change ſides, you might undo and ſubvert all again with the more diſgrace and infamy to your ſelf? It's notoriouſly known, That when both Houſes of Parliament, being extremely deſirous to reform the Church of England by the pattern of other Reformed Churches, had reſolved to aboliſh Epiſcopacy, the King firſt interpoſed, and afterwards waged War againſt them chiefly for that very cauſe; which proved fatal to him. Go now and boaſt of your having defended the King; who, that you might the better defend him, do now openly betray and impugn the Cauſe of the Church, whoſe Defence you your ſelf had formerly undertaken; and whoſe ſevereſt Cenſures ought to be inflicted upon you. As for the preſent form of our Government, ſince ſuch a Foreign inſignificant Profeſſor as you, having laid aſide your Boxes and Deſks ſtufft with nothing but Trifles, which you might have ſpent your time better in putting into order, will needs turn buſie-body, and be troubleſome in other mens matters, I ſhall return you this anſwer, or rather not to you, but to them that are wiſer than your ſelf, viz. That the Form of it is ſuch as our preſent diſtractions will admit of; not ſuch as were to be wiſh'd, but ſuch as the obſtinate Diviſions that are amongſt us, will bear. What State ſoever is peſtered with Factions, and defends it ſelf by Force of Arms, is very juſt in having regard to thoſe only that are ſound and untainted, and in overlooking or ſecluding the reſt, be they of the Nobility or the Common People; nay, though profiting by experience, they ſhould refuſe to be governed any longer either by a King or a Houſe of Lords. But in railing at that Supreme Council, as you call it, and at the Chair-man there, you make your ſelf very ridiculous; for that Council is not the Supreme Council, as you dream it is, but appointed by Authority of Parliament, for a certain time only; and conſiſting of forty Perſons, for the moſt part Members of Parliament, any one of whom may be Preſident, if the reſt vote him into the Chair. And there is nothing more common, than for our Parliaments to appoint Committees of their own Members; who, when ſo appointed, have Power to meet where they pleaſe, and hold a kind of little Parliament amongſt themſelves. And the moſt weighty Affairs are often referred to them, for Expedition and Secreſie; the care of the Navy, the Army, the Treaſury; in ſhort, all things whatſoever relating either to War or Peace. Whether this be called a Council, or any thing elſe, the thing is ancient, though the name may be new; and it is ſuch an Inſtitution, as no Government can be duly adminiſtered without it. As for our putting the King to death, and changing the Government, forbear your bawling, don't ſpit your Venom, till, going along with you through every Chapter, I ſhow, whether you will or no, by what Law, by what Right and Juſtice all that was done. But if you inſiſt to know by what Right, by what Law; by that Law, I tell you, which God and Nature have enacted, viz. that whatever things are for the Univerſal Good of the Whole State, are for that reaſon lawful and juſt. So wiſe Men of old uſed to anſwer ſuch as you. You find fault with us for Repealing Laws that had obtained for ſo many years; but you do not tell us whether thoſe Laws were good or bad, nor, if you did, ſhould we heed what you ſaid; for, you buſy Puppy, what have you to do with our Laws? I wiſh our Magiſtrates had repealed more than they have, both Laws and Lawyers; if they had, they would have conſulted the Intereſt of the Chriſtian Religion, and that of the People better then they have done. It frets you, That Hob-goblins, Sons of the Earth, ſcarce Gentlemen at home, ſcarce known to their own Countrymen, ſhould preſume to do ſuch things. But you ought to have remembred, what not only the Scriptures, but Horace would have taught you, viz.

—— Valet ima ſummis
Mutare, & inſignem attenuat Deus,
Obſcura promens, &c.

The Power that did create, can change the Scene
Of things; make mean of great, and great of mean:
The brighteſt Glory can eclipſe with Night;
And place the moſt obſcure in dazling Light.

But take this into the bargain. Some of thoſe who, you ſay, be ſcarce Gentlemen, are not at all inferiour in birth to any of your party. Others, whoſe Anceſtors were not Noble, have taken a courſe to attain to true Nobility by their own Induſtry and Vertue, and are not inferior to men of the Nobleſt Deſcent. They had rather be called Sons of the Earth, provided it be their own Earth (their own Native Country) and act like Men at home, then, being deſtitute of Houſe or Land, to relieve the neceſſities of Nature in a Foreign Country by ſelling of Smoke, as thou doſt, an inconſiderable Fellow and a Jack-ſtraw, and who dependeſt upon the good will of thy Maſters for a poor Stipend; for whom it were better to diſpenſe with thy labors, and return to thy own Kindred and Country-men, if thou hadſt not this one piece of Cunning, to babble out ſome ſilly Prelections and Fooleries at ſo good a rate amongſt Foreigners. You find fault with our Magiſtrates for admitting ſuch a Common-ſhore of all ſorts of Sects. Why ſhould they not? It belongs to the Church to caſt them out of the Communion of the faithful; not to the Magiſtrate to baniſh them the Country, provided they do not offend againſt the Civil Laws of the State. Men at firſt united into Civil Societies, that they might live ſafely, and enjoy their Liberty, without being wrong'd or oppreſt; and that they might live Religiouſly and according to the Doctrine of Chriſtianity, they united themſelves into Churches. Civil Societies have Laws, and Churches have a Diſcipline peculiar to themſelves, and far differing from each other. And this has been the occaſion of ſo many Wars in Chriſtendom; to wit, becauſe the Civil Magiſtrate and the Church confounded their Juriſdictions. Therefore we do not admit of the Popiſh Sect, ſo as to tolerate Papiſts at all; for we do not look upon that as a Religion, but rather as an Hierarchical Tyranny, under a Cloak of Religion, cloth'd with the Spoils of the Civil Power, which it has uſurp'd to it ſelf contrary to our Saviour's own Doctrine. As for the Independents, we never had any ſuch amongſt us, as you deſcribe; they that we call Independents are only ſuch as hold that no Claſſis or Synods have a Superiority over any particular Church, and that therefore they ought all to be pluckt up by the Roots, as Branches, or rather as the very Trunk of Hierarchy it ſelf; which is your own opinion too. And from hence it was that the name of Independents prevailed amongſt the Vulgar. The reſt of your Preface is ſpent in endeavouring not only to ſtir up the hatred of all Kings and Monarchs againſt us, but to perſwade them to make a General War upon us. Mithridates of old, though in a different cauſe, endeavoured to ſtir up all Princes to make War upon the Romans, by laying to their charge almoſt juſt the ſame things that you do to ours: viz. that the Romans aim'd at nothing but the Subverſion of all Kingdoms, that they had no regard to any thing whether Sacred or Civil, that from their very firſt riſe they never enjoy'd any thing but what they had acquir'd by force, that they were Robbers, and the greateſt Enemies in the world to Monarchy. Thus Mithridates expreſt himſelf in a Letter to Arſaces King of the Parthians. But how came you, whoſe buſineſs it is to make ſilly Speeches from your Deſk, to have the confidence to imagine, that by your perſwaſions to take up Arms, and ſounding an Alarm as it were, you ſhould be able ſo much as to influence a King amongſt Boys at play; eſpecially, with ſo ſhrill a Voice, and unſavoury Breath, that I believe, if you were to have been the Trumpeter, not ſo much as Homer's Mice would have waged War againſt the Frogs? So little do we fear, you Slug you, any War or Danger from Foreign Princes through your ſilly Rhetorick, who accuſeſt us to them, juſt as if you were at play, That we toſs Kings heads like Balls; play at Bowls with Crowns; and regard Scepters no more then if they were Fools Staves with heads on: But you in the mean time, you ſilly Logerhead, deſerve to have your Bones well-thraſh'd with a Fool's ſtaff, for thinking to ſtir up Kings and Princes to War by ſuch Childiſh Arguments. Then you cry aloud to all Nations, who, I know full well, will never heed what you ſay. You call upon that wretched and barbarous Crew of Iriſh Rebels too, to aſſert the King's Party. Which one thing is ſufficient evidence how much you are both a Fool and a Knave, and how you out-do almoſt all Mankind in Villany, Impudence, and Madneſs; who ſcruple not to implore the Loyalty and Aid of an execrable People, devoted to the Slaughter, whom the King himſelf always abhorr'd, or ſo pretended, to have any thing to do with, by reaſon of the guilt of ſo much innocent Blood, which they had contracted. And that very Perfidiouſneſs and Cruelty, which he endeavoured as much as he could to conceal, and to clear himſelf from any ſuſpition of, you the moſt villanous of Mortals, as fearing neither God nor Man, voluntarily and openly take upon your ſelf. Go on then, undertake the Kings Defence at the Encouragement, and by the Aſſiſtance of the Iriſh. You take care, and ſo you might well, leſt any ſhould imagine that you were about to bereave Cicero or Demoſthenes of the praiſe due to their Eloquence, by telling us before hand, that you conceive you ought not to ſpeak like an Orator. 'Tis wiſely ſaid of a Fool; you conceive you ought not to do what is not in your power to do: and who that knows you never ſo little, ever expects any thing like an Orator from you? Who neither uſes, nor is able to publiſh any thing that's Elaborate, Diſtinct, or has ſo much as Senſe in it; but like a ſecond Criſpin, or that little Grecian Tzetzes, you do but write a great deal, take no pains to write well; nor could write any thing well, though you took never ſo much pains. This Cauſe ſhall be argued (ſay you) in the hearing, and as it were before the Tribunal of all Mankind. That's what we like ſo well, that we could now wiſh we had a diſcreet and intelligent Adverſary, and not ſuch a hair-brain'd Blunderbuſs, as you, to deal with. You conclude very Tragically, like Ajax in his Raving; I will proclaim to Heaven and Earth the Injuſtice, the Villany, the Perfidiouſneſs and Cruelty of theſe Men, and will deliver them over convicted to all Poſterity. O Flowers! that ſuch a witleſs, ſenſeleſs Bawler, one that was born but to ſpoil or tranſcribe good Authors, ſhould think himſelf able to write any thing of his own, that will reach Poſterity, whom together with his frivolous Scribles the very next Age will bury in oblivion; unleſs this Defence of the King perhaps may be beholden to the Anſwer I give to it, for being looked into now and then. And I would entreat the Illuſtrious States of Holland to take off their Prohibition, and ſuffer the Book to be publickly ſold. For when I have detected the Vanity, Ignorance, and Falſhood, that it is full of, the farther it ſpreads, the more effectually it will be ſuppreſt. Now let us hear how he convicts us.

A DEFENCE OF THE People of England.

CHAP. I.

I Perſwade my ſelf, Salmaſius, that you being a vain flaſhy man, are not a little proud of being the King of Great Britain's Defender, who himſelf was ſtil'd the Defender of the Faith. For my part, I think you deſerve your Titles both alike; for the King defended the Faith, and you have defended him ſo, that betwixt you, you have ſpoiled both your Cauſes: which I ſhall make appear throughout the whole enſuing Diſcourſe, and particularly in this very Chapter. You told us in the 12th Page of your Preface, That ſo good and ſo juſt a Cauſe ought not to be embeliſht with any flouriſhes of Rhetorick; That the King needed no other Defence than by a bare Narrative of his Story; and yet in your firſt Chapter, in which you had promiſed us that bare Narrative, you neither tell the Story right, nor do you abſtain from making uſe of all the skill you have in Rhetorick to ſet it off. So that, if we muſt take your own judgment, we muſt believe the King's Cauſe to be neither good nor juſt. But by the way I would adviſe you not to have ſo good an Opinion of your ſelf (for no body elſe has ſo of you) as to imagin that you are able to ſpeak well upon any Subject, who can neither play the part of an Orator, nor an Hiſtorian, nor expreſs your ſelf in a Stile that would not be ridiculous even in a Lawyer; but like a Mountebank's Jugler, with big ſwelling words in your Preface, you rais'd our expectation, as if ſome mighty matter were to enſue: in which your deſign was not ſo much to introduce a true Narrative of the King's Story, as to make your own empty intended floriſhes go off the better. For being now about to give us an account of the matter of Fact, you find your ſelf encompaſſed and affrighted with ſo many Monſters of Novelty, that y'are at a loſs what to ſay firſt, what next, and what laſt of all. I'll tell you what the matter is with you. In the firſt place you find your ſelf affrighted and aſtoniſh'd at your own monſtrous Lies, and then you find that empty head of yours not encompaſs'd, but carried round with ſo many trifles and fooleries, that you not only now do not, but never did know what was fit to be ſpoken, and in what method. Among the many Difficulties that you find in expreſſing the heinouſneſs of ſo incredible a piece of Impiety, this one offers it ſelf, you ſay, which is eaſily ſaid, and muſt often be repeated; to wit, That the Sun it ſelf never beheld a more outragious action. But by your good leave, Sir, the Sun has beheld many things, that blind Bernard never ſaw. But we are content you ſhould mention the Sun over and over. And it will be a piece of Prudence in you ſo to do. For though our wickedneſs does not require it, the coldneſs of the defence that you are making, does. The Original of Kings, you ſay, is as ancient, as that of the Sun. May the Gods and Goddeſſes, Damaſippus, bleſs thee with an everlaſting Solſtice; that thou mayſt always be warm, thou that canſt not ſtir a foot without the Sun. Perhaps you would avoid the imputation of being called a Doctor Umbraticus. But alas! you are in perfect darkneſs, that make no difference betwixt a Paternal Power, and a Regal: and that when you had called Kings Fathers of their Country, could fancy that with that Metaphor you had perſwaded us that whatever is applicable to a Father, is ſo to a King. Alas! there's a great difference betwixt them. Our Fathers begot us.

Our King made not us, but we him. Nature has given Fathers to us all, but we our ſelves appointed our own King. So that the People is not for the King, but the King for them. We bear with a Father, though he be harſh and ſevere; and ſo we do with a King. But we do not bear with a Father, if he be a Tyrant. If a Father murder his Son, he himſelf muſt die for't; and why ſhould not a King be ſubject to the ſame Law, which certainly is a moſt juſt one? Eſpecially conſidering that a Father cannot by any poſſibility diveſt himſelf of that Relation, but a King eaſily may make himſelf neither King nor Father of his People. If this action of ours be conſidered according to its quality, as you call it, I, who am both an Engliſh-man born, and was an Eye-witneſs of the Tranſactions of theſe Times, tell you, who are both a Foreigner and an utter Stranger to our Affairs; That we have put to death neither a good, nor a juſt, nor a merciful, nor a devout, nor a godly, nor a peaceable King, as you ſtile him; but an Enemy, that has been ſo to us almoſt ten years to an end; nor one that was a Father, but a Deſtroyer of his Country. You confeſs that ſuch things have been practiſ'd; for your ſelf have not the impudence to deny it: but not by Proteſtants upon a Proteſtant King. As if he deſerv'd the name of a Proteſtant, that in a Letter to the Pope, could give him the title of Moſt Holy Father; that was always more favourable to the Papiſts than to thoſe of his own Profeſſion. And being ſuch, he is not the firſt of his own Family that has been put to death by Proteſtants. Was not his Grand-mother depoſed and baniſht, and at laſt beheaded by Proteſtants? And were not her own Countrymen, that were Proteſtants too, well enough pleas'd with it? Nay, if I ſhould ſay they were Parties to it, I ſhould not lie. But there being ſo few Proteſtant Kings, it is no great wonder, if it never happened that one of them has been put to death. But that it is lawful to depoſe a Tyrant, and to puniſh him according to his deſerts; nay, that this is the opinion of very eminent Divines, and of ſuch as have been moſt inſtrumental in the late Reformation, do you deny it if you dare. You confeſs that many Kings have come to an unnatural Death: Some by the Sword, ſome poyſon'd, ſome ſtrangled, and ſome in a Dungeon; but for a King to be arraign'd in a Court of Judicature, to be put to plead for his Life, to have Sentence of Death pronounc'd againſt him, and that Sentence executed; this you think a more lamentable Inſtance than all the reſt, and make it a prodigious piece of impiety. Tell me, thou ſuperlative Fool, Whether it be not more juſt, more agreeable to the Rules of Humanity, and the Laws of all Humane Societies, to bring a Criminal, be his Offence what it will, before a Court of Juſtice, to give him leave to ſpeak for himſelf; and, if the Law condemn him, then to put him to death as he has deſerv'd, ſo as he may have time to repent or to recollect himſelf; than preſently, as ſoon as ever he is taken, to butcher him without more ado? D'ye think there's a Malefactor in the World, that if he might have his choice, would not chuſe to be thus dealt withal? and if this ſort of proceeding againſt a private Perſon be accounted the fairer of the two, why ſhould it not be counted ſo againſt a Prince? nay, why ſhould we not think that himſelf liked it better? You would have had him kill'd privately, and none to have ſeen it, either that future Ages might have loſt the advantage of ſo good an Example; or that they that did this glorious Action, might ſeem to have avoided the Light, and to have acted contrary to Law and Juſtice. You aggravate the matter by telling us, that it was not done in an uproar, or brought about by any Faction amongſt Great Men, or in the heat of a Rebellion, either of the People, or the Soldiers: that there was no hatred, no fear, no ambition, no blind precipitate raſhneſs in the Caſe; but that it was long conſulted on, and done with deliberation. You did well in leaving off being an Advocate, and turn Grammarian, who from the Accidents and Circumſtances of a thing, which in themſelves conſidered ſway neither one way nor other, argue in diſpraiſe of it, before you have proved the thing it ſelf to be either good or bad. See how open you lie: If the Action you are diſcourſing of, be commendable and praiſe-worthy, they that did it deſerve the greater Honour, in that they were prepoſſeſſed with no Paſſions, but did what they did for Vertue's ſake. If there were great difficulty in the enterpriſe, they did well in not going about it raſhly, but upon Advice and Conſideration. Tho for my own part, when I call to mind with how unexpected an importunity and fervency of Mind, and with how unanimous a Conſent, the whole Army, and a great great part of the People from almoſt every County in the Kingdom, cried out with one Voice for Juſtice againſt the King, as being the ſole Author of all their Calamities: I cannot but think that theſe things were brought about by a Divine impulſe. Whatever the matter was, whether we conſider the Magiſtrates, or the Body of the People, no Men ever undertook with more Courage, and, which our Adverſaries themſelves confeſs, in a more ſedate temper of Mind, ſo brave an Action, an Action that might have become thoſe famous Heroes of whom we read in former Ages; an Action, by which they enobled not only Laws, and their Execution, which ſeem for the future equally reſtor'd to high and low againſt one another; but even Juſtice, and to have rendred it after ſo ſignal a Judgment, more illuſtrious and greater than in its own ſelf. We are now come to an end of the 3d Page of the firſt Book, and have not the bare Narrative he promis'd us yet. He complains that our Principles are, That a King whoſe Government is burdenſome and odious, may lawfully be depoſed: And by this Doctrine, ſays he, if they had had a King a thouſand times better than they had, they would not have ſpared his Life. Obſerve the Man's ſubtle way of arguing. For I would willingly be inform'd what Conſequence there is in this, unleſs he allows, that a King's Government may be burdenſome and odious, who is a thouſand times better than our King was. So, that now he has brought things to this paſs, to make the King that he defends, a thouſand times worſe than ſome whoſe Government notwithſtanding is burdenſom and odious, that is, it may be, the moſt monſtrous Tyrant that ever reign'd. I wiſh ye Joy, O ye Kings, of ſo able a Defender. Now the Narrative begins. They put him to ſeveral ſorts of Torments. Give an inſtance. They remov'd him from Priſon to Priſon; and ſo they might lawfully do; for having been a Tyrant, he became an open Enemy, and was taken in War. Often changing his Keepers. Leſt they themſelves ſhould change. Sometimes they gave him hopes of Liberty, nay, and ſometimes even of reſtoring him to his Crown, upon Articles of Agreement. It ſeems then the taking away his Life, was not done upon ſo much premeditation, as he talked of before; and that we did not lay hold on all opportunities and means, that offer'd themſelves, to renounce our King. Thoſe things that in the beginning of the War we demanded of him, when he had almoſt brought us under, which things if they were denied us, we could enjoy no Liberty, nor live in any Safety; thoſe very things we petitioned him for when he was our Priſoner, in a humble, ſubmiſſive way, not once, nor twice, but thrice, and oftner, and were as often denied. When we had now loſt all hopes of the King's complying with us, then was that noble Order of Parliament made, That from that time forward, there ſhould no Articles be ſent to the King; ſo that we left off applying our ſelves to him, not from the time that he began to be a Tyrant, but from the time that we found him incurable. But afterward ſome Parliament-men ſet upon a new Project, and meeting with a convenient opportunity to put it in practice, paſs a Vote to ſend further Propoſals once more to the King. Whoſe Wickedneſs and Folly neareſt reſembles that of the Roman Senate, who contrary to the Opinion of M. Tullius, and all honeſt Men, voted to ſend Embaſſadors to M. Anthony; and the Event had been the ſame, but that it pleaſed God Almighty in his Providence to order it otherwiſe, and to aſſert our Liberty, tho he ſuffer'd them to be enſlav'd: For tho the King did not agree to any thing that might conduce to a firm Peace, and Settlement of things more than he had before, they go and vote themſelves ſatiſfied. Then the ſounder part of the Houſe finding themſelves and the Commonwealth betray'd, implore the aid of that Valiant and always Faithful Army to the Commonwealth. Upon which occaſion I can obſerve only this, which yet I am loth to utter; to wit, that our Soldiers underſtood themſelves better than our Senators, and that they ſaved the Commonwealth by their Arms, when the other by their Votes had almoſt ruined it. Then he relates a great many things in a doleful, lamentable Strain; but he does it ſo ſenſleſly, that he ſeems rather to beg of his Readers that they would be ſorrowful, than to ſtir up any ſuch Paſſion in them. It grieves him to think that the King ſhould undergo a Capital Puniſhment after ſuch a manner as no other King ever had done. Tho he had often told us before, that there never was a King that underwent a Capital Puniſhment at all. Do you uſe to compare ways and manners, ye Coxcomb, when you have no Things, nor Actions to compare with one another? He ſuffer'd Death, ſays he, as a Robber, as a Murderer, as a Parricide, as a Traytor, as a Tyrant. Is this defending the King? Or is it not rather giving a more ſevere Sentence againſt him than that that we gave? How came you ſo all on a ſudden to be of our mind? He complains that Executioners in Vizars [perſonati Carnifices] cut off the King's Head. What ſhall we do with this Fellow? He told us before, of a Murder committed on one in the diſguiſe of a King: [in Perſona Regis.] Now he ſays, 'twas done in the diſguiſe of an Executioner. 'Twere to no purpoſe to take particular notice of every ſilly thing he ſays. He tells Stories of Boxes on the Ear, and Kicks, that, he ſays, were given the King by Common Soldiers, and that 'twas four Shillings a piece to ſee his dead Body. Theſe and ſuch like Stories which partly are falſe, and partly impertinent, betray the Ignorance and Childiſhneſs of our poor Scholar; but are far from making any Reader ever a whit the ſadder. In good faith, his Son Charles had done better to have hired ſome Ballad-ſinger to have bewailed his Fathers Miſfortunes, than this doleful, ſhall I call him, or rather moſt ridiculous Orator, who is ſo dry and inſipid, that there's not the leaſt Spirit in any thing he ſays. Now the Narrative's done, and 'tis hard to ſay what he does next, he runs on ſo ſordidly and irregular. Now he's angry, then he wonders; he neither cares what he talks, nor how; repeats the ſame things ten times over, that could not but look ill, tho he had ſaid them but once. And I perſwade my ſelf, the extemporary Rimes of ſome antick Jack-pudding may deſerve printing better; ſo far am I from thinking ought he ſays worthy of a ſerious Anſwer. I paſs by his ſtiling the King a Protector of Religion, who choſe to make war upon the Church, rather than part with thoſe Church-Tyrants, and Enemies of all Religion, the Biſhops; and how is it poſſible that he ſhould maintain Religion in its Purity, that was himſelf a Slave to thoſe impure Traditions, and Ceremonies of theirs? And for our Sectaries, whoſe Sacrilegious Meetings, you ſay, have publick Allowance; inſtance in any of their Principles, the Profeſſion of which is not openly allow'd of, and countenanced in Holland? But in the mean, there's not a more Sacrilegious Wretch in Nature than your ſelf, that always took liberty to ſpeak ill of all ſorts of People. They could not wound the Commonwealth more dangerouſly than by taking off its Maſter. Learn, ye abject, home-born Slave; unleſs ye take away the Maſter, ye deſtroy the Commonwealth. That that has a Maſter, is one Man's Property. The word Maſter denotes a private, not a publick Relation. They perſecute moſt unjuſtly thoſe Miniſters that abhorr'd this Action of theirs. Leſt you ſhould not know what Miniſters he means, I'll tell you in a few words what manner of Men they were; they were thoſe very Men, that by their Writings and Sermons juſtified taking up Arms againſt the King, and ſtirr'd the People up to it. That daily curſed, as Deborah did Meroz, all ſuch as would not furniſh the Parliament either with Arms, or Men, or Money. That taught the People out of their Pulpits, that they were not about to fight againſt a King, but a greater Tyrant than either Saul or Ahab ever were; nay, more a Nero than Nero himſelf. As ſoon as the Biſhops, and thoſe Clergy-men, whom they daily inveighed againſt, and branded with the odious Names of Pluraliſts and Non-reſidents, were taken out of their way, they preſently jump, ſome into two, ſome into three of their beſt Benefices; being now warm themſelves, they ſoon unworthily neglected their Charge. Their Covetouſneſs brake through all reſtraints of Modeſty and Religion, and themſelves now labour under the ſame Infamy, that they had loaded their Predeceſſors with; and becauſe their Covetouſneſs is not yet ſatisfied, and their Ambition has accuſtomed them to raiſe Tumults, and be Enemies to Peace, they can't reſt at quiet yet, but preach up Sedition againſt the Magiſtracy, as it is now eſtabliſh'd, as they had formerly done againſt the King. They now tell the People that he was cruelly murdered; upon whom themſelves having heap'd all their Curſes, had devoted him to Deſtruction, whom they had delivered up as it were to the Parliament to be diſpoil'd of his Royalty, and purſu'd with a Holy War. They now complain that the Sectaries are not extirpated; which is a moſt abſurd thing to expect the Magiſtrates ſhould be able to do, who never yet were able, do what they could, to extirpate Avarice and Ambition, thoſe two moſt pernicious Hereſies, and more deſtructive to the Church than all the reſt, out of the very order and tribe of the Miniſters themſelves. For the Sects which they inveigh againſt, I confeſs there are ſuch amongſt us, but they are obſcure, and make no noiſe in the world: The Sects that they are of, are publick and notorious, and much more dangerous to the Church of God. Simon Magus and Diotrephes were the Ringleaders of 'em. Yet are we ſo far from perſecuting theſe men, tho they are peſtilent enough, that tho we know them to be ill-affected to the Government, and deſirous of, and endeavouring to work a change, we allow them but too much Liberty. You, that are both a French-man, and a Vagabond, ſeem diſpleas'd that the Engliſh, more fierce and cruel than their own Maſtiffs, as your barking Eloquence has it, have no regard to the lawful Succeſſor and Heir of the Crown: Take no care of the King's Youngeſt Son, nor of the Queen of Bohemia. I'll make ye no anſwer; you ſhall anſwer your ſelf. When the frame of a Government is changed from a Monarchy to any other, the new Modellers have no regard to ſucceſſion: the Application is eaſy; it's in your Book de primatu Papæ. The great change throughout Three Kingdoms, you ſay, was brought about by a ſmall number of men in one of them. If this were true, that ſmall number of men would have deſerved to have Dominion over the reſt; Valiant men over faint-hearted Cowards. Theſe are they that preſumptuouſly took upon them to change antiquum Regni Regimen, in alium qui à pluribus Tyrannis teneatur. 'Tis well for them that you cannot find fault with them, without committing a barbarous Solœciſm; you ſhame all Grammarians. The Engliſh will never be able to waſh out this ſtain. Nay you, though a blot and a ſtain to all Learned men, were never yet able to ſtain the Renown and everlaſting Glory of the Engliſh Nation, that with ſo great a Reſolution, as we hardly find the like recorded in any Hiſtory, having ſtrugled with, and overcome, not only their Enemies in the Field, but the ſuperſtitious Perſwaſions of the common People, have purchas'd to themſelves in general amongſt all poſterity the name of Deliverers: The Body of the people having undertook and performed an enterpriſe, which in other Nations is thought to proceed only from a magnanimity that's peculiar to Heroes. What the Proteſtants and Primitive Chriſtians have done, or would do upon ſuch an occaſion, I'll tell ye hereafter, when we come to debate the merits of the Cauſe: In diſcourſing it before, I ſhould be guilty of your fault, who outdo the moſt impertinent Talkers in Nature: You wonder how we'll be able to anſwer the Jeſuits. Meddle with your own matters, you Runagate, and be aſham'd of your actions, ſince the Church is aſham'd of you; who, though but of late you ſet your ſelf ſo fiercely and with ſo much Oſtentation againſt the Pope's Supremacy and Epiſcopal Government, are now become your ſelf a very Creature of the Biſhops. You confeſs that ſome Proteſtants whom you do not name, have aſſerted it lawful to depoſe a Tyrant: But though you do not think fit to name them, I will, becauſe you ſay they are far worſe than the very Jeſuits themſelves; they are no other than Luther, and Zuinglius, and Calvin, and Bucer, and Pareus, and many others. But then, you ſay, they refer it to the Judgment of Learned and Wiſe Men, who ſhall be accounted a Tyrant. But what for men, were theſe? Were they wiſe men, were they men of Learning? Were they anywiſe remarkable, either for Vertue or Nobility? You may well allow a People that has felt the heavy Yoke of Slavery, to be Wiſe, and Learned, and Noble enough to know what is fit to be done to the Tyrant that has oppreſs'd them; though they neither conſult with Foreigners nor Grammarians. But that this man was a Tyrant, not only the Parliaments of England and Scotland have declared by their actions and expreſs words; but almoſt all the People of both Nations aſſented to it, till ſuch time as by the Tricks and Artifices of the Biſhops they were divided into two Factions: and what if it has pleaſed God to chuſe ſuch men, to execute his Vengeance upon the greateſt Potentates on Earth, as he choſe to be made partakers of the benefit of the Goſpel? Not many Wiſe, not many Learned, not many Powerful, not many Noble: That by thoſe that are not, he might bring to nought thoſe that are; and that no fleſh might glory in his ſight. And who are you that babble to the contrary? Dare you affect the Reputation of a Learned Man? I confeſs you are pretty well vers'd in Phraſe-Books, and Lexicons, and Gloſſaries; inſomuch that you ſeem to have ſpent your time in nothing elſe. But you do not make appear that you have read any good Authors with ſo much Judgment as to have benefited by them. Other Copies and various Lections and Words omitted, and corruptions of Texts and the like, theſe you are full of; but no foot-ſtep of any ſolid Learning appears in all you have writ: Or do ye think your ſelf a wiſe man, that quarrel and contend about the meaneſt Trifles that may be? That being altogether ignorant in Aſtronomy and Phyſick, yet are always railing at the Profeſſors feſſors of both, whom all men credit in what things belong to their own Sciences, that would be ready to curſe them to the Pit of Hell, that ſhould offer to deprive you of the Vain-glory of having corrected or ſupply'd the leaſt word or letter in any Copy you've criticiz'd upon. And yet y'are mad to hear your ſelf call'd a Grammarian. In a certain trifling Diſcourſe of yours, you call Dr. Hammond Knave in plain terms, who was one of this King's Chaplains, and one that he valu'd above all the reſt, for no other reaſon but becauſe he had call'd you a Grammarian. And I don't queſtion but you would have been as ready to have thrown the ſame reproach upon the King himſelf, if you had heard that he had approv'd his Chaplain's Judgment of ye. Take notice now, how much I (who am but one of thoſe many Engliſh, that you have the impudence to call Mad-men, and unlearned, and ignoble, and wicked) ſlight and deſpiſe you, (for that the Engliſh Nation in general ſhould take any notice in publick of ſuch a worm as you are, would be an infinite undervaluing of themſelves) who though one ſhould turn you topſie-turvy, and in-ſide out, are but a Grammarian: Nay, as if you had made a fooliſher wiſh than Midas did, what ever you meddle with, except when you make Solœciſms, is Grammar ſtill. Whoſoever therefore he be, though from among the Dregs of that common People that you are ſo keen upon (for as for thoſe men of Eminency amongſt us, whoſe great Actions evidenced to all men their Nobility, and Vertue, and Conduct, I won't diſgrace them ſo much, as to compare you to them, or them to you) but whoſoever, I ſay, among the Dregs of that common People has but ſuck'd in this Principle, That he was not born for his Prince, but for God and his Countrey; he deſerves the reputation of a Learned, and an Honeſt, and a Wiſe Man more, and is of greater uſe in the world than your ſelf. For ſuch a one is Learned without Letters; you have Letters, but no Learning, that underſtand ſo many Languages, turn over ſo many Volumes, and yet are but a ſheep when all is done.

CHAP. II.

THE Argument that Salmaſius, toward the concluſion of his firſt Chapter, urg'd as irrefragable, to wit, that it was really ſo, becauſe all men unanimouſly agreed in it; That very Argument, than which, as he apply'd it, there is nothing more falſe, I, that am now about to diſcourſe of the Right of Kings, may turn upon himſelf with a great deal of Truth. For, whereas he defines a King (if that may be ſaid to be defin'd which he makes infinite) to be a Perſon in whom the Supream Power of the Kingdom reſides, who is anſwerable to God alone, who may do whatſoever pleaſes him, who is bound by no Law; I will undertake to demonſtrate, not by mine, but by his own Reaſons and Authorities, that there never was a Nation or People of any account (for to ranſack all the unciviliz'd parts of the World were to no purpoſe) that ever allow'd this to be their King's Right, or put ſuch exorbitant Power into his hand, as that he ſhould not be bound by any Law, that he might do what he would, that he ſhould judg all, but be judged of none. Nor can I perſwade my ſelf, that there ever was any one Perſon beſides Salmaſius of ſo ſlaviſh a Spirit, as to aſſert the outragious Enormities of Tyrants to be the Rights of Kings. Thoſe amongſt us that were the greateſt Royaliſts, always abhorr'd this ſordid Opinion: And Salmaſius himſelf, as appears by ſome other Writings of his before he was brib'd, was quite of another mind. Inſomuch, that what he here gives out, does not look like the Dictates of a free Subject under a free Government, much leſs in ſo famous a Commonwealth as that of Holland, and the moſt eminent Univerſity there; but ſeems to have been penn'd by ſome deſpicable Slave that lay rotting in a Priſon, or a Dungeon. If whatever a King has a mind to do, the Right of Kings will bear him out in (which was a Leſſon that the bloody Tyrant Antoninus Caracalla, tho his Step-mother Julia preach'd it to him, and endeavour'd to inure him to the practice of it, by making him commit inceſt with her ſelf, yet could hardly ſuck in) then there neither is, nor ever was that King that deſerv'd the name of a Tyrant. They may ſafely violate all the Laws of God and Man: their very being Kings keeps them innocent. What Crime was ever any of them guilty of? they did but make uſe of their own Right upon their own Vaſſals. No King can commit ſuch horrible Cruelties and Outrages, as will not be within this Right of Kings. So that there's no Pretence left for any Complaints or Expoſtulations with any of them. And dare you aſſert, That this Right of Kings, as you call it, is grounded upon the Law of Nations, or rather upon that of Nature, you Brute Beaſt? for you deſerve not the name of a Man, that are ſo cruel and unjuſt towards all thoſe of your own kind; that endeavour as much as in you lies, ſo to bear down and villifie the whole race of Mankind, that were made after the Image of God, as to aſſert and maintain that thoſe cruel and unmerciful Taskmaſters, that through the ſuperſtitious whimſies, or ſloth, or treachery of ſome perſons, get into the Chair, are provided and appointed by Nature her ſelf, that mild and gentle Mother of us all, to be the Governours of thoſe Nations they enſlave. By which peſtilent Doctrine of yours, having rendred them more fierce and untractable, you not only enable them to make havock of, and trample under foot their miſerable Subjects; but endeavour to arm them for that very purpoſe with the Law of Nature, the Right of Kings, and the very Conſtitutions of Government, than which nothing can be more impious or ridiculous. By my conſent, as Dionyſius formerly of a Tyrant became a Schoolmaſter, ſo you of a Grammarian, ſhould become a Tyrant; not that you may have that Regal Licenſe of doing other people harm, but a fair opportunity of periſhing miſerably your ſelf: That, as Tiberius complain'd, when he had confin'd himſelf to the Iſland Caprea, you may be reduced into ſuch a condition, as to be ſenſible that you periſh daily. But let us look a little more narrowly into this Right of Kings that you talk of. This was the ſenſe of the Eaſtern, and of the Weſtern part of the World. I ſhall not anſwer you with what Ariſtotle and Cicero, (who are both as credible Authors as any we have) tell us, viz. That the people of Aſia eaſily ſubmit to ſlavery, but the Syrians and the Jews are even born to it from the womb. I confeſs there are but few, and thoſe men of great wiſdom and courage, that are neither deſirous of Liberty, or capable of uſing it. The greateſt part of the world chuſe to live under Maſters; but yet they would have them juſt ones. As for ſuch as are unjuſt and tyrannical, neither was God ever ſo much an enemy to Mankind as to enjoyn a neceſſity of ſubmitting to them; nor was there ever any people ſo deſtitute of all ſenſe, and ſunk into ſuch a depth of deſpair, as to impoſe ſo cruel a Law upon themſelves and their poſterity. Firſt, you produce the words of King Solomon in his Eccleſiaſtes. And we are as willing to appeal to the Scripture as you. As for Solomon's authority, we'll conſider that hereafter, when perhaps we ſhall be better able to underſtand it. Firſt, let us hear God himſelf ſpeak, Deut. 17. 14. When thou art come into the Land, which the Lord thy God giveth thee, and ſhalt ſay, I will ſet a King over me, like as the Nations that are round about me. Which paſſage I could wiſh all men would ſeriouſly conſider: for hence it appears by the teſtimony of God himſelf; Firſt, that all Nations are at liberty to erect what form of Government they will amongſt themſelves, and to change it when and into what they will. This God affirms in expreſs terms concerning the Hebrew Nation; and it does not appear but that other Nations are, as to this reſpect, in the ſame condition. Another remark that this place yields us, is, That a Commonwealth is a more perfect form of Government than a Monarchy, and more ſutable to the condition of Mankind, and in the opinion of God himſelf, better for his own People; for himſelf appointed it, and could hardly be prevail'd withal a great while after, and at their own importunate deſire, to let 'em change it into a Monarchy. But to make it appear that he gave 'em their choice to be govern'd by a ſingle perſon, or by more, ſo they were juſtly govern'd, in caſe they ſhould in time to come reſolve upon a King, he preſcribes Laws for this King of theirs to obſerve, whereby he was forbidden to multiply to himſelf Horſes and Wives, or to heap up Riches: whence he might eaſily infer, that no power was put into his hands over others, but according to Law, ſince even thoſe actions of his life, which related only to himſelf, were under a Law. He was commanded therefore to tranſcribe with his own hand all the Precepts of the Law, and having writ 'em out, to obſerve and keep 'em, that his mind might not be lifted up above his Brethren. 'Tis evident from hence, that as well the Prince as the People was bound by the Law of Moſes. To this purpoſe Joſephus writes, a proper and an able Interpreter of the Laws of his own Country, who was admirably well verſ'd in the Jewiſh Policy, and infinitely preferable to a thouſand obſcure ignorant Rabbins: He has it thus in the fourth Book of his Antiquities, Ἀριστοκρατία μὲν οὖν κράτιστον, &c. "An Ariſtocracy is the beſt form of "Government; wherefore do not you endeavour to ſettle any other, 'tis e-"nough for you that God preſides over ye. But if you will have a King, let "him guide himſelf by the Law of God, rather than by his own wiſdom; "and lay a reſtraint upon him, if he offer at more power than the ſtate of "your affairs will allow of. Thus he expreſſes himſelf upon this place in Deuteronomy. Another Jewiſh Author, Philo Judæus, who was Joſephus's Contemporary, a very ſtudious man in the Law of Moſes, upon which he wrote a large Commentary; when in his Book concerning the Creation of the King, he interprets this Chapter of Deuteronomy, he ſets a King looſe from the Law no otherwiſe than as an enemy may be ſaid to be ſo: "They, ſays he, that to "the prejudice and deſtruction of the people acquire great power to themſelves, "deſerve not the name of Kings, but that of Enemies: For their actions are "the ſame with thoſe of an irreconcilable enemy. Nay, they, that under a "pretence of Government are injurious, are worſe than open enemies. We "may fence our ſelves againſt the latter; but the malice of the former is ſo "much the more peſtilent, becauſe it is not always eaſie to be diſcovered. But when it is diſcover'd, why ſhould they not be dealt with as enemies? The ſame Author in his ſecond Book, Allegoriar. Legis, "A King, ſays he, and a Ty-"rant are Contraries. And a little after, "A King ought not only to command, "but alſo to obey. All this is very true, you'll ſay, a King ought to obſerve the Laws, as well as any other man. But what if he will not, what Law is there to puniſh him? I anſwer, the ſame Law that there is to puniſh other men; for I find no exceptions. There is no expreſs Law to puniſh the Prieſts or any other inferior Magiſtrates, who all of 'em, if this opinion of the exemption of Kings from the Penalties of the Law would hold, might by the ſame reaſon claim impunity, what guilt ſoever they contract, becauſe there is no poſitive Law for their puniſhment; and yet I ſuppoſe none of them ever challeng'd ſuch a Prerogative, nor would it ever be allow'd 'em, if they ſhould. Hitherto we have learn'd from the very Text of God's own Law, that a King ought to obey the Laws, and not lift himſelf up above his Brethren. Let us now conſider whether Solomon preacht up any other Doctrine, Ch. 8. v. 2. I counſel thee to keep the King's Commandment, and that in regard of the Oath of God. Be not haſty to go out of his ſight; ſtand not in an evil thing, for he doth whatſoever pleaſeth him. Where the word of a King is, there is power; and who may ſay unto him, what doſt thou? It is well enough known that here the Preacher directs not his Precepts to the Sanhedrim, or to a Parliament, but to private perſons; and ſuch he commands to keep the King's Commandment, and that in regard of the Oath of God. But as they ſwear Allegiance to Kings, do not Kings likewiſe ſwear to obey and maintain the Laws of God, and thoſe of their own Country? So the Reubenites and Gadites promiſe obedience to Joſhua, Joſh. 1. 17. According as we hearkned unto Moſes in all things, ſo will we hearken unto thee; only the Lord thy God be with thee, as he was with Moſes. Here's an expreſs condition. Hear the Preacher elſe, Chap. 9. v. 17. The words of wiſe men are heard in quiet, more than the cry of him that ruleth among fools. The next caution that Solomon gives us, is, Be not haſty to go out of his ſight; ſtand not in an evil thing; for he doth whatſoever pleaſeth him. That is, he does what he will to Malefactors, whom the Law authorizes him to puniſh, and againſt whom he may proceed with mercy or ſeverity, as he ſees occaſion. Here's nothing like Tyranny; nothing that a good man needs be afraid of. Where the word of a King is, there is power; and who may ſay to him, What doſt thou? And yet we read of one that not only ſaid to a King, What doſt thou? but told him, Thou haſt done fooliſhly. But Samuel, you may ſay, was an extraordinary Perſon. I anſwer you with your own words, which follow in the 49th Page of your Book, What was there extraordinary, ſay you, in Saul or in David? And ſo ſay I, what was there in Samuel extraordinary? He was a Prophet, you'll ſay; ſo are they that now follow his example; for they act according to the will of God, either his reveal'd, or his ſecret will, which your ſelf grant in your 50th Page. The Preacher therefore in this place prudently adviſes private perſons not to contend with Princes; for it is even dangerous to contend with any man that's either rich or powerful. But what then? muſt therefore the Nobility of a Nation, and all the inferior Magiſtrates, and the whole body of the people not dare to mutter when a King raves and acts like a mad-man? Muſt they not oppoſe a fooliſh, wicked, outrageous Tyrant, that perhaps ſeeks the deſtruction of all good men? Muſt they not endeavour to prevent his turning all Divine and Humane things upſide down? Muſt they ſuffer him to maſſacre his People, burn their Cities, and commit ſuch Outrages upon them daily; and finally, to have perfect liberty to do what he liſts without controul?

Thou ſlaviſh Knight of Cappadocia!

Whom all free People, if you can have the confidence hereafter to ſet your foot within a free Countrey, ought to caſt out from amongſt them, and ſend to ſome remote parts of the World, as a Prodigy of dire portent; or to condemn to ſome perpetual drudgery, as one devoted to ſlavery, ſolemnly obliging themſelves, if they ever let you go, to undergo a worſe ſlavery under ſome cruel, ſilly Tyrant: No man living can either deviſe himſelf, or borrow from any other, Expreſſions ſo full of Cruelty and Contempt, as may not juſtly be apply'd to you. But go on. When the Iſraelites asked a King of God, they ſaid, they would ſet up a King that ſhould have the ſame Rule and Dominion over them, that the Kings of their neighbour Countries exercis'd over their Subjects. But the Kings of the Eaſt we know had an unlimited Power: as Virgil teſtifies,

——Regem non ſic Ægyptus & ingens
Lydia, nec Populi Parthorum, & Medus, Hydaſpes
Obſervant.——

No Eaſtern Nation ever did adore
The Majeſty of Soveraign Princes more.

First, What is that to us, what ſort of Kings the Iſraelites deſired? eſpecially ſince God was angry with them, not only for deſiring ſuch a King as other Nations had, and not ſuch a King as his own Law deſcribes, but barely for deſiring a King at all? Nor is it credible that they ſhould deſire an unjuſt King, and one that ſhould be out of the reach of all Laws, who could not bear the Government of Samuel's Sons, though under the power of Laws; but from their Covetouſneſs ſought refuge in a King. And laſtly, The Verſe that you quote out of Virgil, does not prove that the Kings of the Eaſt had an abſolute unlimited Power; for thoſe Bees, that he there ſpeaks of, and who reverence their Kings, he ſays, more than the Egyptians or Medes do theirs, by the Authority of the ſame Poet, ——Magnis agitant ſub legibus ævum.

Live under certain Fundamental Laws.

They do not live under a King then, that's tyed to no Law. But now I'll let you ſee how little reaſon you have to think I bear you an ill will. Moſt People think you are a Knave; but I'll make it appear that you have only put on a Knaves Vizor for the preſent. In your Introduction to your Diſcourſe of the Pope's Supremacy, you ſay, that ſome Divines in the Council of Trent made uſe of the Government, that is ſaid to be amongſt Bees, to prove the Pope's Supremacy. This fancy you borrow from them, and urge it here with the ſame malice that they did there. Now that very ſame anſwer that you gave them, whilſt you were an honeſt Man, now that you are become a Knave, you ſhall give your ſelf, and pull off with your own hand that Vizor you've now put on: The Bees, ſay you, are a State, and ſo Natural Philoſophers call them; they have a King, but a harmleſs one; he is a Leader, or Captain, rather than a King; he never beats, nor pulls, nor kills his ſubject Bees. No wonder they are ſo obſervant of him then: But in good Faith, you had but ill luck to meddle with theſe Bees; for though they are Bees of Trent, they ſhow you to be a Drone. Ariſtotle, a moſt exact writer of Politicks, affirms that the Aſiatique Monarchy, which yet himſelf calls barbarous, was according to Law, Politic. 3. And whereas he reckons up five ſeveral ſorts of Monarchies, four of thoſe five he makes Governments according to Laws, and with the conſent of the People; and yet he calls them Tyrannical Forms of Government, becauſe they lodg ſo much power in one man's hand. But the Kingdom of the Lacedæmonians he ſays is moſt properly a Kingdom, becauſe there all Power is not in the King. The fifth ſort of Monarchy, which he calls παμβασιλεια, that is, where the King is all in all; and to which he refers that, that you call the Right of Kings, which is a Liberty to do what they liſt; he neither tells us when, nor where any ſuch Form of Government ever obtain'd. Nor ſeems he to have mention'd it for any other purpoſe than to ſhew how unjuſt, abſurd, and tyrannical a Government it is. You ſay, that when Samuel would deter the People from chuſing a King, he propounded to them this Right of Kings. But whence had Samuel it? Had he it from the written Law of God? That can't be. We have obſerv'd already, that the Scriptures afford us a quite other Scheme of Soveraignty. Had Samuel it then immediately from God himſelf by Revelation? That's not likely neither; for God diſlikes it, diſcommends it, finds fault with it: So that Samuel does not expound to the People any Right of Kings appointed by God; but a corrupt and depraved manner of governing, taken up by the Pride and Ambition of Princes. He tells not the People what their Kings ought to do, but what they would do. He told them the manner of their King, as before he told us of the manner of the Prieſts, the Sons of Eli; for he uſes the ſame word in both places; (which you in the 33d Page of your Book, by an Hebrew Solœciſm too, call משפת). That manner of theirs was wicked, and odious, and tyrannical: It was no right, but great wrong. The Fathers have commented upon this place too: I'll inſtance in one, that may ſtand for a great many; and that's Sulpitius Severus, a contemporary and intimate Friend of St. Jerom, and, in St. Auguſtin's opinion, a Man of great Wiſdom and Learning. He tells us in his ſacred Hiſtory, that Samuel in that place acquaints the People with the imperious Rule of Kings, and how they uſe to lord it over their Subjects. Certainly it cannot be the Right of Kings to domineer and be imperious. But according to Saluſt, that lawful Power and Authority that Kings were entruſted with, for the preſervation of the publick Liberty, and the good of the Commonwealth, quickly degenerated into Pride and Tyranny: And this is the ſenſe of all Orthodox Divines, and of all Lawyers upon that place of Samuel. And you might have learnt from Sichardus, that moſt of the Rabbins too were of the ſame mind; at leaſt, not any one of them ever aſſerted that the abſolute inherent Right of Kings is there diſcourſed of. Your ſelf in your 5th Chapter, Page 106. complain, That not only Clemens Alexandrinus, but all other Expoſitors miſtake themſelves upon this Text: And you, I'll warrant ye, are the only Man that have had the good luck to hit the Mark. Now what a piece of folly and impudence is this in you to maintain, in oppoſition to all Orthodox Expoſitors, that thoſe very Actions which God ſo much condemns, are the Right of Kings, and to pretend Law for them? Though your ſelf confeſs, that that Right is very often exercis'd in committing Outrages, being injurious, contumelious and the like. Was any Man ever to that degree ſui juris, ſo much his own Maſter, as that he might lawfully prey upon Mankind, bear down all that ſtood in his way, and turn all things up-ſide down? Did the Romans ever maintain, as you ſay they did, That any man might do theſe things ſuo jure, by virtue of ſome inherent Right in himſelf? Saluſt indeed makes C. Memmius, a Tribune of the People, in an invective Speech of his againſt the Pride of the Nobility, and their eſcaping unpuniſh'd, howſoever they miſbehaved themſelves, to uſe theſe words, viz. "To do whatever one has a mind to, without fear of Pu-"niſhment, is to be a King. This Saying you catch'd hold of, thinking it would make for your purpoſe; but conſider it a little better, and you'll find your ſelf deceived. Does he in that place aſſert the Right of Kings? Or does he not blame the Common People, and chide them for their Sloth, in ſuffering their Nobility to lord it over them, as if they were out of the reach of all Law, and in ſubmitting again to that Kingly Tyranny, which together with their Kings themſelves, their Anceſtors had lawfully and juſtly rejected and baniſh'd from amongſt them? If you had conſulted Tully, you would have underſtood both Saluſt and Samuel better. In his Oration pro C. Rabirio, “ There is none “ of us ignorant, ſays he, of the manner of Kings. Theſe are their Lordly “ Dictates: Mind what I ſay, and do accordingly. Many Paſſages to this purpoſe he quotes out of Poets, and calls them not the Right, but the Cuſtom or the Manner of Kings; and he ſays, We ought to read and conſider them, not only for curioſity ſake, but that we may learn to beware of 'em and avoid 'em. You perceive how miſerably you're come off with Saluſt, who, though he be as much an Enemy to Tyranny as any other Author whatſoever, you thought would have patroniz'd this tyrannical Right that you are eſtabliſhing. Take my word for't, the Right of Kings ſeems to be tottering, and even to further its own ruin, by relying upon ſuch weak Props for its ſupport; and by endeavouring to maintain it ſelf by ſuch Examples and Authorities, as would haſten its down-fall, if it were further off than it is. The extremity of Right or Law, you ſay, is the height of injury, Summum jus ſumma injuria; this ſaying is verified moſt properly in Kings, who when they go to the utmoſt of their Right, fall into thoſe courſes, in which Samuel makes the Right of Kings to conſiſt. And 'tis a miſerable Right, which, when you have ſaid all you can for, you can no otherwiſe defend, than by confeſſing, that it is the greateſt injury that may be. The extremity of Right or Law is ſaid to be, when a man ties himſelf up to Niceties, dwells upon Letters and Syllables, and in the mean time neglects the intent and equity of the Law; or when a written Law is cunningly and maliciouſly interpreted; this Cicero makes to have been the riſe of that common ſaying. But ſince 'tis certain that all Right flows from the fountain of Juſtice, ſo that nothing can poſſibly be any man's right that is not juſt, 'tis a moſt wicked thing in you to affirm that for a King to be unjuſt, rapacious, tyrannical, and as ill as the worſt of 'em ever were, is according to the right of Kings; and to tell us that a Holy Prophet would have perſwaded the People to ſuch a ſenſeleſs thing. For whether written or unwritten, whether extreme or remiſs, what Right can any Man have to be injurious? Which leſt you ſhould confeſs to be true of other Men, but not of Kings, I have one Man's Authority to object to you, who I think was a King likewiſe, and profeſſes that that Right of Kings that you ſpeak of, is odious both to God and himſelf: It is in the 94th Pſalm, Shall the Throne of Iniquity have fellowſhip with thee, that frameth miſchief by a Law? Be not therefore ſo injurious to God, as to aſcribe this Doctrine to him, viz. that all manner of wicked and flagitious Actions are but the Right of Kings; ſince himſelf tells us, that he abhors all fellowſhip with wicked Princes for this very reaſon, Becauſe under pretence of Soveraignity they create Miſery and Vexation to their Subjects. Neither bring up a falſe Accuſation againſt a Prophet of God; for by making him to teach us in this place what the Right of Kings is, you do not produce the right Samuel, but ſuch another empty Shadow as was raiſed by the Witch of Endor. Tho for my own part, I verily believe that that infernal Samuel would not have been ſo great a Lyar, but that he would have confeſs'd, that what you call the Right of Kings, is Tyranny. We read indeed of Impieties countenanced by Law, Jus datum ſceleri: you your ſelf confeſs, that they are bad Kings that have made uſe of this boundleſs Licenſe of theirs to do every thing. Now this Right that you have introduc'd for the Deſtruction of Mankind, not proceeding from God, as I have prov'd it does not, muſt needs come from the Devil; and that it does really ſo, will appear more clearly hereafter. By virtue of this Liberty, ſay you, Princes may if they will, And for this, you pretend to have Cicero's Authority. I'm always willing to mention your Authorities, for it generally happens that the very Authors you quote them out of, give you an Anſwer themſelves. Hear elſe what Cicero ſays in his 4th Philippick, ‘What cauſe of War can be more juſt and warrantable than to avoid ‘Slavery? For tho a People may have the good fortune to live under a gentle ‘Maſter, yet thoſe are in a miſerable Condition whoſe Prince may tyrannize ‘over them if he will. May, that is, can; has Power enough ſo to do. If he meant it of his Right, he would contradict himſelf, and make that an unjuſt Cauſe of War, which himſelf had affirm'd with the ſame breath to be a moſt juſt one. It is not therefore the Right of all Kings that you deſcribe, but the Injuriouſneſs, and Force, and Violence of ſome. Then you tell us what private men may do. A private Man, ſay you, may Lie, may be Ungrateful; and ſo may Kings, but what then? May they therefore Plunder, Murder, Raviſh without controul? 'Tis equally prejudicial and deſtructive to the Commonwealth, whether it be their own Prince, or a Robber, or a Foreign-Enemy that Spoils, Maſſacres, and Enſlaves them. And queſtionleſs, being both alike Enemies of Humane Society, the one as well as the other may lawfully be oppos'd and puniſh'd; and their own Prince the rather, becauſe he, tho raiſed to that Dignity by the Honours that his People have conferr'd upon him, and being bound by his Oath to defend the Publick Safety, betrays it notwithſtanding all. At laſt you grant, That Moſes preſcribes Laws, according to which the King that the People of Iſrael ſhould chuſe, ought to govern, tho different from this Right that Samuel propoſes; which words contain a double Contradiction to what you have ſaid before. For whereas you had affirm'd, That a King was bound by no Law, here you confeſs he is. And you ſet up two contrary Rights, one deſcribed by Moſes, and another by Samuel, which is abſurd. But, ſays the Prophet, you ſhall be Servants to your King. Tho I ſhould grant that the Iſraelites were really ſo, it would not preſently follow, that it was the Right of their Kings to have them ſo; but that by the Uſurpation and Injuſtice of moſt of them, they were reduc'd to that Condition. For the Prophet had foretold them, that that importunate Petition of theirs would bring a Puniſhment from God upon them; not becauſe it would be their King's Right ſo to haraſs them, but becauſe they themſelves had deſerved it ſhould be ſo. If Kings are out of the reach of the Law, ſo as that they may do what they liſt, they are more abſolute than any Maſters, and their Subjects in a more deſpicable Condition than the worſt of Slaves. The Law of God provided ſome redreſs for them, tho of another Nation, if their Maſters were cruel and unreaſonable towards them. And can we imagine that the whole Body of the People of a free Nation, tho oppreſs'd and tyranniz'd over, and prey'd upon, ſhould be left remedileſs? That they had no Law to protect them, no Sanctuary to betake themſelves to? Can we think that they were delivered from the Bondage that they were under to the Egyptian Kings, to be reduced into a worſe to one of their own Brethren? All which being neither agreeable to the Law of God, nor to common Senſe, nothing can be more evident than that the Prophet declares to the People the Manner, and not the Right of Kings; nor the Manner of all Kings, but of moſt. Then you come to the Rabbins, and quote two of them, but you have as bad luck with them here, as you had before. For it is plain, that that other Chapter that Rabbi Joſes ſpeaks of, and which contains, he ſays, the Right of Kings, is that in Deuteronomy, and not in Samuel. For Rabbi Judas ſays very truly, and againſt you, that that Diſcourſe of Samuel's was intended only to frighten the People. 'Tis a moſt pernicious Doctrine to maintain that to be any ones Right, which in it ſelf is flat Injuſtice, unleſs you have a mind to ſpeak by contraries. And that Samuel intended to affrighten them, appears by the 18th Verſe, And ye ſhall cry out in that day becauſe of your King, which ye ſhall have choſen you, and I will not hear you in that day, ſaith the Lord. That was to be their Puniſhment for their Obſtinacy in perſiſting to deſire a King againſt the Mind and Will of God, and yet they are not forbidden here either to pray againſt him, or to endeavour to rid themſelves of him. For if they might lawfully pray to God againſt him, without doubt they might uſe all lawful means for their own Deliverance. For what man living, when he finds himſelf in any Calamity, betakes himſelf to God, ſo as to neglect his own Duty in order to a Redreſs, and rely upon his lazy Prayers only? But be it how it will, what is all this to the Right of Kings, or of the Engliſh People? who neither asked a King againſt the Will of God, nor had one appointed us by God, but by the Right that all Nations have to appoint their own Governours, appointed a King over us by Laws of our own, neither in Obedience to, nor againſt any Command of God? And this being the Caſe, for ought I ſee, we have done well in depoſing our King, and are to be commended for it, ſince the Iſraelites ſinned in asking one. And this the Event has made appear; for we, when we had a King, prayed to God againſt him, and he heard us, and delivered us: But the Jews (who not being under a Kingly Government, deſired a King) he ſuffered to live in Slavery under one, till, at laſt, after their return from the Babyloniſh Captivity, they betook themſelves to their former Government again.

Then you come to give us a diſplay of your Talmudical Learning, but you have as ill ſucceſs with that, as you have had with all the reſt. For whilſt you are endeavouring to prove that Kings are not liable to any Temporal Judicature, you quote an Authority out of the Treatiſe of the Sanhedrim, That the King neither is judged of others, nor does himſelf judg any. Which is againſt the Peoples own Petition in Samuel; for they deſired a King that might judg them. You labour in vain to ſalve this, by telling us, that it is to be underſtood of thoſe Kings that reigned after the Babyloniſh Captivity. For then, what ſay ye to Maimonides? He makes this difference betwixt the Kings of Iſrael, and thoſe of Juda; that the Kings of the Poſterity of David judg, and are judged; but the Kings of Iſrael do neither. You contradict and quarrel with your ſelf or your Rabbins; and ſtill do my work for me. This, ſay you, is not to be underſtood of the Kings of Iſrael in their firſt Inſtitution; for in the 17th Verſe 'tis ſaid, You ſhall be his Servants; that is, he ſhall uſe ye to it, not that he ſhall have any Right to make you ſo. Or if you underſtand it of their Kings Right, 'tis but a Judgment of God upon them for asking a King; the effects of which they were ſenſible of under moſt of their Kings, tho not perhaps under all. But you need no Antagoniſts, you are ſuch a perpetual Adverſary to your ſelf. For you tell us now a Story, as if you were arguing on my ſide, how that firſt Ariſtobulus, and after him Jannæus, ſirnamed Alexander, did not receive that Kingly right that they pretended to, from the Sanhedrim, that great Treaſury and Oracle of the Laws of that Nation, but uſurped it by degrees againſt the Will of the Senate. For whoſe ſake, you ſay, that childiſh Fable of the principal Men of that Aſſembly being ſtruck dead by the Angel Gabriel, was firſt invented. And thus you confeſs that this magnificent Prerogative, upon which you ſeem mainly to rely, viz. That Kings are not to be judged by any upon Earth, ‘ Was grounded upon this worſe ‘ than an old Wives Tale, that is, upon a Rabbinical Fable. But that the He‘brew Kings were liable to be call'd in queſtion for their Actions, and to be pu‘niſhed with ſtripes, if they were found faulty, Sichardus ſhows at large out of the Writings of the Rabbins, to which Author you are indebted for all that you employ of that ſort of Learning, and yet you have the Impudence to be thwarting with him. Nay, we read in the Scripture that Saul thought himſelf bound by a Decree of his own making; and in Obedience thereunto, that he caſt Lots with his Son Jonathan which of them two ſhould die. Uzzias likewiſe, when he was thruſt out of the Temple by the Prieſts as a Leper, ſubmitted as every private Perſon in ſuch a Caſe ought to do, and ceas'd to be a King. Suppoſe he ſhould have refuſed to go out of the Temple, and lay down the Government, and live alone, and had reſolved to aſſert that Kingly Right of not being ſubject to any Law; do you think the Prieſts, and the People of the Jews would have ſuffered the Temple to be defiled, the Laws violated, and live themſelves in danger of the Infection? It ſeems there are Laws againſt a leprous King, but none againſt a Tyrant. Can any Man poſſibly be ſo mad and fooliſh as to fancy that the Laws ſhould ſo far provide for the Peoples Health, as tho ſome noiſome Diſtemper ſhould ſeize upon the King himſelf, yet to prevent the Infection's reaching them, and make no Proviſion for the Security of their Lives and Eſtates, and the very being of the whole State, againſt the Tyranny of a cruel, unjuſt Prince, which is incomparably the greater miſchief of the two? But, ſay you, there can be no precedent ſhown of any one King, that has been arraigned in a Court of Juſtice, and condemn'd to dye. Sichardus anſwers that well enough. 'Tis all one, ſays he, as if one ſhould argue on this manner. The Emperor of Germany never was ſummoned to appear before one of the Prince-Electors; therefore if the Prince Elector Palatine ſhould impeach the Emperor, he were not bound to plead to it; tho it appears by the Golden Bull, that Charles the Fourth ſubjected himſelf and his Succeſſors to that Cognizance and Juriſdiction. But no wonder if Kings were indulged in their Ambition, and their Exorbitances paſſed by, when the times were ſo corrupt and depraved, that even private Men, if they had either Money or Intereſt, might eſcape the Law, tho guilty of Crimes of never ſo high a Nature. That ἀνυπεύθυνον, that you ſpeak of, that is to be wholly independent upon any other, and accountable to none upon Earth, which you ſay is peculiar to the Majeſty of Sovereign Princes, Ariſtotle in the 4*th* Book of his Pol. Ch. 10. calls a moſt Tyrannical Form of Government, and not in the leaſt to be endured by a free People. And that Kings are not liable to be queſtion'd for their Actions, you prove by the Teſtimony of a very Worthy Author, that Barbarous Tyrant Mark Anthony, one of thoſe that ſubverted the Commonwealth of Rome: And yet he himſelf, when he undertook an Expedition againſt the Parthians, ſummon'd Herod before him, to anſwer to a Charge of Murder, and would have puniſhed him, but that Herod brib'd him. So that Anthony's aſſerting this Prerogative Royal, and your Defence of King Charles, come both out of one and the ſame Spring. And 'tis very reaſonable, ſay you, that it ſhould be ſo; for Kings derive their Authority from God alone. What Kings are thoſe, I pray, that do ſo? For I deny that there ever were any ſuch Kings in the World, that derived their Authority from God alone. Saul the firſt King of Iſrael had never reign'd, but that the People deſired a King, even againſt the Will of God; and tho he was proclaimed King once at Mizpah, yet after that he lived a private Life, and look'd to his Fathers Cattel, till he was created ſo the ſecond time by the People at Gilgal. And what think ye of David? Tho he had been anointed once by God, was he not anointed the ſecond time in Hebron by the Tribe of Judah, and after that by all the People of Iſrael, and that after a mutual Covenant betwixt him and them? 2 Sam. 5. 1 Chron. 11. Now a Covenant lays an Obligation upon Kings, and reſtrains them within Bounds. Solomon, you ſay, ſucceeded him in the Throne of the Lord, and was acceptable to all men: 1 Chron. 29. So, that 'tis ſomething to be well-pleaſing in the Eyes of the People. Jehoiadah the Prieſt made Joaſh King, but firſt he made him and the People enter into a Covenant to one another, 2 Kings 11. I confeſs that theſe Kings, and all that reign'd of David's Poſterity, were appointed to the Kingdom both by God and the People; but of all other Kings of what Country ſoever, I affirm, that they are made ſo by the People only; nor can you make it appear, that they are appointed by God any otherwiſe than as all other things, great and ſmall, are ſaid to be appointed by him, becauſe nothing comes to paſs without his Providence. So that I allow the Throne of David was in a peculiar manner call'd, The Throne of the Lord; whereas the Thrones of other Princes are no otherwiſe God's, than all other things in the World are his; which if you would, you might have learnt out of the ſame Chapter, Ver. 11, 12. Thine, O Lord, is the greatneſs, &c. for all that is in the Heaven, and in the Earth is thine. Both riches and honour come of thee, and thou reigneſt over all. And this is ſo often repeated, not to puff up Kings, but to put them in mind, tho they think themſelves Gods, that yet there is a God above them, to whom they owe whatever they are and have. And thus we eaſily underſtand what the Poets, and the Eſſenes among the Jews mean, when they tell us, That 'tis by God that Kings reign, and that they are of Jupiter; for ſo all of us are of God, we are all his Off-ſpring. So that this univerſal Right of Almighty God's, and the Intereſt that he has in Princes, and their Thrones, and all that belongs to them, does not at all derogate from the Peoples Right; but that notwithſtanding all this, all other Kings, not particularly and by name appointed by God, owe their Sovereignty to the People only, and conſequently are accountable to them for the management of it. The truth of which Doctrine, tho the Common People are apt to flatter their Kings, yet they themſelves acknowledg, whether good ones, as Sarpedon in Homer is deſcribed to have been; or bad ones, as thoſe Tyrants in the Lyrick Poet:

γλαῦκε, τίη δὴ νῶϊ τετιμήμεσθα μάλιςα, &c.

Glaucus, in Lycia we're ador'd like Gods:
What makes 'twixt us and others ſo great odds?

He reſolves the Queſtion himſelf: “Becauſe, ſays he, we excel others in Heroical Vertues: Let us fight manfully then, ſays he, leſt our Countrymen tax us with Sloth and Cowardice. In which words he intimates to us, both that Kings derive their Grandeur from the People, and that for their Conduct and Behaviour in War, they are accountable to them. Bad Kings indeed, tho to caſt ſome Terror into Peoples minds, and beget a Reverence of themſelves, they declare to the World, that God only is the Author of Kingly Government; in their Hearts and Minds they reverence no other Deity but that of Fortune, according to that paſſage in Horace:

Te Dacus aſper, te profugi Scythæ,
Regumque matres barbarorum, &
Purpurei metuunt Tyranni.

Injurioſo ne pede proruas
Stantem columnam, neu populus frequens
Ad arma ceſſantes, ad arma
Concitet, imperiumque frangat.

“ All barb’rous People, and their Princes too,
“ All Purple Tyrants honour you ;
“ The very wandring Scythians do.

“ Support the Pillar of the Roman State,
“ Leſt all Men be involv’d in one Mans fate.
“ Continue us in Wealth and Peace ;
“ Let Wars and Tumults ever ceaſe.

So that if ’tis by God that Kings now adays reign, ’tis by God too that the People aſſert their own Liberty ; ſince all things are of him, and by him. I’m ſure the Scripture bears witneſs to both ; that by him Kings reign, and that by him they are caſt down from their Thrones. And yet experience teaches us, that both theſe things are brought about by the People, oftner than by God. Be this Right of Kings therefore what it will, the Right of the People is as much from God as it. And when ever any People, without ſome viſible Deſignation of God himſelf, appoint a King over them, they have the ſame Right to put him down, that they had to ſet him up at firſt. And certainly ’tis a more God-like Action to depoſe a Tyrant, than to ſet up one : And there appears much more of God in the People, when they depoſe an unjuſt Prince, than in a King that oppreſſes an innocent People. Nay, the People have a Warrant from God to judg wicked Princes ; for God has conferr’d this very honour upon thoſe that are dear to him, that celebrating the praiſes of Chriſt their own King, ‘ they ſhall bind in Chains the Kings of the Nations, (under which Appellation all Tyrants under the Goſpel are included) ‘ and execute the Judg‘ments written upon them that challenge to themſelves an Exemption from all ‘ written Laws, Pſalm 149. So that there’s but little reaſon left for that wicked and fooliſh Opinion, that Kings who commonly are the worſt of Men, ſhould be ſo high in God’s account, as that he ſhould have put the World under them, to be at their beck, and be govern’d according to their humour ; and that for their ſakes alone he ſhould have reduced all Mankind, whom he made after his own Image, into the ſame condition with Brutes. After all this, rather than ſay nothing, you produce M. Aurelius, as a Countenancer of Tyranny ; but you had better have let him alone. I can’t ſay whether he ever affirm’d that Princes are accountable only before God’s Tribunal. But Xiphiline indeed, out of whom you quote thoſe Words of M. Aurelius, mentions a certain Government, which he calls an Autarchy, of which he makes God the only Judg : περὶ ἀυταρχίας ὁ Θεὸς μόνος κρίνειν δύναται. But that this word Autarchy and Monarchy are Synonymous, I cannot eaſily perſwade my ſelf to believe. And the more I read what goes before, the leſs I find my ſelf inclinable to think ſo. And certainly whoever conſiders the Context, will not eaſily apprehend what coherence this Sentence has with it, and muſt needs wonder how it comes ſo abruptly into the Text ; eſpecially ſince Marcus Aurelius, that Mirror of Princes, carried himſelf towards the People, as Capitolinus tells us, juſt as if Rome had been a Commonwealth ſtill. And we all know that when it was ſo, the Supreme Power was in the People. The ſame Emperor honoured the memory of Tharſeas, and Helvidius, and Cato, and Dio, and Brutus; who all were Tyrant-ſlayers, or affected the reputation of being thought ſo. In the firſt Book that he writes of his own Life, he ſays that he propos’d to himſelf a form of Government, under which all men might equally enjoy the benefit of the Law, and Right and Juſtice be equally adminiſtred to all. And in his fourth Book he ſays, The Law is Maſter, and not he. He acknowledged the right of the Senate and the People, and their Intereſt in all things : We are ſo far, ſays he, from having any thing of our own, that we live in your Houſes. Theſe things Xiphiline relates of him. So little did he arrogate ought to himſelf by virtue of his Soveraign Right. When he died, he recommended his Son to the Romans for his Succeſſor, if they ſhould think he deſerv'd it. So far was he from pretending to a Commiſſion from Heaven to exerciſe that abſolute and imaginary Right of Soveraignty, that Autarchy, that you tell us of. All the Latin and Greek Books are full of Authorities of this nature. But we have heard none of 'em yet. So are the Jewiſh Authors. And yet, you ſay, The Jews in many things allow'd but too little to their Princes. Nay, you'l find that both the Greeks and the Latins allow'd much leſs to Tyrants. And how little the Jews allow'd them, would appear, if that Book that Samuel wrote of the manner of the Kingdom were extant; which Book the Hebrew Doctors tell us their Kings tore in pieces and burnt, that they might be more at liberty to tyrannize ever the People without controul or fear of puniſhment. Now look about ye again, and catch hold of ſomewhat or other. In the laſt place you come to wreſt David's words in the 17*th* Pſalm, Let my ſentence come forth from thy preſence. Therefore, ſays Barnachmoni, God only can judg the King. And yet it's moſt likely that David penn'd this Pſalm when he was perſecuted by Saul, at which time, though himſelf were anointed, he did not decline being judged even by Jonathan: Notwithſtanding if there be iniquity in me, ſlay me thy ſelf, 1 Sam. 20. At leaſt in this Pſalm he does no more than what any perſon in the world would do upon the like occaſion; being falſely accus'd by Men, he appeals to the judgment of God himſelf, Let thine eyes look upon the thing that is right; thou haſt proved and viſited mine heart, &c. What relation has this to a Temporal Judicature? Certainly they do no good office to this right of Kings, that thus diſcover the weakneſs of its foundation. Then you come with that thredbare argument, which of all others is moſt in vogue with our Courtiers, Againſt thee, thee only have I ſinned, Pſal. 51. 6. As if David in the midſt of his Repentance, when overwhelm'd with ſorrow, and almoſt drown'd in tears, he was humbly imploring God's Mercy, had any thoughts of this Kingly right of his when his heart was ſo low, that he thought he deſerv'd not the right of a ſlave. And can we think that he deſpis'd all the People of God, his own Brethren, to that degree, as to believe that he might murder 'em, plunder 'em, and commit Adultery with their Wives, and yet not ſin againſt them all this while? So Holy a Man could never be guilty of ſuch inſufferable Pride, nor have ſo little knowledg either of himſelf, or of his duty to his Neighbour. So without doubt, when he ſays, Againſt thee only, he meant, againſt thee chiefly have I ſinned, &c. But whatever he means, the words of a Pſalm are too full of Poetry, and this Pſalm too full of Paſſion, to afford us any exact definitions of Right and Juſtice; nor is it proper to argue any thing of that nature from 'em. But David was never queſtion'd for this, nor made to plead for his life before the Sanhedrim. What then? How ſhould they know that any ſuch thing had been, which was done ſo privately, that perhaps for ſome years after not above one or two were privy to it, as ſuch ſecrets there are in moſt Courts? 2 Sam. 12. Thou haſt done this thing in ſecret. Beſides, what if the Senate ſhould neglect to puniſh private perſons? Would any infer that therefore they ought not to be puniſh'd at all? But the reaſon why David was not proceeded againſt as a Malefactor, is not much in the dark: He had condemn'd himſelf in the 5*th* verſe, The man that hath done this thing ſhall ſurely die. To which the Prophet preſently replies, Thou art the man. So that in the Prophet's judgment as well as his own, he was worthy of death; but God by his Soveraign Right over all things, and of his great Mercy to David, abſolves him from the guilt of his Sin, and the ſentence of death which he had pronounc'd againſt himſelf; verſe 13*th*, The Lord hath put away thy ſin, thou ſhalt not die. The next thing you do is to rail at ſome bloody Advocate or other, and you take a deal of pains to refute the concluſion of his Diſcourſe. Let him look to that; I'll endeavour to be as ſhort as I can in what I've undertaken to perform. But ſome things I muſt not paſs by without taking notice of; as firſt and formoſt your notorious Contradictions; for in the 30th Page you ſay, The Iſraelites do not deprecate an unjuſt, rapacious, tyrannical King, one as bad as the worſt of Kings are. And yet, Page 42. you are very ſmart upon your Advocate, for maintaining that the Iſraelites asked for a Tyrant: Would they have leap'd out of the Frying-pan into the Fire, ſay you, and groan under the Cruelty of the worſt of Tyrants, rather than live under bad Judges, eſpecially being us'd to ſuch a Form of Government? Firſt you ſaid the Hebrews would rather live under Tyrants than Judges, here you ſay they would rather live under Judges than Tyrants; and that they deſired nothing leſs than a Tyrant. So that your Advocate may anſwer you out of your own Book. For according to your Principles 'tis every King's Right to be a Tyrant. What you ſay next is very true, The Supreme Power was then in the People, which appears by their own rejecting their Judges, and making choice of a Kingly Government. Remember this when I ſhall have occaſion to make uſe of it. You ſay, that God gave the Children of Iſrael a King, as a thing good and profitable for them, and deny that he gave them one in his anger, as a Puniſhment for their Sin But that will receive an eaſy anſwer; for to what purpoſe ſhould they cry to God becauſe of the King that they had choſen, if it were not becauſe a Kingly Government is an evil thing; not in it ſelf, but becauſe it moſt commonly does, as Samuel forewarns the People that theirs would, degenerate into Pride and Tyranny. If y'are not yet ſatisfied, hark what you ſay your ſelf, acknowledg your own hand, and bluſh; 'tis in your Apparatus ad Primatum: God gave them a King in his anger, ſay you, being offended at their Sin in rejecting him from ruling over them; and ſo the Chriſtian Church, as a Puniſhment for its forſaking the pure Worſhip of God, has been ſubjected to the more than Kingly Government of one mortal Head. So that if you own Compariſon holds, either God gave the Children of Iſrael a King as an evil thing, and as a puniſhment; or he has ſet up the Pope for the good of the Church. Was there ever any thing more and light mad than this Man is? Who would truſt him in the ſmalleſt matters, that in things of ſo great concern ſays and unſays without any conſideration in the World? You tell us in your 29th Page, That by the Conſtitution of all Nations, Kings are bound by no Law. That this had been the judgment both of the Eaſtern and Weſtern part of the World. And yet pag. 43. you ſay, That all the Kings of the Eaſt ruled κατὰ νόμον, according to Law, nay that the very Kings of Egypt in all matters whatſoever, whether great or ſmall, were tied to Laws. Tho in the beginning of this Chapter you had undertook to demonſtrate, That Kings are bound by no Laws, that they give Laws to others, but have none preſcribed to themſelves. For my part I've no reaſon to be angry with ye, for either y'are mad, or of our ſide. You do not defend the King's Cauſe, but argue againſt him, and play the fool with him: Or if y'are in earneſt, that Epigram of Catullus:

Tantò peſſimus omnium Poeta,
Quantò tu optimus omnium Patronus.

The worſt of Poets, I my ſelf declare,
By how much you the beſt of Patrons are.

That Epigram, I ſay, may be turn'd, and very properly applied to you; for there never was ſo good a Poet, as you are a bad Patron. Unleſs that ſtupidity, that you complain your Advocate is immers'd over head and ears in, has blinded the eyes of your own underſtanding too, I'll make ye now ſenſible that y'are became a very Brute your ſelf. For now you come aud confeſs that the Kings of all Nations have Laws preſcribed to them. But then you ſay again, They are not ſo under the power of them, as to be liable to cenſure or puniſhment of death, if they break them. Which yet you have proved neither from Scripture, nor from any good Author. Obſerve then in ſhort; to preſcribe Municipal Laws to ſuch as are not bound by them, is ſilly and ridiculous; and to puniſh all others, but leave ſome one man at liberty to commit all ſort of Impieties without fear of puniſhment, is moſt unjuſt; the Law being general, and not making any exception; neither of which can be ſuppos'd to hold place in the Conſtitutions of any wiſe Law-maker, much leſs in thoſe of God's own making. But that all may perceive how unable you are to prove out of the writings of the Jews, what you undertook in this Chapter to make appear by 'em, you confeſs of your own accord, That there are ſome Rabbins, who affirm that their Forefathers ought not to have had any other King than God himſelf; and that he ſet other Kings over them for their puniſhment. And of thoſe mens opinion, I declare my ſelf to be. It is not fitting nor decent that any Man ſhould be a King that does not far excel all his Subjects.

But where Men are Equals, as in all Governments very many are, they ought to have an equal intereſt in the Government, and hold it by turns. But that all Men ſhould be Slaves to one that is their Equal, or (as it happens moſt commonly) far inferior to 'em, and very often a Fool, who can ſo much as entertain ſuch a thought without Indignation? Nor does it make for the Honour of a Kingly Government, that our Saviour was of the Poſterity of ſome Kings, more than it does for the commendation of the worſt of Kings, that he was the Offſpring of ſome of them too. The Meſſias is a King. We acknowledg him ſo to be, and rejoice that he is ſo; and pray that his Kingdom may come, for he is worthy: Nor is there any other either equal, or next to him. And yet a Kingly Government being put into the hands of unworthy and undeſerving Perſons, as moſt commonly it is, may well be thought to have done more harm than good to Mankind. Nor does it follow for all this that all Kings, as ſuch, are Tyrants. But ſuppoſe it did, as for argument-ſake I'll allow it does, leſt you ſhould think I'm too hard with ye; make you the beſt uſe of it you can. Then, ſay you, God himſelf may properly be ſaid to be the King of Tyrants, nay, himſelf the worſt of all Tyrants. If the firſt of theſe concluſions does not follow, another does, which may be drawn from moſt parts of your Book, viz. That you perpetually contradict, not only the Scriptures, but your own ſelf. For in the very laſt foregoing Period you had affirmed, that God was the King of all things, having himſelf created them. Now he created Tyrants and Devils, and conſequently by your own reaſon, is the King of ſuch. The ſecond of theſe Concluſions we deteſt, and wiſh that blaſphemous Mouth of yours were ſtopt up, with which you affirm God to be the worſt of Tyrants, if he be, as you often ſay he is, the King and Lord of ſuch. Nor do you much advantage your Cauſe by telling us that Moſes was a King, and had the abſolute and ſupreme Power of a King. For we could be content that any other were ſo, that could refer our matters to God, as Moſes did, and conſult with him about our affairs, Exod. 18. v. 19. But neither did Moſes, notwithſtanding his great familiarity with God, ever aſſume a Liberty of doing what he would himſelf. What ſays he of himſelf? The people come unto me to enquire of God. They came not then to receive Moſes's own Dictates and Commands. Then ſays Jethro, ver. 19. Be thou for the people to God-ward, that thou mayſt bring their cauſes unto God. And Moſes himſelf ſays, Deut. 4. v. 5. I have taught you Statutes and Judgments, even as the Lord my God commanded me. Hence it is that he is ſaid to have been faithful in all the Houſe of God, Numb. 12. v. 7. So that the Lord Jehovah himſelf was the People's King, and Moſes no other than as it were an Interpreter or a Meſſenger betwixt him and them. Nor can you without Impiety and Sacrilege, transfer this abſolute Supream Power and Authority from God to a Man; (not having any Warrant from the Word of God ſo to do) which Moſes uſed only as a Deputy or Subſtitute to God; under whoſe Eye, and in whoſe Preſence, himſelf and the People always were. But now, for an aggravation of your wickedneſs, though here you make Moſes to have exercis'd an abſolute and unlimitted Power, in your Apparat. ad Primat. Page 230. you ſay that he together with the ſeventy Elders ruled the people, and that himſelf was the chief of the people, but not their Maſter. If Moſes therefore were a King, as certainly he was, and the beſt of Kings, and had a Supream and Legal Power, as you ſay he had, and yet neither was the People's Maſter nor govern'd them alone; then according to you, Kings, tho indued with the Supream Power, are not by virtue of that Sovereign and Kingly Right of theirs Lords over the People, nor ought to govern them alone; much leſs, according to their own Will and Pleaſure. After all this, you have the impudence to feign a Command from God to that People, to ſet up a King over them, as ſoon as they ſhould be poſſeſſed of the Holy Land, Deut. 17. For you craftily leave out the former words, and ſhalt ſay, I will ſet a King over me, &c. And now call to mind what you ſaid before, Page 42. and what I ſaid I ſhould have occaſion to make uſe of, viz. That the Power was then in the People, and that they were entirely free. What follows argues you either mad or irreligious; take whether you liſt: God, ſay you, having ſo long before appointed a Kingly Government, as beſt and moſt proper for that People; What ſhall we ſay to Samuel's oppoſing it, and God's own acting, as if himſelf were againſt it? How do theſe things agree? He finds himſelf caught, and obſerve now with how great malice againſt the Prophet, and impiety againſt God, he endeavours to diſentangle himſelf. We muſt conſider, ſays he, that Samuel's own Sons then judged the People, and the People rejected them becauſe of their corruption; now Samuel was loth his Sons ſhould be laid aſide, and God to gratify the Prophet, intimated to him, as if himſelf were not very well pleaſed with it. Speak out ye Wretch, and never mince the matter: You mean, God dealt deceitfully with Samuel, and he with the People. It is not your Advocate, but your ſelf that are frantick and diſtracted; who caſt off all reverence to God Almighty, ſo you may but ſeem to honour the King. Would Samuel prefer the Intereſt of his Sons and their Ambition, and their Covetouſneſs, before the general good of all the People, when they asked a thing that would be good and profitable for them? Can we think that he would impoſe upon them by cunning and ſubtilty, and make them believe things that were not? Or if we ſhould ſuppoſe all this true of Samuel, would God himſelf countenance and gratify him in it; would he diſſemble with the People? So that either that was not the Right of Kings which Samuel taught the People; or elſe that Right by the Teſtimony, both of God and the Prophet, was an evil thing, was burdenſom, injurious, unprofitable, and chargeable to the Commonwealth: Or Laſtly, (which muſt not be admitted) God and the Prophet deceiv'd the People. God frequently proteſts that he was extreamly diſpleas'd with them for asking a King. V. 7th. They have not rejected thee, but they have rejected me, that I ſhould not reign over them. As if it were a kind of Idolatry to ask a King, that would even ſuffer himſelf to be ador'd, and aſſume almoſt Divine Honour to himſelf. And certainly, they that ſubject themſelves to a worldly Maſter, and ſet him above all Laws, come but a little ſhort of chuſing a ſtrange God: And a ſtrange one it commonly is; brutiſh, and void of all ſenſe and reaſon. So 1ſt of Sam. Chap. 10*th.* v. 19*th.* And ye have this day rejected your God, who himſelf ſaved you out of all your adverſities and your tribulation, and ye have ſaid unto him, Nay, but ſet a King over us, &c. and Chap. 12*th* v. 12*th* Ye ſaid unto me, Nay, but a King ſhall reign over us; when the Lord your God was your King: and v. the 17*th*. See that your wickedneſs is great, that ye have done in the ſight of the Lord, in asking you a King. And Hoſea ſpeaks contemptibly of the King, Chap. 13. v. 10, 11. I will be thy King; where is any other that may ſave in all thy Cities, and thy Judges of whom thou ſaideſt, Give me a King and Princes? I gave thee a King in mine anger, and took him away in my wrath. And Gideon that warlike Judg, that was greater than a King; I will not rule over you, ſays he, neither ſhall my Son rule over you; the Lord ſhall rule over you, Judges, Chap. the 8. Intimating thereby, that it is not fit for a Man, but for God only to exerciſe Dominion over Men. And hence Joſephus in his Book againſt Appion, an Egyptian Grammarian, and a foul-mouth'd fellow, like you, calls the Commonwealth of the Hebrews a Theocracy, becauſe the principality was in God only. In Iſaiah, Chap. 26. v. 13. the People in their Repentance, complain that it had been miſchievous to them, that other Lords beſides God himſelf, had had Dominion over them. All which places prove clearly, that God gave the Iſraelites a King in his anger; but now who can forbear laughing at the uſe you make of Abimelech's Story? Of whom it is ſaid, when he was kill'd, partly by a Woman that hurl'd a piece of a Mill-ſtone upon him, and partly by his own Armour-Bearer, that God rendred the wickedneſs of Abimelech. This Hiſtory, ſay you, proves ſtrongly that God only is the Judg and Avenger of Kings. Yea, if this Argument holds, he is the only Judg and Puniſher of Tyrants, Villanous Raſcals and Baſtards. Whoever can get into the Saddle, whether by right or by wrong, has thereby obtain'd a Soveraign Kingly Right over the People, is out of all danger of puniſhment, all inferior Magiſtrates muſt lay down their Arms at his feet, the People muſt not dare to mutter. But what if ſome great notorious Robber had periſhed in War, as Abimelech did, would any Man infer from thence, That God only is the Judg and Puniſher of High-way-men? Or what if Abimelech had been condemn'd by the Law, and died by an Executioner's hand, would not God then have rendred his wickedneſs? You never read that the Judges of the Children of Iſrael were ever proceeded againſt according to Law: And yet you confeſs, That where the Government is an Ariſtocracy, the Prince, if there be any, may and ought to be call'd in queſtion, if he break the Laws. This in your 47*th Page*. And why may not a Tyrant as well be proceeded againſt in a Kingly Government? Why, becauſe God rendred the wickedneſs of Abimelech. So did the Women, and ſo did his own Armour-Bearer; over both which he pretended to a right of Soveraignty. And what if the Magiſtrates had rendred his wickedneſs? Do not they bear the Sword for that very purpoſe, for the puniſhment of Malefactors? Having done with his powerful argument from the Hiſtory of Abimelech's death, he betakes himſelf, as his cuſtom is, to Slanders and Calumnies; nothing but Dirt and Filth comes from him: but for thoſe things that he promis'd to make appear, he hath not prov'd any one of them, either from the Scriptures, or from the Writings of the Rabbins. He alledges no reaſon why Kings ſhould be above all Laws, and they only of all mortal Men exempt from puniſhment, if they deſerve it. He falls foul upon thoſe very Authors and Authorities that he makes uſe of, and by his own Diſcourſe demonſtrates the truth of the opinion that he argues againſt. And perceiving that he is like to do but little good with his arguments, he endeavours to bring an odium upon us, by loading us with ſlanderous Accuſations, as having put to death the moſt Vertuous innocent Prince that ever reign'd. Was King Solomon, ſays he, better than King Charles the Firſt? I confeſs ſome have ventur'd to compare his Father King James with Solomon; nay to make King James the better Gentleman of the two. Solomon was David's Son, David had been Saul's Muſitian; but King James was the Son of the Earl of Darly, who as Buchanan tells us, becauſe David the Muſitian got into the Queen's Bed-Chamber at an unſeaſonable time, kill'd him a little after; for he could not get to him then, becauſe he had bolted the Door on the inſide. So that King James being the Son of an Earl, was the better Gentleman; and was frequently called a ſecond Solomon, though it is not very certain that himſelf was not the Son of David the Muſitian too. But how could it ever come into your head to make a compariſon betwixt King Charles and Solomon? For that very King Charles whom you praiſe thus to the Sky, that very Man's Obſtinacy, and Covetouſneſs, and Cruelty; his hard uſage of all good and honeſt Men, the Wars that he rais'd, the Spoilings and Plunderings and Conflagrations that he occaſioned, and the death of innumerable of his Subjects that he was the cauſe of, does his Son Charles, at this very time whilſt I'm a writing, confeſs and bewail in the Stool of Repentance in Scotland, and renounces there that Kingly Right that you aſſert. But ſince you delight in Parallels, let's compare King Charles and King Solomon together a little: Solomon began his reign with the death of his Brother, who had juſtly deſerved it; King Charles began his with his Father's Funeral, I do not ſay with his Murder: and yet all the marks and tokens of Poyſon that may be, appeared in his dead body; but that ſuſpition lighted upon the Duke of Buckingham only, whom the King notwithſtanding cleared to the Parliament, though he had killed the King, and his Father; and not only ſo, but he diſſolved the Parliament, leſt the matter ſhould be enquired into. Solomon oppreſſed the people with heavy Taxes; but he ſpent that Money upon the Temple of God, and in raiſing other publick Buildings: King Charles ſpent his in Extravagances. Solomon was enticed to Idolatry by many Wives: This Man by one. Solomon though he were ſeduced himſelf, we read not that he ſeduced others; but King Charles ſeduced and enticed others not only by large and ample rewards to corrupt the Church, but by his Edicts and Eccleſiaſtical Conſtitutions he compell'd them to ſet up Altars, which all Proteſtants abhor, and to bow down to Crucifixes painted over them on the Wall. But yet for all this, Solomon was not condemned to die. Nor does it follow, becauſe he was not, that therefore he ought not to have been. Perhaps there were many Circumſtances that made it then not expedient. But not long after the People both by words and actions made appear what they took to be their right, when Ten Tribes of Twelve revolted from his Son; and if he had not ſaved himſelf by flight, it is very likely they would have ſtoned him, notwithſtanding his Threats and big ſwelling words.

CHAP. III.

HAving proved ſufficiently that the Kings of the Jews were ſubject to the ſame Laws that the People were; That there are no exceptions made in their favour in Scripture; That 'tis a moſt falſe aſſertion grounded upon no Reaſon, nor warranted by any Authority, to ſay, That Kings may do what they liſt with Impunity; That God has exempted them from all humane Juriſdiction, and reſerved them to his own Tribunal only: Let us now conſider, whether the Goſpel preach up any ſuch Doctrine, and enjoyn that blind Obedience which the Law was ſo far from doing, that it commanded the contrary; let us conſider, whether or no the Goſpel, that Heavenly Promulgation, as it were, of Chriſtian Liberty, reduce us to a condition of Slavery to Kings and Tyrants, from whoſe imperious rule even the old Law, that Miſtreſs of Slavery, diſcharged the People of God, when it obtained. Your firſt argument you take from the Perſon of Chriſt himſelf. But, alas! who does not know that he put himſelf into the condition, not of a private perſon only, but even of a Servant, that we might be made free? Nor is this to be underſtood of ſome internal ſpiritual Liberty only; how inconſiſtent elſe would that Song of his Mothers be with the deſign of his coming into the World, He hath ſcattered the proud in the imagination of their heart, he hath put down the mighty from their ſeat, and hath exalted the humble and meek? How ill ſuted to their occaſion would theſe expreſſions be, if the coming of Chriſt rather eſtabliſhed and ſtrengthened a Tyrannical Government, and made a blind ſubjection the duty of all Chriſtians? He himſelf having been born, and lived and died under a Tyrannical Government, has thereby purchaſed Liberty for us. As he gives us his Grace to ſubmit patiently to a condition of Slavery, if there be a neceſſity of it; ſo if by any honeſt ways and means we can rid our ſelves and obtain our Liberty, he is ſo far from reſtraining us, that he encourages us ſo to do. Hence it is that St. Paul not only of an Evangelical, but alſo of a Civil Liberty, ſays thus, 1 Cor. 7.21. Art thou called being a Servant? care not for it; but if thou maiſt be made free, uſe it rather; you are bought with a price, be not ye Servants of Men. So that you are very impertinent in endeavouring to argue us into Slavery by the example of our Saviour; who by ſubmitting to ſuch a condition himſelf, has confirmed even our Civil Liberties. He took upon him indeed in our ſtead the form of a Servant, but he always retained his purpoſe of being a Deliverer; and thence it was that he taught us a quite other notion of the Right of Kings, than this that you endeavour to make good. You, I ſay, that preach up not Kingſhip, but Tyranny, and that in a Commonwealth; by enjoyning not only a neceſſary, but a Religious Subjection to whatever Tyrant gets into the Chair, whether he come to it by Succeſſion, or by Conqueſt, or Chance, or any how. And now I'll turn your own Weapons againſt you; and oppoſe you, as I uſe to do, with your own Authorities. When the Collectors of the Tribute-Money came to Chriſt for Tribute in Galilee, he asked Peter, Mat. 17. Of whom the Kings of the Earth took cuſtom or tribute, of their own Children, or of Strangers? Peter ſaith unto him, Of Strangers; Jeſus ſaith unto him, then are the Children free; notwithſtanding leſt we ſhould offend them, &c. give unto them for thee and for me. Expoſitors differ upon this place, whom this Tribute was paid to; ſome ſay it was paid to the Prieſts, for the uſe of the Sanctuary; others that it was paid to the Emperour. I am of opinion that it was the Revenue of the Sanctuary, but paid to Herod, who perverted the Inſtitution of it, and took it to himſelf. Joſephus mentions divers ſorts of Tribute which he and his Sons exacted, all which Agrippa afterwards remitted. And this very Tribute, though ſmall in it ſelf, yet being accompanied with many more, was a heavy burden. The Jews, even the pooreſt of them in the time of their Commonwealth, paid a Poll, ſo that it was ſome conſiderable oppreſſion that our Saviour ſpoke of; and from hence he took occaſion to tax Herod's Injuſtice (under whoſe Government, and within whoſe Juriſdiction he then was) in that, whereas the Kings of the Earth, who affect uſually the Title of Fathers of their Country, do not uſe to oppreſs their own Children, that is, their own natural born Subjects with heavy and unreaſonable Exactions, but lay ſuch burdens upon ſtrangers, and conquer'd enemies; he, quite contrary, oppreſſed not ſtrangers, but his own people. But let what will be here meant by Children, either natural born Subjects, or the Children of God, and thoſe the Elect only, or Chriſtians in general, as St. Auguſtine underſtands the place; this is certain, that if Peter was a Child, and therefore free, then by conſequence we are ſo too, by our Saviour's own Teſtimony, either as Engliſhmen, or as Chriſtians; and that it therefore is not the Right of Kings to exact heavy Tributes from their own Countrymen, and thoſe freeborn Subjects. Chriſt himſelf profeſſes, that he paid not this Tribute as a thing that was due, but that he might not bring trouble upon himſelf by offending thoſe that demanded it. The work that he came into this World to do, was quite of another nature. But if our Saviour deny, that it is the Right of Kings to burden their Free-born Subjects with grievous Exactions; he would certainly much leſs allow it to be their Right to Spoil, Maſſacre, and Torture their own Countrymen, and thoſe Chriſtians too. He diſcourſed after ſuch a manner of the Right of Kings, that thoſe to whom he ſpoke, ſuſpected his Principles, as laying too great a reſtraint upon Soveraignty, and not allowing the Licenſe that Tyrants aſſume to themſelves to be the Rights of Kings. It was not for nothing that the Phariſees put ſuch Queſtions to him, tempting him; and that at the ſame time they told him, that he regarded not the Perſon of any Man: nor was it for nothing that he was angry when ſuch Queſtions were propoſed to him, Matth. 22. If one ſhould endeavour to enſnare you with little Queſtions, and catch at your Anſwers, to ground an Accuſation againſt you upon your own Principles concerning the Right of Kings, and all this under a Monarchy, would you be angry with him? You'd have but very little reaſon. 'Tis evident, That our Saviour's Principles concerning Government, were not agreeable to the Humour of Princes. His Anſwer too implies as much; by which he rather turn'd them away, than inſtructed them. He asked for the Tribute-Money. Whoſe Image and Superſcription is it, ſays he? They tell him it was Cæſar's. Give then to Cæſar, ſays he, the things that are Cæſar's; and to God, the things that are God's. And how comes it to paſs, that the People ſhould not have given to them the things that are theirs? Render to all Men their dues, ſays St. Paul, Rom. 13. So that Cæſar muſt not ingroſs all to himſelf. Our Liberty is not Cæſar's; 'tis a Bleſſing we have received from God himſelf; 'tis what we are born to; to lay this down at Cæſar's feet, which we derive not from him, which we are not beholden to him for, were an unworthy Action, and a degrading of our very Nature. If one ſhould conſider attentively the Countenance of a Man, and enquire after whoſe Image ſo noble a Creature were framed; would not any one that heard him, preſently make anſwer, That he was made after the Image of God himſelf? Being therefore peculiarly God's own, and conſequently things that are to be given to him; we are intirely free by Nature, and cannot without the greateſt Sacrilege imaginable be reduced into a Condition of Slavery to any Man, eſpecially to a wicked, unjuſt, cruel Tyrant. Our Saviour does not take upon him to determine what things are God's, and what Cæſar's; he leaves that as he found it. If the piece of Money which they ſhewed him, was the ſame that was paid to God, as in Veſpaſian's time it was; then our Saviour is ſo far from having put an end to the Controverſy, that he has but entangl'd it, and made it more perplext than it was before: for 'tis impoſſible the ſame thing ſhould be given both to God, and to Cæſar. But, you ſay, he intimates to them what things were Cæſar's; to wit, that piece of Money becauſe it bore the Emperor's Stamp; and what of all that? How does this advantage your Cauſe? You get not the Emperor, or your ſelf a Penny by this Concluſion. Either Chriſt allowed nothing at all to be Cæſar's, but that piece of Money that he then had in his hand, and thereby aſſerted the Peoples Intereſt in every thing elſe; or elſe, if (as you would have us underſtand him) he affirms all Money that has the Emperor's ſtamp upon it, to be the Emperor's own, he contradicts himſelf, and indeed gives the Magiſtrate a property in every Man's Eſtate, when as he himſelf paid his Tribute-Money with a Proteſtation, that it was more than what either Peter, or he were bound to do. The ground you rely on, is very weak; for Money bears the Prince's Image, not as a token of its being his, but of its being good Metal, and that none may preſume to counterfeit it. If the writing Princes Names, or ſetting their Stamps upon a thing, veſt the property of it in them, 'twere a good ready way for them to invade all Property. Or rather, if whatever Subjects have, be abſolutely at their Princes diſpoſal, which is your Aſſertion, that piece of Money was not Cæſar's, becauſe his Image was ſtampt on it, but becauſe of Right it belonged to him before 'twas coyn'd. So that nothing can be more manifeſt, than that our Saviour in this place never intended to teach us our Duty to Magiſtrates (he would have ſpoke more plainly if he had) but to reprehend the Malice and Wickedneſs of the hypocritical Phariſees. When they told him that Herod laid wait to kill him; did he return an humble, ſubmiſſive Anſwer? Go, tell that Fox, ſays he, &c. intimating, that Kings have no other Right to deſtroy their Subjects, than Foxes have to devour the things they prey upon. Say you, 'He ſuffered 'Death under a Tyrant. How could he poſſibly under any other? But from hence you conclude, that he aſſerted it to be the Right of Kings to commit Murder, and act Injuſtice. You'd make an excellent Moraliſt. But our Saviour, tho he became a Servant, not to make us ſo, but that we might be free; yet carried he himſelf ſo with relation to the Magiſtracy, as not to aſcribe any more to them than their due. Now, let us come at laſt to enquire what his Doctrine was upon this Subject. The Sons of Zebedee were ambitious of Honour and Power in the Kingdom of Chriſt, which they perſwaded themſelves he would ſhortly ſet up in the World; he reproves them ſo, as withal to let all Chriſtians know what Form of Civil Government he deſires they ſhould ſettle amongſt themſelves. Ye know, ſays he, that the Princes of the Gentiles exerciſe dominion over them; and they that are great, exerciſe authority upon them: but it ſhall not be ſo among you; but whoſoever will be great among you, let him be your Miniſter; and whoſoever will be chief among you, let him be your Servant. Unleſs you'd been diſtracted, you could never have imagined that this place makes for you: and yet you urge it, and think it furniſhes you with an Argument to prove that our Kings are abſolute Lords and Maſters over us and ours. May it be our fortune to have to do with ſuch Enemies in War, as will fall blindfold and naked into our Camp inſtead of their own: as you conſtantly do, who alledg that for your ſelf, that of all things in the World makes moſt againſt you. The Iſraelites asked God for a King, ſuch a King as other Nations round about them had. God diſſwaded them by many Arguments, whereof our Saviour here gives us an Epitome; You know that the Princes of the Gentiles exerciſe Dominion over them. But yet, becauſe the Iſraelites perſiſted in their deſire of a King, God gave them one, tho in his Wrath. Our Saviour, leſt Chriſtians ſhould deſire a King, ſuch a one at leaſt as might rule, as he ſays the Princes of the Gentiles did, prevents them with an Injunction to the contrary; but it ſhall not be ſo among you. What can be ſaid plainer than this? That ſtately, imperious Sway and Dominion that Kings uſe to exerciſe, ſhall not be amongſt you; what ſpecious Titles ſoever they may aſſume to themſelves, as that of Benefactors, or the like. But he that will be great amongſt you (and who is greater than the Prince?) let him be your Servant. So that the Lawyer, whoever he be, that you are ſo ſmart upon, was not ſo much out of the way, but had our Saviour's own Authority to back him, when he ſaid that Chriſtian Princes were indeed no other than the People's Servants; 'tis very certain that all good Magiſtrates are ſo. Inſomuch that Chriſtians either muſt have no King at all, or if they have, that King muſt be the People's Servant. Abſolute Lordſhip and Chriſtianity are inconſiſtent. Moſes himſelf, by whoſe Miniſtry that ſervile Oeconomy of the old Law was inſtituted, did not exerciſe an arbitrary, haughty Power and Authority, but bore the burden of the People, and carried them in his Boſom, as a Nurſing Father does a ſucking Child, Numb. 11. and what is that of a Nurſing Father, but a Miniſterial Imployment? Plato would not have the Magiſtrates called Lords, but Servants and Helpers of the People; nor the People Servants, but Maintainers of their Magiſtrates, becauſe they give Meat, Drink, and Wages to their Kings themſelves. Ariſtotle calls the Magiſtrates, Keepers and Miniſters of the Laws. Plato, Miniſters and Servants. The Apoſtle calls them Miniſters of God; but they are Miniſters and Servants of the People, and of the Laws, nevertheleſs for all that; the Laws and the Magiſtrates were both created for the good of the People: And yet this is it, that you call the Opinion of the Fanatick Maſtiffs in England. I ſhould not have thought the People of England were Maſtiff-dogs, if ſuch a Mungril-Cur as thou art, did not bark at them ſo curriſhly. The Maſter, if it ſhall pleaſe ye, of St. Lupus *, complains it ſeems that the Maſtiffs are mad (Fanaticks). Germanus heretofore, whoſe Colleague that Lupus of Triers was, depoſed our Inceſtuous King Vortigerne by his own Authority. And therefore St. Lupus deſpiſes thee, the Maſter not of a Holy Wolf but of ſome hunger-ſtarv'd thieving little Wolf or other, as being more contemptible than that Maſter of Vipers, of whom Martial makes mention, who haſt by relation a barking She-Wolf at home too, that domineers over thee moſt wretchedly; at whoſe Inſtigations, as I am informed, thou haſt wrote this ſtuff. And therefore it is the leſs wonder that thou ſhouldſt endeavour to obtrude an abſolute Regal Government upon others, who haſt been accuſtomed to bear a Female Rule ſo ſervilely at home thy ſelf. Be therefore, in the Name of God, the Maſter of a Wolf, leſt a She-Wolf be thy Miſtreſs; be a Wolf thy ſelf, be a Monſter made up of a Man, and a Wolf; whatever thou art, the Engliſh Maſtiffs will but make a laughing-ſtock of thee. But I am not now at leiſure to hunt for Wolves, and will put an end therefore to this Digreſſion. You that but a while ago wrote a Book againſt all manner of ſuperiority in the Church, now call St. Peter the Prince of the Apoſtles. How inconſtant you are in your Principles! But what ſays Peter? Submit your ſelves to every ordinance of Man, for the Lord's ſake, whether it be to the King as Supream, or to Governours, as unto them that are ſent by him for the puniſhment of evil doers, and the praiſe of them that do well: for ſo is the will of God, &c. This Epiſtle Peter wrote, not only to private Perſons, but thoſe Strangers ſcatter'd and diſpers'd through Aſia; who in thoſe places where they ſojourned, had no other Right, than what the Laws of Hoſpitality intituled them to. Do you think ſuch Mens caſe to be the ſame with that of Natives, Free-born Subjects, Nobility, Senates, Aſſemblies of Eſtates, Parliaments? Nay, is not the caſe far different of private Perſons, tho' in their own Countrey; and Senators, or Magiſtrates, without whom, Kings themſelves cannot poſſibly ſubſiſt? But let us ſuppoſe that St. Peter had directed his Epiſtle to the Natural-born Subjects, and thoſe not private perſons neither; ſuppoſe he had writ to the Senate of Rome, What then? No Law that is grounded upon a reaſon, expreſly ſet down in the Law it ſelf, obligeth further than the reaſon of it extends. Be ſubject, ſays he, ὑποτάγητε: That is, according to the genuine ſenſe and import of the word, be ſubordinate, or legally ſubject. For the Law, Ariſtotle ſays, is Order. Submit for the Lord's ſake. Why ſo? Becauſe a King is an Officer appointed by God for the puniſhment of evil doers, and the praiſe of them that do well; For ſo is the will of God: To wit, that we ſhould ſubmit and yield Obedience to ſuch as are here deſcribed. There is not a word ſpoken of any other. You ſee the ground of this Precept, and how well 'tis laid. The Apoſtle adds in the 16th verſ. as Free; therefore not as Slaves. What now? if Princes pervert the deſign of Magiſtracy, and uſe the power, that is put into their Hands, to the ruin and deſtruction of good Men, and the praiſe and encouragement of evil doers; Muſt we all be condemn'd to perpetual Slavery, not private perſons only, but our Nobility, all our inferior Magiſtrates, our very Parliament it ſelf? Is not temporal Government call'd a humane Ordinance? How comes it to paſs then, that Mankind ſhould have power to appoint and conſtitute, what may be good and profitable for one another; and want power to reſtrain or ſuppreſs things that are univerſally miſchievous and deſtructive? That Prince, you ſay, to whom St. Peter enjoyns Subjection, was Nero the Tyrant: And from thence you infer, that it is our Duty to ſubmit and yield Obedience to ſuch. But it is not certain that this Epiſtle was writ in Nero's Reign: 'Tis as likely to have been writ in Claudius's time. And they that are commanded to ſubmit, were private Perſons and Strangers; they were no Conſuls, no Magiſtrates: 'Twas not the Roman Senate, that St. Peter directed his Epiſtle to. Now let us hear what uſe you make of St. Paul (for you take a freedom with the Apoſtles, I find, that you will not allow us to take with Princes; you make St. Peter the chief of them to day, and to morrow put another in his place) St. Paul in his 13th Chap. to the Romans, has theſe words: Let every Soul be ſubject unto the higher Powers, for there is no power but of God; the powers that be, are ordained of God. I confeſs he writes this to the Romans, not to Strangers diſpers'd, as Peter did; but however he writes to private perſons, and thoſe of the meaner rank: And yet he gives us a true, and a clear account of the reaſon, the original, and the deſign of Government; and ſhows us the true and proper ground of our Obedience, that it's far from impoſing a neceſſity upon us of being Slaves. “Let every

Soul, ſays he; that is, let every Man ſubmit. Chryſoſtom tells us, “ That St. Paul's deſign in this Diſcourſe, was to make it appear, that our Saviour did not go about to introduce Principles inconſiſtent with the Civil Government, but ſuch as ſtrengthned it, and ſettled it upon the ſureſt Foundations. He never intended then by ſetting Nero, or any other Tyrant out of the reach of all Laws, to enſlave Mankind under his Luſt and Cruelty. “ He intended too, ſays the ſame Author, to diſſwade from unneceſſary and cauſleſs Wars. But he does not condemn a War taken up againſt a Tyrant, a Boſom-Enemy of his own Countrey, and conſequently the moſt dangerous that may be. 'Twas commonly ſaid in thoſe days, that the Doctrine of the Apoſtles was ſeditious, themſelves Perſons that endeavour'd to ſhake the ſetled Laws and Government of the World; that this was what they aimed at in all they ſaid and did. The Apoſtle in this Chapter ſtops the mouths of ſuch Gainſayers: So that the Apoſtles did not write in defence of Tyrants, as you do; but they aſſerted ſuch things as made them ſuſpected to be Enemies to the Government they liv'd under, things that ſtood in need of being explained and interpreted, and having another ſenſe put upon them than was generally receiv'd. St. Chryſoſtom has now taught us what the Apoſtle's deſign was in this Diſcourſe; let us now examine his Words: Let every Soul be ſubject to the Higher Powers. He tells us not what thoſe Higher Powers are, nor who they are; for he never intended to overthrow all Governments, and the ſeveral Conſtitutions of Nations, and ſubject all to ſome one Man's will. Every good Emperour acknowledged that the Laws of the Empire, and the Authority of the Senate was above himſelf: and the ſame principle and notion of Government has obtained all along in civiliz'd Nations. Pindar, as he is cited by Herodotus, calls the Law πάντων βασιλέα, King over all. Orpheus in his Hymns calls it the King both of Gods and Men: And he gives the reaſon why it is ſo; Becauſe, ſays he, 'tis that that ſits at the helm of all humane affairs. Plato in his Book De Legibus, calls it τὸ κρατοῦν ἐν τῇ πόλει: that that ought to have the greateſt ſway in the Commonwealth. In his Epiſtles he commends that Form of Government, in which the Law is made Lord and Maſter, and no ſcope given to any Man to tyrannize over the Laws. Ariſtotle is of the ſame opinion in his Politicks; and ſo is Cicero in his Book de Legibus, That the Laws ought to govern the Magiſtrates as they do the People. The Law therefore having always been accounted the higheſt Power on Earth, by the judgment of the moſt learned and wiſe men that ever were, and by the Conſtitutions of the beſt ordered States; and it being very certain that the Doctrine of the Goſpel is neither contrary to Reaſon nor the Law of Nations, that Man is truly and properly ſubject to the higher Powers who obeys the Law and the Magiſtrates, ſo far as they govern according to Law. So that St. Paul does not only command the People, but Princes themſelves to be in ſubjection; who are not above the Laws, but bound by them, For there is no Power but of God: that is no Form, no lawful Conſtitution of any Government. The moſt ancient Laws that are known to us, were formerly aſcribed to God as their Author. For the Law, ſays Cicero in his Philippicks, is no other than a rule of well-grounded reaſon, derived from God himſelf, enjoyning whatever is juſt and right, and forbidding the contrary. So that the inſtitution of Magiſtracy is Jure Divino, and the end of it is, that Mankind might live under certain Laws, and be govern'd by them. But what particular Form of Government each Nation would live under, and what Perſons ſhould be entruſted with the Magiſtracy, without doubt, was left to the choice of each Nation. Hence St. Peter calls Kings and Deputies, Humane Ordinances. And Hoſea in the 8th Chapter of his Propheſy, They have ſet up Kings, but not by me; they have made Princes, and I knew it not. For in the Commonwealth of the Hebrews, where upon matters of great and weighty importance they could have acceſs to God himſelf, and conſult with him, they could not chuſe a King themſelves by Law, but were to refer the matter to him. Other Nations have received no ſuch Command. Sometimes the very Form of Government, if it be amiſs, or at leaſt thoſe Perſons that have the Power in their hands, are not of God, but of Men, or of the Devil, Luke 4. All this Power will I give unto thee, for it is delivered unto me, and I give it to whom I will. Hence the Devil is called the Prince of this World; and in the 12th of the Revelations, the Dragon gave to the Beaſt his Power, and his Throne, and great Authority. So that we muſt not underſtand St. Paul, as if he ſpoke of all ſorts of Magiſtrates in general, but of lawful Magiſtrates; and ſo they are deſcribed in what follows. We muſt alſo underſtand him of the Powers themſelves; not of thoſe Men always, in whoſe hands they are lodged. St. Chryſoſtom ſpeaks very well, and clearly upon this occaſion. What? ſays he, is every Prince then appointed by God to be ſo? I ſay no ſuch thing, ſays he. St. Paul ſpeaks not of the Perſon of the Magiſtrate, but of the Magiſtracy it ſelf. He does not ſay, there is no Prince but who is of God. He ſays there is no Power but of God. Thus far St. Chryſoſtom; for what Powers are, are ordained of God: So that St. Paul ſpeaks only of a lawful Magiſtracy. For what is evil and amiſs, cannot be ſaid to be ordain'd, becauſe 'tis diſorderly; Order and Diſorder cannot conſiſt together in the ſame Subject. The Apoſtle ſays, The Powers that be; and you interpret his words as if he had ſaid, The Powers that now be; that you may prove that the Romans ought in Conſcience to obey Nero, who you take for granted was then Emperor. I'm very well content you ſhould read the words ſo, and draw that Concluſion from them. The Conſequence will be, that Engliſh Men ought to yield Obedience to the preſent Government, as 'tis now eſtabliſht according to a new Model; becauſe you muſt needs acknowledg that it is the preſent Government, and ordain'd of God, as much at leaſt as Nero's was. And leſt you ſhould object that Nero came to the Empire by a Lawful Succeſſion, it's apparent from the Roman Hiſtory that both he and Tiberius got into the Chair by the Tricks and Artifices of their Mothers, and had no right at all to the Succeſſion. So that you are inconſiſtent with your ſelf, and retract from your own Principles, in affirming that the Romans owed Subjection to the Government that then was; and yet denying that Engliſhmen owe Subjection to the Government that now is. But 'tis no wonder to hear you contradict your ſelf. There are no two things in the World more directly oppoſite and contrary to one another, than you are to your ſelf. But what will become of you, poor Wretch? You have quite undone the young King with your Witticiſms, and ruin'd his Fortunes utterly; for according to your own Doctrine you muſt needs confeſs, that this preſent Government in England, is ordain'd of God, and that all Engliſhmen are bound in Conſcience to ſubmit to it. Take notice all ye Criticks and Textuaries; Do not you preſume to meddle with this Text. Thus Salmaſius corrects that Paſſage in the Epiſtle to the Romans: He has made a diſcovery, that the Words ought not to be read, The Powers that are; but, The Powers that now are: And all this to prove that all Men owed Subjection and Obedience to Nero the Tyrant, whom he ſuppoſed to have been then Emperor. This Epiſtle, which you ſay was writ in Nero's time, was writ in his Predeceſſor's time, who was an honeſt well-meaning Man: And this learned Men evince by undeniable Arguments. But beſides, the five firſt years of Nero's reign were without exception. So that this thredbare Argument, which ſo many Men have at their Tongues end, and have been deceived by, to wit, that Tyrants are to be obeyed, becauſe St. Paul injoyns a Subjection to Nero, is evident to have been but a cunning Invention of ſome ignorant Parſon. He that reſiſts the Powers, to wit, a lawful Power, reſiſts the Ordinance of God. Kings themſelves come under the Penalty of this Law, when they reſiſt the Senate, and act contrary to the Laws. But do they reſiſt the Ordinance of God, that reſiſt an unlawful Power, or a Perſon that goes about to overthrow and deſtroy a lawful one? No Man living in his right Wits can maintain ſuch an Aſſertion. The words immediately after make it as clear as the Sun, that the Apoſtle ſpeaks only of a lawful power; for he gives us in them a Definition of Magiſtrates, and thereby explains to us who are the Perſons thus authoriz'd, and upon what account we are to yield Obedience, leſt we ſhould be apt to miſtake and ground extravagant Notions upon his Diſcourſe. The Magiſtrates, ſays he, are not a Terror to good Works, but to evil; Wilt thou then not be afraid of the Power? Do that which is good, and thou ſhalt have praiſe of the ſame: For he is the Miniſter of God to thee for good. He beareth not the Sword in vain; for he is the Miniſter of God, a Revenger to execute Wrath upon him that doth Evil. What honeſt Man would not willingly ſubmit to ſuch a Magiſtracy as is here deſcribed? And that not only to avoid Wrath, and for fear of Puniſhment, but for Conſcience ſake. Without Magiſtrates, and ſome Form or other of Civil Government, no Commonwealth, no Humane Society can ſubſiſt, there were no living in the World. But whatever Power enables a Man, or whatſoever Magiſtrate takes upon him to act contrary to what St. Paul makes the Duty of thoſe that are in Authority; neither is that Power, nor that Magiſtrate ordain'd of God. And conſequently to ſuch a Magiſtracy no Subjection is commanded, nor is any due, nor are the People forbidden to reſiſt ſuch Authority; for in ſo doing they do not reſiſt the Power, nor the Magiſtracy, as they are here excellently well deſcribed; but they reſiſt a Robber, a Tyrant, an Enemy; who if he may notwithſtanding in ſome ſenſe be called a Magiſtrate, upon this account only, becauſe he has Power in his hands, which perhaps God may have inveſted him with for our puniſhment; by the ſame reaſon the Devil may be called a Magiſtrate. This is moſt certain, that there can be but one true Definition of one and the ſame thing. So that if St. Paul in this place define what a Magiſtrate is, which he certainly does, and that accurately well; He cannot poſſibly define a Tyrant, the moſt contrary thing imaginable, in the ſame words. Hence I infer, that he commands us to ſubmit to ſuch Magiſtrates only as he himſelf defines and deſcribes, and not to Tyrants, which are quite other things. For this Cauſe you pay Tribute alſo: He gives a Reaſon, together with a Command. Hence St. Chryſoſtom; Why do we pay Tribute to Princes? Do we not, adds he, thereby reward them for the care they take of our Safety? We ſhould not have paid them any Tribute if we had not been convinc'd, that it was good for us to live under a Government. So that I muſt here repeat what I have ſaid already, That ſince Subjection is not abſolutely enjoined, but on a particular Reaſon, that Reaſon muſt be the rule of our Subjection: where that Reaſon holds, we are Rebels if we ſubmit not; where it holds not, we are Cowards and Slaves if we do. But, ſay you, the Engliſh are far from being Freemen; for they are wicked and flagitious. I will not reckon up here the Vices of the French, tho they live under a Kingly Government; neither will I excuſe my own Countrey-men too far: but this I may ſafely ſay, whatever Vices they have, they have learnt them under a Kingly Government; as the Iſraelites learnt a great deal of Wickedneſs in Egypt. And as they, when they were brought into the Wilderneſs, and lived under the immediate Government of God himſelf, could hardly reform, juſt ſo 'tis with us. But there are good hopes of many amongſt us; that I may not here celebrate thoſe Men who are eminent for their Piety and Virtue, and Love of the Truth; of which ſort I perſwade my ſelf we have as great a number, as where you think there are moſt ſuch. But they have laid a heavy yoke upon the Engliſh Nation: What if they have, upon thoſe of them that endeavoured to lay a heavy Yoke upon all the reſt? Upon thoſe that have deſerved to be put under the hatches? As for the reſt, I queſtion not but they are very well content to be at the expence of maintaining their own Liberty, the Publick Treaſury being exhauſted by the Civil Wars. Now he betakes himſelf to the Fabulous Rabbins again: He aſſerts frequently, that Kings are bound by no Laws; and yet he proves, That according to the ſenſe of the Rabbins, a King may be guilty of Treaſon, by ſuffering an Invaſion upon the Rights of his Crown. So Kings are bound by Laws, and they are not bound by them; they may be Criminals, and yet they may not be ſo. This Man contradicts himſelf ſo perpetually, that Contradiction and he ſeem to be of kin to one another. You ſay that God himſelf put many Kingdoms under the yoke of Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babylon. I confeſs he did ſo for a time, Jer. 27. 7. but do you make appear if you can, that he put the Engliſh Nation into a condition of Slavery to Charles Stuart for a minute. I confeſs he ſuffered them to be enſlaved by him for ſome time; but I never yet heard that himſelf appointed it ſo to be. Or if you will have it ſo, that God ſhall be ſaid to put a Nation under Slavery, when a Tyrant prevails; why may he not as well be ſaid to deliver them from his Tyranny, when the People prevail and get the upper hand? Shall his Tyranny be ſaid to be of God, and not our Liberty? There is no evil in the City, that the Lord hath not done, Amos 3. So that Famine, Peſtilence, Sedition, War, all of them are of God; and is it therefore unlawful for a People afflicted with any of theſe Plagues, to endeavour to get rid of them? Certainly they would do their utmoſt, tho they know them to be ſent by God, unleſs himſelf miraculouſly from Heaven ſhould command the contrary: And why may they not by the ſame reaſon rid themſelves of a Tyrant, if they are ſtronger than he? Why ſhould we ſuppoſe his weakneſs to be appointed by God for the ruin and deſtruction of the Commonwealth, rather than the Power and Strength of all the People for the good of the State? Far be it from all Commonwealths, from all Societies of free-born men to maintain not only ſuch pernicious, nicious, but ſuch ſtupid and ſenſeleſs Principles; Principles that ſubvert all Civil Society, that to gratifie a ſew Tyrants, level all Mankind with Brutes; and by ſetting Princes out of the reach of humane Laws, give them an equal power over both. I paſs by thoſe fooliſh Dilemma's that you now make, which that you might take occaſion to propoſe, you feign ſome or other to aſſert that the ſuperlative power of Princes is derived from the People; though for my own part I do not at all doubt but that all the power that any Magiſtrates have, is ſo. Hence Cicero in his Orat. pro Flacco, 'Our wiſe and holy Anceſtors, ſays he, appointed thoſe things to obtain for Laws, that the People enacted. And hence it is that Lucius Craſſus, an Excellent Roman Orator, and at that time Preſident of the Senate, when in a Controverſie betwixt them and the common People, he aſſerted their Rights, 'I beſeech you, ſays he, ſuffer not us to live in ſubjection to any, but your ſelves, to the entire body of whom we can and ought to ſubmit. For though the Roman Senate govern'd the People, the People themſelves had appointed them to be their Governours, and had put that power into their hands. We read the term of Majeſty more frequently applied to the People of Rome, than to their Kings. Tully in Orat. pro Plancio, 'It is the condition of all free People, (ſays he) and eſpecially of this People, the Lord of all Nations, by their Votes to give or take away, to or from any as themſelves ſee cauſe. 'Tis the duty of the Magiſtrates patiently to ſubmit to what the body of the People enact. Thoſe that are not ambitious of Honour, have the leſs obligation upon them to court the People; thoſe that affect Preferment, muſt not be weary of entreating them. Should I ſcruple to call a King the Servant of his People, when I hear the Roman Senate, that reign'd over ſo many Kings, profeſs themſelves to be but the Peoples Servants? You'll object perhaps, and ſay, that all this is very true in a popular State; but the caſe was altered afterwards, when the Regal Law transferr'd all the People's Right into Auguſtus and his Succeſſors. But what think you then of Tiberius, whom your ſelf confeſs to have been a very great Tyrant, as he certainly was? Suetonius ſays of him, that when he was once called Lord or Maſter, though after the enacting of that Lex Regia, he deſired the Perſon that gave him that appellation, to forbear abuſing him. How does this ſound in your ears? a Tyrant thinks one of his Subjects abuſes him in calling him Lord. The ſame Emperor in one of his Speeches to the Senate, 'I have ſaid, ſays he, frequently heretofore, and now I ſay it again, that a good Prince, whom you have inveſted with ſo great power as I am entruſted with, ought to ſerve the Senate, and the body of the People, and ſometimes even particular Perſons; nor do I repent of having ſaid ſo: I confeſs that you have been good, and juſt, and indulgent Maſters to me, and that you are yet ſo. You may ſay that he diſſembled in all this, as he was a great Proficient in the art of Hypocriſie; but that's all one. No man endeavours to appear otherwiſe than he ought to be. Hence Tacitus tells us, that it was the cuſtom in Rome for the Emperours in the Circus, to worſhip the People; and that both Nero and other Emperours practiſed it. Claudian in his Panegyrick upon Honorius mentions the ſame cuſtom. By which ſort of Adoration what could poſſibly be meant, but that the Emperours of Rome, even after the enacting of the Lex Regia, confeſſed the whole body of the People to be their Superiors? But I find, as I ſuſpected at firſt, and ſo I told ye, that you have ſpent more time and pains in turning over Gloſſaries, and criticiſing upon Texts, and propagating ſuch like laborious Trifles, than in reading ſound Authors ſo as to improve your knowledg by them. For had you been never ſo little verſed in the Writings of learned Men in former Ages, you would not have accounted an opinion new, and the product of ſome Enthuſiaſtick Heads, which has been aſſerted and maintained by the greateſt Philoſophers, and moſt famous Politicians in the World. You endeavour to expoſe one Martin, who you tell us was a Taylor, and one William a Tanner; but if they are ſuch as you deſcribe them, I think they and you may very well go together; though they themſelves would be able to inſtruct you, and unfold thoſe Miſterious Riddles that you propoſe: as, whether or no they that in a Monarchy would have the King but a Servant to the Commonwealth, will ſay the ſame thing of the whole body of the People in a popular State? And whether all the People ſerve in a Democracy, or only ſome part or other ſerve the reſt? And when they have been an Oedipus to you, by my conſent you ſhall be a Sphinx to them in good earneſt, and throw your ſelf headlong from ſome precipice or other, and break your neck; for elſe I'm afraid you'l never have done with your Riddles and Fooleries. You ask, Whether or no, when St. Paul names Kings, he meant the People? I confeſs St. Paul commands us to pray for Kings, but he had commanded us to pray for the People before, verſ. 1. But there are ſome for all that, both among Kings and common People, that we are forbidden to pray for; and if a man muſt not ſo much as be prayed for, may he not be puniſhed? What ſhould hinder? But, when Paul wrote this Epiſtle, he that reigned was the moſt profligate Perſon in the World. That's falſe. For Ludovicus Capellus makes it evident, that this Epiſtle likewiſe was writ in Claudius's time. When St. Paul has occaſion to ſpeak of Nero, he calls him not a King, but a Lion; that is, a wild, ſavage Beaſt, from whoſe jaws he is glad he was delivered, 2 Tim. 4. So that it is for Kings, not for Beaſts that we are to pray, that under them we may live a quiet and a peaceable life, in all godlineſs and honeſty. Kings and their Intereſt are not the things here intended to be advanced and ſecured; 'tis the publick Peace, Godlineſs and Honeſty, whoſe eſtabliſhment we are commanded to endeavour after, and to pray for. But is there any People in the World that would not chuſe rather to live an honeſt and careful Life, tho never free from War and Troubles, in the defence of themſelves and their Families, whether againſt Tyrants or Enemies (for I make no difference) than under the power of a Tyrant or an Enemy to ſpin out a Life equally troubleſome, accompanied with Slavery and Ignominy? That the latter is the more deſirable of the two, I'll prove by a Teſtimony of your own; not becauſe I think your Authority worth quoting, but that all Men may obſerve how double-tongu'd you are, and how mercenary your Pen is. " Who would not rather, ſay you, bear with thoſe " diſſenſions that through the emulation of great Men often happen in an Ariſtocratical Government, than live under the Tyrannical Government of one, " where nothing but certain miſery and ruin is to be look'd for? The People of " Rome preferr'd their Commonwealth, tho never ſo much ſhatter'd with civil " Broils, before the intolerable Yoke of their Emperors. When a People to " avoid Sedition, ſubmits to a Monarchy, and finds by experience, that that is " the worſt evil of the two, they often deſire to return to their former Govern" ment again. Theſe are your own words, and more you have to this purpoſe in that Diſcourſe concerning Biſhops, which under a feigned name you wrote againſt Petavius the Jeſuit; though your ſelf are more a Jeſuit than he, nay worſe than any of that Crew. We have already heard the ſenſe of the Scripture upon this Subject; and it has been worth our while to take ſome pains to find it out. But perhaps it will not be ſo to enquire into the Judgment of the Fathers, and to ranſack their Volumes: for if they aſſert any thing which is not warranted by the Word of God, we may ſafely reject their authority, be it never ſo great; and particularly that expreſſion that you alledg out of Ireneus, " That God in his Providence orders it ſo, that ſuch Kings reign as are " ſutable to, and proper for the People they are to govern, all Circumſtances " conſidered. That expreſſion, I ſay, is directly contrary to Scripture. For though God himſelf declared openly that it was better for his own people to be governed by Judges than by Kings, yet he left it to them to change that Form of Government for a worſe, if they would themſelves. And we read frequently, that when the body of the People has been good, they have had a wicked King, and contrariwiſe that a good King has ſometimes reign'd when the People have been wicked. So that wiſe and prudent Men are to conſider and ſee what is profitable and fit for the People in general; for it is very certain that the ſame Form of Government is not equally convenient for all Nations, nor for the ſame Nation at all times; but ſometimes one, ſometimes another may be more proper, according as the induſtry and valour of the People may increaſe or decay. But if you deprive the People of this liberty of ſetting up what Government they like beſt among themſelves, you take that from them, in which the life of all Civil Liberty conſiſts. Then you tell us of Juſtin Martyr, of his humble and ſubmiſſive behaviour to the Antonines, thoſe beſt of Emperours; as if any body would not do the like to Princes of ſuch moderation as they were. " How " much worſe Chriſtians are we in theſe days, than thoſe were? They were content to " live under a Prince of another Religion. Alas! They were private Perſons, and infinitely inferior to the contrary party in ſtrength and number. But now Papiſts will not endure a Proteſtant Prince, nor Proteſtants one that is Popiſh. You do well and diſcreetly, in ſhowing your ſelf to be neither Papiſt nor Proteſtant. And you are very liberal in your conceſſions; for now you confeſs that all ſorts of Chriſtians agree in that very thing, that you alone take upon you with ſo much impudence and wickedneſs, to cry down and oppoſe. And how unlike thoſe Fathers that you commend, do you ſhow your ſelf? They wrote Apologies for the Chriſtians to Heathen Princes; you in defence of a wicked Popiſh King, againſt Chriſtians and Proteſtants. Then you entertain us with a number of impertinent quotations out of Athenagoras and Tertullian: Things that we have already heard out of the Writings of the Apoſtles, much more clearly and intelligibly expreſt. But Tertullian was quite of a different opinion from yours, of a King's being a Lord and Maſter over his Subjects: Which you either knew not, or wickedly diſſembled. For he, though he were a Chriſtian, and directed his diſcourſe to a Heathen Emperor, had the confidence to tell him, that an Emperor ought not to be called Lord. " Auguſtus " himſelf, ſays he, that formed this Empire, refus'd that appellation: 'Tis a " Title proper to God only. Not but that the Title of Lord and Maſter may " in ſome ſenſe be aſcribed to the Emperor: But there is a peculiar ſenſe of that " word, which is proper to God only; and in that ſenſe, I will not aſcribe it " to the Emperor. I am the Emperor's free-man. God alone is my Lord and " Maſter. And the ſame Author, in the ſame Diſcourſe; how inconſiſtent, " ſays he, are thoſe two Appellations, Father of his Countrey, and Lord and " Maſter? And now I wiſh you much joy of Tertullian's authority, whom it had been a great deal better you had let alone. But Tertullian calls them Parricides that ſlew Domitian. And he does well, for ſo they were, his Wife and Servants conſpir'd againſt him. And they ſet one Parthenius and Stephanus, who were accus'd for concealing part of the publick Treaſure, to make him away. If the Senate and the People of Rome had proceeded againſt him according to the cuſtom of their Anceſtors; had given Judgment of Death againſt him, as they did once againſt Nero; and had made ſearch for him to put him to death; do ye think Tertullian would have called them Parricides? If he had, he would have deſerv'd to be hang'd, as you do. I give the ſame anſwer to your quotation out of Origen, that I have given already to what you have cited out of Irenaus. Athanaſius indeed ſays, that Kings are not accountable before humane Tribunals. But I wonder who told Athanaſius this? I do not hear that he produces any authority from Scripture, to confirm this aſſertion. And I'll rather believe Kings and Emperors themſelves, who deny that they themſelves have any ſuch Privilege, than I will Athanaſius. Then you quote Ambroſius, who after he had been a Proconſul, and after that became a Catechumen, at laſt got into a Biſhoprick: But for his authority, I ſay, that his Interpretation of thoſe words of David, againſt thee only have I ſinned, is both ignorant and adulatory. He was willing all others ſhould be enthrall'd to the Emperor, that he might enthral the Emperor to himſelf. We all know with what a Papal Pride and Arrogancy he treated Theodoſius the Emperor, how he took upon him to declare him guilty of that Maſſacre at Theſſalonica, and to forbid him coming into the Church; how miſerably raw in Divinity, and unacquainted with the Doctrine of the Goſpel, he ſhewed himſelf upon that occaſion; when the Emperor fell down at his feet, he commanded him to get him out of the Porch. At laſt, when he was received again into the Communion of the Church, and had offered, becauſe he continued ſtanding near to the Altar, the Magiſterial Prelate commanded him out of the Rails; O Emperor, ſays he, theſe inner places are for the Prieſts only, 'tis not lawful for others to come within them! Does this ſound like the behaviour of a Miniſter of the Goſpel, or like that of a Jewiſh High-Prieſt? And yet this man, ſuch as we hear he was, would have the Emperor ride other People, that himſelf might ride him, which is a common trick of almoſt all Eccleſiaſticks. With words to this purpoſe, he put back the Emperor as inferior to himſelf: You rule over men, ſaid he, that are partakers of the ſame Nature, and Fellow-ſervants with your ſelf: For there is one only Lord and King over all, to wit, the Creator of all. This is very pretty! This piece of truth, which the craft and flattery of Clergy-men has all along endeavoured to ſuppreſs and obſcure, was then brought to light by the furious paſſion, or to ſpeak more mildly, by the ignorant indiſcreet zeal of one of them. After you have diſplai'd Ambroſe's ignorance, you ſhow your own, or rather, vent a Hereſie in affirming point blank, That under the Old Teſtament, there was no ſuch thing as forgiveneſs of Sins upon the account of Chriſt's ſufferings; ſince David confeſs'd his tranſgreſſion, ſaying, Againſt thee only have I ſinned, P. 68. 'Tis the Orthodox Tenet, that there never was any remiſſion of Sins, but by the blood of the Lamb that was ſlain from the beginning of the World. I know not whoſe Diſciple you are, that ſet up for a Broacher of new Hereſies: but certain I am, that that great Divnie's Diſciple whom you are ſo angry with, did not miſtake himſelf, when he ſaid that any one of David's Subjects might have ſaid, againſt thee only have I ſinned, as properly, and with as much right, as David himſelf. Then you quote St. Auguſtine, and produce a company of Hipponenſian Divines. What you alledg out of St. Auſtin, makes not at all againſt us. We confeſs that, as the Prophet Daniel has it, it's God that changeth times, ſets up one Kingdom, and pulls down another; we only deſire to have it allow'd us, that he makes uſe of Men as his Inſtruments. If God alone gave a Kingdom to King Charles, God alone has taken it from him again, and given it to the Parliament, and to the People. If therefore our Allegiance was due to King Charles, becauſe God had given him a Kingdom; for the ſame reaſon it is now due to the preſent Magiſtracy. For your ſelf confeſs, that God has given our Magiſtrates ſuch power as he uſes to give to wicked Princes, for the puniſhment of the Nation. And the conſequence of this will be, that according to your own opinion, our preſent Magiſtrates being rais'd and appointed by God, cannot lawfully be depoſed by any, but God himſelf. Thus you overthrow the opinion you pretend to maintain, which is a thing very frequent with you: Your Apology for the King, carries its deaths-wound in it. You have attained to ſuch a prodigious degree of Madneſs and Stupidity, as to prove it unlawful upon any account whatſoever, to lift up ones finger againſt Magiſtrates, and with the very next breath to affirm that it's the duty of their Subjects to riſe up in Rebellion againſt them. You tell us that St. Jerom calls Iſmael that ſlew Gedalia, a Parricide or Traytor: And it is very true, that he was ſo: For Gedalia was Deputy Governour of Judæa, a good man, and ſlain by Iſmael without any cauſe. The ſame Author in his Comment upon the Book of Eccleſiaſtes, ſays, that Solomon's command to keep the King's Commandment, is the ſame with St. Paul's Doctrine, upon the ſame ſubject; and deſerves commendation for having made a more moderate Conſtruction of that Text, than moſt of his Contemporaries. You ſay you will forbear enquiring into the Sentiments of Learned Men that lived ſince St. Auguſtine's time: but to ſhew that you had rather diſpence with a Lie, than not quote any Author that you think makes for you, in the very next period but one, you produce the Authorities of Iſidore, Gregory, and Otho, Spaniſh and Dutch Authors, that liv'd in the moſt barbarous and ignorant ages of all; whoſe Authorities, if you knew how much we deſpiſe, you would not have told a Lie to have quoted them. But would you know the reaſon why he dares not come ſo low as to the preſent times? Why he does as it were hide himſelf, and diſappear, when he comes towards our own times? The reaſon is, Becauſe he knows full well, that as many Eminent Divines as there are of the Reformed Church, ſo many Adverſaries he would have to encounter. Let him take up the Cudgels, if he thinks fit; he will quickly find himſelf run down with innumerable Authorities out of Luther, Zuinglius, Calvin, Bucer, Martyr, Pareus, and the reſt. I could oppoſe you with Teſtimonies out of Divines that have flouriſhed even in Leyden. Though that famous Univerſity and renowned Commonwealth, which has been as it were a Sanctuary for Liberty, thoſe Fountains and Streams of all Polite Learning, have not yet been able to waſh away that ſlaviſh Ruſt that ſticks to you, and infuſe a little Humanity into you. Finding your ſelf deſtitute of any aſſiſtance or help from Orthodox Proteſtant Divines, you have the impudence to betake your ſelf to the Sorboniſts, whoſe College you know is devoted to the Romiſh Religion, and conſequently but of very weak authority amongſt Proteſtants. We are willing to deliver ſo wicked an aſſertor of Tyranny as you, to be drown'd in the Sorbon, as being aſham'd to own ſo deſpicable a Slave as you ſhow your ſelf to be, by maintaining that the whole body of a Nation is not equal in power to the moſt ſlothful degenerate Prince that may be. You labour in vain to lay that upon the Pope, which all free Nations, and all Orthodox Divines own and aſſert. But the Pope and his Clergy, when they were in a low Condition, and but of ſmall account in the World, were the firſt Authors of this pernicious abſurd Doctrine of yours: and when by preaching ſuch Doctrine they had gotten power into their own hands, they became the worſt of Tyrants themſelves. Yet they engaged all Princes to them by the cloſeſt tye imaginable, perſwading the World that was now beſotted with their Superſtition, that it was unlawful to depoſe Princes tho never ſo bad, unleſs the Pope diſpenſed with their Allegiance to them, by abſolving them from their Oaths. But you avoid Orthodox Writers, and endeavour to burden the truth with prejudice and calumny, by making the Pope the firſt aſſertor of what is a known and common received Opinion amongſt them; which if you did not do it cunningly, you would make your ſelf appear to be neither Papiſt nor Proteſtant, but a kind of a Mongrel Idumean Herodian. For as they of old adored one moſt inhumane bloody Tyrant for the Meſſias, ſo you would have the World fall down and worſhip all. You boaſt that you have confirm'd your Opinion by the Teſtimonies of the Fathers that flouriſhed in the four firſt Centuries; whoſe Writings only are Evangelical, and according to the truth of the Chriſtian Religion. This man is paſt all ſhame! how many things did they preach, how many things have they publiſhed, which Chriſt and his Apoſtles never taught? How many things are there in their Writings, in which all Proteſtant Divines differ from them? But what is that Opinion that you have confirm'd by their Authorities? Why, That evil Princes are appointed by God. Allow that, as all other pernicious and deſtructive things are. What then? why, that therefore they have no Judg but God alone, that they are above all humane Laws; that there is no Law, written or unwritten, no Law of Nature, nor of God, to call them to account before their own Subjects. But how comes that to paſs? Certain I am, that there is no Law againſt it: No Penal Law excepts Kings. And all reaſon and juſtice requires, that thoſe that offend, ſhould be puniſhed according to their deſerts, without reſpect of Perſons. Nor have you hitherto produced any one Law, either written or unwritten, of God or of Nature, by which this is forbidden. What ſtands in the way then? Why may not Kings be proceeded againſt? why, becauſe they are appointed by God, be they never ſo bad. I do not know whether I had beſt call you a Knave, or a Fool, or ignorant, unlearned Barbarian. You ſhow your ſelf a vile Wretch, by propagating a Doctrine ſo deſtructive and pernicious; and y'are a Fool for backing it with ſuch ſilly Arguments. God ſays in Iſa. 54. I have created the ſlayer to deſtroy. Then by your reaſon a Murderer is above the Laws. Turn this topſy turvy, and conſider it as long as you will, you'll find the Conſequence to be the ſame with your own. For the Pope is appointed by God, juſt as Tyrants are, and ſet up for the puniſhment of the Church, which I have already demonſtrated out of your own Writings; And yet, ſay you, Wal. Meſ. pag. 412. becauſe he has raiſed his Primacy to an inſufferable height of power, ſo as that he has made it neither better nor worſe than plain downright Tyranny, both he and his Biſhops may be put down more lawfully than they were at firſt ſet up. You tell us that the Pope and the Biſhops (tho God in his wrath appointed them) may yet lawfully be rooted out of the Church, becauſe they are Tyrants; and yet you deny that 'tis lawful to depoſe a Tyrant in the Commonwealth, and that for no other reaſon than becauſe God appointed him, tho he did it in his anger. What ridiculous ſtuff this is! for whereas the Pope cannot hurt a Man's Conſcience againſt his own will, for in the Conſciences of Men it is that his Kingdom conſiſts, yet you are for depoſing him as a grievous Tyrant, in whoſe own power it is not to be a Tyrant; and yet you maintain that a Tyrant properly and truly ſo called, a Tyrant that has all our Lives and Eſtates within his reach, without whoſe aſſiſtance the Pope himſelf could not exerciſe his Tyranny in the Church, ought for Conſcience ſake to be born withal and ſubmitted to. Theſe aſſertions compar'd with one another betray your Childiſhneſs to that degree, that no Man can read your Books, but muſt of neceſſity take notice of your ignorance, raſhneſs, and incogitancy. But you allege another reaſon, Humane Affairs would be turn'd upſide down. They would ſo, and be chang'd for the better. Humane Affairs would certainly be in a deplorable condition, if being once troubled and diſorder'd, there were a neceſſity of their continuing always ſo. I ſay, they would be chang'd for the better, for the King's power would revert to the People, from whom it was firſt derived and conferred upon one of themſelves; and the power would be transferred from him that abuſed it, to them that were prejudiced and injured by the abuſe of it; than which nothing can be more juſt, for there could not well be an Umpire in ſuch a caſe; Who would ſtand to the judgment of a Foreigner? all Mankind would equally be ſubject to the Laws; there would be no Gods of fleſh and blood: Which kind of Deities whoever goes about to ſet up in the World, they are equally injurious to Church and Commonwealth. Now I muſt turn your own Weapons upon you again. You ſay, There can be no greater Hereſy than this, to ſet up one Man in Chriſt's Seat. Theſe two are infallible marks of Antichriſt, Infallibility in Spirituals, and Omnipotence in Temporals. Apparat. ad Prim. pag. 171. Do you pretend that Kings are infallible? If you do not, why do you make them Omnipotent? And how comes it to paſs that an unlimited power in one Man ſhould be accounted leſs deſtructive to Temporal things, than it is to Eccleſiaſtical? Or do you think that God takes no care at all of Civil Affairs? If he takes none himſelf, I'm ſure he does not forbid us to take care which way they go. If he does take any care about them, certainly he would have the ſame Reformation made in the Commonwealth, that he would have made in the Church, eſpecially it being obvious to every Mans experience that Infallibility and Omnipotency being arrogated to one Man, are equally miſchievous in both. God has not ſo modelled the Government of the World as to make it the duty of any Civil Community to ſubmit to the Cruelties of Tyrants, and yet to leave the Church at liberty to free themſelves from Slavery and Tyranny: nay, rather quite contrary, he has put no Arms into the Churches hand but thoſe of Patience and Innocence, Prayer and Eccleſiaſtical Diſcipline; but the Commonwealth, all the Magiſtracy are by him entruſted with the preſervation and execution of the Laws, with the power of puniſhing and revenging; he has put the Sword into their hands. I cannot but ſmile at this Man's prepoſterous whimſies; in Eccleſiaſticks he's Helvidius, Thraſeas, a perfect Tyrannicide. In Politicks no Man more a Lackey and Slave to Tyrants than he. If his Doctrine hold, not we only that have depos'd our King, but the Proteſtants in general, who againſt the minds of their Princes have rejected the Pope, are all Rebels alike. But I've confounded him long enough with his own Arguments. Such is the nature of the Beaſt, leſt his Adverſary ſhould be unprovided, he himſelf furniſhes him with Weapons. Never did any Man give his Antagoniſt greater advantages againſt himſelf than he does. They that he has to do withal, will be ſooner weary of purſuing him, than he of flying.

CHAP. IV.

PErhaps you think, Salmaſius, that you have done enough to ingratiate your ſelf with Princes; that you have deſerved well of 'em: but if they conſider their own Intereſt, and take their meaſures according to what it really is, not according to the falſe Gloſs that your flatteries have put upon it, there never was any Man in the World that deſerv'd ſo ill of 'em as you, none more deſtructive and pernicious to them and their intereſt in the whole World than your ſelf. For by exalting the Power of Kings above all Humane Laws, you tell all Mankind that are ſubject to ſuch a Government, that they are no better than Slaves, and make them but the more deſirous of Liberty by diſcovering to them their error, and putting that into their heads that they never ſo much as dreamt of before, to wit, that they are Slaves to their Princes. And without doubt ſuch a ſort of Government will be more irkſome and unſufferable, by how much the more you perſwade the World, that it is not by the allowance and ſubmiſſion of Nations, that Kings have obtained this exorbitant Power; but that it is abſolutely eſſential to ſuch a form of Government, and of the nature of the thing itſelf. So that whether you make the World of your mind or no, your Doctrine muſt needs be miſchievous and deſtructive, and ſuch as cannot but be abhorred of all Princes. For if you ſhould work men into a perſwaſion that the Right of Kings is without all bounds, they would no longer be ſubject to a Kingly Government; if you miſs of your aim, yet you make men weary of Kings, by telling them that they aſſume ſuch a power to themſelves, as of right belonging to them. But if Princes will allow of thoſe Principles that I aſſert; if they will ſuffer themſelves and their own power to be circumſcribed by Laws, inſtead of an uncertain, weak and violent Government, full of cares and fears, they will reign peaceably, quietly, and ſecurely. If they ſlight this counſel of mine, though wholſome in its ſelf, becauſe of the meanneſs of the Author, they ſhall know that it is not my counſel only, but what was anciently adviſed by one of the wiſeſt of Kings. For Lycurgus King of Lacedemon, when he obſerved that his own Relations that were Princes of Argos and Meſſana, by endeavouring to introduce an Arbitrary Government, had ruin'd themſelves and their People; he, that he might benefit his Country, and ſecure the Succeſſion to his own Family, could think upon no better expedient, than to communicate his Power to the Senate, and taking the great Men of the Realm into part of the Government with himſelf; and by this means the Crown continued in his Family for many ages. But whether it was Lycurgus, or, as ſome learned men are of opinion, Theopompus, that introduced that mixt Form of Government among the Lacedemonians, ſomewhat more than a hundred years after Lycurgus's time (of whom it is recorded, that he uſed to boaſt, that by advancing the Power of the Senate above that of the Prince, he had ſetled the Kingdom upon a ſure Foundation, and was like to leave it in a laſting and durable condition to his Poſterity) which of them ſoever it was, I ſay, he has left a good Example to Modern Princes; and was as creditable a Counſellor, as his Counſel was ſafe. For that all men ſhould ſubmit to any one man, ſo as to acknowledg a Power in him ſuperior to all humane Laws, neither did any Law ever enact, nor indeed was it poſſible that any ſuch Law ſhould ever be; for that cannot be ſaid to be a Law, that ſtrikes at the root of all Laws, and takes them quite away. It being apparent that your Poſitions are inconſiſtent with the nature of all Laws, being ſuch as render them no Laws at all. You endeavour notwithſtanding, in this Fourth Chapter, to make good by Examples, what you have not been able to do by any Reaſons that you have alledged hitherto. Let's conſider whether your Examples help your Cauſe; for they many times make things plain, which the Laws are either altogether ſilent in, or do but hint at. We'll begin firſt with the Jews, whom we ſuppoſe to have known moſt of the mind of God; and then, according to your own method, we'll come to the Times of Chriſtianity. And firſt, for thoſe Times in which the Iſraelites being ſubject to Kings, who, or howſoever they were, did their utmoſt to caſt that ſlaviſh yoke from off their necks. Eglon the King of Moab had made a Conqueſt of them; the Seat of his Empire was at Jericho; he was no contemner of the true God; when his Name was mentioned, he roſe from his Seat: The Iſraelites had ſerved him eighteen Years; they ſent a Preſent to him, not as to an Enemy, but to their own Prince; notwithſtanding which outward Veneration and Profeſſion of Subjection, they kill him by a wile, as an Enemy to their Countrey. You'll ſay perhaps, that Ehud, who did that action, had a Warrant from God for ſo doing. He had ſo, 'tis like; and what greater Argument of its being a warrantable and praiſe-worthy action? God uſes not to put Men upon things that are unjuſt, treacherous and cruel, but upon ſuch things as are vertuous and laudable. But we read no where that there was any poſitive Command from Heaven in the caſe. The Iſraelites called upon God; So did we. And God ſtirred up a Saviour for them; ſo he did for us. Eglon of a Neighbouring Prince became a Prince of the Jews; of an Enemy to them he became their King. Our Gentleman of an Engliſh King became an Enemy to the Engliſh Nation; ſo that he ceas'd to be a King. Thoſe Capacities are inconſiſtent No Man can be a Member of the State, and an Enemy to it at the ſame time. Antony was never lookt upon by the Romans as a Conſul, nor Nero as an Emperor, after the Senate had voted them both Enemies. This Cicero tells us in his Fourth Philippick: If Antony be a Conſul, ſays he, Brutus is an Enemy; but if Brutus be a Saviour and Preſerver of the Commonwealth, Antony is an Enemy: none but robbers count him a Conſul. By the ſame reaſon, ſay I, who but Enemies to their Countrey look upon a Tyrant as a King? So that Eglon's being a Foreigner, and King Charles a Prince of our own, will make no difference in the caſe; both being Enemies, and both Tyrants, they are in the ſame circumſtances. If Ehud kill'd him juſtly, we have done ſo too in putting our King to death. Sampſon that Renowned Champion of the Hebrews, tho his Countrey-men blam'd him for it, Doſt thou not know, ſay they, that the Philiſtines have dominion over us? Yet againſt thoſe Philiſtines, under whoſe Dominion he was, he himſelf undertook a War in his own Perſon, without any other help; and whether he acted in purſuance of a Command from Heaven, or was prompted by his own Valour only; or whatſoever inducement he had, he did not put to death one, but many that tyrannized over his Countrey, having firſt called upon God by Prayer, and implored his Aſſiſtance. So that Sampſon counted it no act of Impiety, but quite contrary, to kill thoſe that enſlaved his Countrey, tho they had dominion over himſelf too; and tho the greater part of his Countrymen ſubmitted to their Tyranny. But yet David who was both a King and a Prophet, would not take away Saul's life, becauſe he was God's anointed. Does it follow that becauſe David refuſed to do a thing, therefore we are obliged not to do that very thing? David was a private Perſon, and would not kill the King; is that a precedent for a Parliament, for a whole Nation? David would not revenge his own Quarrel, by putting his Enemy to death by ſtealth; does it follow that therefore the Magiſtrates muſt not puniſh a Malefactor according to Law? He would not kill a King; Muſt not an Aſſembly of the States therefore puniſh a Tyrant? He ſcrupled the killing of God's anointed; Muſt the People therefore ſcruple to condemn their own anointed? Eſpecially one that after having ſo long profeſſed Hoſtility againſt his own People, had waſh'd off that anointing of his, whether Sacred or Civil, with the Blood of his own Subjects. I confeſs that thoſe Kings whom God by his Prophets anointed to be Kings, or appointed to ſome ſpecial ſervice, as he did Cyrus, Iſa. 44. may not improperly be called the Lord's anointed; but all other Princes, according to the ſeveral ways of their coming to the Government, are the People's anointed, or the Army's, or many times the anointed of their own Faction only. But taking it for granted, That all Kings are God's anointed, you can never prove, That therefore they are above all Laws, and not to be called in queſtion, what Villanies ſoever they commit. What if David laid a charge upon himſelf and other private Perſons not to ſtretch forth their hands againſt the Lords anointed? Does not God himſelf command Princes not ſo much as to touch his anointed? Which were no other than his People, Pſal. 105. He preferred that anointing wherewith his People were anointed, before that of Kings, if any ſuch thing were. Would any man offer to infer from this place of the Pſalmiſt, That Believers are not to be called in queſtion, tho they offend againſt the Laws, becauſe God commands Princes not to touch his Anointed? King Solomon was about to put to death Abiathar the Prieſt, tho he were God's Anointed too; and did not ſpare him becauſe of his Anointing, but becauſe he had been his Father's Friend. If that Sacred and Civil Anointing, wherewith the High-Prieſt of the Jews was anointed, whereby he was not only conſtituted High-Prieſt, but a Temporal Magiſtrate in many caſes, did not exempt him from the Penalty of the Laws; how comes a Civil Anointing only to exempt a Tyrant? But you ſay, Saul was a Tyrant, and worthy of death: What then? It does not follow, that becauſe he deſerved it, that David in the circumſtances he was then under, had power to put him to death without the People's Authority, or the Command of the Magiſtracy. But was Saul a Tyrant? I wiſh you would ſay ſo; indeed you do ſo, though you had ſaid before in your Second Book, page 32. That he was no Tyrant, but a good King, and choſen of God. Why ſhould falſe Accuſers, and Men guilty of Forgery be branded, and you eſcape without the like ignominious Mark? For they practiſe their Villanies with leſs Treachery and Deceit than you write, and treat of matters of the greateſt moment. Saul was a good King, when it ſerv'd your turn to have him ſo; and now he's a Tyrant, becauſe it ſutes with your preſent purpoſe. But 'tis no wonder that you make a Tyrant of a good King; for your Principles look as if they were invented for no other deſign, than to make all good Kings ſo. But yet David, tho he would not put to death his Father-in-Law, for Cauſes and Reaſons that we have nothing to do withal, yet in his own Defence he raiſed an Army, took and poſſeſſed Cities that belong'd to Saul, and would have defended Keilah againſt the King's Forces, had he not underſtood that the Citizens would be falſe to him. Suppoſe Saul had beſieged the Town, and himſelf had been the firſt that had ſcal'd the Walls; do you think David would preſently have thrown down his Arms, and have betray'd all thoſe that aſſiſted him to his anointed Enemy? I believe not. What reaſon have we to think David would have ſtuck to do what we have done, who when his Occaſions and Circumſtances ſo required, proffered his Aſſiſtance to the Philiſtines, who were then the profeſſed Enemies of his Country, and did that againſt Saul, which I am ſure we ſhould never have done againſt our Tyrant? I'm weary of mentioning your Lies, and aſham'd of them. You ſay, 'tis a Maxim of the Engliſh, That Enemies are rather to be ſpared than Friends; and that therefore we conceived we ought not to ſpare our King's Life, becauſe he had been our Friend. You impudent Lyar, what Mortal ever heard this Whimſy before you invented it? But we'll excuſe it. You could not bring in that thredbare Flouriſh, of our being more fierce than our own Maſtiffs (which now comes in the fifth time, and will as oft again before we come to the end of your Book) without ſome ſuch Introduction. We are not ſo much more fierce than our own Maſtiffs, as you are more hungry than any Dog whatſoever, who return ſo greedily to what you have vomited up ſo often. Then you tell us, That David commanded the Amalekite to be put to death, who pretended to have killed Saul. But that Inſtance, neither in reſpect of the Fact, nor the Perſon, has any Affinity with what we are diſcourſing of. I do not well underſtand what cauſe David had to be ſo ſevere upon that Man, for pretending to have haſtned the King's death, and in effect but to have put him out of his pain, when he was dying; unleſs it were to take away from the Iſraelites all ſuſpicion of his own having been inſtrumental in it, whom they might look upon as one that had revolted to the Philiſtines, and was part of their Army. Juſt ſuch another Action as this of David's, do all Men blame in Domitian, who put to death Epaphroditus, becauſe he had helped Nero to kill himſelf. After all this, as another inſtance of your Impudence, you call him not only the anointed of the Lord, but the Lord's Chriſt, who a little before you had ſaid was a Tyrant, and acted by the impulſe of ſome evil Spirit. Such mean thoughts you have of that Reverend Name, that you are not aſham'd to give it to a Tyrant, whom you your ſelf confeſs to have been poſſeſſed with the Devil. Now I come to that Precedent, from which every Man that is not blind muſt needs infer the Right of the People to be ſuperior to that of Kings. When Solomon was dead, the People aſſembled themſelves at Sichem to make Rehoboam King. Thither himſelf went, as one that ſtood for the place, that he might not ſeem to claim the Succeſſion as his Inheritance, nor the ſame Right over a freeborn People that every Man has over his Father's Sheep and Oxen. The People propoſe Conditions, upon which they were willing to admit him to the Government. He deſires three days time to adviſe; he conſults with the old Men; they tell him no ſuch thing, as that he had an abſolute Right to ſucceed, but perſwade him to comply with the People, and ſpeak them fair, it being in their Power whether he ſhould reign or not. Then he adviſes with the young Men that were brought up with him; they, as if Salmaſius's Phrenſy had taken them, thunder this Right of Kings into his Ears; perſwade him to threaten the People with Whips and Scorpions: And he anſwered the People as they adviſed him. When all Iſrael ſaw that the King hearkned not to them, then they openly proteſt the Right of the People, and their own Liberty; What portion have we in David? To thy Tents, O Iſrael: now look to thine own Houſe, David. When the King ſent Adoram to them, they ſtoned him with Stones, and perhaps they would not have ſtuck to have ſerv'd the King himſelf ſo, but he made haſte and got out of the way. The next News is of a great Army rais'd by Rehoboam to reduce the Iſraelites to their Allegiance. God forbids him to proceed, Go not up, ſays he, to war againſt your Brethren the Children of Iſrael; for this thing is of me. Now conſider; heretofore the People had deſired a King; God was diſpleaſed with them for it, but yet permitted them to make a King, according to that Right that all Nations have to appoint their own Governors. Now the People reject Rehoboam from ruling them; and this God not only ſuffers them to do, but forbids Rehoboam to make War againſt them for it, and ſtops him in his undertaking; and teaches him withal, that thoſe that had revolted from him, were not Rebels in ſo doing; but that he ought to look upon them as Brethren. Now recollect your ſelf: You ſay that all Kings are of God, and that therefore the People ought not to reſiſt them, be they never ſuch Tyrants. I anſwer you, The Convention of the People, their Votes, their Acts, are likewiſe of God, and that by the Teſtimony of God himſelf in this place; and conſequently according to your Argument, by the Authority of God himſelf, Princes ought not to reſiſt the People. For as certain as it is, that Kings are of God, and whatever Argument you may draw from thence to enforce a Subjection on and Obedience to them: So certain is it, that free Aſſemblies of the Body of the People are of God, and that naturally affords the ſame Argument for their Right of reſtraining Princes from going beyond their Bounds, and rejecting them if there be occaſion; nor is their ſo doing a juſtifiable Cauſe of War, any more than the People of Iſrael's rejecting Rehoboam was. You ask, why the People did not revolt from Solomon? Who but you would ask ſuch an impertinent Queſtion? You ſee they did revolt from a Tyrant, and were neither puniſhed, nor blam'd for it. It is true, Solomon fell into ſome Vices, but he was not therefore a Tyrant; he made amends for his Vices by many excellent Vertues, that he was famous for, by many Benefits which accrued to the Nation of the Jews by his Government. But admit that he had been a Tyrant: Many times the Circumſtances of a Nation are ſuch, that the People will not, and many times ſuch, that they cannot depoſe a Tyrant. You ſee they did it when it was in their Power. But, ſay you, Jeroboam's Act was ever had in Deteſtation; 'twas looked upon as an unjuſt revolt from a lawful Prince; he and his Succeſſors were accounted Rebels. I confeſs we find his revolt from the true Worſhip of God often found fault with; but I no where find him blam'd for revolting from Rehoboam; and his Succeſſors are frequently ſpoken of as wicked Princes, but not as Rebels. Acting contrary to Law and Right, ſay you, cannot introduce, or eſtabliſh a Right. I pray, what becomes then of your Right of Kings? Thus do you perpetually baffle your ſelf. You ſay, Adulteries, Murders, Thefts are daily committed with impunity. Are you not aware, that here you give an anſwer to your own Queſtion, how it comes to paſs, that Tyrants do ſo often eſcape unpuniſhed? You ſay, Thoſe Kings were Rebels, and yet the Prophets do no where diſſwade the People from their Allegiance. And why do you, ye raſcally falſe Prophet, endeavour to perſwade the People of England not to yield Obedience to their preſent Magiſtrates, tho in your Opinion they are Rebels? This Engliſh Faction of Robbers, ſay you, alledg for themſelves, that by ſome immediate Voice from Heaven, they were put upon their bloody Enterprize. It is notoriouſly evident, that you were diſtracted when you wrote theſe Lines; for as you have put the words together, they are neither Latin, nor Senſe. And that the Engliſh pretend to any ſuch warrant, as a Juſtification of their Actions, is one of thoſe many Lies and Fictions that your Book is full of. But I proceed to urge you with Examples. Libna, a great City revolted from Joram, becauſe he had forſaken God; 'twas the King therefore that was guilty, not the City, nor is the City blam'd for it. He that conſiders the reaſon that's given why that City rejected his Government, muſt conclude that the Holy Ghoſt rather approves of what they did, then condemns them for it. Theſe kind of revolts are no precedents, ſay you. But why were you then ſo vain, as to promiſe in the beginning of this Chapter, that you would argue from Examples, whereas all the Examples that you alledg, are meer Negatives, which prove nothing? and when we urge Examples that are ſolid and poſitive, you ſay they are no Precedents. Who would endure ſuch a way of arguing? You challenged us at Precedents; we produced them; and what do you do? You hang back, and get out of the way. I proceed: Jehu at the Command of a Prophet, ſlew a King; nay, he ordered the death of Ahaziah, his own Liege Prince. If God would not have Tyrants put to death by their own Subjects, if it were a wicked thing ſo to do, a thing of a bad Example; why did God himſelf command it? If he commanded it, it was a lawful, commendable, and a praiſe-worthy Action. It was not therefore lawful to kill a Tyrant, becauſe God commanded it; but God commanded it, becauſe antecedently to his Command, it was a juſtifiable, and a lawful Action. Again, Jehoiada the High-Prieſt did not ſcruple to depoſe Athaliah, and kill her, tho ſhe had been ſeven years in actual Poſſeſſion of the Crown. But, ſay you, ſhe took upon her the Government when ſhe had no Right to it. And did not you ſay your ſelf, but a while ago, That Tiberius aſſumed the Soveraignty when it belonged not at all to him? And yet you then affirm'd, that according to our Saviour's Doctrine, we ought to yield Obedience to ſuch Tyrants as he was. 'Twere a moſt ridiculous thing to imagine, that a Prince, who gets in by Uſurpation, may lawfully be depoſed; but one that rules tyrannically may not. But, ſay you, Athaliah could not poſſibly reign according to the Law of the Jewiſh Kingdom, Thou ſhalt ſet over thee a King, ſays God Almighty; he does not ſay, Thou ſhalt ſet over thee a Queen. If this Argument have any weight, I may as well ſay, the Command of God was, that the People ſhould ſet over themſelves a King, not a Tyrant. So that I'm even with you. Amazias was a ſlothful, idolatrous Prince, and was put to death, not by a few Conſpirators; but rather, it ſhould ſeem, by the Nobility, and by the Body of the People. For he fled from Jeruſalem, had none to ſtand by him, and they purſued him to Lachiſh: They took counſel againſt him, ſays the Hiſtory, becauſe he had forſaken God: And we do not find that Azarius his Son proſecuted thoſe that had cut off his Father. You quote a great many frivolous paſſages out of the Rabbins, to prove that the Kings of the Jews were ſuperiour to the Sanhedrim. You do not conſider Zedekia's own words, Jerem 38. The King is not he that can do any thing againſt you. So that this was the Prince's own ſtile. Thus he confeſſed himſelf inferior to the great Council of the Realm. Perhaps, ſay you, he meant that he durſt not deny them any thing for fear of Sedition. But what does your perhaps ſignify, whoſe moſt poſitive aſſerting any thing is not worth a Louſe? For nothing in Nature can be more fickle and inconſiſtent than you are. How oft have you appear'd in this Diſcourſe inconſtant with your ſelf; unſaying with one Breath what you had ſaid with another? Here, again, you make Compariſons betwixt King Charles, and ſome of the good Kings of Judah. You ſpeak contemptibly of David, as if he were not worthy to come in competition with him. Conſider David, ſay you, an Adulterer, a Murderer; King Charles was guilty of no ſuch Crimes. Solomon his Son, who was accounted wiſe, &c. Who can with patience hear this filthy, raſcally Fool, ſpeak ſo irreverently of Perſons eminent both in Greatneſs and Piety? Dare you compare King David with King Charles; a moſt Religious King and Prophet, with a Superſtitious Prince, and who was but a Novice in the Chriſtian Religion; a moſt prudent, wiſe Prince with a weak one; a valiant Prince with a cowardly one; finally, a moſt juſt Prince with a moſt unjuſt one? Have you the impudence to commend his Chaſtity and Sobriety, who is known to have committed all manner of Leudneſs in company with his Confident the Duke of Buckingham? It were to no purpoſe to enquire into the private Actions of his Life, who publickly at Plays would embrace and kiſs the Ladies laſciviouſly, and handle Virgins and Matrons Breaſts, not to mention the reſt? I adviſe you therefore, you counterfeit Plutarch, to abſtain from ſuch like Parallels, leſt I be forced to publiſh thoſe things concerning King Charles, which I am willing to conceal. Hitherto we have entertain'd our ſelves with what the People of the Jews have acted or attempted againſt Tyrants, and by what Right they did it in thoſe times, when God himſelf did immediately, as it were, by his Voice from Heaven govern their Commonwealth. The Ages that ſucceeded, do not afford us any Authority, as from themſelves, but confirm us in our Opinion by their imitating the Actions of their Fore-fathers. For after the Babyloniſh Captivity, when God did not give any new command concerning the Crown, tho the Royal Line was not extinct, we find the People returning to the old Moſaical Form of Government again. They were one while Tributaries to Antiochus, King of Syria; yet when he injoyn'd them things that were contrary to the Law of God, they reſiſted him, and his Deputies, under the Conduct of their Prieſts, the Maccabees, and by force regain'd their former Liberty. After that, whoever was accounted moſt worthy of it, had the Principality conferr'd upon him. Till at laſt, Hircanus the Son of Simon, the Brother of Judah, the Maccabee, having ſpoiled David's Sepulchre, entertain'd foreign Soldiers, and began to inveſt the Prieſthood with a kind of Regal Power. After whoſe time his Son Ariſtobulus was the firſt that aſſum'd the Crown; he was a Tyrant indeed, and yet the People ſtirred not againſt him, which is no great wonder, for he reigned but one Year. And he himſelf being overtaken with a grievous Diſeaſe, and repenting of his own Cruelty and Wickedneſs, deſired nothing more than to dye, and had his wiſh. His Brother Alexander ſucceeded him; and againſt him, you ſay, the People raiſed no Inſurrection, tho he were a Tyrant too. And this Lie might have gone down with us, if Joſephus's Hiſtory had not been extant. We ſhould then have had no memory of thoſe times, but what your Joſippus would afford us, out of whom you tranſcribe a few ſenſeleſs and uſeleſs Apothegms of the Phariſees. The Hiſtory is thus: Alexander adminiſtred the Publick Affairs ill, both in War and Peace; and tho he kept in pay great numbers of Piſidians and Cilicians, yet could he not protect himſelf from the Rage of the People: but whilſt he was ſacrificing they fell upon him, and had almoſt ſmother'd him with Boughs of Palmtrees and Citron-trees. Afterward the whole Nation made War upon him ſix Years, during which time, when many thouſands of the Jews had been ſlain, and he himſelf being at length deſirous of Peace, demanded of them, what they would have him do to ſatisfy them; they told him nothing could do that, but his Blood, nay, that they ſhould hardly pardon him after his death. This Hiſtory you perceiv'd was not for your purpoſe, and ſo you put it off with a few Phariſaical Sentences; when it had been much better, either to have let it quite alone, or to have given a true Relation of it: but you truſt to Lies more than to the Truth of your Cauſe. Even thoſe eight hundred Phariſees, whom he commanded to be crucified, were of their number that had taken up Arms againſt him. And they with the reſt of the People had ſolemnly proteſted, That if they could ſubdue the King's Forces, and get his Perſon into their Power, they would put him to death. After the death of Alexander, his Wife Alexandra took the Government upon her, as Athalia had formerly done, not according to Law (for you have confeſſed, that the Laws of the Jews admitted not a Female to wear the Crown) but ſhe got it partly by force, for ſhe maintain'd an Army of Foreigners; and partly by favour, for ſhe had brought over the Phariſees to her Intereſt, which ſort of Men were of the greateſt Authority with the People. Them ſhe had made her own, by putting the Power into their Hands, and retaining to her ſelf only the Name. Juſt as the Scotch Presbyterians lately allowed Charles the Name of King, but upon condition, that he would let them be King in effect. After the death of Alexandra, Hyrcanus and Ariſtobulus, her Sons, contended for the Sovereignty: Ariſtobulus was more induſtrious, and having a greater Party, forced his Elder Brother out of the Kingdom. A while after, when Pompey paſſed through Syria, in his return from the Mithridatick War; the Jews, ſuppoſing they had now an opportunity of regaining their Liberty, by referring their Cauſe to him, diſpatcht an Embaſſy to him in their own Names; they renounce both the Brothers; complain that they had enſlaved them. Pompey depoſed Ariſtobulus, leaves the Prieſthood, and ſuch a Principality as the Laws allowed to Hyrcanus the Elder. From that time forward he was called High-Prieſt, and Ethnarcha. After theſe times in the Reign of Archelaus, the Son of Herod, the Jews ſent fifty Ambaſſadors to Auguſtus Cæſar; accuſed Herod that was dead, and Archelaus his Son, that then reigned; they depoſed him as much as in them lay, and petition'd the Emperor, that the People of the Jews might be govern'd without a King. Cæſar was moved at their entreaty, and did not appoint a King over them, but a Governour, whom they called an Ethnarch. When that Governour had preſided ten years over Judea, the People ſent Ambaſſadors again to Rome, and accuſed him of Tyranny. Cæſar heard them graciouſly; ſent for the Governour, condemn'd him to perpetual Exile, and baniſhed him to Vienna. Anſwer me now, That People that accuſed their own Princes, that deſir'd their Condemnation, that deſir'd their Puniſhment, would not they themſelves rather, if it had been in their Power, and that they might have had their choice; would not they, I ſay, rather have put them to death themſelves? You do not deny, but that the People, and the Nobles often took up Arms againſt the Roman Deputies, when by their Avarice, or their Cruelty, their Government was burdenſome and oppreſſive. But you give a ridiculous reaſon for this, as all the reſt of yours are. You ſay, They were not yet accuſtomed to the Yoke; very like they were not, under Alexander, Herod, and his Son. But, ſay you, they would not raiſe War againſt Caius Cæſar, nor Petronius. I confeſs they did not, and they did very prudently in abſtaining, for they were not able. Will you hear their own words upon that occaſion? We will not make War, ſay they, becauſe we cannot. That thing which they themſelves acknowledg, they refrain'd from for want of Ability; you, falſe Hypocrite, pretend they abſtain'd from out of Religion. Then with a great deal of toil you do juſt nothing at all; for you endeavour to prove out of the Fathers (tho you had done it as ſuperficially before) that Kings are to be prayed for. That good Kings are to be pray'd for, no Man denies; nay, and bad ones too, as long as there are any hopes of them: ſo we ought to pray for Highway-men, and for our Enemies. But how? Not that they may plunder, ſpoil and murder us; but that they may repent. We pray both for Thieves and Enemies; and yet whoever dreamt but that it was lawful to put the Laws in execution againſt one, and to fight againſt the other?

I value not the Egyptian Liturgy that you quote; but the Prieſt that you mention, who prayed that Commodus might ſuceed his Father in the Empire, did not pray for any thing in my opinion, but imprecated all the miſchiefs imaginable to the Roman State. You ſay, that we have broken our Faith, which we engaged more than once in ſolemn Aſſemblies to preſerve the Authority and Majeſty of the King. But becauſe hereafter you are more large upon that ſubject, I ſhall paſs it by in this place; and talk with you when you come to it again. You return then to the Fathers; concerning whom take this in ſhort. Whatever they ſay, which is not warranted by the Authority of the Scriptures, or by good Reaſon, ſhall be of no more regard with me, than if any other ordinary Man had ſaid it. The firſt that you quote is Tertullian, who is no Orthodox Writer, notorious for many errors; whoſe authority, if he were of your opinion, would ſtand you in no ſtead. But what ſays he? He condemns Tumults and Rebellions. So do we. But in ſaying ſo, we do not mean to deſtroy all the Peoples Rights and Privileges, all the Authority of Senates, the Power of all Magiſtrates, the King only excepted. The Fathers declaim againſt Seditions raſhly raiſed, by the giddy heat of the multitude; they ſpeak not of the inferior Magiſtrates, of Senates, of Parliaments encouraging the People to a lawful oppoſing of a Tyrant. Hence Ambroſe whom you quote, “ Not to reſiſt, ſays he, but to weep and to ſigh, “ theſe are the Bulwarks of the Prieſthood; what one is there of our little number who dares ſay to the Emperor, I do not like your Laws? This is not allowed the Prieſts, and ſhall Lay-men pretend to it? 'Tis evident of what ſort of Perſons he ſpeaks, viz. of the Prieſts, and ſuch of the People as are private Men, not of the Magiſtrates. You ſee by how weak and prepoſterous a reaſon he lighted a Torch as it were to the diſſentions that were afterwards to ariſe betwixt the Laity and the Clergy concerning even Civil, or Temporal Laws. But becauſe you think you preſs hardeſt upon us with the Examples of the Primitive Chriſtians; who tho they were haraſſed as much as a People could be, yet, you ſay, they never took up Arms againſt the Emperour: I will make it appear, in the firſt place, that for the moſt part they could not: Secondly, that whenever they could, they did: And thirdly, that whether they did or did not, they were ſuch a ſort of People, as that their example deſerves but to have little ſway with us. Firſt therefore, no Man can be ignorant of this, that when the Commonwealth of Rome expired, the whole and ſovereign power in the Empire was ſetled in the Emperour; that all the Souldiers were under his pay; inſomuch that if the whole Body of the Senate, the Equeſtrian Order, and all the common People had endeavoured to work a change, they might have made way for a maſſacre of themſelves, but could not in any probability retrieve their loſt Liberty: for the Empire would ſtill have continued, tho they might perhaps have been ſo lucky as to have kill'd the Emperour. This being ſo, what could the Chriſtians do? 'tis true there were a great many of them; but they were diſperſed, they were generally Perſons of mean quality, and but of ſmall intereſt in the World. How many of them would one Legion have been able to keep in awe? Could ſo inconſiderable a body of Men as they were in thoſe days, ever expect to accompliſh an Enterprize that many famous Generals, and whole Armies of tried Soldiers had loſt their lives in attempting? When about 300 years after our Saviour's Nativity, which was near upon 20 years before the Reign of Conſtantine the Great, when Diocleſian was Emperour, there was but one Chriſtian Legion in the whole Roman Empire; which Legion for no other reaſon than becauſe it conſiſted of Chriſtians, was ſlain by the reſt of the Army at a Town in France called Octodurum. The Chriſtians, ſay you, conſpir'd not with Caſſius, with Albinus, with Niger; and does Tertullian think they merited by not being willing to loſe their lives in the quarrels of Infidels? 'Tis evident therefore that the Chriſtians could not free themſelves from the yoke of the Roman Emperours; and it could be no ways advantageous to their intereſt to conſpire with Infidels, as long as Heathen Emperours reign'd. But that afterwards the Chriſtians made War upon Tyrants, and defended themſelves by force of Arms when there was occaſion, and many times revenged upon Tyrants their Enormities, I am now about to make appear. In the firſt place, Conſtantine being a Chriſtian, made War upon Licinius, and cut him off, who was his Partner in the Sovereign Power, becauſe he moleſted the Eaſtern Chriſtians; by which act of his he declared thus much at leaſt, That one Magiſtrate might puniſh another: For he for his Subjects ſake puniſhed Li- cinius, who to all intents was as abſolute in the Empire as himſelf, and did not leave the vengeance to God alone: Licinius might have done the ſame to Conſtantine, if there had been the like occaſion. So then, if the matter be not wholly reſerved to Gods own Tribunal, but that Men have ſomething to do in the caſe, why did not the Parliament of England ſtand in the ſame relation to King Charles, that Conſtantine did to Licinius? The Soldiers made Conſtantine what he was. But our Laws have made our Parliaments equal, nay, ſuperior to our Kings. The Inhabitants of Conſtantinople reſiſted Conſtantius an Arian Emperour, by force of Arms, as long as they were able; they oppoſed Hermogenes whom he had ſent with a Military power to depoſe Paul an Orthodox Biſhop; the houſe whither he had betaken himſelf for ſecurity, they fired about his ears, and at laſt killed him right out. Conſtans threatned to make War upon his Brother Conſtantius, unleſs he would reſtore Paul and Athanaſius to their Biſhopricks. You ſee thoſe holy Fathers, when their Biſhopricks were in danger, were not aſhamed to ſtir up their Prince's own Brother to make War upon him. Not long after, the Chriſtian Soldiers, who then made whom they would Emperors, put to death Conſtans the Son of Conſtantinus, becauſe he behaved himſelf diſſolutely and proudly in the Government, and tranſlated the Empire to Magnentius. Nay, thoſe very perſons that ſaluted Julian by the name of Emperour, againſt Conſtantius's will, who was actually in poſſeſſion of the Empire, (for Julian was not then an Apoſtate, but a vertuous and valiant perſon) are they not amongſt the number of thoſe Primitive Chriſtians, whoſe Example you propoſe to us for our imitation? Which action of theirs, when Conſtantius by his Letters to the People very ſharply and earneſtly forbad, (which Letters were openly read to them) they all cried out unanimouſly, That themſelves had but done what the Provincial Magiſtrates, the Army, and the Authority of the Commonwealth had decreed. The ſame perſons declared War againſt Conſtantius, and contributed as much as in them lay, to deprive him both of his Government and his Life. How did the Inhabitants of Antioch behave themſelves, who were none of the worſt ſort of Chriſtians? I'll warrant you they prayed for Julian, after he became an Apoſtate, whom they uſed to rail at in his own preſence, and ſcoffing at his long Beard bid him make Ropes of it: Upon the news of whoſe death they offer'd publick Thankſgivings, made Feaſts, and gave other publick Demonſtrations of Joy. Do you think they uſed when he was alive to pray for the continuance of his life and health? Nay, is it not reported, that a Chriſtian Soldier in his own Army was the Author of his death? Sozomen, a Writer of Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, does not deny it, but commends him that did it, if the Fact were ſo; 'For it is no wonder, ſays he, that ſome of his own Soldiers 'might think within himſelf, that not only the Greeks, but all Mankind hitherto 'had agreed that it was a commendable action to kill a Tyrant; and that they 'deſerve all mens praiſe, who are willing to die themſelves to procure the liberty of all others: ſo that that Soldier ought not raſhly to be condemned, 'who in the Cauſe of God and of Religion, was ſo zealous and valiant. Theſe are the words of Sozomen, a good and Religious Man of that age. By which we may eaſily apprehend what the general opinion of pious men in thoſe days was upon this point. Ambroſe himſelf being commanded by the Emperour Valentinian the Younger, to depart from Milan, refuſed to obey him, but defended himſelf and the Palace by force of Arms againſt the Emperour's Officers, and took upon him, contrary to his own Doctrin, to reſiſt the higher powers. There was a great ſedition raiſed at Conſtantinople againſt the Emperour Arcadius, more than once, by reaſon of Chryſoſtom's Exile. Hitherto I have ſhewn how the Primitive Chriſtians behaved themſelves towards Tyrants; how not only the Chriſtian Soldiers, and the People, but the Fathers of the Church themſelves, have both made War upon them, and oppoſed them with force, and all this before St. Auſtin's time: for you your ſelf are pleaſed to go down no lower; and therefore I make no mention of Valentinian the Son of Placidia, who was ſlain by Maximus a Senator, for committing Adultery with his Wife; nor do I mention Avitus the Emperour, whom, becauſe he diſbanded the Soldiers, and betook himſelf wholly to a luxurious life, the Roman Senate immediately depoſed; becauſe theſe things came to paſs ſome years after St. Auſtin's death. But all this I give you: Suppoſe I had not mentioned the practice of the Primitive Chriſtians; ſuppoſe they never had ſtirred in oppoſition to Tyrants; ſuppoſe they had accounted it unlawful ſo to do; I will make it appear that they were not ſuch Perſons, as that we ought to rely upon their Authority, or can ſafely follow their Example. Long before Conſtantin's time the generality of Chriſtians had loſt much of the Primitive Sanctity and Integrity both of their Doctrine and Manners. Afterwards, when he had vaſtly enriched the Church, they began to fall in love with Honour and Civil Power, and then the Chriſtian Religion went to wrack. Firſt Luxury and Sloth, and then a great drove of Hereſies and Immoralities broke looſe among them; and theſe begot Envy, Hatred and Diſcord, which abounded every where. At laſt, they that were linked together into one Brotherhood by that holy band of Religion, were as much at variance and ſtrife among themſelves, as the moſt bitter Enemies in the world could be. No reverence for, no conſideration of their duty was left amongſt them: the Soldiers and Commanders of the Army, as oft as they pleaſed themſelves, created new Emperors, and ſometimes killed good ones as well as bad. I need not mention ſuch as Verannio, Maximus, Eugenius, whom the Soldiers all of a ſudden advanced and made them Emperors; nor Gratian, an excellent Prince; nor Valentinian the younger, who was none of the worſt, and yet were put to death by them. It is true, theſe things were acted by the Soldiers, and Soldiers in the Field; but thoſe Soldiers were Chriſtians, and lived in that Age which you call Evangelical, and whoſe example you propoſe to us for our imitation. Now you ſhall hear how the Clergy managed themſelves: Paſtors and Biſhops, and ſometimes thoſe very Fathers whom we admire and extol to ſo high a degree, every one of whom was a Leader of their ſeveral Flocks; thoſe very men, I ſay, fought for their Biſhopricks, as Tyrants did for their Soveraignty; ſometimes throughout the City, ſometimes in the very Churches, ſometimes at the Altar, Clergy-men and Lay-men fought promiſcuouſly; they ſlew one another, and great ſlaughters were made on both ſides. You may remember Damaſus and Vrciſinus, who were Contemporaries with Ambroſe. It would be too long to relate the tumultuary Inſurrections of the Inhabitants of Conſtantinople, Antioch, and Alexandria, eſpecially thoſe under the Conduct and Management of Cyrillus, whom you extol as a Preacher up of Obedience; when the Monks in that Fight, within the City, had almoſt ſlain Oreſtes, Theodoſius's Deputy. Now who can ſufficiently wonder at your Impudence, or Careleſsneſs and Neglect? “ Till St. Auſtin's time, ſay you, and lower “ down than the Age that he lived in, there is not any mention extant in Hiſtory, of any “ private Perſon, of any Commander, or of any number of Conſpirators, that have “ put their Prince to death, or taken up Arms againſt him. I have named to you out of known and approved Hiſtories, both private Perſons and Magiſtrates, that with their own hands have ſlain not only bad, but very good Princes: Whole Armies of Chriſtians, many Biſhops amongſt them, that have fought againſt their own Emperors. You produce ſome of the Fathers, that with a great flouriſh of words, perſuade or boaſt of Obedience to Princes: And I, on the other ſide, produce both thoſe ſame Fathers, and others beſides them, that by their actions have declined Obedience to their Princes, even in lawful things; have defended themſelves with a Military Force againſt them; others that have oppoſed forcibly, and wounded their Deputies; others that being Competitors for Biſhopricks, have maintained Civil Wars againſt one another: As if it were lawful for Chriſtians to wage War with Chriſtians for a Biſhoprick, and Citizens with Citizens; but unlawful to fight againſt a Tyrant, in defence of our Liberty, of our Wives and Children, and of our Lives themſelves. Who would own ſuch Fathers as theſe? You produce St. Auſtin, who you ſay, aſſerts that the Power of a Maſter over his Servants, and a Prince over his Subjects, is one and the ſame thing. But I anſwer; If St. Auſtin aſſert any ſuch thing, he aſſerts what neither our Saviour, nor any of his Apoſtles ever aſſerted; tho for the confirmation of that Aſſertion, than which nothing can be more falſe, he pretends to rely wholly upon their Authority. The three or four laſt Pages of this Fourth Chapter, are ſtuffed with meer Lies, or things careleſly and looſely put together, that are little to the purpoſe: And that every one that reads them, will diſcover by what has been ſaid already. For what concerns the Pope, againſt whom you declaim ſo loudly, I am content you ſhould bawl at him, till you are hoarſe. But whereas you endeavour to perſwade the ignorant, That all that called themſelves Chriſtians, yielded an entire obedience to Princes, whether good or bad, till the Papal Power grew to that height, that it was acknowledged ſuperior to that of the Civil Magiſtrate, and till he took upon him to abſolve Subjects from their Allegiance : I have ſufficiently proved by many Examples before and ſince the age that St. Auguſtin lived in, that nothing can be more falſe. Neither does that ſeem to have much more truth in it, which you ſay in the laſt place; viz. That Pope Zachary abſolved the French-men from their Oath of Allegiance to their King. For Francis Hottoman, who was both a French-man and a Lawyer, and a very learned man, in the 13th Chapter of his Francogallia, denies that either Chilperic was depoſed, or the Kingdom tranſlated to Pepin by the Pope's Authority; and he proves out of very Ancient Chronicles of that Nation, That the whole affair was tranſacted in the great Council of the Kingdom, according to the Original Conſtitution of that Government. Which being once done, the French Hiſtories, and Pope Zachary himſelf, deny that there was any neceſſity of abſolving his Subjects from their Allegiance. For not only Hottoman, but Guiccard, a very eminent Hiſtorian of that Nation, informs us, That the Ancient Records of the Kingdom of France teſtify, That the Subjects of that Nation upon the firſt inſtitution of Kingſhip amongſt them, reſerved a power to themſelves, both of chuſing their Princes, and of depoſing them again, if they thought fit: And that the Oath of Allegiance which they took, was upon this expreſs condition; to wit, That the King ſhould likewiſe perform what at his Coronation he ſwore to do. So that if Kings by miſgoverning the People committed to their charge, firſt broke their own Oath to their Subjects, there needs no Pope to diſpenſe with the Peoples Oaths; the Kings themſelves by their own perfidiouſneſs having abſolved their Subjects. And finally, Pope Zachary himſelf in a Letter of his to the French, which you your ſelf quote, renounces, and aſcribes to the People that Authority which you ſay he aſſumes to himſelf: For "if a "Prince be accountable to the People, being beholden to them for his Royalty; "if the People, ſince they make Kings, have the ſame Right to depoſe them, as the very words of that Pope are; it is not likely that the French-men would by any Oath depart in the leaſt from that Ancient Right, or ever tye up their own hands, ſo as not to have the ſame Right that their Anceſtors always had, to depoſe bad Princes, as well as to honour and obey good ones; nor is it likely that they thought themſelves obliged to yield that Obedience to Tyrants, which they ſwore to yield only to good Princes. A People obliged to Obedience by ſuch an Oath, is diſcharged of that Obligation, when a lawful Prince becomes a Tyrant, or gives himſelf over to Sloth and Voluptuouſneſs; the rule of Juſtice, the very Law of Nature diſpenſes with ſuch a Peoples Allegiance. So that even by the Pope's own opinion, the People were under no Obligation to yield Obedience to Chilperic, and conſequently had no need of a Diſpenſation.

CHAP. V.

THO I am of opinion, Salmaſius, and always was, That the Law of God does exactly agree with the Law of Nature; ſo that having ſhown what the Law of God is, with reſpect to Princes, and what the practiſe has been of the People of God, both Jews and Chriſtians, I have at the ſame time, and by the ſame Diſcourſe, made appear what is moſt agreeable to the Law of Nature: yet becauſe you pretend to confute us moſt powerfully by the Law of Nature, I will be content to admit that to be neceſſary, which before I had thought would be ſuperfluous; that in this Chapter I may demonſtrate, That nothing is more ſutable to the Law of Nature, than that Puniſhment be inflicted upon Tyrants. Which if I do not evince, I will then agree with you, that likewiſe by the Law of God they are exempt. I do not purpoſe to frame a long Diſcourſe of Nature in general, and the original of Civil Societies; that Argument has been largely handled by many Learned Men, both Greek and Latin. But I ſhall endeavour to be as ſhort as may be; and my deſign is not ſo much to confute you (who would willingly have ſpared this pains) as to ſhow that you confute your ſelf, and deſtroy your own Poſitions. I'll begin with that firſt Poſition which you lay down as a Fundamental, and that ſhall be the Groundwork of my enſuing Diſcourſe. The Law of Nature, ſay you, is a Principle imprinted on all mens minds, to regard the good of all Mankind, conſidering men as united together in Societies. But this innate Principle cannot procure that common good, unleſs, as there are people that muſt be governed, ſo that very Principle aſcertain who ſhall govern them. To wit, leſt the ſtronger oppreſs the weaker, and thoſe perſons, who for their mutual Safety and Protection have united themſelves together, ſhould be diſunited and divided by Injury and Violence, and reduced to a beaſtial ſavage life again. This I ſuppoſe is what you mean. Out of the number of thoſe that united into one body, you ſay, there muſt needs have been ſome choſen, who excelled the reſt in Wiſdom and Valour; that they either by force, or by perſwaſion, might reſtrain thoſe that were refractory, and keep them within due bounds. Sometimes it would ſo fall out that one ſingle Perſon, whoſe Conduct and Valour was extraordinary, might be able to do this, and ſometimes more aſſiſted one another with their Advice and Counſel. But ſince it is impoſſible that any one man ſhould order all things himſelf, there was a neceſſity of his conſulting with others, and taking ſome into part of the Government with himſelf: So that whether a ſingle perſon reign, or whether the Supreme Power reſide in the body of the People, ſince it is impoſſible that all ſhould adminiſter the affairs of the Commonwealth, or that one man ſhould do all, the Government does always lie upon the ſhoulders of many. And afterwards you ſay, Both Forms of Government, whether by many or a few, or by a ſingle perſon, are equally according to the Law of Nature; for both proceed from the ſame Principle of Nature, viz. That it is impoſſible for any ſingle perſon ſo to govern alone, as not to admit others into a ſhare of the Government with himſelf. Tho I might have taken all this out of the Third Book of Ariſtotle's Politicks, I choſe rather to tranſcribe it out of your own Book; for you ſtole it from him, as Prometheus did Fire from Jupiter, to the ruin of Monarchy, and overthrow of your ſelf, and your own opinion. For enquire as diligently as you can for your life, into the Law of Nature, as you have deſcribed it, you will not find the leaſt footſtep in it of Kingly Power, as you explain it. The Law of Nature, ſay you, in ordering who ſhould govern others, reſpected the univerſal good of all mankind. It did not then regard the private good of any particular perſon, not of a Prince, ſo that the King is for the People, and conſequently the People ſuperior to him; which being allowed, it is impoſſible that Princes ſhould have any right to oppreſs or enſlave the people; that the inferior ſhould have right to tyrannize over the ſuperior. So that ſince Kings cannot pretend to any right to do miſchief, the right of the people muſt be acknowledged according to the Law of Nature to be ſuperior to that of Princes; and therefore by the ſame right, that before Kingſhip was known, men united their Strength and Counſels for their mutual Safety and Defence; by the ſame right, that for the preſervation of all mens Liberty, Peace, and Safety, they appointed one or more to govern the reſt; by the ſame right they may depoſe thoſe very perſons, whom for their Valour or Wiſdom they advanced to the Government, or any others that rule diſorderly, if they find them by reaſon of their ſlothfulneſs, folly, or impiety, unfit for Government: ſince Natnre does not regard the good of one, or of a few, but of all in general. For what ſort of perſons were they whom you ſuppoſe to have been choſen? You ſay, they were ſuch as excelled in Courage and Conduct, to wit, ſuch as by Nature ſeemed fitteſt for Government; who by reaſon of their excellent Wiſdom and Valour, were enabled to undertake ſo great a Charge. The conſequence of this I take to be, That right of Succeſſion is not by the Law of Nature; that no Man by the Law of Nature has right to be King, unleſs he excel all others in Wiſdom and Courage; that all ſuch as reign, and want theſe qualifications, are advanced to the Government by Force or Faction; have no right by the Law of Nature to be what they are, but ought rather to be Slaves than Princes. For Nature appoints that Wiſe Men ſhould govern Fools, not that Wicked Men ſhould rule over Good Men; Fools over Wiſe Men: And conſequently, they that take the Government out of ſuch mens hands, act according to the Law of Nature. To what end Nature directs Wiſe Men ſhould bear the Rule, you ſhall hear in your own words; viz. " That by Force or by Perſwaſion, they may keep ſuch " as are unruly, within due bounds. But how ſhould he keep others within the bounds of their duty, that neglects, or is ignorant of, or wilfully acts contrary to his own? Alledg now, if you can, any dictate of Nature, by which we are enjoined to neglect the wiſe Inſtitutions of the Law of Nature, and have no regard to them in Civil and Publick Concerns, when we ſee what great and admirable things Nature her ſelf effects in things that are inanimate and void of ſenſe, rather than loſe her end. Produce any Rule of Nature, or Natural Juſtice, by which inferior Criminals ought to be puniſhed, but Kings and Princes to go unpuniſhed; and not only ſo, but tho guilty of the greateſt Crimes imaginable, be had in Reverence, and almoſt adored. You agree, That all Forms of Government, whether by many, or a few, or by a ſingle perſon, are equally agreeable to the Law of Nature. So that the perſon of a King is not by the Law of Nature more ſacred than a Senate of Nobles, or Magiſtrates, choſen from amongſt the common people, who you grant may be puniſhed, and ought to be, if they offend; and conſequently, Kings ought to be ſo too, who are appointed to rule for the very ſame end and purpoſe that other Magiſtrates are. For ſay you, Nature does not allow any ſingle perſon to bear rule ſo entirely, as not to have Partners in the Government. It does not therefore allow of a Monarch; it does not allow one ſingle perſon to rule ſo, as that all others ſhould be in a ſlaviſh ſubjection to his Commands only. You that give Princes ſuch Partners in the Government, as in whom, to uſe your own words, the Government always reſides, do at the ſame time make others Colleagues with them, and equal to them; nay, and conſequently you ſettle a power in thoſe Colleagues of puniſhing, and of depoſing them. So that while you your ſelf go about, not to extol a Kingly Government, but to eſtabliſh it by the Law of Nature, you deſtroy it; no greater misfortune could befal Soveraign Princes, than to have ſuch an Advocate as you are. Poor, unhappy wretch! what blindneſs of mind has ſeiz'd you, that you ſhould unwittingly take ſo much pains to diſcover your knavery and folly, and make it viſible to the world (which before you conceal'd, in ſome meaſure and diſguis'd) that you ſhould be ſo induſtrious to heap diſgrace and ignominy upon your ſelf. What offence does Heaven puniſh you for, in making you appear in publick, and undertake the defence of a deſperate Cauſe, with ſo much impudence and childiſhneſs, and inſtead of defending it, to betray it by your ignorance? What Enemy of yours would deſire to ſee you in a more forlorn, deſpicable condition than you are, who have no refuge left from the depth of miſery, but in your own imprudence and want of ſenſe, ſince by your unskilful and ſilly defence, you have rendered Tyrants the more odious and deteſtable, by aſcribing to them an unbounded liberty of doing miſchief with Impunity; and conſequently have created them more Enemies than they had before? But I return to your Contradictions. When you had reſolved with your ſelf to be ſo wicked as to endeavour to find out a foundation for Tyranny in the Law of Nature, you ſaw a neceſſity of extolling Monarchy above other ſorts of Government; which you cannot go about to do, without doing as you uſe to do, that is contradicting your ſelf. For having ſaid but a little before, That all Forms of Government, whether by more or fewer, or by a ſingle perſon, are equally according to the Law of Nature, now you tell us, that of all theſe ſorts of Government, that of a ſingle perſon is moſt natural. Nay, though you had ſaid in expreſs terms but lately, That the Law of Nature does not allow that any Government ſhould reſide entirely in one man. Now upbraid whom you will with the putting of Tyrants to death; ſince you your ſelf by your own folly, have cut the Throats of all Monarchs, nay even of Monarchy it ſelf. But it is not to the purpoſe for us here to diſpute which Form of Government is beſt, by one ſingle perſon, or by many. I confeſs many eminent and famous men have extolled Monarchy; but it has always been upon this ſuppoſition, that the Prince were a very excellent perſon, and one that of all others deſerved beſt to reign; without which Suppoſition, no Form of Government can be ſo prone to Tyranny as Monarchy is. And whereas you reſemble a Monarchy to the Government of the World, by one Divine Being, I pray anſwer me, Whether you think that any other can deſerve to be inveſted with a power here on Earth, that ſhall reſemble his power that governs the World, except ſuch a perſon as does infinitely excel all other Men, and both for Wiſdom and Goodneſs in ſome meaſure reſemble the Deity? and ſuch a perſon in my opinion, none can be but the Son of God himſelf. And whereas you make a Kingdom to be a kind of Family, and make a compariſon betwixt a Prince and the Maſter of a Family; obſerve how lame the Parallel is. For a Maſter of a Family begot part of his Houſhold, at leaſt he feeds all thoſe that are of his houſe, and upon that account deſerves to have the Government; but the reaſon holds not in the caſe of a Prince; nay 'tis quite contrary. In the next place, you propoſe to us for our imitation the example of inferior Creatures, eſpecially of Birds, and amongſt them of Bees, which according to your skill in Natural Philoſophy, are a ſort of Birds too; The Bees have a King over them. The Bees of Trent you mean; don't you remember? all other Bees, you your ſelf confeſs to be Commonwealths. But leave off playing the fool with Bees; they belong to the Muſes, and hate, and (you ſee) confute ſuch a Beetle as you are. The Quails are under a Captain. Lay ſuch ſnares for your own Bitterns; you are not Fowler good enough to catch us. Now you begin to be perſonally concerned. Gallus Gallinaceus, a Cock, ſay you, has both Cocks and Hens under him. How can that be, ſince you your ſelf that are Gallus, and but too much Gallinaceus, by report cannot govern your own ſingle Hen, but let her govern you? So that if a Gallinaceus be a King over many Hens, you that are a ſlave to one, muſt own your ſelf not to be ſo good as a Gallinaceus, but ſome Stercorarius Gallus, ſome Dunghil-Cock or other. For matter of Books, there is no body publiſhes huger Dunghils than you, and you diſturb all people with your ſhitten Cock-crow; that's the only property in which you reſemble a true Cock. I'll throw you a great many Barley-corns, if in ranſacking this Dunghil Book of yours, you can ſhow me but one Jewel. But why ſhould I promiſe you Barley, that never peckt at Corn, as that honeſt plain Cock that we read of in Æſop, but at Gold, as that Roguey Cock in Plautus, though with a different event; for you found a hundred Jacobuſſes, and he was ſtruck dead with Euclio's Club, which you deſerve more than he did. But let us go on: That ſame natural reaſon that deſigns the good and ſafety of all Mankind, requires, that whoever is once promoted to the Soveraignty, be preſerved in the poſſeſſion of it. Who ever queſtion'd this, as long as his preſervation is conſiſtent with the ſafety of all the reſt? But is it not obvious to all men that nothing can be more contrary to natural reaſon than that any one man ſhould be preſerved and defended to the utter ruin and deſtruction of all others? But yet (you ſay) it is better to keep and defend a bad Prince, nay one of the worſt that ever was, than to change him for another; becauſe his ill Government cannot do the Commonwealth ſo much harm as the diſturbances will occaſion, which muſt of neceſſity be raiſed before the people can get rid of him. But what is this to the Right of Kings by the Law of Nature? If Nature teaches me rather to ſuffer my ſelf to be robbed by High-way men, or if I ſhould be taken Captive by ſuch, to purchaſe my Liberty with all my Eſtate, than to fight with them for my life, can you infer from thence, that they have a natural right to rob and ſpoil me? Nature teaches men to give way ſometimes to the violence and outrages of Tyrants, the neceſſity of affairs ſometimes enforces a Toleration with their enormities; what foundation can you find in this forced patience of a Nation, in this compulſory ſubmiſſion, to build a Right upon, for Princes to tyrannize by the Law of Nature? That Right which Nature has given the people for their own preſervation, can you affirm that ſhe has inveſted Tyrants with for the people's ruin and deſtruction? Nature teaches us, of two evils to chuſe the leaſt; and to bear with oppreſſion, as long as there is a neceſſity of ſo doing; and will you infer from hence, that Tyrants have ſome Right by the Law of Nature to oppreſs their Subjects, and go unpuniſhed, becauſe as circumſtances may fall out, it may ſometimes be a leſs miſchief to bear with them than to remove them? Remember what your ſelf once wrote concerning Biſhops againſt a Jeſuit; you were then of another opinion than you are now: I have quoted your words formerly; you there affirm that ſeditious Civil diſſentions and diſcords of the Nobles and Common People againſt and amongſt one another, are much more tolerable, and leſs miſchievous than certain miſery and deſtruction under the Government of a ſingle perſon, that plays the Tyrant. And you ſaid very true. For you had not then run mad; you had not then been bribed with Charles his Jacobuſſes. You had not got the King's-Evil. I ſhould tell you perhaps, if I did not know you, that you might be aſhamed thus to prevaricate. But you can ſooner burſt than bluſh, who have caſt off all ſhame for a little profit. Did you not remember, that the Commonwealth of the people of Rome flouriſhed and became glorious when they had baniſhed their Kings? Could you poſſibly forget that of the Low Countries? which after it had ſhook off the Yoke of the King of Spain, after long and tedious Wars, but crown'd with ſucceſs, obtained its Liberty, and feeds ſuch a pitiful Grammarian as your ſelf with a Penſion; but not with a deſign that their youth might be ſo infatuated by your Sophiſtry, as to chuſe rather to return to their former Slavery than inherit the Glorious Liberty which their Anceſtors purchaſed for them. May thoſe pernicious principles of yours be baniſhed with your ſelf into the moſt remote and barbarous Corners of the World. And laſt of all, the Commonwealth of England might have afforded you an example, in which Charles, who had been their King, after he had been taken captive in War, and was found incurable, was put to death. But they have defaced and impoveriſhed the Iſland with Civil broils and diſcords, which under its Kings was happy, and ſwam in Luxury. Yea, when it was almoſt buried in Luxury and Voluptuouſneſs, and the more inured thereto, that it might be enthralled the more eaſily; when its Laws were aboliſhed, and its Religion agreed to be ſold, they delivered it from Slavery. You are like him that publiſhed Simplicius and Epictetus in the ſame Volume; a very grave Stoick, Who call an Iſland happy, becauſe it ſwims in Luxury. I'm ſure no ſuch Doctrine ever came out of Zeno's School. But why ſhould not you, who would give Kings a power of doing what they liſt, have liberty your ſelf to broach what new Philoſophy you pleaſe? Now begin again to act your part. There never was in any King's Reign ſo much blood ſpilt, ſo many Families ruined. All this is to be imputed to Charles, not to us, who firſt raiſed an Army of Iriſhmen againſt us; who by his own Warrant authorized the Iriſh Nation to conſpire againſt the Engliſh; who by their means ſlew two hundred thouſand of his Engliſh Subjects in the Province of Vlſter, beſides what Numbers were ſlain in other parts of that Kingdom; who ſollicited two Armies towards the deſtruction of the Parliament of England, and the City of London; and did many other actions of Hoſtility before the Parliament and People had liſted one Soldier for the preſervation and defence of the Government. What Principles, what Law, what Religion ever taught men rather to conſult their eaſe, to ſave their Money, their Blood, nay their Lives themſelves, than to oppoſe an Enemy with force? for I make no difference betwixt a Foreign Enemy and another, ſince both are equally dangerous and deſtructive to the good of the whole Nation. The People of Iſrael ſaw very well, that they could not poſſibly puniſh the Benjamites for murdering the Levite's Wife, without the loſs of many Mens Lives: And did that induce them to ſit ſtill? Was that accounted a ſufficient Argument why they ſhould abſtain from War, from a very Bloody Civil War? Did they therefore ſuffer the death of one poor Woman to be unrevenged? Certainly if Nature teaches us rather to endure the Government of a King, though he be never ſo bad, than to endanger the lives of a great many Men in the recovery of our Liberty; it muſt teach us likewiſe not only to endure a Kingly Government, which is the only one that you argue ought to be ſubmitted to, but even an Ariſtocracy and a Democracy: Nay, and ſometimes it will perſwade us, to ſubmit to a Multitude of Highway-men, and to Slaves that mutiny. Fulvius and Rupilius, if your Principles had been received in their days, muſt not have engaged in the Servile War (as their Writers call it) after the Prætorian Armies were ſlain: Craſſus muſt not have marched againſt Spartacus, after the Rebels had deſtroyed one Roman Army, and ſpoil'd their Tents: Nor muſt Pompey have undertaken the Piratick War. But the State of Rome muſt have purſued the dictates of Nature, and muſt have ſubmitted to their own Slaves, or to the Pyrates rather than run the hazard of loſing ſome Mens Lives. You do not prove at all, that Nature has imprinted any ſuch notion as this of yours on the minds of Men: And yet you cannot forbear boding us ill luck, and denouncing the Wrath of God againſt us (which may Heaven divert, and inflict it upon your ſelf, and all ſuch Prognoſticators as you) who have puniſhed as he deſerved, one that had the name of our King, but was in Fact our implacable Enemy; and we have made Atonement for the death of ſo many of our Countreymen, as our Civil Wars have occaſion'd, by ſhedding his Blood, that was the Author and Cauſe of them. Then you tell us, that a Kingly Government appears to be more according to the Laws of Nature, becauſe more Nations, both in our days and of old, have ſubmitted to that Form of Government, than ever did to any other. I anſwer, If that be ſo, it was neither the effect of any dictate of the Law of Nature, nor was it in Obedience to any Command from God. God would not ſuffer his own People to be under a King; he conſented at laſt, but unwillingly: what Nature and right Reaſon dictates, we are not to gather from the practiſe of moſt Nations, but of the wiſeſt and moſt prudent. The Grecians, the Romans, the

Italians, and Carthaginians, with many other, have of their own accord, out of choice, preferr'd a Commonwealth to a Kingly Government; and theſe Nations that I have named, are better inſtances than all the reſt. Hence Sulpitius Severus ſays, 'That the very name of a King was always very odious among 'freeborn People. But theſe things concern not our preſent purpoſe, nor many other Impertinences that follow over and over again. I'll make haſte to prove that by Examples which I have proved already by Reaſon; viz. That it is very agreeable to the Law of Nature, that Tyrants ſhould be puniſhed; and that all Nations by the inſtinct of Nature, have puniſhed them; which will expoſe your Impudence, and make it evident, that you take a liberty to publiſh palpable downright Lies. You begin with the Egyptians; and indeed, who does not ſee, that you play the Gipſy your ſelf throughout? Amongſt them, ſay you, there is no mention extant of any King, that was ever ſlain by the People in a Popular Inſurrection, no War made upon any of their Kings by their Subjects, no attempt made to depoſe any of them. What think you then of Oſiris, who perhaps was the firſt King that the Egyptians ever had? Was not he ſlain by his Brother Typhon, and five and twenty other Conſpirators? And did not a great part of the Body of the People ſide with them, and fight a Battel with Iſis and Orus, the late King's Wife and Son? I paſs by Seſoſtris, whom his Brother had well nigh put to death, and Chemmis, and Cephrenes, againſt whom the People were deſervedly enraged; and becauſe they could not do it while they were alive, they threatned to tear them in pieces after they were dead. Do you think that a People that durſt lay violent hands upon good Kings, had any reſtraint upon them, either by the Light of Nature or Religion, from putting bad ones to Death? Could they that threatned to pull the dead Bodies of their Princes out of their Graves, when they ceaſed to do miſchief, (tho by the Cuſtom of their own Country, the Corps of the meaneſt Perſon was ſacred and inviolable) abſtain from inflicting Puniſhment upon them in their Life-time, when they were acting all their Villanies, if they had been able; and that upon ſome Maxim of the Law of Nature? I know you would not ſtick to anſwer me in the affirmative, how abſurd ſoever it be; but that you may not offer at it, I'll pull out your Tongue. Know then, that ſome Ages before Cephrenes's time, one Ammoſis was King of Egypt, and was as great a Tyrant, as who has been the greateſt; him the People bore with. This you are glad to hear; this is what you would be at. But hear what follows, my honeſt Tell-troth. I ſhall ſpeak out of Diodorus, They bore with him for ſome while, becauſe he was too ſtrong for them: But when Actiſanes King of Ethiopia made war upon him, they took that opportunity to revolt, ſo that being deſerted, he was eaſily ſubdued, and Egypt became an Acceſſion to the Kingdom of Ethiopia. You ſee the Egyptians, as ſoon as they could, took up Arms againſt a Tyrant; they joined Forces with a Foreign Prince, to depoſe their own King, and diſinherit his Poſterity; they choſe to live under a moderate and good Prince, as Actiſanes was, tho a Foreigner, rather than under a Tyrant of their own. The ſame People with a very unanimous Conſent took up Arms againſt Apries, another Tyrant, who relied upon Foreign Aids that he had hired to aſſiſt him. Under the Conduct of Amaſis their General they conquered, and afterward ſtrangled him, and placed Amaſis in the Throne. And obſerve this Circumſtance in the Hiſtory; Amaſis kept the Captive King a good while in the Palace, and treated him well: At laſt, when the People complain'd that he nouriſhed his own and their Enemy; he delivered him into their hands, who put him to death in the manner I have mentioned. Theſe things are related by Herodotus and Diodorus. Where are you now? Do you think that any Tyrant would not chuſe a Hatchet rather than a Halter? Afterwards, ſay you, when the Egyptians were brought into ſubjection by the Perſians, they continued faithful to them; which is moſt falſe, they never were faithful to them: For in the fourth year after Cambyſes had ſubdued them, they rebelled. Afterward, when Xerxes had tamed them, within a ſhort time they revolted from his Son Artaxerxes, and ſet up one Inarus to be their King. After his death they rebell'd again, and created one Tachus King, and made war upon Artaxerxes Mnemon. Neither were they better Subjects to their own Princes, for they depoſed Tachus, and conferr'd the Government upon his Son Nectanebus, till at laſt Artaxerxes Ochus brought them the ſecond time under ſubjection to the Perſian Empire. When they were under the Macedonian Empire, they declared by their Actions, that Tyrants ought to be under ſome reſtraint:

They threw down the Statutes and Images of Ptolomæus Phyſco, and would have killed him, but that the mercenary Army that he commanded, was too ſtrong for them. His Son Alexander was forced to leave his Country by the meer violence of the People, who were incenſed againſt him for killing his Mother. And the People of Alexandria dragged his Son Alexander out of the Palace, whoſe inſolent Behaviour gave juſt Offence, and killed him in the Theatre. And the ſame People depoſed Ptolomæus Auletes for his many Crimes. Now, ſince it is impoſſible that any Learned Man ſhould be ignorant of theſe things that are ſo generally known; and ſince it is an inexcuſable Fault in Salmaſius to be ignorant of them, whoſe Profeſſion it is to teach them others, and whoſe very aſſerting things of this nature ought to carry in it ſelf an Argument of Credibility; it is certainly a very ſcandalous thing (I ſay) either that ſo ignorant, illiterate a Blockhead, ſhould to the ſcandal of all Learning, profeſs himſelf, and be accounted a Learned Man, and obtain Salaries from Princes and States; or that ſo impudent and notorious a Lyar ſhould not be branded with ſome particular mark of Infamy, and for ever baniſhed from the Society of learned and honeſt Men. Having ſearched among the Egyptians for Examples, let us now conſider the Ethiopians their Neighbours. They adore their Kings, whom they ſuppoſe God to have appointed over them, even as if they were a ſort of Gods: And yet whenever the Prieſts condemn any of them, they kill themſelves: And on that manner, ſays Diodorus, they puniſh all their Criminals; they put them not to death, but ſend a Miniſter of Juſtice to command them to deſtroy their own Perſons. In the next place you mention the Aſſyrians, the Medes, and the Perſians, who of all others were moſt obſervant of their Princes: And you affirm, contrary to all Hiſtorians that have wrote any thing concerning thoſe Nations, That the Regal Power there, had an unbounded Liberty annexed to it, of doing what the King liſted. In the firſt place the Prophet Daniel tells us, how the Babylonians expelled Nebuchadnezzar out of Human Society, and made him graze with the Beaſts, when his Pride grew to be inſufferable. The Laws of thoſe Countries were not entituled the Laws of their Kings, but the Laws of the Medes and Perſians; which Laws were irrevocable, and the Kings themſelves were bound by them: Inſomuch that Darius the Mede, tho he earneſtly deſired to have delivered Daniel from the hands of the Princes, yet could not effect it. Thoſe Nations, ſay you, thought it no ſufficient pretence to reject a Prince, becauſe he abuſed the Right that was inherent in him as he was Sovereign. But in the very writing of theſe words you are ſo ſtupid, as that with the ſame breath that you commend the Obedience and Submiſſiveneſs of thoſe Nations, of your own accord you make mention of Sardanapalus's being deprived of his Crown by Arbaces. Neither was it he alone that accompliſhed that Enterpriſe; for he had the aſſiſtance of the Prieſts (who of all others were beſt verſed in the Law) and of the People; and it was wholly upon this account that he depoſed him, becauſe he abuſed his authority and power, not by giving himſelf over to cruelty, but to luxury and effeminacy. Run over the Hiſtories of Herodotus, Cteſias, Diodorus, and you will find things quite contrary to what you aſſert here; you will find that thoſe Kingdoms were deſtroyed for the moſt part by Subjects, and not by Foreigners; that the Aſſyrians were brought down by the Medes, who then were their Subjects, and the Medes by the Perſians, who at that time were likewiſe ſubject to them. You your ſelf confeſs, that Cyrus rebell'd, and that at the ſame time in divers parts of the Empire little upſtart Governments were formed by thoſe that ſhook off the Medes. But does this agree with what you ſaid before? Does this prove the obedience of the Medes and Perſians to their Princes, and that Jus Regium which you had aſſerted to have been univerſally received amongſt thoſe Nations? What Potion can cure this brainſick Frenzy of yours? You ſay, It appears by Herodotus how abſolute the Perſian Kings were. Cambyſes being deſirous to marry his Siſter, conſulted with the Judges, who were the Interpreters of the Laws, to whoſe Deciſion all difficult matters were to be referred. What anſwer had he from them? They told him, they knew no Law which permitted a Brother to marry his Siſter; but another Law they knew, that the Kings of Perſia might do what they liſted. Now to this I anſwer, if the Kings of Perſia were really ſo abſolute, what need was there of any other to interpret the Laws, beſides the King himſelf? Thoſe ſuperfluous unneceſſary Judges would have had their abode and reſidence in any other place rather than in the Palace, where they were altogether uſeleſs. Again, if thoſe Kings might do whatever they would, It is not credible that ſo ambitious a Prince as Cambyſes was, ſhould be ſo ignorant of that grand Prerogative, as to conſult with the Judges, whether what he deſired were according to Law. What was the matter then? either they deſigned to humour the King, as you ſay they did, or they were afraid to croſs his inclination, which is the account that Herodotus gives of it; and ſo told him of ſuch a Law, as they knew would pleaſe him, and in plain terms made a fool of him; which is no new thing with Judges and Lawyers now a days. But, ſay you, Artabanus a Perſian told Themiſtocles, that there was no better Law in Perſia, than that by which it was enacted, That Kings were to be honoured and adored. An excellent Law that was without doubt which commanded Subjects to adore their Princes! but the Primitive Fathers have long ago damned it; and Artabanus was a proper perſon to commend ſuch a Law, who was the very Man that a little while after ſlew Xerxes with his own hand. You quote Regicides to aſſert Royalty. I am afraid you have ſome deſign upon Kings. In the next place you quote the Poet Claudian, to prove how obedient the Perſians were. But I appeal to their Hiſtories and Annals, which are full of the Revolts of the Perſians, the Medes, the Bactrians, and Babylonians, and give us frequent inſtances of the Murders of their Princes. The next perſon whoſe authority you cite, is Otanes the Perſian, who likewiſe killed Smerdis then King of Perſia, to whom, out of the hatred which he bore to a Kingly Government, he reckons up the impieties and injurious actions of Kings, their violation of all Laws, their putting Men to Death without any legal Conviction, their Rapes and Adulteries; and all this you will have called the Right of Kings, and ſlander Samuel again as a teacher of ſuch Doctrines. You quote Homer, who ſays that Kings derive their Authority from Jupiter; to which I have already given an anſwer. For King Philip of Macedon, whoſe aſſerting the Right of Kings, you make uſe of: I'll believe Charles his deſcription of it, as ſoon as his. Then you quote ſome Sentences out of a fragment of Diogenes a Pythagorean; but you do not tell us what ſort of a King he ſpeaks of. Obſerve therefore how he begins that Diſcourſe; for whatever follows muſt be underſtood to have relation to it. ‘Let him be ‘ King, ſays he, that of all others is moſt juſt, and ſo he is that acts moſt according to Law; for no Man can be King that is not juſt; and without Laws ‘ there can be no Juſtice. This is directly oppoſite to that Regal Right of yours. And Ecphantas, whom you likewiſe quote, is of the ſame opinion: ‘Whoſoever takes upon him to be a King, ought to be naturally moſt pure and clear ‘ from all imputation. And a little after, ‘Him, ſays he, we call a King, that ‘ governs well, and he only is properly ſo. So that ſuch a King as you ſpeak of, according to the Philoſophy of the Pythagoreans, is no King at all. Hear now what Plato ſays in his Eighth Epiſtle: ‘Let Kings, ſays he, be liable ‘ to be called to account for what they do: Let the Laws controul not only the ‘ People, but Kings themſelves, if they do any thing not warranted by Law. I'll mention what Ariſtotle ſays in the Third Book of his Politicks; ‘It is neither for ‘ the Publick Good, nor is it juſt, ſays he, ſeeing all men are by nature alike ‘ and equal, that any one ſhould be Lord and Maſter over all the reſt, where ‘ there are no Laws: nor is it for the Publick Good, or Juſt, that one man ‘ ſhould be a Law to the reſt, where there are Laws; nor that any one, tho ‘ a good man, ſhould be Lord over other good men, nor a bad man over bad ‘ men. And in the Fifth Book, ſays he, ‘That King whom the People refuſe to be ‘ govern'd by, is no longer a King, but a Tyrant. Hear what Xenophon ſays in Hiero: ‘People are ſo far from revenging the deaths of Tyrants, that they ‘ confer great Honour upon him that kills one, and erect Statues in their Temples to the Honour of Tyrannicides. Of this I can produce an Eye-witneſs, Marcus Tullius, in his Oration pro Milone, ‘The Grecians, ſays he, aſcribe Divine Worſhip to ſuch as kill Tyrants: What things of this nature have I myſelf ſeen at Athens, and in the other Cities of Greece? How many Religious ‘ Obſervances have been inſtituted in honour of ſuch men? How many Hymns? ‘ They are conſecrated to Immortality and Adoration, and their Memory endeavoured to be perpetuated. And laſtly, Polybius, a Hiſtorian of great Authority and Gravity, in the Sixth Book of his Hiſtory ſays thus: ‘When Princes began ‘ to indulge their own Luſts and ſenſual Appetites, then Kingdoms were turned ‘ into ſo many Tyrannies, and the Subjects began to conſpire the death of their ‘ Governors; neither was it the profligate ſort that were the Authors of thoſe ‘ Deſigns, but the moſt Generous and Magnanimous. I could quote many ſuch like paſſages, but I ſhall inſtance in no more. From the Philoſophers you appeal to the Poets; and I am very willing to follow you thither. Æſchylus is enough to inform us, That the Power of the Kings of Greece was ſuch, as not to be liable to the cenſure of any Laws, or to be queſtioned before any Human Judicature; for he in that Tragedy that is called, The Suppliants, calls the King of the Argives, a Governor not obnoxious to the Judgment of any Tribunal. But you muſt know (for the more you ſay, the more you diſcover your raſhneſs and want of judgment) you muſt know, I ſay, that one is not to regard what the Poet ſays, but what perſon in the Play ſpeaks, and what that perſon ſays; for different perſons are introduced, ſometimes good, ſometimes bad; ſometimes wiſe men, ſometimes fools; and ſuch words are put into their mouths, as it is moſt proper for them to ſpeak; not ſuch as the Poet would ſpeak, if he were to ſpeak in his own perſon. The Fifty Daughters of Danaus being baniſhed out of Egypt, became Suppliants to the King of the Argives; they begg'd of him, that he would protect them from the Egyptians, who purſued them with a Fleet of Ships. The King told them he could not undertake their Protection, till he had imparted the matter to the people; ‘ For, ſays he, if I ſhould make a promiſe to you, I ſhould not ‘ be able to perform it, unleſs I conſult with them firſt. The Women being Strangers and Suppliants, and fearing the uncertain ſuffrages of the people, tell him, ‘ That the Power of all the people reſides in him alone; that he judg‘ es all others, but is not judged himſelf by any. He anſwers: ‘ I have told you ‘ already, That I cannot do this thing that you deſire of me, without the peo‘ ples conſent; nay, and tho I could, I would not. At laſt he refers the matter to the people; ‘ I will aſſemble the people, ſays he, and perſwade them to pro‘ tect you. The people met, and reſolved to engage in their quarrel; inſomuch that Danaus their Father bids his Daughters, ‘ be of good cheer, for the ‘ People of the Countrey, in a popular Convention, had voted their Safeguard ‘ and Defence. If I had not related the whole thing, how raſhly would this impertinent Ignoramus have determined concerning the Right of Kings among the Grecians, out of the mouths of a few Women that were Strangers and Suppliants, tho the King himſelf, and the Hiſtory be quite contrary? The ſame thing appears by the ſtory of Oreſtes in Euripides, who after his Father's death was himſelf King of the Argives, and yet was called in queſtion by the people for the death of his Mother, and made to plead for his Life, and by the major ſuffrage was condemned to die. The ſame Poet in his Play called The Suppliants, declares, That at Athens the Kingly Power was ſubject to the Laws; where Theſeus then King of that City is made to ſay theſe words: ‘ This is a free City, ‘ it is not govern'd by one man; the people reigns here. And his Son Demophoon, who was King after him, in another Tragedy of the ſame Poet, called Heraclidæ; ‘ I do not exerciſe a Tyrannical Power over them, as if they were Barbarians: ‘ I am upon other terms with them; but if I do them juſtice, they will do me ‘ the like. Sophocles in his Oedipus ſhows, That anciently in Thebes the Kings were not abſolute neither: Hence ſays Tireſias to Oedipus, ‘ I am not your ‘ Slave. And Creon to the ſame King, ‘ I have ſome Right in this City, ſays he, ‘ as well as you. And in another Tragedy of the ſame Poet, called Antigone, Æmon tells the King, ‘ That the City of Thebes is not govern'd by a ſingle per‘ ſon. All men know that the Kings of Lacedemon have been arraigned, and ſometimes put to death judicially. Theſe inſtances are ſufficient to evince what Power the Kings in Greece had. Let us conſider now the Romans: You betake your ſelf to that paſſage of C. Memmius in Saluſt, of Kings having a liberty to do what they liſt, and go unpuniſhed; to which I have given an anſwer already. Saluſt himſelf ſays in expreſs words, ‘ That the ancient Government of Rome ‘ was by their Laws, tho the Name and Form of it was Regal: which Form of Government, when it grew into a Tyranny, you know they put down and changed. Cicero in his Oration againſt Piſo, ‘ Shall I, ſays he, account him a Conſul, ‘ who would not allow the Senate to have any Authority in the Commonwealth? ‘ Shall I take notice of any man as Conſul, if at the ſame time there be no ſuch ‘ thing as a Senate; when of old, the City of Rome acknowledged not their ‘ Kings, if they acted without or in oppoſition to the Senate? Do you hear; the very Kings themſelves at Rome ſignified nothing without the Senate. But, ſay you, Romulus governed as he liſted; and for that you quote Tacitus.

No wonder : The Government was not then eſtabliſhed by Law ; they were a confus'd multitude of ſtrangers, more likely regulated than a State; and all Mankind lived without Laws, before Governments were ſetled. But when Romulus was dead, tho all the People were deſirous of a King, not having yet experienced the ſweetneſs of Liberty, yet, as Livy informs us, ‘ The Sovereign Power reſided in the People ; ſo that they parted not with more Right than they retained. The ſame Author tells us, ‘ That the ſame Power was afterwards extorted from them by their Emperours. Servius Tullius at firſt reigned by fraud, and as it were a Deputy to Tarquinius Priſcus ; but afterward he referred it to the People, Whether they would have him reign or no ? At laſt, ſays Tacitus, he became the Author of ſuch Laws as the Kings were obliged to obey. Do you think he would have done ſuch an injury to himſelf and his Poſterity, if he had been of opinion that the Right of Kings had been above all Laws ? Their laſt King Tarquinius Superbus, was the firſt that put an end to that cuſtom of conſulting the Senate concerning all Publick Affairs ; for which very thing, and other enormities of his, the People depoſed him, and baniſhed him and his Family. Theſe things I have out of Livy and Cicero, than whom you will hardly produce any better Expoſitors of the Right of Kings among the Romans. As for the Dictatorſhip, that was but temporary, and was never made uſe of, but in great extremities, and was not to continue longer than ſix Months. But that which you call the Right of the Roman Emperours, was no Right, but a plain downright Force ; and was gained by War only. But Tacitus, ſay you, that lived under the Government of a ſingle Perſon, writes thus ; The Gods have committed the Sovereign Power in human Affairs to Princes only, and have left to Subjects the honour of being obedient. But you tell us not where Tacitus has theſe words, for you were conſcious to your ſelf, that you impoſed upon your Readers in quoting them ; which I preſently ſmelt out, tho I could not find the place of a ſudden : For that Expreſſion is not Tacitus's own, who is an approved Writer, and of all others the greateſt Enemy to Tyrants ; but Tacitus relates that of M. Terentius, a Gentleman of Rome, being accuſed for a Capital Crime, amongſt other things that he ſaid to ſave his Life, flattered Tiberius on this manner. It is in the Sixth Book of his Annals. ‘ The Gods have entruſted you with the ultimate Judgment in all things ; they have left us the honour of Obedience. And you cite this paſſage as if Tacitus had ſaid it himſelf ; you ſcrape together whatever ſeems to make for your Opinion, either out of oſtentation, or out of weakneſs ; you would leave out nothing that you could find in a Baker's, or a Barber's Shop ; nay, you would be glad of any thing that looked like an Argument, from the very Hangman. If you had read Tacitus himſelf, and not tranſcribed ſome looſe Quotations out of him by other Authors, he would have taught you whence that Imperial Right had its Original. ‘ After the Conqueſt of Aſia, ſays he, the whole ſtate of our Affairs was turned upſide down ; nothing of the ancient integrity of our Forefathers was left amongſt us ; all men ſhook off that former equality which had been obſerved, and began to have a reverence for the Mandates of Princes. This you might have learned out of the Third Book of his Annals, whence you have all your Regal Right. ‘ When that ancient equality was laid aſide, and inſtead thereof Ambition and Violence took place, Tyrannical Forms of Government ſtarted up, and fixed themſelves in many Countries. This ſame thing you might have learned out of Dio, if your natural Levity and Unſetledneſs of Judgment would have ſuffered you to apprehend any thing that's ſolid. He tells us in the Fifty third Book of his Hiſtory, out of which Book you have made ſome quotation already, That Octavius Cæſar, partly by Force, and partly by Fraud, brought things to that paſs, that the Emperors of Rome became no longer fettered by Laws. For he, tho he promiſed to the people in publick that he would lay down the Government, and obey the Laws, and become ſubject to others ; yet under pretence of making War in ſeveral Provinces of the Empire, ſtill retained the Legions, and ſo by degrees invaded the Government, which he pretended he would refuſe. This was not regularly getting from under the Law, but breaking forcibly through all Laws, as Spartacus the Gladiator might have done ; and then aſſuming to himſelf the ſtyle of Prince or Emperor, as if God or the Law of Nature had put all Men and all Laws into ſubjection under him. Would you enquire a little further into the Original of the Right of the Roman Emperors ? Marcus Antonius, whom Cæſar (when by taking up Arms againſt the Commonwealth, he had got all the Power into his hands) had made Conſul, when a Solemnity called the Lupercalia was celebrated at Rome, as had been contrived before-hand that he ſhould ſet a Crown upon Cæſar's head, though the people ſighed and lamented at the ſight, cauſed it to be entred upon record, That Marcus Antonius at the Lupercalia, made Cæſar King at the Inſtance of the people. Of which action Cicero in his ſecond Philippick ſays, 'Was Lucius Tarquinius therefore expelled, Spurius Caſſius, Sp. Melius, and Marcus Manilius put to death, that after many ages Marcus Antonius ſhould make a King in Rome contrary to Law? But you deſerve to be tortured, and loaded with everlaſting diſgrace, much more than Mark Antony; tho I would not have you proud becauſe he and your ſelf are put together: for I do not think ſo deſpicable a Wretch as you fit to be compared with him in any thing but his Impiety; you that in thoſe horrible Lupercalia of yours, ſet not a Crown upon one Tyrant's head, but upon all, and ſuch a Crown as you would have limited by no Laws, nor liable to any. Indeed if we muſt believe the Oracles of the Emperors themſelves (for ſo ſome Chriſtian Emperors, as Theodoſius and Valens, have called their Edicts, Cod. lib. 1. tit. 14.) the Authority of the Emperors depends upon that of the Law. So that the Majeſty of the Perſon that reigns, even by the Judgment, or call it the Oracle of the Emperors themſelves, muſt ſubmit to the Laws, on whoſe Authority it depends. Hence Pliny tells Trajan in his Panegyrick, when the Power of the Emperors was grown to its height, 'A Principality, and an Abſolute Sovereignty are quite different things. Trajan puts down whatever looks like a Kingdom; he rules like a Prince, that there may be no room for a Magiſterial Power. And afterwards, 'Whatever I have ſaid of other Princes, I ſaid that I might ſhow how our Prince reforms and corrects the Manners of Princes, which by long cuſtom have been corrupted and depraved. Are not you aſhamed to call that the Right of Kings, that Pliny calls the corrupt and depraved Cuſtoms of Princes? But let this ſuffice to have been ſaid in ſhort of the Right of Kings, as it was taken at Rome. How they dealt with their Tyrants, whether Kings or Emperors, is generally known. They expelled Tarquin. But, ſay you, How did they expel him? Did they proceed againſt him judicially? No ſuch matter: When he would have come into the City, they ſhut the gates againſt him. Ridiculous Fool! What could they do but ſhut the gates, when he was haſtning to them with part of the Army? And what great difference will there be, whether they baniſhed him, or put him to death, ſo they puniſhed him one way or other? The beſt men of that age kill'd Cæſar the Tyrant in the very Senate. Which action of theirs, Marcus Tullius, who was himſelf a very excellent Man, and publickly call'd the Father of his Countrey, both elſewhere and particularly in his ſecond Philippick, extols wonderfully. I'll repeat ſome of his words: 'All good men kill'd Cæſar, as far as in them lay. Some Men could not adviſe in it, others wanted Courage to act in it, others wanted an Opportunity, all had a good will to it. And afterwards, 'What greater and more glorious Action (ye holy gods!) ever was performed, not in this City only, but in any other Country? what Action more worthy to be recommended to everlaſting memory? I am not unwilling to be included within the number of thoſe that adviſed it, as within the Trojan Horſe. The paſſage of Seneca may relate both to the Romans, and the Grecians, 'There cannot be a greater, nor more acceptable Sacrifice offered up to Jupiter, than a wicked Prince. For if you conſider Hercules, whoſe words theſe are, they ſhew what the Opinion was of the principal Men amongſt the Grecians in that Age. If the Poet, who flouriſhed under Nero, (and the moſt worthy Perſons in Plays generally expreſs the Poet's own Senſe) then this paſſage ſhows us what Seneca himſelf and all good Men, even in Nero's time, thought was fit to be done to a Tyrant; and how vertuous an Action, how acceptable to God they thought it to kill one. So every good Man of Rome, as far as in him lay, kill'd Domitian. Pliny the Second owns it openly in his Panegyrick to Trajan the Emperor, 'We took pleaſure in daſhing thoſe proud Looks againſt the Ground, in piercing him with our Swords, in mangling him with Axes, as if he had bled and felt pain at every ſtroke: No Man could ſo command his paſſion of Joy, but that he counted it a piece of Revenge to behold his mangled Limbs, his Members torn aſunder, and after all, his ſtern and horrid Statues thrown down and burnt. And afterwards, 'They cannot love good Princes enough,

‘ that cannot hate bad ones as they deſerve. Then amongſt other Enormities of Domitian, he reckons this for one, that he put to death Epaphroditus, that had kill'd Nero: ‘ Had we forgotten the avenging Nero's death? Was it likely that ‘ he would ſuffer his Life and Actions to be ill ſpoken of, whoſe death he revenged? He ſeems to have thought it almoſt a Crime not to kill Nero, that counts it ſo great a one to puniſh him that did it. By what has been ſaid, it is evident, that the beſt of the Romans did not only kill Tyrants, as oft as they could, and howſoever they could; but that they thought it a commendable, and a praiſeworthy Action ſo to do, as the Grecians had done before them. For when they could not proceed judicially againſt a Tyrant in his life-time, being inferior to him in Strength and Power, yet after his death they did it, and condemn'd him by the Valerian Law. For Valerius Publicola, Junius Brutus his Colleague, when he ſaw that Tyrants, being guarded with Soldiers, could not be brought to a legal Trial, he deviſed a Law to make it lawful to kill them any way, tho uncondemn'd; and that they that did it, ſhould afterwards give an account of their ſo doing. Hence, when Caſſius had actually run Caligula through with a Sword, tho every Body elſe had done it in their hearts, Valerius Aſiaticus, one that had been Conſul, being preſent at the time, cried out to the Soldiers that began to mutiny becauſe of his death, I wiſh I my ſelf had kill'd him. And the Senate at the ſame time was ſo far from being diſpleaſed with Caſſius for what he had done, that they reſolved to extirpate the Memory of the Emperors, and to raze the Temples that had been erected in Honour of them. When Claudius was preſently ſaluted Emperor by the Soldiers, they forbad him by the Tribune of the People to take the Government upon him; but the Power of the Soldiers prevailed. The Senate declared Nero an Enemy, and made enquiry after him, to have puniſhed him according to the Law of their Anceſtors; which required, that he ſhould be ſtript naked, and hung by the Neck upon a forked Stake, and whipt to death. Conſider now, how much more mildly and moderately the Engliſh dealt with their Tyrant, tho many are of Opinion, that he cauſed the ſpilling of more Blood than ever Nero himſelf did. So the Senate condemn'd Domitian after his death; they commanded his Statues to be pull'd down and daſh'd in pieces, which was all they could do. When Commodus was ſlain by his own Officers, neither the Senate, nor the People puniſht the Fact, but declared him an Enemy, and enquired for his dead Corps to have made it an Example. An Act of the Senate made upon that occaſion is extant in Lampridius: ‘ Let the Enemy of his Country be depriv'd of all his Titles; let the Parricide ‘ be drawn, let him be torn in pieces in the Spoliary, let the Enemy of the gods, ‘ the Executioner of the Senate be drag'd with a Hook, &c. The ſame Perſons in a very full Senate condemn'd Didius Julianus to death, and ſent a Tribune to ſlay him in the Palace. The ſame Senate depoſed Maximinus, and declared him an Enemy. Let us hear the words of the Decree of the Senate concerning him, as Capitolinus relates it: ‘ The Conſul put the queſtion, Conſcript Fathers, what ‘ is your pleaſure concerning the Maximines? They anſwered, ‘ They are Enemies, ‘ they are Enemies, who ever kills them ſhall be rewarded. Would you know now, whether the People of Rome, and the Provinces of the Empire obeyed the Senate, or Maximine the Emperor? Hear what the ſame Author ſays, The Senate wrote Letters into all the Provinces, requiring them to take care of their Common Safety and Liberty; the Letters were publickly read. And the Friends, the Deputies, the Generals, the Tribunes, the Soldiers of Maximine, were ſlain in all places; very few Cities were found that kept their Faith with the publick Enemy. Herodian relates the ſame thing. But what need we give any more Inſtances out of the Roman Hiſtories? Let us now ſee what manner of thing the Right of Kings was in thoſe days, in the Nations that bordered upon the Empire. Ambiorix, a King of the Gauls, confeſſes, ‘ The Nature of his Dominion to be ‘ ſuch, that the People have as great Power over him, as he over them. And conſequently, as well as he judged them, he might be judged by them. Vercingetorix, another King in Gaul, was accuſed of Treaſon by his own People. Theſe things Cæſar relates in his Hiſtory of the Gallick Wars. ‘ Neither is the ‘ Regal Power among the Germans abſolute and uncontroulable; leſſer matters ‘ are ordered and diſpoſed by the Princes; greater Affairs by all the People. ‘ The King or Prince is more conſiderable by the Authority of his Perſwaſions, ‘ than by any Power that he has of commanding. If his Opinion be not ap-

‘ prov'd of, they declare their diſlike of it by a general murmuring Noiſe. This is out of Tacitus. Nay, and you your ſelf now confeſs, that what but of late you exclaim'd againſt as an unheard of thing, has been often done, to wit, That no leſs than fifty Scotiſh Kings have been either Baniſhed, or Impriſoned, or put to death, nay, and ſome of them publickly executed. Which having come to paſs in our very Iſland; why do you, as if it were your Office to conceal the violent deaths of Tyrants, by burying them in the dark, exclaim againſt it as an abominable and unheard of thing? You proceed to commend the Jews and Chriſtians for their Religious Obedience even to Tyrants, and to heap one Lie upon another, in all which I have already confuted you. Lately you made large Encomiums on the Obedience of the Aſſyrians and Perſians, and now you reckon up their Rebellions; and tho but of late you ſaid they never had rebell'd at all, now you give us a great many reaſons why they rebell'd ſo often. Then you reſume the Narrative of the manner of our King's death, which you had broken off long ſince; that if you had not taken care ſufficiently to appear ridiculous, and a Fool then, you may do it now. You ſaid, He was led through the Members of his own Court. What you mean by the Members of the Court, I would gladly know. You enumerate the Calamities that the Romans underwent by changing their Kingdom into a Commonwealth. In which I have already ſhown how groſly you give your ſelf the Lie. What was it you ſaid when you wrote againſt the Jeſuit? You demonſtrated, That in an Ariſtocracy, or a popular State there could but be Seditions and Tumults, whereas under a Tyrant nothing was to be looked for, but certain Ruin and Deſtruction: And dare you now ſay, you vain corrupt Mortal, That thoſe Seditions were Puniſhments inflicted upon them for baniſhing their Kings? Forſooth, becauſe King Charles gave you a hundred Jacobuſſes, therefore the Romans ſhall be puniſhed for baniſhing their Kings. But ‘ they that kill'd Julius ‘ Ceſar, did not proſper afterwards. I confeſs, if I would have had any Tyrant ſpared, it ſhould have been him. For altho he introduced a Monarchical Government into a Free State by force of Arms, yet perhaps himſelf deſerved a Kingdom beſt; and yet I conceive that none of thoſe that killed him can be ſaid to have been puniſhed for ſo doing, any more than Caius Anthonius, Cicero's Colleague, for deſtroying Catiline, who when he was afterward condemn'd for other Crimes, ſays Cicero in his Oration pro Flacco, Catiline's Sepulchre was adorned with Flowers. For they that favoured Catiline, then rejoyced; They gave out then, that what Catiline did was juſt, to encreaſe the Peoples hatred againſt thoſe that had cut him off. Theſe are Artifices, which wicked Men make uſe of, to deter the beſt of Men from puniſhing Tyrants, and flagitious Perſons. I might as eaſily ſay the quite contrary, and inſtance in them that have killed Tyrants, and proſpered afterwards; if any certain inference might be drawn in ſuch Caſes from the events of things. You object further, That the Engliſh did not put their Hereditary King to death in like manner, as Tyrants uſe to be ſlain, but as Robbers and Traytors are executed. In the firſt place I do not, nor can any wiſe Man underſtand what a Crown's being Hereditary ſhould contribute to a King's Crimes being unpuniſhable. What you aſcribe to the Barbarous Cruelty of the Engliſh, proceeded rather from their Clemency and Moderation, and as ſuch, deſerves Commendation; who, tho the being a Tyrant is a Crime that comprehends all ſorts of Enormities, ſuch as Robberies, Treaſons, and Rebellions againſt the whole Nation, yet were contented to inflict no greater puniſhment upon him for being ſo, than they uſed of courſe to do upon any common Highway-man, or ordinary Traytor. You hope ſome ſuch Men as Harmodius and Thraſibulus will riſe up amongſt us, and make expiation for the King's death by ſhedding their Blood that were the Authors of it. But you will run mad with deſpair, and be deteſted by all good Men, and put an end to that wretched Life of yours, by hanging your ſelf, before you ſee Men like Harmodius avenging the Blood of a Tyrant upon ſuch as have done no other than what they did themſelves. That you will come to ſuch an end is moſt probable, nor can any other be expected of ſo great a Rogue; but the other thing is an utter impoſſibility. You mention thirty Tyrants that rebelled in Gallienus's time. And what if it fall out, that one Tyrant happens to oppoſe another, muſt therefore all they that reſiſt Tyrants be accounted ſuch themſelves? You cannot perſwade Men into ſuch a belief, you Slave of a Knight; nor your Author Trebellius Pollio, the moſt inconſiderable of all Hiſtorians that have writ. If any of the Emperors were declared Enemies by the Senate, you ſay, it was done by Faction, but could not have been by Law. You put us in mind what it was that made Emperours at firſt: It was Faction and Violence, and to ſpeak plainer, it was the madneſs of Anthony, that made Generals at firſt rebel againſt the Senate, and the People of Rome; there was no Law, no Right for their ſo doing. Galba, you ſay, was puniſhed for his Inſurrection againſt Nero. Tell us likewiſe how Veſpaſian was puniſhed for taking up Arms againſt Vitellius; There was as much difference, you ſay, betwixt Charles and Nero, as betwixt thoſe Engliſh Butchers, and the Roman Senators of that Age. Deſpicable Villain! by whom it is Scandalous to be commended, and a Praiſe to be evil ſpoken of: But a few Periods before, diſcourſing of this very thing, you ſaid, That the Roman Senate under the Emperors, was in effect but an Aſſembly of Slaves in Robes: And here you ſay, That very Senate was an Aſſembly of Kings; which if it be allowed, then are Kings according to your own Opinion, but Slaves with Robes on. Kings are bleſſed, that have ſuch a Fellow as you to write in their praiſe, than whom no Man is more a Raſcal, no Beaſt more void of Senſe, unleſs this one thing may be ſaid to be peculiar to you, that none ever brayed ſo learnedly. You make the Parliament of England more like to Nero, than to the Roman Senate. This itch of yours of making ſilly Similitudes, enforces me to rectify you, whether I will or no: And I will let you ſee how like King Charles was to Nero. Nero you ſay, commanded his own Mother to be run through with a Sword. But Charles murdered both his Prince, and his Father, and that by Poyſon. For to omit other evidences; he that would not ſuffer a Duke that was accuſed for it, to come to his Tryal, muſt needs have been guilty of it himſelf. Nero ſlew many thouſands of Chriſtians; but Charles ſlew many more. There were thoſe, ſays Suetonius, that praiſed Nero after he was dead, that long'd to have had him again, That hung Garlands of Flowers upon his Sepulchre, and gave out that they would never proſper that had been his Enemies. And ſome there are tranſported with the like Phrenſy, that wiſh for King Charles again, and extol him to the higheſt degree imaginable, of whom you a Knight of the Halter are a Ringleader. The Engliſh Soldiers more Savage than their own Maſtiffs, erected a new and unheard-of Court of Juſtice. Obſerve this ingenions Symbol, or Adage of Salmaſius, which he has now repeated ſix times over, more Savage than their own Maſtiffs. Take notice, Orators and School-Maſters; pluck, if you are wiſe, this Elegant Flower, which Salmaſius is ſo very fond of: Commit this Flouriſh of a Man, that is ſo much a Maſter of Words, to your Deſks for ſafe Cuſtody, leſt it be loſt. Has your rage made you forget words to that degree, that like a Cuckcoo, you muſt needs ſay the ſame thing over and over again? What ſtrange thing has befallen you? The Poet tells us, that Spleen and Rage turn'd Hecuba into a Dog; and it has turn'd you, the Lord of St. Lupus, into a Cuckoo. Now you come out with freſh Contradictions. You had ſaid before, pag. 113. That Princes were not bound by any Laws, neither Coercive, nor Directory; that they were bound by no Law at all. Now you ſay, That you will diſcourſe by and by of the difference betwixt ſome Kings and others, in point of Power; ſome having had more, ſome leſs. You ſay, You will prove that Kings cannot be judged, nor condemn'd by their own Subjects, by a moſt ſolid Argument; but you do it by a very ſilly one, and 'tis this: You ſay, There was no other difference than that betwixt the Judges, and the Kings of the Jews; and yet the reaſon why the Jews required to have Kings over them, was becauſe they were weary of their Judges, and hated their Government. Do you think, that, becauſe they might judg and condemn their Judges, if they miſbehaved themſelves in the Government, they therefore hated and were weary of them, and would be under Kings, whom they ſhould have no Power to reſtrain and keep within Bounds, tho they ſhould break through all Laws? Who but you ever argued ſo childiſhly? So that they deſired a King for ſome other reaſon, than that they might have a Maſter over them, whoſe Power ſhould be ſuperior to that of the Law; which reaſon what it was, it is not to our preſent purpoſe to make a Conjecture. Whatever it was, both God and his Prophets tells us, it was no piece of prudence in the People to deſire a King. And now you fall foul upon your Rabbins, and are very angry with them for ſaying, That a King might be judged and condemned to undergo Stripes; out of whoſe Writings you ſaid before you had proved that the Kings of the Jews could not be judged. Wherein you confeſs, that you told a Lye when you ſaid you had proved any ſuch thing out of their Writings.

Writings. Nay, you come at laſt to forget the Subject you were upon, of writing in the King's Defence, and raiſe little impertinent Controverſies about Solomon's Stables, and how may Stalls he had for his Horſes. Then of a Jocky you become a Ballad-ſinger again, or rather, as I ſaid before, a raving diſtracted Cuckoo. You complain, That in theſe latter Ages, Diſcipline has been more remiſs, and the Rule leſs obſerved and kept up to; viz. becauſe one Tyrant is not permitted, without a Check from the Law, to let looſe the Reins of all Diſcipline, and corrupt all Mens manners. This Doctrine, you ſay, the Browniſts introduced amongſt thoſe of the Reform'd Religion; ſo that Luther, Calvin, Zuinglius, Bucer, and all the moſt Celebrated Orthodox Divines are Browniſts in your Opinion. The Engliſh have the leſs reaſon to take your Reproaches ill, becauſe they hear you belching out the ſame Slanders againſt the moſt eminent Doctors of the Church, and in effect againſt the whole Reformed Church it ſelf.

CHAP. VI.

AFter having diſcours'd upon the Law of God, and of Natute, and handled both ſo untowardly, that you have got nothing by the bargain but a deſerved reproach of ignorance and knavery; I cannot apprehend what you can have farther to alledg in defence of your Royal Cauſe, but meer trifles. I for my part hope I have given ſatisfaction already to all good and learned men, and done this Noble Cauſe right, ſhould I break off here; yet leſt I ſhould ſeem to any to decline your variety of arguing and ingenuity, rather than your immoderate impertinence, and tittle-tattle, I'll follow you where ever you have a mind to go; but with ſuch brevity as ſhall make it appear, that after having perform'd whatever the neceſſary defence of the Cauſe required, if not what the dignity of it merited, I now do but comply with ſome mens expectation, if not their curioſity. Now, ſay you, I ſhall alledg other and greater Arguments. What! greater Arguments than what the Law of God and Nature afforded? Help Lucina! The mountain Salmaſius is in labour! It is not for nothing that he has got a She-Husband. Mortals expect ſome extraordinary Birth. If he that is, and is called a King, might be accuſed before any other Power, that Power muſt of neceſſity be greater than that of the King; and if ſo, then muſt that Power be indeed the Kingly Power, and ought to have the name of it: For a Kingly Power is thus defined; to wit, the Supreme Power in the State reſiding in a ſingle Perſon, and which has no ſuperior. O ridiculous Birth! a Mouſe crept out of the Mountain! Help Grammarians! one of your number is in danger of periſhing! The Law of God and of Nature are ſafe; but Salmaſius's Dictionary is undone. What if I ſhould anſwer you thus? That words ought to give place to things; that we having taken away Kingly Government it ſelf, do not think our ſelves concerned about its name, and definition; let others look to that, who are in love with Kings: We are contented with the enjoyment of our Liberty; ſuch an anſwer would be good enough for you. But to let you ſee that I deal fairly with you throughout, I will anſwer you, not only from my own, but from the opinion of very wiſe and good men, who have thought that the Name and Power of a King are very conſiſtent with a Power in the People and the Law, ſuperior to that of the King himſelf. In the firſt place Lycurgus, a man very eminent for wiſdom, deſigning, as Plato ſays, to ſecure a Kingly Government as well as it was poſſible, could find no better expedient to preſerve it, than by making the Power of the Senate, and of the Ephori, that is, the Power of the People, ſuperior to it. Theſeus, in Euripides, King of Athens, was of the ſame opinion; for he to his great honour reſtored the People to their Liberty, and advanced the Power of the People above that of the King, and yet left the Regal Power in that City to his Poſterity. Whence Euripides in his Play called the Suppliants, introduces him ſpeaking on this manner: 'I have advanced the People themſelves into the 'Throne, having freed the City from Slavery, and admitted the People to a 'ſhare in the Government, by giving them an equal right of Suffrage. And in another place to the Herald of Thebes, 'In the firſt place, ſays he, you begin 'your Speech, Friend, with a thing that is not true, in ſtiling me a Monarch;

‘ for this City is not governed by a ſingle Perſon, but is a Free State; the People ‘ reigns here. Theſe were his words, when at the ſame time he was both called, and really was King there. The Divine Plato likewiſe in his Eight Epiſtle, Lycurgus, ſays he, introduced the Power of the Senate and of the Ephori, a thing very preſervative of Kingly Government, which by this means has honourably flouriſhed for ſo many Ages, becauſe the Law in effect was made King. Now the Law cannot be King, unleſs there be ſome, who, if there ſhould be occaſion, may put the Law in execution againſt the King. A Kingly Government ſo bounded and limited, he himſelf commends to the Sicilians: ‘ Let the People enjoy their Liberty under a ‘ Kingly Government; let the King himſelf be accountable; let the Law take ‘ place even againſt Kings themſelves, if they act contrary to Law. Ariſtotle likewiſe in the third Book of his Politicks, ‘ Of all Kingdoms, ſays he, that are go‘ vern'd by Laws, that of the Lacedemonians ſeems to be moſt truly and properly ſo. And he ſays, all forms of Kingly Governments are according to ſetled and eſtabliſht Laws, but one, which he calls παμβασιλεία, or Abſolute Monarchy, which he does not mention ever to have obtain'd in any Nation. So that Ariſtotle thought ſuch a Kingdom, as that of the Lacedemonians was, to be and deſerve the name of a Kingdom more properly than any other; and conſequently that a King, tho ſubordinate to his own People, was neverthelеſs actually a King, and properly ſo called. Now ſince ſo many and ſo great Authors aſſert that a Kingly Government both in name and thing may very well ſubſiſt even where the People, tho they do not ordinarily exerciſe the Supream Power, yet have it actually reſiding in them, and exerciſe it upon occaſion; be not you of ſo mean a Soul as to fear the downfall of Grammar, and the confuſion of the ſignification of words to that degree, as to betray the Liberty of Mankind, and the State, rather than your Gloſſary ſhould not hold water. And know for the future, that words muſt be conformable to things, not things to words. By this means you'll have more wit, and not run on in infinitum, which now you're afraid of. It was to no purpoſe then for Seneca, you ſay, to deſcribe thoſe three forms of Government, as he has done. Let Seneca do a thing to no purpoſe, ſo we enjoy our Liberty. And if I miſtake us not, we are other ſort of Men than to be enſlav'd by Seneca's Flowers. And yet Seneca, tho he ſays that the Sovereign Power in a Kingly Government reſides in a ſingle Perſon, ſays withal that the Power is the People's, and by them committed to the King for the welfare of the whole, not for their ruin and deſtruction; and that the People has not given him a propriety in it, but the uſe of it. Kings at this rate, you ſay, do not reign by God, but by the People. As if God did not ſo over-rule the People, that they ſet up ſuch Kings, as it pleaſes God. Since Juſtinian himſelf openly acknowledges, that the Roman Emperours derived their Authority from that Royal Law, whereby the People granted to them and veſted in them all their own Power and Authority. But how oft ſhall we repeat theſe things over and over again? Then you take upon you to intermeddle with the Conſtitution of our Government, in which you are no ways concerned, who are both a Stranger and a Foreigner; but it ſhows your ſawcineſs, and want of good manners. Come then, let us hear your Solœciſms, like a buſy Coxcomb as you are. You tell us, but 'tis in falſe Latin, that what thoſe Deſperadoes ſay, is only to deceive the People. You Raſcal! was it not for this that you a Renegado Grammarian, were ſo forward to intermeddle with the Affairs of our Government, that you might introduce your Solœciſms and Barbariſms amongſt us? But ſay, How have we deceiv'd the People? The form of Government which they have ſet up, is not Popular, but Military. This is what that herd of Fugitives and Vagabonds hired you to write. So that I ſhall not trouble my ſelf to anſwer you, who bleat what you know nothing of, but I'll anſwer them that hired you. Who excluded the Lords from Parliament, was it the People? Ay it was the People; and in ſo doing they threw an intolerable Yoke of Slavery from off their necks. Thoſe very Soldiers, who you ſay did it, were not Foreigners, but our own Country-men, and a great part of the People; and they did it with the conſent, and at the deſire of almoſt all the reſt of the People, and not without the Authority of the Parliament neither. Was it the People that cut off part of the Houſe of Commons, forcing ſome away? &c. Yes, I ſay, it was the People. For whatever the better and ſounder part of the Senate did, in which the true power of the People reſided, why may not the People be ſaid to have done it? What if the greater part of the Senate ſhould chuſe to be Slaves, or to expoſe the Government to ſale, ought not the leſſer number to interpoſe, and endeavour to retain their Liberty, if it be in their power? But the Officers of the Army and their Soldiers did it. And we are beholden to thoſe Officers for not being wanting to the State, but repelling the Tumultuary violence of the Citizens and Mechanicks of London, who, like that Rabble that appear'd for Clodius, had but a little before beſet the very Parliament Houſe? Do you therefore call the right of the Parliament, to whom it properly and originally belongs to take care of the Liberty of the People both in Peace and War, a Military Power? But 'tis no wonder that thoſe Traitors that have dictated theſe paſſages to you, ſhould talk at that rate; ſo that profligate faction of Anthony and his adherents uſed to call the Senate of Rome, when they armed themſelves againſt the Enemies of their Country, The Camp of Pompey. And now I'm glad to underſtand that they of your party envy Cromwell, that moſt valiant General of our Army, for undertaking that Expedition in Ireland, (ſo acceptable to Almighty God) ſurrounded with a joyful crowd of his Friends, and proſecuted with the well-wiſhes of the people, and the prayers of all good men: For I queſtion not but at the news of his many Victories there, they are by this time burſt with ſpleen. I paſs by many of your impertinencies concerning the Roman Soldiers. What follows is moſt notoriouſly falſe: The power of the people, ſay you, ceaſes where there is a King. By what Law or Right is that? Since it is known that almoſt all Kings, of what Nations ſoever, received their Authority from the people upon certain conditions; which if the King do not perform, I wiſh you would inform us, why that Power, which was but a truſt, ſhould not return to the people, as well from a King, as from a Conſul, or any other Magiſtrate. For when you tell us, that 'tis neceſſary for the Publick Safety, you do but trifle with us; for the ſafety of the Publick is equally concerned, whether it be from a King, or from a Senate, or from a Triumvirate, that the power wherewith they were entruſted, revert to the people, upon their abuſe of it; and yet you your ſelf grant that it may ſo revert from all ſorts of Magiſtrates, a King only excepted. Certainly, if no people in their right wits ever committed the Government either to a King, or other Magiſtrates, for any other purpoſe than for the common good of them all, there can be no reaſon why, to prevent the utter ruin of them all, they may not as well take it back again from a King, as from other Governors; nay, and it may with far greater eaſe be taken from one, than from many. And to inveſt any mortal creature with a power over themſelves, on any other terms than upon truſt, were extreme madneſs; nor is it credible that any people ſince the Creation of the World, who had freedom of will, were ever ſo miſerably ſilly, as either to part with the power for ever, and to all purpoſes, or to revoke it from thoſe whom they had entruſted with it, but upon moſt urgent and weighty reaſons. If diſſenſions, if Civil Wars, are occaſioned thereby, there cannot any Right accrue from thence to the King, to retain that power by force of arms, which the people challenge from him as their own. Whence it follows that what you ſay, and we do not deny, That Governors are not lightly to be changed, is true with reſpect to the Peoples Prudence, not the King's Right; but that therefore they ought never to be changed, upon no occaſion whatſoever, that does not follow by no means; nor have you hitherto alledged any thing, nor made appear any Right of Kings to the contrary, but that all the people concurring, they may lawfully be depoſed, when unfit for Government; provided it may be done, as it has been often done in your own Countrey of France, without any Tumults or Civil Wars. Since therefore the Safety of the People, and not that of a Tyrant, is the Supreme Law; and conſequently ought to be alledged on the Peoples behalf againſt a Tyrant, and not for him againſt them: you that go about to pervert ſo ſacred and ſo glorious a Law, with your fallacies and juglings; you who would have this Supreme Law, and which of all others is moſt beneficial to Mankind, to ſerve only for the Impunity of Tyrants; let me tell you (ſince you call us Engliſhmen ſo often inſpired, and Enthuſiaſts, and Prophets) let me, I ſay, be ſo far a Prophet, as to tell you, That the Vengeance of God and Man hangs over your head for ſo horrid a Crime; altho your ſubjecting all Mankind to Tyranny, as far as in you lies, which in effect is no better than condemning them to be devoured by wild Beaſts, is in it ſelf part of its own Vengeance; and whitherſoever you fly, and whereſoever you wander, will firſt or laſt purſue you with its Furies, and overtake you, and cauſe you to rave worſe than you do at preſent.

ſent. I come now to your ſecond Argument, which is not unlike the firſt: If the People may reſume their Liberty, there would be no difference, ſay you, betwixt a Popular State and a Kingdom; but that in a Kingdom one Man rules, and in a Popular State many. And what if that were true; would the State have any prejudice by it? But you your ſelf tell us of other differences that would be notwithſtanding; to wit, of Time and Succeſſion; for in popular States, the Magiſtrates are generally choſen yearly; whereas Kings, if they behave themſelves well, are perpetual; and in moſt Kingdoms there is a Succeſſion in the ſame Family. But let them differ from one another, or not differ, I regard not thoſe petty things: In this they agree, that when the Publick Good requires it, the People may without doing injury to any, reſume that Power for the Publick Safety, which they committed to another for that end and purpoſe. But according to the Royal Law, by the Romans ſo called, which is mentioned in the Inſtitutes, the People of Rome granted all their Power and Authority to the Prince. They did ſo by compulſion; the Emperor being willing to ratify their Tyranny by the Authority of a Law. But of this we have ſpoken before; and their own Lawyers commenting upon this place in the Inſtitutes, confeſs as much. So that we make no queſtion but the People may revoke what they were forced to grant, and granted againſt their wills. But moſt rational it is to ſuppoſe, that the People of Rome transferred no other power to the Prince, than they had before granted to their own Magiſtrates; and that was a power to govern according to Law, and a revocable, not an abſurd, tyrannical power. Hence it was that the Emperors aſſumed the Conſular Dignity, and that of the Tribunes of the People; but after Julius Cæſar, not one of them pretended to the Dictatorſhip: In the Circus Maximus they uſed to adore the People, as I have ſaid already out of Tacitus and Claudian. But as heretofore many private perſons have ſold themſelves into ſlavery, ſo a whole Nation may. Thou Goal-bird of a Knight, thou day-ſpirit, thou everlaſting ſcandal to thy Native Countrey! The moſt deſpicable Slaves in the World ought to abhor and ſpit upon ſuch a Factor for Slavery, ſuch a publick Pander as thou art. Certainly if people had ſo enſlaved themſelves to Kings, then might Kings turn them over to other Maſters, or ſell them for Money; and yet we know that Kings cannot ſo much as alienate the Demeſnes of the Crown: And ſhall he, that has but the Crown, and the Revenues that belong to it, as an Uſufructuary, and thoſe given him by the People, can he be ſaid to have, as it were, purchaſed the People, and made them his Propriety? Tho you were bored through both ears, and went barefoot, you would not be ſo vile and deſpicable, ſo much more contemptible than all Slaves, as the broaching ſuch a ſcandalous Doctrine as this makes you. But go on, and puniſh your ſelf for your Rogueries, as now you do, tho againſt your will. You frame a long Diſcourſe of the Law of War; which is nothing to the purpoſe in this place: For neither did Charles conquer us; and for his Anceſtors, if it were never ſo much granted that they did, yet have they often renounced their Title as Conquerors. And certain it is, That we were never ſo conquered, but that as we ſwore Allegiance to them, ſo they ſwore to maintain our Laws, and govern by them: Which Laws, when Charles had notoriouſly violated, taken in what capacity you will, as one who had formerly been a Conqueror, or was now a perjured King, we ſubdued him by force, he himſelf having begun with us firſt. And according to your own opinion, Whatever is acquired by War, becomes his property that acquired it. So that how full ſoever you are of words, how impertinent ſoever a babler, whatever you prate, how great a noiſe ſoever you make, what Quotations ſoever out of the Rabbins, tho you make your ſelf never ſo hoarſe, to the end of this Chapter, aſſure your ſelf, That nothing of it makes for the King, he being now conquered, but all for us, who by God's aſſiſtance are Conquerors.

CHAP. VII.

TO avoid two very great inconveniences, and, conſidering your own weight, very weighty ones indeed, you denied in the foregoing Chapter, That the Peoples Power was ſuperior to that of the King; for if that ſhould be granted, Kings muſt provide themſelves of ſome other name, becauſe the People would indeed be King, and ſome diviſions in your Syſtem of Politicks would be confounded: the firſt of which inconveniences would thwart with your Dictionary, and the latter overthrow your Politicks. To theſe I have given ſuch an anſwer as ſhows, That tho our own Safety and Liberty were the principal things I aimed the preſervation of, yet withal, I had ſome conſideration of ſalving your Dictionary, and your Politicks. Now, ſay you, I will prove by other arguments, That a King cannot be judged by his own Subjects; of which Arguments this ſhall be the greateſt and moſt convincing, That a King has no Peer in his Kingdom. What? Can a King have no Peer in his Kingdom? What then is the meaning of thoſe Twelve Ancient Peers of the Kings of France? Are they Fables and Trifles? Are they called ſo in vain, and in mock only? Have a care how you affront thoſe Principal Men of that Kingdom: Who if they are not the King's Peers, as they are called, I am afraid your Dictionary, which is the only thing you are concerned for, will be found more faulty in France, than in England. But go to, let's hear your demonſtration, that a King has no Peer in his own Kingdom. Becauſe, ſay you, the People of Rome, when they had baniſh'd their King, appointed not one, but two Conſuls; and the reaſon was, That if one of them ſhould tranſgreſs the Laws, his Collegue might be a check to him. There could hardly have been deviſed any thing more ſilly: How came it to paſs then, that but one of the Conſuls had the bundles of Rods carried before him, and not both, if two were appointed, that each might have a Power over the other? And what if both had conſpired againſt the Commonwealth? Would not the Caſe then be the very ſame that it would have been, if one Conſul only had been appointed without a Collegue? But we know very well, that both Conſuls, and all other Magiſtrates were bound to obey the Senate, whenever the Senate and the People ſaw, that the Intereſt of the Commonwealth ſo required. We have a famous inſtance of that in the Decemvirs, who tho they were inveſted with the Power of Conſuls, and were the chief Magiſtrates, yet the Authority of the Senate reduced them all, tho they ſtruggled to retain their Government. Nay, we read that ſome Conſuls before they were out of office, have been declared Enemies, and Arms been taken up againſt them; for in thoſe days no man looked upon him as a Conſul, who acted as an Enemy. So War was waged againſt Antony, tho a Conſul, by Authority of the Senate; in which being worſted, he would have been put to death, but that Octavius, affecting the Empire, ſided with him to ſubvert the Commonwealth. Now whereas you ſay, That it is a property peculiar to Kingly Majeſty, that the power reſides in a ſingle perſon; that's but a looſe expreſſion, like the reſt of what you ſay, and is contradicted by your ſelf a little after: For the Hebrew Judges, you ſay, ruled as long as they lived, and there was but one of them at a time: The Scripture alſo calls them Kings; and yet they were accountable to the great Council. Thus we ſee, That an itch of Vain-glory, in being thought to have ſaid all that can be ſaid, makes you hardly ſay any thing but contradictions. Then I aſk, what kind of Government that was in the Roman Empire, when ſometimes two, ſometimes three Emperors, reign'd all at once? Do you reckon them to have been Emperors, that is, Kings, or was it an Ariſtocracy, or a Triumvirate? Or will you deny, that the Roman Empire under Antoninus and Verus, under Diocleſian and Maximian, under Conſtantine and Licinius, was ſtill but one entire Empire? If theſe Princes were not Kings, your three Forms of Government will hardly hold; if they were, then it is not an eſſential Property of a Kingly Government, to reſide in a ſingle perſon. If one of theſe offend, ſay you, then may the other refer the matter to the Senate, or the People, where he may be accuſed and condemned. And does not the Senate and the People then judg, when the matter is ſo referred to them? So that if you will give any credit to your ſelf, there needs not one Collegue to judg another. Such a miſerable Advocate as you, if you were not ſo wretched a fellow as you are, would deſerve compaſſion; you lie every way ſo open to blows, that if one were minded for ſports-ſake to make a Paſs at any part of you, he could hardly miſs, let him aim where he would. 'Tis ridiculous, ſay you, to imagine, That a King will ever appoint Judges to condemn himſelf. But I can tell you of an Emperor, that was no ridiculous perſon, but an Excellent Prince, and that was Trajan, who when he delivered a Dagger to a certain Roman Magiſtrate, as the cuſtom was, that being the badg of his Office, frequently thus admoniſhed him, 'Take this Sword, and uſe it for me, if I do as I ought; if otherwiſe, againſt me; for Miſcarriages in the Supreme Magiſtrate are leſs excuſable. This Dion and Aurelius Victor ſay of him: You ſee here, that a worthy Emperor appointed one to judg himſelf, tho he did not make him his equal. Tiberius perhaps might have ſaid as much out of Vanity and Hypocriſie; but 'tis almoſt a crime to imagine that ſo good and vertuous a Prince as Trajan, did not really ſpeak as he thought, and according to what he apprehended right and juſt. How much more reaſonable was it that tho he were ſuperior to the Senate in power, and might if he would, have refuſed to yield them any obedience, yet he actually did obey them, as by virtue of his office he ought to do, and acknowledged their Right in the Government to be ſuperior to his own? For ſo Pliny tells us in his Panegyrick, 'The Senate both deſired and commanded you to be Conſul a fourth time; you may know by the Obedience you pay them, that this is no word of Flattery, but of Power. And a little after, 'This is the deſign you aim at, to reſtore our loſt Liberty. And Trajan was not of that mind alone; the Senate thought ſo too, and were of opinion, That their Authority was indeed Supreme: For they that could command their Emperor, might judg him. So the Emperor Marcus Aurelius, when Caſſius Governor of Syria endeavoured to get the Empire from him, referred himſelf either to the Senate, or the People of Rome, and declared himſelf ready to lay down the Government, if they would have it ſo. Now how ſhould a man determine of the Right of Kings better, and more truly, than out of the very mouths of the beſt of Kings? Indeed every good King accounts either the Senate, or the People, not only equal, but ſuperior to himſelf by the Law of Nature. But a Tyrant being by nature inferior to all men, every one that is ſtronger than he, ought to be accounted not only his equal but ſuperior: For as heretofore nature taught men from Force and Violence to betake themſelves to Laws; ſo wherever the Laws are ſet at naught, the ſame dictate of nature muſt neceſſarily prompt us to betake our ſelves to Force again. 'To be of this opinion, ſays Cicero pro Seſtio, is a ſign of Wiſdom; to put it in practice, argues Courage and Reſolution; and to do both, is the effect of Vertue in its perfection. Let this ſtand then as a ſetled Maxim of the Law of Nature, never to be ſhaken by any Artifices of Flatterers, That the Senate, or the People, are ſuperior to Kings, be they good or bad: Which is but what you your ſelf do in effect confeſs, when you tell us, That the Authority of Kings was derived from the People. For that power which they transferred to Princes, doth yet naturally, or as I may ſay virtually reſide in themſelves notwithſtanding: for ſo natural cauſes that produce any effect by a certain eminency of operation, do always retain more of their own virtue and energy than they impart; nor do they by communicating to others, exhauſt themſelves. You ſee, the cloſer wee keep to Nature, the more evidently does the Peoples Power appear to be above that of the Prince. And this is likewiſe certain, That the People do not freely, and of choice, ſettle the Government in their King abſolutely, ſo as to give him a Propriety in it, nor by Nature can do ſo; but only for the Publick Safety and Liberty, which when the King ceaſes to take care of, then the People in effect have given him nothing at all: For Nature ſays the People gave it him to a particular end and purpoſe; which end, if neither Nature nor the People can attain, the Peoples Gift becomes no more valid, than any other void Covenant or Agreement. Theſe Reaſons prove very fully, That the People are ſuperior to the King; and ſo your greateſt and moſt convincing Argument, That a King cannot be judged by his People, becauſe he has no Peer in his Kingdom, nor any Superior, falls to the ground. For you take that for granted, which we by no means allow. In a popular State, ſay you, the Magiſtrates being appointed by the People, may likewiſe be puniſhed for their Crimes by the People: In an Ariſtocracy the Senators may be puniſhed by their Collegues:

legues: But 'tis a prodigious thing to proceed criminally againſt a King in his own Kingdom, and make him plead for his Life. What can you conclude from hence, but that they who ſet up Kings over them, are the moſt miſerable and moſt ſilly People in the World? But, I pray, what's the reaſon why the People may not puniſh a King that becomes a Malefactor, as well as they may popular Magiſtrates and Senators in an Ariſtocracy? Do you think that all they who live under a Kingly Government, were ſo ſtrangely in love with Slavery, as when they might be free, to chuſe Vaſſalage, and to put themſelves all and entirely under the dominion of one man, who often happens to be an ill Man, and often a Fool, ſo as whatever cauſe might be, to leave themſelves no refuge in, no relief from the Laws nor the Dictates of Nature, againſt the Tyranny of a moſt outragious Maſter, when ſuch a one happens? Why do they then tender Conditions to their Kings, when they firſt enter upon their Government, and preſcribe Laws for them to govern by? Do they do this to be trampled upon the more, and be the more laughed to ſcorn? Can it be imagined, that a whole People would ever ſo vilify themſelves, depart from their own intereſt to that degree, be ſo wanting to themſelves, as to place all their hopes in one Man, and he very often the moſt vain Perſon of them all? To what end do they require an Oath of their Kings, not to act any thing contrary to Law? We muſt ſuppoſe them to do this, that (poor Creatures!) they may learn to their ſorrow, That Kings only may commit Perjury with impunity. This is what your own wicked Concluſions hold forth. If a King that is elected, promiſe any thing to his People upon Oath, which if he would not have ſworn to, perhaps they would not have choſe him, yet if he refuſe to perform that promiſe, he falls not under the Peoples cenſure. Nay, tho he ſwear to his Subjects at his Election, That he will adminiſter Juſtice to them according to the Laws of the Kingdom; and that if he do not, they ſhall be diſcharged of their Allegiance, and himſelf ipſo facto ceaſe to be their King, yet if he break this Oath, 'tis God and not Man that muſt require it of him. I have tranſcribed theſe lines, not for their Elegance, for they are barbarouſly expreſſed; nor becauſe I think there needs any anſwer to them, for they anſwer themſelves, they explode and damn themſelves by their notorious falſhood and loathſomneſs: but I did it to recommend you to Kings for your great Merits; that among ſo many places as there are at Court, they may put you into ſome Preferment or Office that may be fit for you. Some are Princes Secretaries, ſome their Cupbearers, ſome Maſters of the Revels; I think you had beſt be Maſter of the Perjuries to ſome of them. You ſhan't be Maſter of the Ceremonies, you are too much a Clown for that; but their Treachery and Perfidiouſneſs ſhall be under you care. But that Men may ſee that you are both a Fool and a Knave to the higheſt degree, let us conſider theſe laſt aſſertions of yours a little more narrowly; A King, ſay you, tho he ſwear to his Subjects at his Election that he will govern according to Law, and that if he do not, they ſhall be diſcharged of their Allegiance, and he himſelf ipſo facto ceaſe to be their King; yet can he not be depoſed or puniſhed by them. Why not a King, I pray, as well as popular Magiſtrates? becauſe in a popular State, the People do not transfer all their Power to the Magiſtrates. And do they in the Caſe that you have put, veſt it all in the King, when they place him in the Government upon thoſe terms expreſly, to hold it no longer than he uſes it well? Therefore it is evident, that a King ſworn to obſerve the Laws, if he tranſgreſs them, may be puniſhed and depoſed, as well as popular Magiſtrates. So that you can make no more uſe of that invincible Argument of the Peoples transferring all their Right and Power to the Prince; you your ſelf have battered it down with your own Engines. Hear now another moſt powerful and invincible Argument of his, why Subjects cannot judg their Kings, becauſe he is bound by no Law, being himſelf the ſole Lawgiver. Which having been proved already to be moſt falſe, this great reaſon comes to nothing, as well as the former. But the reaſon why Princes have but ſeldom been proceeded againſt for perſonal and private Crimes, as Whoredom, and Adultery, and the like, is not becauſe they could not juſtly be puniſhed even for ſuch, but leſt the People ſhould receive more prejudice through diſturbances that might be occaſioned by the King's death, and the change of Affairs, than they would be profited by the puniſhment of one Man or two. But when they begin to be univerſally injurious and inſufferable, it has always been the Opinion of all Nations, that then, being Tyrants, it is lawful to put them to death any how, condemn'd or uncondemn'd. Hence Cicero in his Second Philippick, ſays thus of thoſe that kill'd Cæſar, 'They were the firſt that ran through with their Swords, not a Man who affected to be King, but who was actually ſetled in the Government; which, as it was a worthy and godlike Action, ſo it's ſet before us for our imitation. How unlike are you to him! Murder, Adultery, Injuries, are not regal and publick, but private and perſonal Crimes. Well ſaid Paraſite! you have obliged all Pimps and Profligates in Courts by this Expreſſion. How ingeniouſly do you act, both the Paraſite, and the Pimp, with the ſame breath? A King that is an Adulterer, or a Murderer, may yet govern well, and conſequently ought not to be put to death, becauſe together with his Life he muſt loſe his Kingdom; and it was never yet allowed by God's Laws, or Man's, that for one and the ſame Crime, a Man was to be puniſhed twice. Infamous foul-mouth Wretch! By the ſame reaſon the Magiſtrates in a popular State, or in an Ariſtocracy, ought never to be put to death, for fear of double Puniſhment; no Judg, no Senator muſt die, for they muſt loſe their Magiſtracy too, as well as their Lives. As you have endeavoured to take all Power out of the Peoples hands, and veſt it in the King, ſo you would all Majeſty too: A delegated tranſlatitious Majeſty we allow, but that Majeſty does chiefly and primarily reſide in him, you can no more prove, than you can, that Power and Authority does. A King, you ſay, cannot commit Treaſon againſt his People, but a People may againſt their King. And yet a King is what he is for the People only, not the People for him. Hence I infer, that the whole Body of the People, or the greater part of them muſt needs have greater Power than the King. This you deny, and begin to caſt up accounts. He is of greater Power than any one, than any two, than any three, than any ten, than any hundred, than any thouſand, than any ten thouſand; be it ſo, He is of more Power than half the Peeple. I will not deny that neither; Add now half of the other half, will he not have more Power than all thoſe? Not at all. Go on, why do you take away the Board? Do you not underſtand Progreſſion in Arithmetick? He begins to reckon after another manner. Has not the King, and the Nobility together, more Power? No, Mr. Changeling, I deny that too. If by the Nobility, whom you ſtile Optimates, you mean the Peers only; for it may happen, that amongſt the whole number of them, there may not be one Man deſerving that Appellation; for it often falls out, that there are better and wiſer Men than they amongſt the Commons, whom in conjunction with the greater, or the better part of the People, I ſhould not ſcruple to call by the Name of, and take them for all the People. But if the King is not ſuperiour in Power to all the People together, he is then a King but of ſingle Perſons, he is not the King of the whole Body of the People. You ſay well, no more he is, unleſs they are content he ſhould be ſo. Now, ballance your Accounts, and you will find that by miſcaſting, you have loſt your Principal. The Engliſh ſay, that the Right of Majeſty originally and principally reſides in the People; which Principle would introduce a Confuſion of all States. What, of an Ariſtocracy and Democracy? But let that paſs. What if it ſhould overthrow a Gynæcocracy too? (i.e. a Government of one or more Women) under which State or Form of Government, they ſay, you are in danger of being beaten at home; would not the Engliſh do you a kindneſs in that, you ſheepiſh Fellow, you? But there's no hope of that. For 'tis moſt juſtly ſo ordered, ſince you would ſubject all Mankind to Tyranny abroad, that you your ſelf ſhould live in a ſcandalous moſt unmanlike Slavery at home. We muſt tell you, you ſay, what we mean by the word People. There are a great many other things, which you ſtand more in need of being told: For of things that more immediately concern you, you ſeem altogether ignorant, and never to have learnt any thing but Words and Letters, nor to be capable of any thing elſe. But this you think you know, that by the word People, we mean the Common People only, excluſive of the Nobility, becauſe we have put down the Houſe of Lords. And yet that very thing ſhows, that under the word People, we comprehend all our Natives, of what Order and Degree ſoever; in that we have ſetled one Supreme Senate only, in which the Nobility alſo, as a part of the People (not in their own Right, as they did before; but repreſenting thoſe Burroughs or Counties, for which they may be choſe) may give their Votes. Then you inveigh againſt the Common People, as being blind and brutiſh, ignorant of the art of governing; you ſay there's nothing more empty, more vain, more inconſtant, more uncertain than they. All which is very true of your ſelf, and it's true likewiſe of the Rabble, but not of the middle ſort, amongſt whom the moſt prudent Men, and moſt skilful in Affairs are generally found; others are moſt commonly diverted either by Luxury and Plenty, or by Want and Poverty, from Vertue, and the ſtudy of Laws and Government. There are many ways, you ſay, by which Kings come to the Crown, ſo as not to be beholden to the People at all for it; and eſpecially, thoſe that inherit a Kingdom. But thoſe Nations moſt certainly be Slaves, and born to Slavery, that acknowledg any one to be their Lord and Maſter ſo abſolutely, as that they are his inheritance, and come to him by deſcent, without any conſent of their own; they deſerve not the Appellation of Subjects, nor of Freemen, nor can they be juſtly reputed ſuch; nor are they to be accounted as a Civil Society, but muſt be looked on as the Poſſeſſions and Eſtate of their Lord, and his Family: For I ſee no difference as to the Right of Ownerſhip betwixt them, and Slaves, or Beaſts. Secondly, They that come to the Crown by Conqueſt, cannot acknowledg themſelves to have receiv'd from the People the Power they uſurp. We are not now diſcourſing of a Conqueror, but of a conquered King; what a Conqueror may lawfully do, we'll diſcourſe elſewhere; do you keep to your Subject. But whereas you aſcribe to Kings that ancient Right that Maſters of Families have over their Houſholds, and take an example from thence of their Abſolute Power; I have ſhown already over and over, that there is no likeneſs at all betwixt them. And Ariſtotle (whom you name ſo often) if you had read him, would have taught you as much in the beginning of his Politicks, where he ſays they judg amiſs that think there is but little difference betwixt a King, and a Maſter of a Family: For that there is not a numerical, but a ſpecifical difference betwixt a Kingdom and a Family. For when Villages grew to be Towns and Cities, that Regal Domeſtick Right vaniſhed by degrees, and was no more owned. Hence Diodorus in his firſt Book ſays, That anciently Kingdoms were tranſmitted not to the former Kings Sons, but to thoſe that had beſt deſerved of the People. And Juſtin, 'Originally, ſays he, the Government of Nations, and of Countries, was by Kings, who were exalted to that height of Majeſty, not by popular Ambition, but for their Moderation which commended them to good Men. Whence it is manifeſt, that in the very beginning of Nations, that Fatherly and Hereditary Government gave way to Vertue, and the Peoples Right: Which is the moſt natural reaſon and cauſe, and was the true riſe of Kingly Government. For at firſt, Men entred into Societies, not that any one might inſult over all the reſt, but that in caſe any ſhould injure other, there might be Laws and Judges to protect them from wrong, or at leaſt to puniſh the wrong doers. When Men were at firſt diſpers'd and ſcattered aſunder, ſome wiſe and eloquent Man perſwaded them to enter into Civil Societies; that he himſelf, ſay you, might exerciſe Dominion over them, when ſo united. Perhaps you meant this of Nimrod, who is ſaid to have been the firſt Tyrant. Or elſe it proceeds from your own malice only, and certainly it cannot have been true of thoſe great and generous ſpirited Men, but is a Fiction of your own, not warranted by any Authority that I ever heard of. For all ancient Writers tell us, that thoſe firſt Inſtituters of Communities of Men, had a regard to the good and ſafety of Mankind only, and not to any private advantages of their own, or to make themſelves great or powerful. One thing I cannot paſs by, which I ſuppoſe you intended for an Emblem, to ſet off the reſt of this Chapter: If a Conſul, ſay you, had been to be accuſed before his Magiſtracy expired, there muſt have been a Dictator created for that purpoſe; tho you had ſaid before, that for that very reaſon there were two of them. Juſt ſo your Poſitions always agree with one another, and almoſt every Page declares how weak and frivolous whatever you ſay or write upon any Subject, is. Under the ancient Engliſh Saxon Kings, you ſay, the People were never called to Parliaments. If any of our own Countrymen had aſſerted ſuch a thing, I could eaſily have convinced him that he was in an error. But I am not ſo much concerned at your miſtaking our Affairs, becauſe y'are a Foreigner. This in effect is all you ſay of the Right of Kings in general. Many other things I omit, for you uſe many Digreſſions, and put things down that either have no ground at all, or are nothing to the purpoſe, and my deſign is not to vie with you in Impertinence.

CHAP. VIII.

IF you had publiſhed your own opinion, Salmaſius, concerning the Right of Kings in general, without affronting any Perſons in particular, notwithſtanding this alteration of Affairs in England, as long as you did but uſe your own liberty in writing what your ſelf thought fit, no Engliſh Man could have had any cauſe to have been diſpleaſed with you, nor would you have made good the opinion you maintain ever a whit the leſs. For if it be a poſitive Command both of Moſes and of Chriſt himſelf, That all Men whatſoever, whether Spaniards, French, Italians, Germans, Engliſh or Scotch, ſhould be ſubject to their Princes, be they good or bad, which you aſſerted, Pag. 127. to what purpoſe was it for you, who are a Foreigner and unknown to us, to be tampering with our Laws, and to read us Lectures out of them as out of your own Papers and Miſcellanies, which, be they how they will, you have taught us already in a great many words, that they ought to give way to the Laws of God? But now it is apparent that you have undertaken the defence of this Royal Cauſe, not ſo much out of your own inclination, as partly becauſe you were hired, and that at a good round price too, conſidering how things are with him that ſet you on work; and partly, 'tis like, out of expectation of ſome greater reward hereafter, to publiſh a ſcandalous Libel againſt the Engliſh, who are injurious to none of their Neighbours, and meddle with their own matters only. If there were no ſuch thing as that in the caſe, is it credible that any Man ſhould be ſo impudent or ſo mad, as tho he be a ſtranger, and at a great diſtance from us, yet of his own accord to intermeddle with our Affairs, and ſide with a Party? What the Devil, is it to you what the Engliſh do amongſt themſelves? What would you have, Pragmatical Puppy? What would you be at? Have you no concerns of your own at home? I wiſh you had the ſame concerns that that famous Olus, your fellow buſy-body in the Epigram, had; and perhaps ſo you have; you deſerve them I'm ſure. Or did that Hotſpur your Wife, who encouraged you to write what you have done for out-law'd Charles's ſake, promiſe you ſome profitable Profeſſors place in England, and God knows what Gratifications at Charles's Return? But aſſure your ſelves, my Miſtreſs and my Maſter, that England admits neither of Wolves, nor Owners of Wolves: So that it's no wonder you ſpit ſo much Venom at our Engliſh Maſtiffs. It were better for you to return to thoſe Illuſtrious Titles of yours in France; firſt to that hunger-ſtarved Lordſhip of yours at * St. Lou; and in the next place to the Sacred Conſiſtory of the moſt Chriſtian King. Being a Counſellor to the Prince, you are at too great a diſtance from your own Countrey. But I ſee full well that ſhe neither deſires you, nor your Counſel; nor did it appear ſhe did, when you were there a few years ago, and began to lick a Cardinal's Trencher; ſhe's in the right, by my troth, and can very willingly ſuffer ſuch a little Fellow as you, that are but one half of a Man, to run up and down with your Miſtreſs of a Wife, and your Deſks full of Trifles and Fooleries, till you light ſome where or other upon a Stipend, large enough for a Knight of the Grammar, or an Illuſtrious Critick on Horſeback; if any Prince or State has a mind to hire a Vagabond Doctor that is to be ſold at a good round Price. But here's one that will bid for you; whether you're a Merchantable Commodity or not, and what you are worth we ſhall ſee by and by. You ſay, The Parricides aſſert, that the Government of England is not meerly Kingly, but that it is a mixt Government. Sir Thomas Smith, a Country-man of ours in Edward the Sixth's days, a good Lawyer, and a Stateſman, one whom you your ſelf will not call a Parricide, in the beginning of a Book which he wrote of the Commonwealth of England, aſſerts the ſame thing, and not of our Government only, but of almoſt all others in the World, and that out of Ariſtotle; and he ſays it is not poſſible that any Government ſhould otherwiſe ſubſiſt. But as if you thought it a crime to ſay any thing, and not unſay it again, you repeat your former thredbare Contradictions. You ſay, There neither is nor ever was any Nation that did not underſtand by the very name of a King, a Perſon whoſe authority is inferior to God alone, and who is accountable to no other. And yet a little after you confeſs, that the name of a King was formerly given to ſuch Powers and Magiſtrates, as had not a full and abſolute right of themſelves, but had a dependance upon the People,

* St. Lou, in Latin, Sanctus Lupus, Saint Wolf, is the name of a place in France, where Salmaſius had ſome ſmall Eſtate, and was called ſo from St. Lupus a German Biſhop, who with St. German came over into England, Anno Dom. 429.

ple, as the Suffetes among the Carthaginians, the Hebrew Judges, the Kings of the Lacedemonians, and of Arragon. Are you not very conſiſtent with your ſelf? Then you reckon up five ſeveral ſorts of Monarchies out of Ariſtotle; in one of which only that Right obtain'd, which you ſay is common to all Kings. Concerning which I have ſaid already more than once, that neither doth Ariſtotle give an inſtance of any ſuch Monarchy, nor was there ever any ſuch in being; the other four he clearly demonſtrates that they were bounded by Eſtabliſht Laws, and the King's Power ſubject to thoſe Laws. The firſt of which four was that of the Lacedemonians, which in his opinion did of all others beſt deſerve the name of a Kingdom. The ſecond was ſuch as obtain'd among Barbarians, which was laſting, becauſe regulated by Laws, and becauſe the People willingly ſubmitted to it; whereas by the ſame Author's opinion in his third Book, what King ſo ever retains the Soveraignty againſt the People's will, is no longer to be accounted a King, but a downright Tyrant; all which is true likewiſe of his third ſort of Kings, which he calls Æſymnetes, who were choſen by the People, and moſt commonly for a certain time only, and for ſome particular purpoſes, ſuch as the Roman Dictators were. The fourth ſort he makes of ſuch as reigned in the Heroical days, upon whom for their extraordinary merits the People of their own accord conferr'd the Government, but yet bounded by Laws; nor could theſe retain the Soveraignty againſt the will of the People: nor do theſe four ſorts of Kingly Governments differ, he ſays, from Tyranny in any thing elſe, but only in that theſe Governments are with the good liking of the People, and That againſt their will. The fifth ſort of Kingly Government, which he calls παμβασίλεια, or abſolute Monarchy, in which the Supreme Power reſides in the King's Perſon, which you pretend to be the right of all Kings, is utterly condemn'd by the Philoſopher, as neither for the good of Mankind, nor conſonant to Juſtice or Nature, unleſs ſome People ſhould be content to live under ſuch a Government, and withal confer it upon ſuch as excel all others in vertue. Theſe things any man may read in the third Book of his Politicks. But you, I believe, that once in your life you might appear witty and florid, pleaſed your ſelf with making a compariſon betwixt theſe five ſorts of Kingly Government, and the five Zones of the World; betwixt the two extremes of Kingly power, there are three more temperate Species interpoſed, as there lie three Zones betwixt the Torrid and the Frigid. Pretty Rogue! what ingenious compariſons he always makes us! May you for ever be baniſhed, whither you your ſelf condemn an abſolute Kingdom to be, that is, to the frigid Zone, which when you are there, will be doubly cold to what it was before. In the mean while we ſhall expect that new faſhioned ſphere which you deſcribe, from you our modern Archimedes, in which there ſhall be two extreme Zones, one Torrid, and the other Frigid, and three temperate ones lying betwixt. The Kings of the Lacedæmonians, you ſay, might lawfully be Impriſoned, but it was not lawful to put them to death. Why not? Becauſe the Miniſters of Juſtice, and ſome Foreign Soldiers, being ſurpriſed at the Novelty of the thing, thought it not lawful to lead Agis to his Execution, though condemn'd to die? And the People of Lacedemon, were diſpleaſed at his death, not becauſe condemn'd to die, though a King, but becauſe he was a good man and popular, and had been circumvented by a faction of the great ones. Says Plutarch, "Agis was the firſt King that was put to death "by the Ephori; in which words he does not pretend to tell us what lawfully might be done, but what actually was done. For to imagin that ſuch as may lawfully accuſe a King, and impriſon him, may not alſo lawfully put him to death, is a childiſh conceit. At laſt you betake your ſelf to give an account of the Right of Engliſh Kings. There never was, you ſay, but one King in England. This you ſay, becauſe you had ſaid before, that unleſs a King be ſole in the Government, he cannot be a King. Which if it be true, ſome of them, who I had thought had been Kings of England, were not really ſo; for to omit many of our Saxon Kings, who had either their Sons, or their Brothers Partners with them in the Government, it is known that King Henry II. of the Norman Race, reign'd together with his Son. Let them ſhew, ſay you, a Preſident of any Kingdom under the Government of a ſingle perſon, who has not an abſolute power; though in ſome Kingdoms more remiſs, in others more intenſe. Do you ſhow any Power that's abſolute, and yet remiſs, you Aſs; is not that power that's abſolute, the Supreme Power of all? How can it then be both ſupreme and remiſs? Whatſoever Kings you ſhall acknowledg to be inveſted with a remiſs (or a leſs) power, thoſe I will eaſily make appear to have no abſolute power; and conſequently to be inferior to a People, free by nature, who is both its own Law-giver, and can make the Regal Power more or leſs intenſe or remiſs; that is, greater or leſs. Whether the whole Iſland of Britain was anciently governed by Kings, or no, is uncertain. It's moſt likely that the form of their Government changed according to the Exigencies of the Times. Whence Tacitus ſays, The Britains anciently were under Kings; now the great Men amongſt them divide them into Parties and Factions. When the Romans left them, they were about forty years without Kings; they were not always therefore under a Kingly Government, as you ſay they were. But when they were ſo, that the Kingdom was Hereditary, I poſitively deny; which that it was not, is evident both from the Series of their Kings, and their way of creating them: for the conſent of the People is asked in expreſs words. When the King has taken the accuſtomed Oath, the Archbiſhop ſtepping to every ſide of the Stage erected for that purpoſe, asks the People four ſeveral times in theſe words, Do you conſent to have this Man to be your King? Juſt as if he ſpoke to them in the Roman Stile, Vultis, Jubetis hunc Regnare? 'Is it your pleaſure, do you appoint this Man to reign? Which would be needleſs, if the Kingdom were by the Law hereditary. But with Kings, Uſurpation paſſes very frequently for Law and Right. You go about to ground Charles's Right to the Crown, who was ſo often conquered himſelf, upon the Right of Conqueſt. William, ſirnamed the Conqueror, ſorſooth, ſubdued us. But they who are not ſtrangers to our Hiſtory, know full well, that the Strength of the Engliſh Nation was not ſo broken in that one Fight at Haſtings, but that they might eaſily have renewed the War. But they choſe rather to accept of a King, than to be under a Conqueror and a Tyrant: They ſwear therefore to William, to be his Liege-men, and he ſwears to them at the Altar, to carry himſelf towards them as a good King ought to do in all reſpects. When he broke his Word, and the Engliſh betook themſelves again to their Arms, being diffident of his Strength, he renewed his Oath upon the Holy Evangeliſts, to obſerve the Ancient Laws of England. And therefore, if after that he miſerably oppreſſed the Engliſh, (as you ſay he did) he did it not by Right of Conqueſt, but by Right of Perjury. Beſides, it is certain, that many Ages ago, the Conquerors and Conquered coaleſced into one and the ſame People: So that that Right of Conqueſt, if any ſuch ever were, muſt needs have been antiquated long ago. His own words at his death, which I give you out of a French Manuſcript written at Caen, put all out of doubt, I appoint no Man (ſays he) to inherit the Kingdom of England. By which words, both his pretended Right of Conqueſt, and the Hereditary Right, were diſclaim'd at his death, and buried together with him. I ſee now that you have gotten a place at Court, as I foretold you would; you are made the King's Chief Treaſurer and Steward of his Court-Craft: And what follows, you ſeem to write ex Officio, as by virtue of your Office, Magnificent Sir. If any preceding Kings; being thereunto compelled by Factions of Great Men, or Sedition: amongſt the Common People, have receded in ſome meaſure from their Right, that cannot prejudice the Succeſſor; but that he is at liberty to reſume it. You ſay well; if therefore at any time our Anceſtors have through neglect loſt any thing that was their Right, why ſhould that prejudice us their Poſterity? If they would promiſe for themſelves to become Slaves, they could make no ſuch promiſe for us; who ſhall always retain the ſame Right of delivering our ſelves out of Slavery, that they had of enſlaving themſelves to any whomſoever. You wonder how it comes to paſs that a King of Great Britain muſt now a-days be looked upon as one of the Magiſtrates of the Kingdom only; whereas in all other Kingly Governments in Chriſtendom, Kings are inveſted with a Free and Abſolute Authority. For the Scots, I remit you to Buchanan: For France, your own Native Countrey, to which you ſeem to be a ſtranger, to Hottoman's Franco-Gallia, and Girardus a French Hiſtorian; for the reſt, to other Authors, of whom none that I know of, were Independents: Out of whom you might have learned a quite other Leſſon concerning the Right of Kings, than what you teach. Not being able to prove that a Tyrannical Power belongs to the Kings of England by Right of Conqueſt, you try now to do it by Right of Perjury. Kings profeſs themſelves to reign By the Grace of God: What if they had profeſſed themſelves to be Gods? 'I believe if they had, you might have eaſily have been brought to become one of their Prieſts.

So the Archbiſhops of Canterbury pretended to Archbiſhop it by Divine Providence. Are you ſuch a Fool, as to deny the Popes being a King in the Church, that you may make the King greater than a Pope in the State? But in the Statutes of the Realm the King is called our Lord. You are become of a ſudden a wonderful Nomenclater of our Statutes: But you know not that many are called Lords and Maſters, who are not really ſo: You know not how unreaſonable a thing it is to judg of Truth and Right by Titles of Honour, not to ſay of Flattery. Make the ſame Inference, if you will, from the Parliament's being called the King's Parliament; for it is called the King's Bridle too, or a Bridle to the King: and thereſore the King is no more Lord or Maſter of his Parliament, than a Horſe is of his Bridle. But why not the King's Parliament, ſince the King ſummons them? I'll tell you why; becauſe the Conſuls uſed to indict a Meeting of the Senate, yet were they not Lords over that Council. When the King therefore ſummons or calls together a Parliament, he does it by virtue and in diſcharge of that Office, which he has received from the People, that he may adviſe with them about the weighty Affairs of the Kingdom, not his own particular Affairs. Or when at any time the Parliament debated of the King's own Affairs, if any could properly be called his own, they were always the laſt things they did; and it was in their choice when to debate of them, and whether at all or no, and depended not upon the King's Pleaſure. And they whom it concerns to know this, know very well, that Parliaments anciently, whether ſummoned or not, might by Law meet twice a Year: But the Laws are called too, The King's Laws. Theſe are flattering Aſcriptions; a King of England can of himſelf make no Law: For he was not conſtituted to make Laws, but to ſee thoſe Laws kept, which the People made. And you your ſelf here confeſs, That Parliaments meet to make Laws: Wherefore the Law is alſo called the Law of the Land, and the Peoples Law. Whence King Ethelſtane in the Preface to his Laws, ſpeaking to all the People, I have granted you every thing, ſays he, by your own Law. And in the Form of the Oath, which the Kings of England uſed to take before they were made Kings, the People ſtipulate with them thus; Will you grant thoſe juſt Laws, which the People ſhall chuſe? The King anſwers, I will. And you are infinitely miſtaken in ſaying, That when there is no Parliament ſitting, the King governs the whole State of the Kingdom, to all intents and purpoſes, by a Regal Power. For he can determine nothing of any moment, with reſpect to either Peace or War; nor can he put any ſtop to the Proceedings of the Courts of Juſtice. And the Judges therefore ſwear, that they will do nothing judicially, but according to Law, though the King by Word, or Mandate, or Letters under his own Seal, ſhould command the contrary. Hence it is that the King is often ſaid in our Law to be an Infant; and to poſſeſs his Rights and Dignities, as a Child or a Ward does his: See the Mirror, Cap. 4. Sect. 22. And hence is that common Saying amongſt us, That the King can do no wrong: Which you, like a Raſcal, interpret thus, Whatever the King does, is no Injury, becauſe he is not liable to be puniſhed for it. By this very Comment, if there were nothing elſe, the wonderful Impudence and Villany of this Fellow, diſcovers it ſelf ſufficiently. It belongs to the Head, you ſay, to command, and not to the Members: The King is the Head of the Parliament. You would not trifle thus, if you had any guts in your brains. You are miſtaken again (but there's no end of your miſtakes) in not diſtinguiſhing the King's Counſellors from the States of the Realm: For neither ought he to make choice of all of them, nor of any of theſe, which the reſt do not approve of; but for electing any Member of the Houſe of Commons, he never ſo much as pretended to it. Whom the People appointed to that Service, they were ſeverally choſen by the Votes of all the People in their reſpective Cities, Towns, and Counties. I ſpeak now of things univerſally known, and therefore I am the ſhorter. But you ſay, 'Tis falſe that the Parliament was inſtituted by the People, as the Worſhippers of Saint Independency aſſert. Now I ſee why you took ſo much pains in endeavouring to ſubvert the Papacy; you carry another Pope in your belly, as we ſay. For what elſe ſhould you be in labour of, the Wife of a Woman, a He-Wolf, impregnated by a She-Wolf, but either a Monſter, or ſome new ſort of Papacy? You now make He-Saints, and She-Saints, at your pleaſure, as if you were a true genuine Pope. You abſolve Kings of all their ſins; and as if you had utterly vanquiſh'd and ſubdu'd your Antagoniſt the Pope, you adorn your ſelf with his ſpoils. But becauſe you have not yet profligated the Pope quite, till the ſecond and third, and perhaps the fourth and fifth Part of your Book of his Supremacy come out, which Book will nauſeate a great many Readers to death, ſooner than you'll get the better of the Pope by it; let it ſuffice you in the mean time, I beſeech you, to become ſome Antipope or other. There's another She-Saint, beſides that Independency that you deride, which you have Canoniz'd in good earneſt; and that is, the Tyranny of Kings: You ſhall therefore by my conſent be the High-Prieſt of Tyranny; and that you may have all the Pope's Titles, you ſhall be a Servant of the Servants not of God, but of the Court. For that Curſe pronounced upon Canaan, ſeems to ſtick as cloſe to you, as your Shirt. You call the People a Beaſt. What are you then your ſelf? For neither can that Sacred Conſiſtory, nor your Lordſhip of St. Lou, exempt you its Maſter from being one of the People, nay, of the Common People; nor can make you other than what you really are, a moſt loathſom Beaſt. Indeed, the Writings of the Prophets ſhadow out to us the Monarchy and Dominion of Great Kings by the Name, and under the Reſemblance of a Great Beaſt. You ſay, That there is no mention of Parliaments held under our Kings, that reigned before William the Conqueror. It is not worth while to jangle about a French word: The thing was always in being; and you your ſelf allow that in the Saxon times, Concilia Sapientum Wittena-gemots, are mentioned. And there are wiſe Men among the Body of the People, as well as amongſt the Nobility. But in the Statute of Merton made in the twentieth year of King Henry the 3d, the Earls and Barons are only named. Thus you are always impoſed upon by words, who yet have ſpent your whole Life in nothing elſe but words; for we know very well that in that age, not only the Guardians of the Cinque-Ports, and Magiſtrates of Cities, but even Tradeſmen are ſometimes called Barons; and without doubt they might much more reaſonably call every Member of Parliament, tho never ſo much a Commoner, by the Name of a Baron. For that in the fifty ſecond Year of the ſame King's Reign, the Commoners as well as the Lords were ſummoned, the Statute of Marlbridge, and moſt other Statutes, declare in expreſs words; which Commoners King Edward the Third, in the Preface to the Statute-Staple, calls, Magnates Comitatum, The Great Men of the Counties, as you very learnedly quote it for me; thoſe to wit, That came out of the ſeveral Counties, and ſerved for them; which number of Men conſtituted the Houſe of Commons, and neither were Lords, nor could be. Beſides, a Book more Ancient than thoſe Statutes, called, Modus habendi Parliamenta, i.e. The manner of holding Parliaments, tells us, That the King, and the Commons may hold a Parliament, and enact Laws, tho the Lords, the Biſhops, are abſent; but that with the Lords, and the Biſhops, in the abſence of the Commons, no Parliament can be held. And there's a reaſon given for it, viz. becauſe Kings held Parliaments and Councils with their People before any Lords or Biſhops were made; beſides, the Lords ſerve for themſelves only, the Commons each for the County, City, or Burrough that ſent them. And that therefore the Commons in Parliament repreſent the whole Body of the Nation; in which reſpect they are more worthy, and every way preferable to the Houſe of Peers. But the power of Judicature, you ſay, never was inveſted in the Houſe of Commons. Nor was the King ever poſſeſſed of it: Remember tho, that originally all Power proceeded, and yet does proceed from the People. Which Marcus Tullius excellently well ſhows in his Oration, De lege Agraria, Of the Agrarian Law: 'As all Powers, Authorities, and publick Adminiſtrations 'ought to be derived from the whole Body of the People; ſo thoſe of them 'ought in an eſpecial manner ſo to be derived, which are ordained and appointed for the Common Benefit and Intereſt of all; to which Imployments every 'particular Perſon may both give his Vote for the chuſing ſuch Perſons, as he 'thinks will take moſt care of the Publick, and withal by voting and making 'Intereſt for them, lay ſuch Obligations upon them, as may entitle them to 'their Friendſhip, and good Offices in time to come. Here you ſee the true riſe and original of Parliaments, and that it was much ancienter than the Saxon Chronicles. Whilſt we may dwell in ſuch a light of Truth and Wiſdom, as Cicero's Age afforded, you labour in vain to blind us with the darkneſs of obſcurer times. By the ſaying whereof I would not be underſtood to derogate in the leaſt from the Authority and Prudence of our Anceſtors, who moſt certainly went further in the enacting of good Laws, than either the Ages they lived in, or their own Learning or Education ſeem to have been capable of; and tho ſometimes they made Laws that were none of the beſt, yet as being conſcious to themſelves of the Ignorance and Infirmity of Human Nature, they have conveyed this Doctrine down to Poſterity, as the foundation of all Laws, which likewiſe all our Lawyers admit, That if any Law, or Cuſtom, be contrary to the Law of God, of Nature, or of Reaſon, it ought to be looked upon as null and void. Whence it follows, that tho it were poſſible for you to diſcover any Statute, or other publick Sanction, which aſcribed to the King a Tyrannical Power, ſince that would be repugnant to the Will of God, to Nature, and to right Reaſon, you may learn from that general and primary Law of ours, which I have juſt now quoted, that it will be null and void. But you will never be able to find that any ſuch Right of Kings has the leaſt Foundation in our Law. Since it is plain therefore, that the Power of Judicature was originally in the People themſelves, and that the People never did by any Royal Law part with it to the King, (for the Kings of England neither uſe to judg any Man, nor can by the Law do it, otherwiſe than according to Laws ſetled and agreed to: Fleta, Book 1. Cap. 17.) it follows, that this Power remains yet whole and entire in the People themſelves. For that it was either never committed to the Houſe of Peers, or if it were, that it may lawfully be taken from them again, you your ſelf will not deny. But, It is in the King's. Power, you ſay, to make a Village into a Burrough, and that into a City; and conſequently, the King does in effect create thoſe that conſtitute the Commons Houſe of Parliament. But, I ſay, that even Towns and Burroughs are more ancient than Kings; and that the People is the People, tho they ſhould live in the open Fields. And now we are extreamly well pleaſed with your Angliciſms, COUNTY COURT, THE TURNE. HUNDREDA: you have quickly learnt to count your hundred Jacobuſſes in Engliſh.

Quis expedivit Salmaſio ſuam HUNDREDAM?
Picamque docuit verba noſtra conari?
Magiſter artis venter, & Jacobæi
Centum, exulantis viſcera marſupii Regis.
Quod ſi doloſi ſpes refulſerit nummi,
Ipſe Antichriſti modò qui Primatum Papæ
Minatus uno eſt diſſipare ſufflatu,
Cantabit ultrò Cardinalitium melos.

Who taught Salmaſius, that French chatt'ring Pye,
To aim at Engliſh, and HUNDREDA cry?
The ſtarving Raſcal, fluſht with juſt a Hundred
Engliſh Jacobuſſes, HUNDREDA blunder'd.
An out-law'd King's laſt ſtock. — A hundred more,
Would make him pimp for th' Antichriſtian Whore;
And in Rome's praiſe employ his poyſon'd Breath,
Who threatn'd once to ſtink the Pope to death.

The next thing you do is to trouble us with a long Diſcourſe of the Earls and the Barons, to ſhow that the King made them all; which we readily grant, and for that reaſon they were moſt commonly at the King's beck; and therefore we have done well to take care, that for the future they ſhall not be Judges of a Free People. You affirm, That the Power of calling Parliaments as often as he pleaſes, and of diſſolving them when he pleaſes, has belonged to the King time out of mind. Whether ſuch a vile, mercenary Foreigner as you, who tranſcribe what ſome Fugitives dictate to you, or the expreſs Letter of our own Laws are more to be credited in this matter, we ſhall enquire hereafter. But ſay you, there is another Argument, and an invincible one, to prove the Power of the Kings of England ſuperior to that of the Parliament; the King's Power is perpetual and of courſe, whereby he adminiſters the Government ſingly without the Parliament; that of the Parliament is extraordinary, or out of courſe, and limited to particulars only, nor can they enact any thing ſo as to be binding in Law, without the King. Where does the great force of this Argument lie? in the words of courſe and perpetual? Why, many inferior Magiſtrates have an ordinary and perpetual Power, thoſe whom we call Juſtices of Peace. Have they therefore the Supreme Power? And I have ſaid already, that the King's

Power is committed to him, to take care, by interpoſing his Authority, that nothing be done contrary to Law, and that he may ſee to the due obſervation of our Laws, not to top his own upon us: and conſequently that the King has no Power out of his Courts; nay all the ordinary power is rather the Peoples, who determine all Controverſies themſelves by Juries of Twelve Men. And hence it is that when a Malefactor is asked at his Arraignment, How will you be tried? he anſwers always according to Law and Cuſtom, by God and my Country; not by God and the King, or the King's Deputy. But the Authority of the Parliament, which indeed and in truth is the Supreme Power of the People committed to that Senate, if it may be called extraordinary, it muſt be by reaſon of its Eminence and Superiority; elſe it is known they are called Ordines, and therefore cannot properly be ſaid to be extra ordinem, out of order; and if not actually, as they ſay, yet virtually they have a perpetual Power and Authority over all Courts and ordinary Magiſtrates, and that without the King. And now it ſeems our barbarous terms grate upon your Critical Ears, forſooth! whereas, if I had leiſure, or that if it were worth my while, I could reckon up ſo many Barbariſms of yours in this one Book, as if you were to be chaſtiz'd for them as you deſerve, all the School-boys Ferula's in Chriſtendom would be broken upon you; nor would you receive ſo many pieces of Gold as that wretched Poet did of old, but a great many more Boxes o'th' ear. You ſay, 'Tis a Prodigy more monſtrous than all the moſt abſurd Opinions in the World put together, that the Bedlams ſhould make a diſtinction betwixt the King's Power and his Perſon. I will not quote what every Author has ſaid upon this Subject; but if by the words Perſonam Regis, you mean what we call in Engliſh, the Perſon of the King; Chryſoſtom, who was no Bedlam, might have taught you, that it is no abſurd thing to make a diſtinction betwixt that and his Power; for that Father explains the Apoſtle's command of being ſubject to the Higher Powers, to be meant of the thing, the Power it ſelf, and not of the Perſons of the Magiſtrates. And why may not I ſay that a King, who acts any thing contrary to Law, acts ſo far forth as a private Perſon, or a Tyrant, and not in the capacity of a King inveſted with a Legal Authority? If you do not know that there may be in one and the ſame Man more Perſons or Capacities than one, and that thoſe Capacities may in thought and conception be ſevered from the man himſelf, you are altogether ignorant both of Latin and Common Senſe. But this you ſay to abſolve Kings from all ſin and guilt; and that you may make us believe that you are gotten into the Chair your ſelf, which you have pull'd the Pope out of. The King, you ſay, is ſuppoſed not capable of committing any crime, becauſe no puniſhment is conſequential upon any crime of his. Whoever therefore is not puniſht, offends not; it is not the theft, but the puniſhment that makes the Thief. Salmaſius the Grammarian commits no Solœciſms now, becauſe he is from under the Ferula; when you have overthrown the Pope, let theſe, for God's ſake, be the Canons of your Pontificate, or at leaſt your Indulgences, whether you ſhall chuſe to be called the High-Prieſt St. Tyranny, or St. Slavery. I paſs by the reproachful Language which towards the latter end of the Chapter you give the State of the Commonwealth, and the Church of England; 'tis common to ſuch as you are, you contemptible Varlet, to rail at thoſe things moſt, that are moſt praiſe-worthy. But that I may not ſeem to have aſſerted any thing raſhly concerning the Right of the Kings of England, or rather concerning the Peoples Right with reſpect to their Princes; I will now alledg out of our ancient Hiſtories a few things indeed of many, but ſuch as will make it evident that the Engliſh lately tried their King according to the ſetled Laws of the Realm, and the Cuſtoms of their Anceſtors. After the Romans quitted this Iſland, the Britains for about forty years were ſui Juris, and without any Kings at all. Of whom thoſe they firſt ſet up, ſome they put to death. And for that, Gildas reprehends them, not as you do, for killing their Kings, but for killing them uncondemned, and (to uſe his own words) Non pro veri examinatione, without enquiring into the matter of Fact. Vortigern was for his Inceſtuous Marriage with his own Daughter condemn'd (as Nennius informs us, the moſt ancient of all our Hiſtorians next to Gildas) by St. German, and a General Council of the Britains, and his Son Vortimer ſet up in his ſtead. This came to paſs not long after St. Auguſtine's death, which is enough to diſcover how futilous you are, to ſay, as you have done, that it was a Pope, and Zachary by name, who firſt held the lawfulneſs of judging Kings. About the year of our Lord 600, Mercantius, who then reign'd in Wales, was by Oudeceus Biſhop of Landaff, condemn'd to Exile, for the Murder of his Uncle, though he got the Sentence off by beſtowing ſome Lands upon the Church. Come we now to the Saxons, whoſe Laws we have, and therefore I ſhall quote none of their Precedents. Remember that the Saxons were of a German Extract, who neither inveſted their Kings with any abſolute, unlimited power, and conſulted in a Body of the more weighty affairs of Government; whence we may perceive that in the time of our Saxon Anceſtors Parliaments (the name it ſelf only excepted) had the Supreme Authority. The name they gave them, was Councils of Wiſe-men; and this in the Reign of Ethelbert, of whom Bede ſays, That he made Laws in imitation of the Roman Laws, cum concilio ſapientum; by the advice, or in a Council of his Wiſe-men. So Edwyn, King of Northumberland; and Ina King of the Weſt-Saxons, having conſulted with their Wiſe-men, and the Elders of the People, made new Laws. Other Laws K. Alfred made, by the advice in like manner of his Wiſe-men; and he ſays himſelf, That it was by the conſent of them all, that they were commanded to be obſerved. From theſe and many other like places, it is as clear as the Sun, that choſen Men even from amongſt the Common People, were Members of the Supreme Councils, unleſs we muſt believe that no Men are wiſe, but the Nobility. We have likewiſe a very ancient Book, called the Mirror of Juſtices, in which we are told, That the Saxons, when they firſt ſubdued the Britains, and choſe themſelves Kings, required an Oath of them, to ſubmit to the Judgment of the Law, as much as any of their Subjects, Cap. 1. Sect. 2. In the ſame place 'tis ſaid, that it is but juſt that the King have his Peers in Parliament, to take Cognizance of wrongs done by the King, or the Queen; and that there was a Law made in King Alored's time, that Parliaments ſhould be holden twice a year at London, or oftner, if need were: Which Law, when through neglect it grew into diſuſe, was revived by two Statutes in King Edward the Third's time. And in another ancient Manuſcript, called Modus tenendi Parliamenta, we read thus, 'If the King diſſolve the Parliament 'before they have diſpatcht the buſineſs, for which the Council was ſummon'd, 'he is guilty of Perjury; and ſhall be reputed to have broken his Coronation 'Oath. For how can he be ſaid to grant thoſe good Laws, which the People chuſe, as he is ſworn to do, if he hinders the People from chuſing them, either by ſummoning Parliaments ſeldomer, or by diſſolving them ſooner than the Publick Affairs require, or admit? And that Oath, which the Kings of England take at their Coronation, has always been looked upon by our Lawyers, as a moſt ſacred Law. And what remedy can be found to obviate the great Dangers of the whole State (which is the very end of ſummoning Parliaments) if that Great and Auguſt Aſſembly may be diſſolved at the pleaſure many times of a ſilly, head-ſtrong King? To abſent himſelf from them, is certainly leſs than to diſſolve them; and yet by our Laws, as that Modus lays them down, the King neither can, nor ought to abſent himſelf from his Parliament, unleſs he be really indiſpoſed in Health; nor then neither, till twelve of the Peers have been with him to inſpect his Body, and give the Parliament an account of his Indiſpoſition. Is this like the Carriage of Servants to a Maſter? On the other hand, the Houſe of Commons, without whom there can be no Parliament held, tho ſummoned by the King, may withdraw, and having made a Seceſſion, expoſtulate with the King concerning Male-adminiſtration, as the ſame Book has it. But, which is the greateſt thing of all, amongſt the Laws of King Edward, commonly called the Confeſſor, there is one very excellent, relating to the Kingly Office; which Office, if the King do not diſcharge as he ought, Then, ſays the Law, He ſhall not retain ſo much as the Name of a King. And leſt theſe words ſhould not be ſufficiently underſtood, the Example of Chilperic King of France is ſubjoyn'd, whom the People for that Cauſe depoſed. And that by this Law a wicked King is liable to Puniſhment, that Sword of King Edward, called Curtana, denotes to us, which the Earl of Cheſter uſed to carry in the Solemn Proceſſion at a Coronation; A token, ſays Matthew Paris, that he has Authority by Law to puniſh the King, if he will not do his Duty: and the Sword is hardly ever made uſe of but in Capital Puniſhments. This ſame Law, together with other Laws of that good King Edward, did William the Conqueror ratifie in the Fourth Year of his Reign, and in a very full Council held at Verulam, confirm'd it with a moſt ſolemn Oath: And by ſo doing, he not only extinguiſh'd his Right of Conqueſt, if he ever had any over us, but ſubjected himſelf to be judged according to the Tenor of this very Law. And his Son Henry ſwore to the obſervance of King Edward's Laws, and of this amongſt the reſt; and upon thoſe only terms it was, that he was choſen King, whilſt his Elder Brother Robert was alive. The ſame Oath was taken by all ſucceeding Kings, before they were crowned. Hence our Ancient and Famous Lawyer Bracton, in his firſt Book, Chap. 8. There is no King in the caſe, ſays he, where Will rules the roaſt, and Law does not take place. And in his Third Book, Chap. 9. A King is a King ſo long as he rules well; he becomes a Tyrant when he oppreſſes the People committed to his Charge. And in the ſame Chapter, The King ought to uſe the Power of Law and Right, as God's Miniſter and Vice-gerent; the Power of wrong is the Devils, and not Gods; when the King turns aſide to do Injuſtice, he is the Miniſter of the Devil. The very ſame words almoſt another ancient Lawyer has, who was the Author of the Book, called Fleta; both of them remembered that truly Royal Law of King Edward, that Fundamental Maxim in our Law, which I have formerly mentioned, by which nothing is to be accounted a Law, that is contrary to the Laws of God, or of Reaſon; no more than a Tyrant can be ſaid to be a King, or a Miniſter of the Devil a Miniſter of God. Since therefore the Law is chiefly right Reaſon, if we are bound to obey a King, and a Miniſter of God; by the very ſame Reaſon, and the very ſame Law, we ought to reſiſt a Tyrant, and a Miniſter of the Devil. And becauſe Controverſies ariſe oftner about Names than Things, the ſame Authors tell us, that a King of England, thô he have not loſt the Name of a King, yet is as liable to be judged, and ought ſo to be, as any of the Common People. Bracton, Book 1. Chap. 8. Fleta, Book 1. Chap. 17. No Man ought to be greater than the King in the Adminiſtration of Juſtice; but he himſelf ought to be as little as the leaſt in receiving Juſtice, ſi peccat, if he offend. Others read it, ſi petat. Since our Kings therefore are liable to be judged, whether by the Name of Tyrants, or of Kings, it muſt not be difficult to aſſign their Legal Judges. Nor will it be amiſs to conſult the ſame Authors upon that point. Bracton, Book 1. Chap. 16. Fleta, Book 1. Chap. 17. The King has his Superiors in the Government; The Law, by which he is made King, and his Court, to wit, the Earls, and the Barons: Comites ( Earls ) are as much as to ſay, Companions; and he that has a Companion, has a Maſter; and therefore, if the King will be without a Bridle, that is, not govern by Law, they ought to bridle him. That the Commons are comprehended in the word Barons, has been ſhown already; nay, and in the Books of our ancient Laws they are frequently ſaid to have been called Peers of Parliament: and eſpecially in the Modus tenendi, &c. There ſhall be choſen (ſays that Book) out of all the Peers of the Realm, five and twenty Perſons, of whom five ſhall be Knights, five Citizens, and five Burgeſſes; and two Knights of a County, have a greater Vote in granting and rejecting than the greateſt Earl in England. And it is but reaſonable they ſhould, for they vote for a whole County, &c. the Earls for themſelves only. And who can but perceive that thoſe Patent Earls, whom you call Earls made by Writ (ſince we have now none that hold their Earldoms by Tenure) are very unfit Perſons to try the King, who conferr'd their Honours upon them? Since therefore by our Law, as appears by that old Book, call'd The Mirror, the King has his Peers, who in Parliament have cognizance of wrongs done by the King to any of his People; and ſince it is notoriouſly known, that the meaneſt Man in the Kingdom may even in inferior Courts have the benefit of the Law againſt the King himſelf in caſe of any Injury, or Wrong ſuſtained; how much more conſonant to Juſtice, how much more neceſſary is it, that in caſe the King oppreſs all his People, there ſhould be ſuch as have authority not only to reſtrain him, and keep him within bounds, but to judg and puniſh him? For that Government muſt needs be very ill, and moſt ridiculouſly conſtituted, in which remedy is provided in caſe of little Injuries done by the Prince to private Perſons, and no remedy, no redreſs for greater, no care taken for the ſafety of the whole; no proviſion made to the contrary, but that the King may without any Law ruin all his Subjects, when at the ſame time he cannot by Law ſo much as hurt any one of them. And ſince I have ſhown that it is neither good manners, nor expedient, that the Lords ſhould be the Kings Judges; it follows, that the Power of Judicature in that caſe does wholly, and by very good Right, belong to the Commons, who are both Peers of the Realm, and Barons, and have the Power and

Authority of all the People committed to them. For ſince (as we find it expreſly in our written Law, which I have already cited) the Commons together with the King, make a good Parliament without either Lords or Biſhops, becauſe before either Lords or Biſhops had a Being, Kings held Parliaments with their Commons only; by the very ſame reaſon the Commons apart muſt have the Sovereign Power without the King, and a Power of judging the King himſelf, becauſe before there ever was a King, they in the Name of the whole Body of the Nation held Councils and Parliaments, had the Power of Judicature, made Laws, and made the Kings themſelves, not to lord it over the People, but to adminiſter their publick Affairs. Whom if the King, inſtead of ſo doing ſhall endeavour to injure and oppreſs, our Law pronounces him from time forward not ſo much as to retain the Name of a King, to be no ſuch thing as a King; and if he be no King, what need we trouble our ſelves to find out Peers for him? For being then by all good Men adjudged to be a Tyrant, there are none but who are Peers good enough for him, and proper enough to pronounce Sentence of Death upon him judicially. Theſe things being ſo, I think I have ſufficiently proved what I undertook, by many Authorities, and written Laws; to wit, that ſince the Commons have Authority by very good Right to try the King, and ſince they have actually tried him, and put him to Death, for the miſchief he had done both in Church and State, and without all hope of amendment, they have done nothing therein but what was juſt and regular, for the Intereſt of the State, in diſcharging of their Truſt, becoming their Dignity, and according to the Laws of the Land. And I cannot upon this occaſion, but congratulate my ſelf with the Honour of having had ſuch Anceſtors, who founded this Government with no leſs Prudence, and in as much Liberty as the moſt worthy of the Ancient Romans or Grecians ever founded any of theirs: and they muſt needs, if they have any knowledg of our Affairs, rejoice over their Poſterity, who when they were almoſt reduced to Slavery, yet with ſo much Wiſdom and Courage vindicated and aſſerted the State, which they ſo wiſely founded upon ſo much Liberty, from the unruly Government of a King.

CHAP. IX.

I Think by this time 'tis ſufficiently evident that Kings of England may be judged even by the Laws of England; and that they have their proper Judges, which was the thing to be proved. What do you do farther? (for whereas you repeat many things that you have ſaid before, I do not intend to repeat the anſwers that I have given them) 'Tis an eaſie thing to demonſtrate even from the nature of the things for which Parliaments are ſummon'd, that the King is above the Parliament. The Parliament, you ſay, is wont to be aſſembled upon weighty affairs, ſuch as wherein the ſafety of the Kingdom and of the People, is concerned. If therefore the King call Parliaments together, not for his own concerns, but thoſe of the Nation, nor to ſettle thoſe neither, but by their own conſent, at their own diſcretion, what is he more than a Miniſter, and as it were an Agent for the People? ſince without their Suffrages that are choſen by the People, he cannot enact the leaſt thing whatſoever, either with relation to himſelf, or any body elſe? Which proves likewiſe that 'tis the King's duty to call Parliaments whenever the People deſire it; ſince the Peoples and not the King's concerns are to be treated of by that Aſſembly, and to be ordered as they ſee cauſe. For although the King's aſſent be required for faſhion ſake, which in leſſer matters, that concerned the welfare of private perſons only, he might refuſe, and uſe that form, the King will adviſe; yet in thoſe greater affairs that concern'd the publick ſafety, and liberty of the People in general, he had no negative voice: for it would have been againſt his Coronation-Oath to deny his aſſent in ſuch caſes, which was as binding to him as any Law could be, and againſt the chief Article of Magna Charta, Cap. 29. 'We will not deny to any man, nor will we delay to render to every man Right and Juſtice. Shall it not be in the King's power to deny Juſtice, and ſhall it be in his power to deny the enacting of juſt Laws? Could he not deny Juſtice to any particular perſon, and could he to all his People? Could he not do it in inferior Courts, and could he in the Supreme Court of all? Or, can any King be ſo arrogant as to pretend to know what's juſt and profitable better than the whole body of the People? Eſpecially, ſince 'he is 'created and choſen for this very end and purpoſe, to do Juſtice to all, as Bracton ſays, Lib. 3. Cap. 9. that is, to do Juſtice according to ſuch Laws as the People agree upon. Hence is what we find in our Records, 7 H. 4. Rott. Parl. num. 59. 'The King has no Prerogative that derogates from Juſtice and Equity. And formerly when Kings have refuſed to confirm Acts of Parliament, to wit, Magna Charta, and ſome others, our Anceſtors have brought them to it by force of Arms. And yet our Lawyers never were of opinion that thoſe Laws were leſs valid, or leſs binding, ſince the King was forced to aſſent to no more than what he ought in Juſtice to have aſſented to voluntarily, and without conſtraint. Whilſt you go about to prove that Kings of other Nations have been as much under the power of their Senates or Counſels, as our Kings were, you do not argue us into Slavery, but them into Liberty. In which you do but that over again, that you have from the very beginning of your Diſcourſe, and which ſome ſilly Leguleians now and then do, to argue unawares againſt their own Clients. But you ſay, We confeſs that the King wherever he be, yet is ſuppoſed ſtill to be preſent in his Parliament by virtue of his power; inſomuch that whatever is tranſacted there, is ſuppoſed to be done by the King himſelf: and then as if you had got ſome petty bribe or ſmall morſel, and tickled with the remembrance of your Purſe of Gold, We take, ſay you, what they give us; and take a Halter then, for I'm ſure you deſerve it. But we do not give it for granted, which is the thing you thought would follow from thence, That therefore that Court acts only by virtue of a delegated Power from the King. For when we ſay that the Regal Power, be it what it will, cannot be abſent from the Parliament, do we thereby acknowledg that Power to be Supreme? Does not the King's Authority ſeem rather to be transferred to the Parliament, and, as being the leſſer of the two, to be compriſed in the greater? Certainly if the Parliament may reſcind the King's Acts whether he will or no, and revoke Privileges granted by him, to whomſoever they be granted: If they may ſet bounds to his Prerogative, as they ſee cauſe, if they may regulate his yearly Revenue, and the Expences of his Court, his Retinue, and generally all the concerns of his Houſhold; If they may remove his moſt intimate Friends and Counſellors, and as it were pluck them out of his boſom, and bring them to condign puniſhment: Finally, if any Subject may by Law appeal from the King to the Parliament (all which things, that they may lawfully be done, and have been frequently practiſed, both our Hiſtories and Records, and the moſt eminent of our Lawyers aſſure us) I ſuppoſe no man in his right wits will deny the Authority of the Parliament to be ſuperior to that of the King. For even in an Interregnum the Authority of the Parliament is in being, and (than which nothing is more common in our Hiſtories) they have often made a free Choice of a Succeſſor, without any regard to a Hereditary deſcent. In ſhort, the Parliament is the Supreme Council of the Nation, conſtituted and appointed by a moſt free People, and armed with ample power and authority, for this end and purpoſe; viz. to conſult together upon the moſt weighty affairs of the Kingdom; the King was created to put their Laws in execution. Which thing after the Parliament themſelves had declared in a publick Edict (for ſuch is the Juſtice of their Proceedings, that of their own accord they have been willing to give an account of their actions to other Nations) is it not prodigious, that ſuch a pitiful fellow as you are, a man of no authority, of no credit, of no figure in the world, a meer Burgundian ſlave, ſhould have the impudence to accuſe the Parliament of England, aſſerting by a publick Inſtrument their own and their Countries Right, of a deteſtable and horrid Impoſture? Your Country may be aſhamed, you Raſcal, to have brought forth a little inconſiderable fellow of ſuch profligate impudence. But perhaps you have ſomewhat to tell us that may be for our good: Go on, we'll hear you. What Laws, ſay you can a Parliament enact, in which the Biſhops are not preſent? Did you then, ye Mad-man, expel the Order of Biſhops out of the Church to introduce them into the State? O wicked Wretch, who ought to be delivered over to Satan, whom the Church ought to forbid her Communion, as being a Hypocrite, and an Atheiſt, and no Civil Society of men to acknowledg as a member, being a publick Enemy, and a Plague-ſore to the common Liberty of Mankind; who, where the Goſpel fails you, endeavour to prove out of Ariſtotle, Halicarnaſſeum, and then from ſome Popiſh Authorities of the moſt corrupt ages, that the King of England is the head of the Church of England, to the end that you may, as far as in you lies, bring in the Biſhops again, his Intimates and Table-Companions, grown ſo of late, to rob and tyrannize in the Church of God, whom God himſelf has depoſed and degraded, whoſe very Order you had heretofore aſſerted in Print that it ought to be rooted out of the world, as deſtructive of and pernicious to the Chriſtian Religion. What Apoſtate did ever ſo ſhamefully and wickedly deſert as this man has done, I do not ſay his own which indeed never was any, but the Chriſtian Doctrine which he had formerly aſſerted? The Biſhops being put down, who under the King, and by his permiſſion held Plea of Eccleſiaſtical Cauſes, upon whom, ſay you, will that Juriſdiction devolve? O Villain, have ſome regard at leaſt to your own Conſcience; Remember before it be too late, if at leaſt this admonition of mine come not too late, remember that this mocking the Holy Spirit of God is an inexpiable crime, and will not be left unpuniſht. Stop at laſt, and ſet bounds to your fury, leſt the Wrath of God lay hold upon you ſuddenly, for endeavouring to deliver the flock of God, his Anointed ones that are not to be touched, to Enemies and cruel Tyrants, to be cruſht and trampled on again, from whom himſelf by a high and ſtretched out arm had ſo lately delivered them; and from whom you your ſelf maintained that they ought to be delivered, I know not whether for any good of theirs, or in order to the hardning of your own heart, and to further your own damnation. If the Biſhops have no right to lord it over the Church, certainly much leſs have Kings, whatever the Laws of Men may be to the contrary. For they that know any thing of the Goſpel know thus much, that the Government of the Church is altogether Divine and Spiritual, and no Civil Conſtitution. Whereas you ſay, That in Secular Affairs, the Kings of England have always had the Sovereign Power: Our Laws do abundantly declare that to be falſe. Our Courts of Juſtice are erected and ſuppreſſed, not by the King's Authority, but that of the Parliament; and yet in any of them, the meaneſt Subject might go to Law with the King: nor is it a rare thing for the Judges to give Judgment againſt him, which if the King ſhould endeavour to obſtruct by any Prohibition, Mandate, or Letters, the Judges were bound by Law, and by their Oaths not to obey him, but to reject ſuch Inhibitions as null and void in Law. The King could not impriſon any Man, or ſeize his Eſtate as forfeited; he could not puniſh any Man, not ſummoned to appear in Court, where not the King but the ordinary Judges gave Sentence; which they frequently did, as I have ſaid, againſt the King. Hence our Bracton, lib. 3. cap. 9. The Regal Power, ſays he, is according to Law; he has no power to do any wrong, nor can the King do any thing but what the Law warrants. Thoſe Lawyers that you have conſulted, Men that have lately fled their Countrey, may tell you another tale, and acquaint you with ſome Statutes, not very ancient neither, but made in King Edward 4th's, King Henry 6th's, and King Edward 6th's days; but they did not conſider, That what power ſoever thoſe Statutes gave the King, was conferred upon him by Authority of Parliament, ſo that he was beholding to them for it; and the ſame power that conferr'd it, might at pleaſure reſume it. How comes it to paſs that ſo acute a diſputant as you, ſhould ſuffer your ſelf to be impoſed upon to that degree, as to make uſe of that very Argument to prove the King's Power to be Abſolute and Supreme, than which nothing proves more clearly, That it is ſubordinate to that of the Parliament? Our Records of the greateſt Authority with us, declare, That our Kings owe all their Power, not to any Right of Inheritance, of Conqueſt, or Succeſſion, but to the People. So in the Parliament Rolls of King Hen. 4. numb. 108. we read, That the Kingly Office and Power was granted by the Commons to King Henry the 4th, and before him, to his Predeceſſor King Richard the 2d. juſt as Kings uſe to grant Commiſſioners Places, and Lieutenantſhips to their Deputies, by Edicts and Patents. Thus the Houſe of Commons ordered expreſly to be entred upon record, ‘That ‘they had granted to King Richard to uſe the ſame good Liberty that the Kings of Eng‘land before him had uſed: Which becauſe that King abuſed to the ſubverſion of the Laws, and contrary to his Oath at his Coronation, the ſame perſons that granted him that power, took it back again, and depoſed him. The ſame Men, as appears by the ſame Record, declared in open Parliament, ‘That having confidence ‘in the Prudence and Moderation of King Henry the 4th. they will and enact, ‘That he enjoy the ſame Royal Authority that his Anceſtors enjoyed. Which if it had been any other than in the nature of a Truſt, as this was, either thoſe Houſes of Parliament were fooliſh and vain, to give what was none of their own, or thoſe Kings that were willing to receive as from them, what was already theirs, were too injurious both to themſelves and their Poſterity; neither of which is likely. A third part of the Regal Power, ſay you, is converſant about the Militia; this the Kings of England have uſed to order and govern, without Fellow or Competitor. This is as falſe as all the reſt that you have taken upon the credit of Fugitives: For in the firſt place, both our own Hiſtories, and thoſe of Foreigners, that have been any whit exact in the relation of our Affairs, declare, That the making of Peace and War, always did belong to the Parliament. And the Laws of St. Edward, which our Kings were bound to ſwear that they would maintain, make this appear beyond all exception, in the Chapter De Heretochiis, viz. ‘That there were certain Officers appointed in every Province and County throughout the Kingdom, that were called Heretochs, in Latin Duces, Commanders of Armies, that were to command the Forces of the ſeveral Counties, not for the Honour of the Crown only, ‘but for the good of the Realm. And they were choſen by the General Council, and in the ſeveral Counties at publick Aſſemblies of the Inhabitants, as Sheriffs ought to be choſen. Whence it is evident, That the Forces of the Kingdom, and the Commanders of thoſe Forces, were anciently, and ought to be ſtill, not at the King's Command, but at the People's; and that this moſt reaſonable and juſt Law obtained in this Kingdom of ours no leſs than heretofore it did in the Commonwealth of the Romans. Concerning which, it will not be amiſs to hear what Cicero ſays, Philip. 1. ‘All the Legions, all the Forces of the Commonwealth, whereſoever they are, are the People of Rome's; nor are thoſe Legions that deſerted the Conſul Antonius, ſaid to have been Antony's, but the Commonwealth's Legions. This very Law of St. Edward, together with the reſt, did William the Conqueror, at the deſire and inſtance of the People, confirm by Oath, and added over and above, cap. 56. ‘That all Cities, Boroughs, Caſtles, ſhould be ſo watched every night, as the Sheriffs, the Aldermen, and other Magiſtrates, ſhould think meet for the ſafety of the Kingdom. And in the 6th Law, ‘Caſtles, Boroughs, and Cities, were firſt built for the Defence of the People, and therefore ought to be maintained free and entire, by all ways and means. What then? Shall Towns and Places of Strength in times of Peace be guarded againſt Thieves and Robbers by common Councils of the ſeveral Places; and ſhall they not be defended in dangerous times of War, againſt both Domeſtick and Foreign Hoſtility, by the Common Council of the whole Nation? If this be not granted, there can be no Freedom, no Integrity, no Reaſon in the guarding of them; nor ſhall we obtain any of thoſe ends, for which the Law it ſelf tells us, that Towns and Fortreſſes were at firſt founded. Indeed our Anceſtors were willing to put any thing into the King's Power, rather than their Arms, and the Garriſons of their Towns; conceiving that to be neither better nor worſe, than betraying their Liberty to the Fury and Exorbitancy of their Princes. Of which there are ſo very many inſtances in our Hiſtories, and thoſe ſo generally known, that it would be ſuperfluous to mention any of them here. But the King owes protection to his Subjects; and how can he protect them, unleſs he have Men and Arms at Command? But, ſay I, he had all this for the good of the Kingdom, as has been ſaid, not for the deſtruction of his People, and the ruin of the Kingdom: Which in King Henry the 3d's time, one Leonard, a Learned Man in thoſe days, in an Aſſembly of Biſhops, told Ruſtandus, the Pope's Nuncio and the King's Procurator, in theſe words; ‘All Churches are the Pope's, as all Temporal things are ſaid to be the King's, for Defence and Protection, not his in Propriety and Ownerſhip, as we ſay; they are his to defend, not to deſtroy. The aforementioned Law of St. Edward, is to the ſame purpoſe; and what does this import more than a Truſt? Does this look like abſolute power? Such a kind of Power a Commander of an Army always has, that is, a delegated Power; and yet both at home and abroad he is never the leſs able to defend the People that chuſe him. Our Parliaments would anciently have contended with our Kings about their Liberty and the Laws of St. Edward, to very little purpoſe; and 'twould have been an unequal match betwixt the Kings and them, if they had been of opinion, that the Power of the Sword belonged to him alone: for how unjuſt Laws ſoever their Kings would have impoſed upon them, their Charter, tho never ſo great, would have been a weak Defence againſt Force. But ſay you, What would the Parliament be the better for the Militia, ſince without the King's Aſſent they cannot raiſe the leaſt Farthing from the People towards the maintaining it? Take you no thought for that: For in the firſt place you go upon a falſe ſuppoſition, That Parliaments cannot impoſe Taxes without the King's Aſſent, upon the People that ſend them, and whoſe concerns they undertake. In the next place, you that are ſo officious an enquirer into other mens matters, cannot but have heard, That the People of their own accord, by bringing in their Plate to be melted down, raiſed a great Sum of Money towards the carrying on of this War againſt the King. Then you mention the largeneſs of our King's Revenue: You mention over and over again Five Hundred and Forty Thouſands: That thoſe of our Kings that have been eminent for their Bounty and Liberality, have uſed to give Large Boons out of their own Patrimony. This you were glad to hear; 'twas by this Charm, that thoſe Traytors to their Countrey allured you, as Balaam the Prophet was enticed of old, to curſe the People of God, and exclaim againſt the Judicial Diſpenſations of his Providence. You Fool! what was that unjuſt and violent King the better for ſuch abundance of Wealth? What are you the better for it? Who have been no partaker of any part of it, that I can hear of (how great hopes ſoever you may have conceiv'd of being vaſtly enriched by it) but only of a hundred pieces of Gold, in a Purſe wrought with beads. Take that reward of thine Iniquity, Balaam, which thou haſt loved, and enjoy it. You go on to play the Fool; The ſetting up of a Standard is a Prerogative that belongs to the King only. How ſo? Why becauſe Virgil tells us in his Æneis, 'That Turnus ſet up a Standard on the top of the Tower at Laurentum, for an 'Enſign of War. And do not you know, Grammarian, that every General of an Army does the ſame thing? But, ſays Ariſtotle, The King muſt always be provided of a Military Power, that he may be able to defend the Laws; and therefore the King muſt be ſtronger than the whole body of the People. This man makes Conſequences juſt as Oenus does Ropes in Hell; which are of no uſe but to be eaten by Aſſes. For a number of Soldiers given to the King by the People, is one thing; and the ſole power of the Militia is quite another thing; the latter, Ariſtotle does not allow that Kings ought to be Maſters of, and that in this very place which you have quoted: He ought, ſays he, to have ſo many armed men about him, as to make him ſtronger than any one man, than many men got together; but he muſt not be ſtronger than all the People, Polit. lib. 3. cap. 4. Elſe inſtead of protecting them, it would be in his power to ſubject both People and Laws to himſelf. For this is the difference betwixt a King and a Tyrant: A King, by conſent of the Senate and People, has about him ſo many armed men, as to enable him to reſiſt Enemies, and ſuppreſs Seditions. A Tyrant, againſt the Will both of Senate and People, gets as great a number as he can, either of Enemies, or profligate Subjects to ſide with him againſt the Senate and the People. The Parliament therefore allowed the King, as they did whatever he had beſides, the ſetting up of a Standard; not to wage War againſt his own People, but to defend them againſt ſuch as the Parliament ſhould declare Enemies to the State: If he acted otherwiſe, himſelf was to be accounted an Enemy; ſince according to the very Law of St. Edward, or according to a more ſacred Law than that, the Law of Nature it ſelf, he loſt the name of a King, and was no longer ſuch. Whence Cicero in his Philip. 'He forfeits his Command in the Army, and Intereſt in the Government, that employs them againſt the State. Neither could the King compel thoſe that held of him by Knight-Service, to ſerve him in any other War, than ſuch as was made by conſent of Parliament; which is evident by many Statutes. So for Cuſtoms and other Subſidies for the maintenance of the Navy; the King could not exact them without an Act of Parliament; as was reſolved about twelve years ago, by the ableſt of our Lawyers, when the King's Authority was at the height. And long before them, Forteſcue, an Eminent Lawyer, and Chancellor to King Henry the 6th, 'The King of England, ſays he, 'can neither alter the Laws, nor exact Subſidies without the People's conſent; nor can any Teſtimonies be brought from Antiquity, to prove the Kingdom of England to have been merely Regal. 'The King, ſays Bracton, has a Juriſdiction over all his Subjects; that is, in his Courts of Juſtice, where Juſtice is adminiſtred in the King's name indeed, but according to our own Laws. 'All 'are ſubject to the King; that is, every particular man is; and ſo Bracton explains himſelf in the places that I have cited. What follows is but turning the ſame ſtone over and over again; (at which ſport I believe you are able to tire Si- ſiphus himſelf) and is ſufficiently anſwered by what has been ſaid already. For the reſt, if our Parliaments have ſometimes complimented good Kings with ſubmiſſive expreſſions, tho neither ſavouring of Flattery nor Slavery, thoſe are not to be accounted due to Tyrants, nor ought to prejudice the Peoples Right: good manners and civility do not infringe Liberty. Whereas you cite out of Sir Edw. Coke and others, 'That the Kingdom of England is an Abſolute Kingdom; that is ſaid with reſpect to any Foreign Prince, or the Emperor; becauſe as Camden ſays, 'It is not under the Patronage of the Emperor: but both of them affirm that the Government of England reſides not in the King alone, but in a Body Politick. Whence Forteſcue in his Book de Laud. Leg. Angl. cap. 9. 'The 'King of England, ſays he, governs his People, not by a merely Regal, but a 'Political Power; for the Engliſh are govern'd by Laws of their own making. Foreign Authors were not ignorant of this: Hence Philip de Comines, a Grave Author, in the Fifth Book of his Commentaries, 'Of all the Kingdoms of the 'Earth, ſays he, that I have any knowledg of, there is none in my opinion, 'where the Government is more moderate, where the King has leſs power of 'hurting his People, than in England. Finally, 'Tis ridiculous, ſay you, for them to affirm that Kingdoms were ancienter than Kings; which is as much as if they ſhould ſay, that there was Light before the Sun was created. But with your good leave, Sir, we do not ſay that Kingdoms, but that the People were before Kings. In the mean time, who can be more ridiculous than you, who deny there was Light before the Sun had a being? You pretend to a curioſity in other mens matters, and have forgot the very firſt things that were taught you. You wonder how they that have ſeen the King upon his Throne, at a Seſſion of Parliament (ſub aureo & ſerico Cœlo, under a golden and ſilken Heaven) under a Canopy of State, ſhould ſo much as make a queſtion whether the Majeſty reſided in him, or in the Parliament? They are certainly hard of belief, whom ſo lucid an Argument coming down from Heaven, cannot convince. Which Golden Heaven, you, like a Stoick, have ſo devoutly and ſeriouſly gaz'd upon, that you ſeem to have forgot what kind of Heaven Moſes and Ariſtotle deſcribe to us; for you deny that there was any Light in Moſes's Heaven, before the Sun; and in Ariſtotle's you make three temperate Zones. How many Zones you obſerved in that Golden and Silken Heaven of the King's, I know not; but I know you got one Zone (a Purſe) well tempered with a Hundred Golden Stars by your Aſtronomy.

CHAP. X.

SInce this whole Controverſy, whether concerning the Right of Kings in general, or that of the King of England in particular, is rendred difficult and intricate, rather by the obſtinacy of Parties, than by the nature of the thing it ſelf; I hope they that prefer Truth before the Intereſt of a Faction, will be ſatisfied with what I have alledged out of the Law of God, the Laws of Nations, and the Municipal Laws of my own Countrey, That a King of England may be brought to Trial, and put to Death. As for thoſe whoſe minds are either blinded with Superſtition, or ſo dazled with the Splendor and Grandure of a Court, that Magnanimity and true Liberty do not appear ſo glorious to them, as they are in themſelves, it will be in vain to contend with them, either by Reaſon and Arguments, or Examples. But you Salmaſius, ſeem very abſurd, as in every other part of your Book, ſo particularly in this, who tho you rail perpetually at the Independents, and revile them with all the terms of Reproach imaginable, yet aſſert to the higheſt degree that can be, the Independency of a King, whom you defend; and will not allow him to owe his Sovereignty to the People, but to his Deſcent. And whereas in the beginning of your Book you complain'd that he was put to plead for his Life, here you complain, That he periſh'd without being heard to ſpeak for himſelf. But if you have a mind to look into the Hiſtory of his Trial, which is very faithfully publiſh'd in French, it may be you'll be of another opinion. Whereas he had liberty given him for ſome days together, to ſay what he could for himſelf, he made uſe of it not to clear himſelf of the Crimes laid to his Charge, but to diſprove the Authority of his Judges, and the Judicature that he was called before. And whenever a Criminal is either mute, or ſays nothing to the purpoſe, there is no Injuſtice in condemning him without hearing him, if his Crimes are notorious, and publickly known. If you ſay that Charles died as he lived, I agree with you: If you ſay that he died piouſly, holily, and at eaſe, you may remember that his Grandmother Mary, Queen of Scots, an infamous Woman, died on a Scaffold with as much outward appearance of Piety, Sanctity, and Conſtancy, as he did. And leſt you ſhould aſcribe too much to that preſence of mind which ſome common Malefactors have ſo great a meaſure of at their death; many times deſpair, and a hardned heart puts on as it were a Vizor of Courage; and Stupidity, a ſhew of Quiet, and Tranquillity of Mind: Sometimes the worſt of Men deſire to appear good, undaunted, innocent, and now and then religious, not only in their life, but at their death; and in ſuffering death for their villanies, uſe to act the laſt part of their hypocriſy and cheats, with all the ſhow imaginable; and like bad Poets or Stage-players, are very ambitious of being clapp'd at the end of the Play. Now, you ſay, you are come to enquire who they chiefly were, that gave Sentence againſt the King. Whereas it ought firſt to be enquired into, how you, a Foreigner, and a French Vagabond, came to have any thing to do to raiſe a queſtion about our Affairs, to which you are ſo much a Stranger? And what Reward induced you to it? But we know enough of that, and who ſatisfied your curioſity in theſe matters of ours; even thoſe Fugitives, and Traitors to their Countrey, that could eaſily hire ſuch a vain Fellow as you, to ſpeak ill of us. Then an account in writing, of the ſtate of our Affairs, was put into your hands by ſome hair-brain'd, half-Proteſtant, half-Papiſt Chaplain or other, or by ſome ſneaking Courtier, and you were put to tranſlate it into Latin; out of that you took theſe Narratives, which, if you pleaſe, we'll examine a little: Not the hundred thouſandth part of the People conſented to this Sentence of Condemnation. What were the reſt of the People then that ſuffer'd ſo great a thing to be tranſacted againſt their will? Were they Stocks and Stones, were they mere Trunks of Men only, or ſuch Images of Britains, as Virgil deſcribes to have been wrought in Tapſtry?

And Britains interwove held up the Purple Hangings.

For you deſcribe no true Britains but painted ones, or rather Needle-wrought Men inſtead of them. Since therefore it is a thing ſo incredible that a warlike Nation ſhould be ſubdued by ſo few, and thoſe of the dregs of the People (which is the firſt thing that occurs in your Narrative) that appears in the very nature of the thing it ſelf to be moſt falſe. The Biſhops were turn'd out of the Houſe of Lords by the Parliament it ſelf. The more deplorable is your Madneſs (for are you not yet ſenſible that you rave) to complain of their being turn'd out of the Parliament, whom you your ſelf in a large Book endeavour to prove ought to be turn'd out of the Church. One of the States of Parliament, to wit, the Houſe of Lords, conſiſting of Dukes, Earls, and Viſcounts, was removed. And deſervedly were they removed; for they were not deputed to ſit there by any Town or County, but repreſented themſelves only; they had no Right over the People, but (as if they had been ordained for that very purpoſe) uſed frequently to oppoſe their Rights and Liberties. They were created by the King, they were his Companions, his Servants, and as it were, Shadows of him. He being removed, it was neceſſary they ſhould be reduced to the ſame Level with the Body of the People, from amongſt whom they took their riſe. One part of the Parliament, and that the worſt of all, ought not to have aſſum'd that Power of judging and condemning the King. But I have told you already, that the Houſe of Commons was not only the chief part of our Parliament, while we had Kings, but was a perfect and entire Parliament of it ſelf, without the Temporal Lords, much more without the Biſhops. But, The whole Houſe of Commons themſelves were not admitted to have to do with the Trial of the King. To wit, that part of them was not admitted, that openly revolted to him in their Minds and Councels; whom, tho they ſtil'd him their King, yet they had ſo often acted againſt, as an Enemy. The Parliament of England, and the Deputies ſent from the Parliament of Scotland, on the 13th of January, 1645, wrote to the King, in anſwer to a Letter of his, by which he deſired a deceitful Truce, and that he might treat with them at London; that they could not admit him into that City, till he had made Satisfaction to the State for the Civil War that he had raiſed in the three Kingdoms, and for the Deaths of ſo many of his Subjects ſlain by his Order; and till he had agreed to a true and firm Peace upon ſuch Terms as the Parliaments of both

Kingdoms had offered him ſo often already, and ſhould offer him again. He on the other hand either refuſed to hear, or by ambiguous Anſwers eluded their juſt and equal Propoſals, tho moſt humbly preſented to him ſeven times over. The Parliament at laſt, after ſo many years patience, leſt the King ſhould overturn the State by his Wiles and Delays, when in Priſon, which he could not ſubdue in the Field, and leſt the vanquiſh'd Enemy pleaſed with our Diviſions, ſhould recover himſelf, and triumph unexpectedly over his Conquerors, vote that for the future they would have no regard to him, that they would ſend him no more Propoſals, nor receive any from him: After which Vote, there were found even ſome Members of Parliament, who out of the hatred they bore that invincible Army, whoſe Glory they envied, and which they would have had disbanded, and ſent home with diſgrace, after they had deſerved ſo well of their Nation, and out of a ſervile compliance with ſome Seditious Miniſters, finding their opportunity, when many, whom they knew to be otherwiſe minded than themſelves, having been ſent by the Houſe it ſelf to ſuppreſs the Presbyterians, who began already to be turbulent, were abſent in the ſeveral Counties, with a ſtrange Levity, not to ſay Perfidiouſneſs, vote that that inveterate Enemy of the State, who had nothing of a King but the Name, without giving any Satisfaction or Security, ſhould be brought back to London, and reſtored to his Dignity and Government, as if he had deſerved well of the Nation by what he had done. So that they preferr'd the King before their Religion, their Liberty, and that very celebrated Covenant of theirs. What did they do in the mean time, who were ſound themſelves, and ſaw ſuch pernicious Councils on foot? Ought they therefore to have been wanting to the Nation, and not provide for its ſafety, becauſe the Infection had ſpread it ſelf even in their own Houſe? But, who ſecluded thoſe ill affected Members? The Engliſh Army, you ſay: So that it was not an Army of Foreigners, but of moſt valiant, and faithful, honeſt Natives, whoſe Officers for the moſt part were Members of Parliament; and whom thoſe good ſecluded Members would have ſecluded their Country, and baniſhed into Ireland; while in the mean time the Scots, whoſe Alliance began to be doubtful, had very conſiderable Forces in four of our Northern Counties, and kept Gariſons in the beſt Towns of thoſe Parts, and had the King himſelf in Cuſtody; whilſt they likewiſe encouraged the tumultuating of thoſe of their own Faction, who did more than threaten the Parliament, both in City and Country, and through whoſe means not only a Civil, but a War with Scotland too ſhortly after brake out. If it has been always accounted praiſe-worthy in private Men to aſſiſt the State, and promote the publick Good, whether by Advice or Action; our Army ſure was in no fault, who being ordered by the Parliament to come to Town, obey'd and came, and when they were come, quell'd with eaſe the Faction and Uproar of the King's Party, who ſometimes threatned the Houſe it ſelf. For things were brought to that paſs, that of neceſſity either we muſt be run down by them, or they by us. They had on their ſide moſt of the Shopkeepers and Handicrafts-men of London, and generally thoſe of the Miniſters, that were moſt factious. On our ſide was the Army, whoſe Fidelity, Moderation, and Courage were ſufficiently known. It being in our Power by their means to retain our Liberty, our State, our common Safety, do you think we had not been Fools to have loſt all by our negligence and folly? They who had had places of Command in the Kings Army, after their Party were ſubdued, had laid down their Arms indeed againſt their Wills, but continued Enemies to us in their Hearts; and they flock'd to Town, and were here watching all opportunities of renewing the War. With theſe Men, tho they were the greateſt Enemies they had in the World, and thirſted after their Blood, did the Presbyterians, becauſe they were not permitted to exerciſe a Civil, as well as an Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction over all others, hold ſecret Correſpondence, and took meaſures very unworthy of what they had formerly both ſaid and done; and they came to that Spleen at laſt, that they would rather enthral themſelves to the King again, than admit their own Brethren to ſhare in their Liberty, which they likewiſe had purchaſed at the price of their own Blood; they choſe rather to be lorded over once more by a Tyrant, polluted with the Blood of ſo many of his own Subjects, and who was enraged, and breath'd out nothing but revenge againſt thoſe of them that were left, than endure their Brethren and Friends to be upon the ſquare with them. The Independents, as they are called, were the only men, that from firſt to laſt kept to their point, and knew what uſe to make of their Victory.

They refuſ'd (and wiſely, in my opinion) to make him King again, being then an Enemy; who when he was their King, had made himſelf their Enemy: Nor were they ever the leſs averſe to a Peace, but they very prudently dreaded a new War, or a perpetual Slavery under the name of a Peace. To load our Army with the more reproaches, you begin a ſilly confuſed Narrative of our Affairs; in which tho I find many things falſe, many things frivolous, many things laid to our charge, for which we rather merit; yet I think it will be to no purpoſe for me to write a true relation, in anſwer to your falſe one. For you and I are arguing, not writing Hiſtories, and both ſides will believe our reaſons, but not our narrative; and indeed the nature of the things themſelves is ſuch, that they cannot be related as they ought to be, but in a ſet Hiſtory; ſo that I think it better, as Saluſt ſaid of Carthage, rather to ſay nothing at all, than to ſay but a little of things of this weight and importance. Nay, and I ſcorn ſo much as to mention the praiſes of great Men, and of Almighty God himſelf (who in ſo wonderful a courſe of Affairs ought to be frequently acknowledged) amongſt your Slanders and Reproaches. I'll therefore only pick out ſuch things as ſeem to have any colour of argument. You ſay, the Engliſh and Scotch promiſed by a Solemn Covenant, to preſerve the Majeſty of the King. But you omit upon what terms they promiſed it; to wit, if it might conſiſt with the ſafety of their Religion and their Liberty. To both which, Religion and Liberty, that King was ſo averſe to his laſt breath, and watcht all opportunities of gaining advantages upon them, that it was evident that his Life was dangerous to their Religion, and the certain ruin of their Liberty. But then you fall upon the King's Judges again: If we conſider the thing aright, the concluſion of this abominable action muſt be imputed to the Independents, yet ſo as the Presbyterians may juſtly challenge the glory of its beginning and progreſs. Hark, ye Presbyterians, what good has it done you? How is your Innocence and Loyalty the more cleared by your ſeeming ſo much to abhor the putting the King to death? You your ſelves in the opinion of this everlaſting talkative Advocate of the King, your accuſer, went more than half-way towards it; you were ſeen acting the fourth Act and more, in this Tragedy; you may juſtly be charged with the King's death, ſince you ſhew'd the way to it; 'twas you and only you that laid his head upon the Block. Wo be to you in the firſt place, if ever Charles his Poſterity recover the Crown of England; aſſure your ſelves, you are like to be put in the Black Liſt. But pay your Vows to God, and love your Brethren who have delivered you, who have prevented that calamity from falling upon you, who have ſaved you from inevitable ruin, tho againſt your own wills. You are accuſed likewiſe for that ſome years ago you endeavoured by ſundry Petitions to leſſen the Kings authority, that you publiſht ſome ſcandalous Expreſſions of the King himſelf in the Papers you preſented him with in the name of the Parliament; to wit, in that Declaration of the Lords and Commons of the 26th of May 1642, you declar'd openly in ſome mad Poſitions that breath'd nothing but Rebellion, what your thoughts were of the King's authority: Hotham by order of Parliament ſhut the gates of Hull againſt the King; you had a mind to make a trial by this firſt act of Rebellion how much the King would bear. What could this Man ſay more if it were his deſign to reconcile the minds of all Engliſh Men to one another, and alienate them wholly from the King? for he gives them here to underſtand, that if ever the King be brought back, they muſt not only expect to be puniſht for his Father's death, but for the Petitions they made long ago, and ſome Acts that paſt in full Parliament, concerning the putting down the Common-Prayer and Biſhops, and that of the Triennial Parliament, and ſeveral other things that were enacted with the greateſt conſent and applauſe of all the People that could be; all which will be look'd upon as the Seditions and mad Poſitions of the Presbyterians. But this vain fellow changes his mind all of a ſudden; and what but of late, when he conſidered it aright, he thought was to be imputed wholly to the Presbyterians, now that he conſiders the ſame thing from firſt to laſt, he thinks the Independents were the ſole Actors of it. But even now he told us, The Presbyterians took up Arms againſt the King, that by them he was beaten, taken captive, and put in priſon; Now he ſays, this whole Doctrine of Rebellion is the Independents Principle. O! the faithfulneſs of this Man's Narrative. How conſiſtent he is with himſelf! What need is there of a Counter Narrative to this of his, that cuts its own Throat? But if any man ſhould queſtion whether you are an honeſt Man or a Knave, let him read theſe following lines of yours: It is time to explain whence and at what time this Sect of Enemies to Kingſhip firſt began. Why truly theſe rare Puritans began in Queen Elizabeths time to crawl out of Hell, and diſturb not only the Church, but the State likewiſe; for they are no leſs plagues to the latter than to the former. Now your very ſpeech bewrays you to be a right Balaam; for where you deſigned to ſpit out the moſt bitter Poyſon you could, there unwittingly and againſt your will you have pronounc'd a Bleſſing. For it's notoriouſly known all over England that if any endeavoured to ſollow the example of thoſe Churches, whether in France or Germany, which they accounted beſt reformed, and to exerciſe the publick Worſhip of God in a more pure manner, which our Biſhops had almoſt univerſally corrupted with their Ceremonies and Superſtitions; or if any ſeemed either in point of Religion or Morality to be better than others, ſuch perſons were by the Favourers of Epiſcopacy termed Puritans. Theſe are they whoſe Principles you ſay are ſo oppoſite to Kingſhip. Nor are they the only perſons, moſt of the Reformed Religion, that have not ſucked in the reſt of their principles, yet ſeem to have approved of thoſe that ſtrike at Kingly Government. So that while you inveigh bitterly againſt the Independents, and endeavour to ſeparate them from Chriſt's flock, with the ſame breath you praiſe them; and thoſe Principles which almoſt every where you affirm to be peculiar to the Independents, here you confeſs have been approved of by moſt of the Reformed Religion. Nay you are arrived to that degree of impudence, impiety and apoſtacy, that though formerly you maintained Biſhops ought to be extirpated out of the Church, root and branch, as ſo many peſts and limbs of Antichriſt, here you ſay the King ought to protect them, for the ſaving of his Coronation-Oath. You cannot ſhow your ſelf a more infamous Villain than you have done already, but by abjuring the Proteſtant Reformed Religion, to which you are a ſcandal. Whereas you tax us with giving a Toleration of all Sects and Hereſies, you ought not to find fault with us for that; ſince the Church bears with ſuch a profligate Wretch as you your ſelf, ſuch a vain Fellow, ſuch a Lyar, ſuch a Mercenary Slanderer, ſuch an Apoſtate, one who has the impudence to affirm, That the beſt and moſt pious of Chriſtians, and even moſt of thoſe who profeſs the Reformed Religion, are crept out of Hell, becauſe they differ in opinion from you. I had beſt paſs by the Calumnies that fill up the reſt of this Chapter, and thoſe prodigious Tenets that you aſcribe to the Independents, to render them odious; for neither do they at all concern the Cauſe you have in hand, and they are ſuch for the moſt part as deſerve to be laugh'd at, and deſpiſed, rather than receive a ſerious Anſwer.

CHAP. XI.

YOU ſeem to begin this Eleventh Chapter, Salmaſius, though with no modeſty, yet with ſome ſenſe of your weakneſs and trifling in this Diſcourſe. For whereas you propoſed to your ſelf to enquire in this place, by what authority ſentence was given againſt the King? you add immediately, which no body expected from you, that 'tis in vain to make any ſuch enquiry; to wit, becauſe the quality of the perſons that did it, leaves hardly any room for ſuch a queſtion. And therefore as you have been found guilty of a great deal of Impudence and Saucineſs in the undertaking of this Cauſe, ſo ſince you ſeem here conſcious of your own impertinence, I ſhall give you the ſhorter anſwer. To your queſtion then; by what authority the Houſe of Commons either condemn'd the King themſelves, or delegated that Power to others; I anſwer, they did it by virtue of the Supreme Authority on Earth. How they come to have the Supreme Power, you may learn by what I have ſaid already, when I refuted your Impertinencies upon that Subject. If you believed your ſelf that you could ever ſay enough upon any Subject, you would not be ſo tedious in repeating the ſame things ſo many times over. And the Houſecf Commons might delegate their Judicial Power by the ſame reaſon, by which you ſay the King may delegate his, who received all he had from the People. Hence in that Solemn League and Covenant that you object to us, the Parliaments of England and Scotland ſolemnly proteſt and engage to each other, to puniſh the Traitors in ſuch manner as the Supreme, Judicial Authority in both Nations, or ſuch as ſhould have a delegate power from them, ſhould think fit. Now you hear the Parliaments of both Nations proteſt with one voice, that they may delegate their Judicial Power, which they call the Supreme ; ſo that you move a vain and frivolous Controverſy about delegating this power. But, ſay you, there were added to thoſe Judges that were made choice of out of the Houſe of Commons, ſome Officers of the Army, and it never was known that Soldiers had any right to try a Subject for his life. I'll ſilence you in a very few words: You may remember that we are not now diſcourſing of a Subject, but of an Enemy ; whom if a General of an Army, after he has taken him Priſoner, reſolves to diſpatch, would he be thought to proceed otherwiſe than according to Cuſtom and Martial Law, if he himſelf with ſome of his Officers ſhould ſit upon him, and try and condemn him ? An Enemy to a State made a Priſoner of War, cannot be lookt upon to be ſo much as a Member, much leſs a King in that State. This is declar'd by that Sacred Law of St. Edward, which denies that a bad King is a King at all, or ought to be call'd ſo. Whereas you ſay, it was not the whole but a part of the Houſe of Commons that try'd and condemned the King, I give you this anſwer: The number of them, who gave their Votes for putting the King to death, was far greater than is neceſſary according to the cuſtom of our Parliaments to tranſact the greateſt Affairs of the Kingdom, in the abſence of the reſt ; who ſince they were abſent through their own fault (for to revolt to the common Enemy in their hearts is the worſt ſort of abſence) their abſence ought not to hinder the reſt who continued faithful to the cauſe, from preſerving the State ; which when it was in a tottering condition, and almoſt quite reduced to Slavery and utter Ruin, the whole body of the People had at firſt committed to their fidelity, prudence and courage. And they acted their parts like men ; they ſet themſelves in oppoſition to the unruly wilfulneſs, the rage, the ſecret deſigns of an inveterate and exaſperated King ; they prefer'd the common Liberty and Safety before their own ; they out-did all former Parliaments, they out-did all their Anceſtors in Conduct, Magnanimity and Steddineſs to their cauſe. Yet theſe very men did a great part of the People ungratefully deſert in the midſt of their undertaking, tho they had promiſed them all fidelity, all the help and aſſiſtance they could afford them. Theſe were for Slavery and Peace with ſloth and luxury upon any terms: Others demanded their Liberty, nor would accept of a Peace that was not ſure and honourable. What ſhould the Parliament do in this caſe ? ought they to have defended this part of the People, that was ſound and continued faithful to them and their Country, or to have ſided with thoſe that deſerted both ? I know what you will ſay they ought to have done. You are not Eurylochus, but Elpenor, a miſerable enchanted Beaſt, a filthy Swine, accuſtomed to a ſordid Slavery even under a Woman ; ſo that you have not the leaſt reliſh of true Magnanimity, nor conſequently of Liberty which is the effect of it: You would have all other men Slaves, becauſe you find in your ſelf no generous, ingenuous inclinations ; you ſay nothing, you breath nothing but what's mean and ſervile. You raiſe another ſcruple, to wit, That he was the King of Scotland too, whom we condemn'd ; as if he might therefore do what he would in England. But that you may conclude this Chapter, which of all others is the moſt weak and inſipid, at leaſt with ſome witty querk, There are two little words, ſay you, that are made up of the ſame number of Letters, and differ only in the placing of them, but whoſe ſignifications are wide aſunder, to wit, Vis and Jus, (might and right.) 'Tis no great wonder that ſuch a three letter'd man as you, (Fur a Thief) ſhould make ſuch a Witticiſm upon three Letters: 'Tis the greater wonder (which yet you aſſert throughout your Book) that two things ſo directly oppoſite to one another as thoſe two are, ſhould yet meet and become one and the ſame thing in Kings. For what violence was ever acted by Kings, which you do not affirm to be their Right ? Theſe are all the paſſages that I could pick out of nine long Pages, that I thought deſerved an anſwer. The reſt conſiſts either of repetitions of things that have been anſwered more than once, or ſuch as have no relation to the matter in hand. So that my being more brief in this Chapter than in the reſt, is not to be imputed to want of diligence in me, which, how irkſom ſoever you are to me, I have not ſlackned, but to your tedious impertinence, ſo void of matter and ſenſe.

CHAP. XII.

I Wiſh, Salmaſius, that you had left out this part of your Diſcourſe concerning the King's crimes, which it had been more adviſable for your ſelf and your party to have done ; for I'm afraid leſt in giving you an anſwer to it, I ſhould appear too ſharp and ſevere upon him, now he his dead, and hath received his puniſhment. But ſince you choſe rather to diſcourſe confidently and at large upon that Subject, I'll make you ſenſible, that you could not have done a more inconſiderate thing, than to reſerve the worſt part of your cauſe to the laſt, to wit that of ripping up and enquiring into the Kings Crimes; which when I ſhall have proved them to have been true and moſt exorbitant, they will render his memory unpleaſant and odious to all good men, and imprint now in the cloſe of the Controverſy, a juſt hatred of you, who undertake his defence, on the Readers minds. Say you, His accuſation may be divided into two parts, one is converſant about his Morals, the other taxeth him with ſuch faults as he might commit in his publick capacity. I'll be content to paſs by in ſilence that part of his life that he ſpent in Banquetings, at Plays, and in the converſation of Women; for what can there be in Luxury and Exceſs, worth relating? And what would thoſe things have been to us, if he had been a private perſon? But ſince he would be a King, as he could not live a private Life, ſo neither could his Vices be like thoſe of a private Perſon. For in the firſt place, he did a great deal of miſchief by his Example: In the ſecond place, all that time that he ſpent upon his luſt, and in his ſports, which was a great part of his time, he ſtole from the State, the Government of which he had undertaken. Thirdly and laſtly, he ſquandered away vaſt Sums of Money, which were not his own, but the publick Revenue of the Nation, in his Domeſtick Luxury and Extravagance. So that in his private life at home he firſt began to be an ill King. But let us rather paſs over to thoſe Crimes that he is charged with on the account of miſgovernment. Here you lament his being condemned as a Tyrant, a Traitor, and a Murderer. That he had no wrong done him, ſhall now be made appear. But firſt let us define a Tyrant, not according to vulgar conceits, but the judgment of Ariſtotle, and of all Learned Men. He is a Tyrant who regards his own welfare and profit only, and not that of the People. So Ariſtotle defines one in the Tenth Book of his Ethicks, and elſewhere, and ſo do very many others. Whether Charles regarded his own or the Peoples good, theſe few things of many that I ſhall but touch upon, will evince. When his Rents and other publick Revenues of the Crown would not defray the Expences of the Court, he laid moſt heavy Taxes upon the People; and when they were ſquandred away, he invented new ones; not for the benefit, honour, or defence of the State, but that he might hoard up, or laviſh out in one Houſe, the Riches and Wealth, not of one but of three Nations. When at this rate he broke looſe, and acted without any colour of Law to warrant his proceedings, knowing that a Parliament was the only thing that could give him check, he endeavoured either wholly to lay aſide the very calling of Parliaments, or calling them juſt as often, and no oftner, than to ſerve his own turn, to make them entirely at his devotion. Which Bridle when he had caſt off himſelf, he put another Bridle upon the People; he put Gariſons of German Horſe and Iriſh Foot in many Towns and Cities, and that in time of Peace. Do you think he does not begin to look like a Tyrant? In which very thing, as in many other Particulars, which you have formerly given me occaſion to inſtance (tho you ſcorn to have Charles compared with ſo cruel a Tyrant as Nero) he reſembled him extremely much. For Nero likewiſe often threatned to take away the Senate. Beſides he bore extreme hard upon the Conſciences of good men, and compelled them to the uſe of Ceremonies and Superſtitious Worſhip, borrowed from Popery, and by him re-introduced into the Church. They that would not conform, were impriſoned or baniſht. He made War upon the Scots twice for no other cauſe than that. By all theſe actions he has ſurely deſerved the name of a Tyrant once over at leaſt. Now I'll tell you why the word Traitor was put into his Indictment: When he aſſured his Parliament by Promiſes, by Proclamations, by Imprecations, that he had no deſign againſt the State, at that very time did he liſt Papiſts in Ireland, he ſent a private Embaſſie to the King of Denmark to beg aſſiſtance from him of Arms, Horſes and Men, expreſly againſt the Parliament; and was endeavouring to raiſe an Army firſt in England, and then in Scotland. To the Engliſh he promiſed the Plunder of the City of London, to the Scots, that the four Northern Counties ſhould be added to Scotland, if they would but help him to get rid of the Parliament, by what means ſoever. Theſe Projects not ſucceeding, he ſent over one Dillon a Traitor, into Ireland with private Inſtructions to the Natives, to fall ſuddenly upon all the Engliſh that inhabited there. Theſe are the moſt remarkable inſtances of his Treaſons, not taken up upon hear-ſay and idle reports, but diſcovered by Letters under his own Hand and Seal. And finally I ſuppoſe no man will deny that he was a Murderer, by whoſe order the Iriſh took Arms, and put to death with moſt exquiſite Torments, above a hundred thouſand Engliſh, who lived peaceably by them, and without any apprehenſion of danger; and who raiſed ſo great a Civil War in the other two Kingdoms. Add to all this, that at the Treaty in the Iſle of Wight, the King openly took upon himſelf the guilt of the War, and clear'd the Parliament in the Confeſſion he made there, which is publickly known. Thus you have in ſhort why King Charles was adjudged a Tyrant, a Traytor, and a Murderer. But, ſay you, why was he not declared ſo before, neither in that Solemn League and Covenant, nor afterwards when he was delivered to them, either by the Presbyterians or the Independents, but on the other hand was receiv'd as a King ought to be, with all reverence? This very thing is ſufficient to perſuade any rational man, that the Parliament entred not into any Councils of quite depoſing the King, but as their laſt refuge, after they had ſuffered and undergone all that poſſibly they could, and had attempted all other ways and means. You alone endeavour maliciouſly to lay that to their charge, which to all good men cannot but evidence their great Patience, Moderation, and perhaps a too long forbearing with the King's Pride and Arrogance. But in the month of Auguſt, before the King ſuffered, the Houſe of Commons, which then bore the only ſway, and was governed by the Independents, wrote Letters to the Scots, in which they acquainted them that they never intended to alter the Form of Government that had obtain'd ſo long in England under King, Lords, and Commons. You may ſee from hence, how little reaſon there is to aſcribe the depoſing of the King, to the principles of the Independents. They, that never uſed to diſſemble and conceal their Tenets, even then, when they had the ſole management of affairs, profeſs, That they never intended to alter the Government. But if afterwards a thing came into their minds, which at firſt they intended not, why might they not take ſuch a courſe, tho before not intended, as appear'd moſt adviſable, and moſt for the Nation's Intereſt? Eſpecially when they found that the King could not poſſibly be intreated or induced to aſſent to thoſe juſt demands that they had made from time to time, and which were always the ſame from firſt to laſt. He perſiſted in thoſe perverſe ſentiments with reſpect to Religion and his own Right, which he had all along eſpouſed, and which were ſo deſtructive to us; not in the leaſt altered from the man that he was, when in Peace and War, he did us all ſo much miſchief. If he aſſented to any thing, he gave no obſcure hints that he did it againſt his will, and that whenever he ſhould come into power again, he would look upon ſuch his aſſent as null and void. The ſame thing his Son declared by writing under his hand, when in thoſe days he ran away with part of the Fleet, and ſo did the King himſelf by Letters to ſome of his own party in London. In the mean time, againſt the avowed ſenſe of the Parliament, he ſtruck up a private Peace with the Iriſh, the moſt barbarous Enemies imaginable to England, upon baſe diſhonourable terms; but whenever he invited the Engliſh to Treaties of Peace, at thoſe very times with all the power he had, and intereſt he could make, he was preparing for War. In this caſe, what ſhould they do, who were intruſted with the care of the Government? Ought they to have betrayed the ſafety of us all to our moſt bitter Adverſary? Or would you have had them left us to undergo the Calamities of another ſeven years War, not to ſay worſe? God put a better mind into them, of preferring, purſuant to that very ſolemn League and Covenant, their Religion, and Liberties, before thoſe thoughts they once had, of not rejecting the King; for they had not gone ſo far as to vote it; all which they ſaw at laſt (tho indeed later than they might have done) could not poſſibly ſubſiſt, as long as the King continued King. The Parliament ought and muſt of neceſſity be entirely free, and at liberty to provide for the good of the Nation, as occaſion requires; nor ought they ſo to be wedded to their firſt Sentiments, as to ſcruple the altering their minds, for their own, or the Nation's good, if God put an opportunity into their hands of procuring it. But the Scots were of another opinion; for they, in a Letter to Charles, the King's Son, call his Father a moſt Sacred Prince, and the putting him to death, a moſt execrable Villany. Do not you talk of the Scots, whom you know not; we know them well enough, and know the time, when they called that ſame King, a moſt execrable perſon, a Murderer, and Traitor; and the putting a Tyrant to death a moſt ſacred action. Then you pick holes in the King's Charge, as not being properly penn'd; and you ask why we needed to call him a Traitor and a Murderer, after we had ſtiled him a Tyrant; ſince the word Tyrant, includes all the Crimes that may be: And then you explain to us grammatically and critically, what a Tyrant is. Away with thoſe

Trifles, you Pedagogue, which that one definition of Ariſtotle's, that has lately been cited, will utterly confound; and teach ſuch a Doctor as you, That the word Tyrant (for all your concern is barely to have ſome underſtanding of words) may be applied to one, who is neither a Traitor nor a Murderer. But the Laws of England do not make it Treaſon in the King to ſtir up Sedition againſt himſelf or the People. Nor do they ſay, That the Parliament can be guilty of Treaſon by depoſing a bad King, nor that any Parliament ever was ſo, tho they have often done it; but our Laws plainly and clearly declare, that a King may violate, diminiſh, nay, and wholly loſe his Royalty. For that expreſſion in the Law of St. Edward, of loſing the name of a King, ſignifies neither more nor leſs, than being deprived of the Kingly Office and Dignity; which befel Chilperic King of France, whoſe example, for illuſtration ſake, is taken notice of in the Law it ſelf. There is not a Lawyer amongſt us that can deny, but that the higheſt Treaſon may be committed againſt the Kingdom as well as againſt the King. I appeal to Glanvile himſelf, whom you cite, 'If any man attempt to put the King to death, or raiſe 'Sedition in the Realm, it is High Treaſon. So that attempt of ſome Papiſts to blow up the Parliament-Houſe, and the Lords and Commons there with Gunpowder, was by King James himſelf, and both Houſes of Parliament, declared to be High Treaſon, not againſt the King only, but againſt the Parliament and the whole Kingdom. 'Twould be to no purpoſe to quote more of our Statutes, to prove ſo clear a Truth; which yet I could eaſily do. For the thing it ſelf is ridiculous, and abſurd to imagine, That High Treaſon may be committed againſt the King, and not againſt the People, for whoſe good, nay, and by whoſe leave, as I may ſay, the King is what he is: So that you babble over ſo many Statutes of ours to no purpoſe; you toil and wallow in our Ancient Law-Books, to no purpoſe; for the Laws themſelves ſtand or fall by Authority of Parliament, who always had power to confirm or repeal them; and the Parliament is the ſole Judg of what is Rebellion, what High Treaſon (læſa Majeſtas) and what not. Majeſty never was veſted to that degree in the Perſon of the King, as not to be more conſpicuous, and more auguſt in Parliament, as I have often ſhown: But who can endure to hear ſuch a ſenſeleſs Fellow, ſuch a French Mountebank as you, declare what our Laws are? And, you Engliſh Fugitives, ſo many Biſhops, Doctors, Lawyers, who pretend that all Learning and Ingenuous Literature is fled out of England with your ſelves, was there not one of you that could defend the King's Cauſe and your own, and that in good Latin alſo, to be ſubmitted to the judgment of other Nations, but that this brain-ſick, beggarly Frenchman muſt be hired to undertake the Defence of a poor indigent King, ſurrounded with ſo many Infant-Prieſts and Doctors? This very thing I aſſure you, will be a great imputation to you amongſt Foreigners; and you will be thought deſervedly to have loſt that Cauſe that you were ſo far from being able to defend by Force of Arms, as that you cannot ſo much as write in behalf of it. But now I come to you again, Good-man Gooſcap, who ſcribble ſo finely; if at leaſt you are come to your ſelf again; for I find you here towards the latter end of your Book, in a deep ſleep, and dreaming of ſome voluntary Death or other that's nothing to the purpoſe. Then you deny that 'tis poſſible for a King in his right wits to embroil his People in Seditions, to betray his own Forces to be ſlaughtered by Enemies, and raiſe Factions againſt himſelf. All which things having been done by many Kings, and particularly by Charles the late King of England, you will no longer doubt, I hope, eſpecially being addicted to Stoiciſm, but that all Tyrants, as well as profligate Villains, are downright mad. Hear what Horace ſays, 'Whoever through a ſenſeleſs Stupidity, or any other 'cauſe whatſoever, hath his Underſtanding ſo blinded, as not to diſcern truth, 'the Stoicks account of him as of a mad-man: And ſuch are whole Nations, ſuch 'are Kings and Princes, ſuch are all Mankind; except thoſe very few that are 'Wiſe. So that if you would clear King Charles from the Imputation of acting like a Mad-man, you muſt firſt vindicate his integrity and ſhow that he never acted like an ill man. But a King, you ſay, cannot commit Treaſon againſt his own Subjects and Vaſſals. In the firſt place, ſince we are as free as any People under Heaven, we will not be impos'd upon by any Barbarous Cuſtom of any other Nation whatſoever. In the ſecond place, Suppoſe we had been the King's Vaſſals; that Relation would not have obliged us to endure a Tyrant to reign and lord it over us. All Subjection to Magiſtrates, as our own Laws declare, is circumſcribed, and confined within the bounds of Honeſty, and the Publick Good. Read Leg. Hen. 1. Cap. 55. The obligation betwixt a Lord and his Tenants, is mutual, and remains ſo long as the Lord protects his Tenant; (this all our Lawyers tell us) but if the Lord be too ſevere and cruel to his Tenant, and do him ſome heinous Injury, The whole Relation betwixt them, and whatever Obligation the Tenant is under by having done Homage to his Lord, is utterly diſſolv'd and extinguiſh'd. Theſe are the very words of Bracton and Fleta. So that in ſome Caſe, the Law it ſelf warrants even a Slave, or a Vaſſal to oppoſe his Lord, and allows the Slave to kill him, if he vanquiſh him in Battle. If a City, or a whole Nation may not lawfully take this Courſe with a Tyrant, the Condition of Freemen will be worſe than that of Slaves. Then you go about to excuſe King Charles's ſhedding of Innocent Blood, partly by Murders committed by other Kings, and partly by ſome Inſtances of Men put to death by them lawfully. For the matter of the Iriſh Maſſacre, you refer the Reader to Εἰκὼν Βασιλική; and I refer you to Eiconoclaſtes. The Town of Rochel being taken, and the Townſmen betray'd, aſſiſtance ſhown but not afforded them, you will not have laid at Charles's door; nor have I any thing to ſay, whether he was faulty in that buſineſs or not; he did miſchief enough at home; we need not enquire into what Miſdemeanors he was guilty of abroad. But you in the mean time would make all the Proteſtant Churches, that have at any time defended themſelves by force of Arms againſt Princes, who were profeſs'd Enemies of their Religion to have been guilty of Rebellion. Let them conſider how much it concerns them for the maintaining their Eccleſiaſtical Diſcipline, and aſſerting their own Integrity, not to paſs by ſo great an Indignity offered them by a Perſon bred up by and amongſt themſelves. That which troubles us moſt, is, that the Engliſh likewiſe were betray'd in that Expedition. He, who had deſign'd long ago to convert the Government of England into a Tyranny, thought he could not bring it to paſs, till the Flower and Strength of the Military Power of the Nation were cut off. Another of his Crimes was, the cauſing ſome words to be ſtruck out of the uſual Coronation-Oath, before he himſelf would take it. Unworthy and abominable Action! The act was wicked in it ſelf; what ſhall be ſaid of him that undertakes to juſtifie it? For, by the Eternal God, what greater breach of Faith, and Violation of all Laws can poſſibly be imagin'd? What ought to been more ſacred to him, next to the Holy Sacraments themſelves, than that Oath? Which of the two do you think the more flagitious Perſon, him that offends againſt the Law, or him that endeavours to make the Law equally guilty with himſelf? Or rather him who ſubverts the Law it ſelf, that he may not ſeem to offend againſt it? For thus, that King violated that Oath which he ought moſt religiouſly to have ſworn to; but that he might not ſeem openly and publickly to violate it, he craſtily adulterated and corrupted it; and leſt he himſelf ſhould be accounted perjur'd, he turn'd the very Oath into a Perjury. What other could be expected, than that his Reign would be full of Injuſtice, Craſt, and Misfortune, who began it with ſo deteſtable an Injury to his People? And who durſt pervert and adulterate that Law which he thought the only Obſtacle that ſtood in his way, and hindred him from perverting all the reſt of the Laws? But that Oath (thus you juſtify him) lays no other Obligation upon Kings, than the Laws themſelves do; and Kings pretend that they will be bound and limited by Laws, tho indeed they are altogether from under the Power of Laws. Is it not prodigious, that a Man ſhould dare to expreſs himſelf ſo ſacrilegiouſly, and ſo ſenſeleſly, as to aſſert that an Oath ſacredly ſworn upon the Holy Evangeliſts, may be diſpenſed with, and ſet aſide as a little inſignificant thing, without any Cauſe whatſoever! Charles himſelf refutes you, you Prodigy of Impiety: Who thinking that Oath no light matter, choſe rather by a Subterfuge to avoid the force of it, or by a Fallacy to elude it, than openly to violate it; and would rather falſify and corrupt the Oath, than manifeſtly forſwear himſelf after he had taken it. But, The King indeed ſwears to his People, as the People do to him; but the People ſwear Fidelity to the King, not the King to them. Pretty Invention! Does not he that promiſes, and binds himſelf by an Oath to do any thing to, or for another, oblige his Fidelity to them that require the Oath of him? Of a truth, every King ſwears Fidelity, and Service, and Obedience to the People, with reſpect to the performance of whatever he promiſes upon Oath to do. Then you run back to William the Conqueror, who was forced more than once to ſwear to perform, not what he himſelf would, but what the People, and the great Men of the Realm requir'd of him. If many Kings are Crown'd without the uſual Solemnity, and Reign without taking any Oath, the ſame thing may be ſaid of the People; a great many of whom never took the Oath of Allegiance. If the King by not taking an Oath be at Liberty, berty, the People are ſo too. And that part of the People that has ſworn, ſwore not to the King only, but to the Realm, and the Laws, by which the King came to his Crown; and no otherwiſe to the King, than whilſt he ſhould act according to thoſe Laws, that the Common People, that is, the Houſe of Commons, ſhould chuſe; (Quas Vulgus elegerit.) For it were folly to alter the Phraſe of our Law, and turn it into more genuine Latin. This Clauſe (Quas Vulgus elegerit) Which the Commons ſhall chuſe, Charles before he was crown'd, procured to be razed out. But, ſay you, without the King's aſſent the People can chuſe no Laws; and for this you cite two Statutes, viz. Anno 37. H. 6. Cap. 15. and 13 Edw. 4. Cap. 8. but thoſe two Statutes are ſo far from appearing in our Statute-Books, that in the years you mention, neither of thoſe Kings enacted any Laws at all. Go now and complain, that thoſe Fugitives who pretended to furniſh you with matter out of our Statutes, impoſed upon you in it; and let other People in the mean time ſtand aſtoniſh'd at your Impudence and Vanity, who are not aſham'd to pretend to be throughly vers'd in ſuch Books, as it is ſo evident you have never look'd into, nor ſo much as ſeen. And that Clauſe in the Coronation Oath, which ſuch a brazen-fac'd Brawler as you call fictitious, The King's Friends, you ſay your ſelf, acknowledg that it may poſſibly be extant in ſome Ancient Copies, but that it grew into diſuſe, becauſe it had no convenient ſignification. But for that very reaſon, did our Anceſtors inſert it in the Oath, that the Oath might have ſuch a ſignification as would not be for a Tyrant's conveniency. If it had really grown into diſuſe, which yet is moſt falſe, there was the greater need of reviving it; but even that would have been to no purpoſe, according to your Doctrine: For that Cuſtom of taking an Oath, as Kings now-adays generally uſe it, is no more, you ſay, than a bare Ceremony. And yet the King, when the Biſhops were to be put down, pretended that he could not do it by reaſon of that Oath. And conſequently, that reverend and ſacred Oath, as it ſerves for the Kings turn, or not, muſt be ſolemn and binding, or an empty Ceremony: Which I earneſtly entreat my Country-men to take notice of, and to conſider what manner of a King they are like to have, if he ever come back. For it would never have entred into the thoughts of this Raſcally foreign Grammarian to write a Diſcourſe of the Rights of the Crown of England, unleſs both Charles Stuart now in Baniſhment, and tainted with his Fathers Principles, and thoſe Profligate Tutors that he has along with him, had induſtriouſly ſuggeſted to him what they would have writ. They dictated to him, That the whole Parliament were liable to be proceeded againſt as Traitors, becauſe they declar'd without the Kings Aſſent all them to be Traitors, who had taken up Arms againſt the Parliament of England; and that Parliaments were but the King's Vaſſals: That the Oath which our Kings take at their Coronation, is but a Ceremony: And why not that a Vaſſal too? So that no reverence of Laws, no ſacredneſs of an Oath, will be ſufficient to protect your Lives and Fortunes, either from the Exorbitance of a furious, or the Revenge of an exaſperated Prince, who has been ſo inſtructed from his Cradle, as to think Laws, Religion, nay, and Oaths themſelves ought to be ſubject to his Will and Pleaſure. How much better is it, and more becoming your ſelves, if you deſire Riches, Liberty, Peace, and Empire, to obtain them aſſuredly by your own Vertue, Induſtry, Prudence and Valour, than to long after, and hope for them in vain under the Rule of a King? They, who are of opinion that theſe things cannot be compaſs'd but under a King, and a Lord; it cannot well be expreſſed how mean, how baſe, I do not ſay, how unworthy thoughts they have of themſelves; for in effect, what do they other than confeſs, that they themſelves are lazy, weak, ſenſeleſs, ſilly Perſons, and fram'd for Slavery both in Body and Mind? And indeed all manner of Slavery is ſcandalous and diſgraceful to a freeborn ingenious Perſon; but for you, after you have recovered your loſt Liberty, by God's Aſſiſtance, and your own Arms; after the performance of ſo many valiant Exploits, and the making ſo remarkable an Example of a moſt Potent King, to deſire to return again into a Condition of Bondage and Slavery, will not only be ſcandalous and diſgraceful, but an impious and wicked thing; and equal to that of the Iſraelites, who for deſiring to return to the Egyptian Slavery, were ſo ſeverely puniſh'd for that ſordid, ſlaviſh Temper of mind, and ſo many of them deſtroy'd by that God, who had been their Deliverer. But what ſay you now, who would perſwade us to become Slaves? The King, ſay you, had a Power of pardoning ſuch as were guilty of Treaſon, and other Crimes; which evinces ſufficiently that the King himſelf was under no Law. The King might indeed pardon Treaſon, not againſt the Kingdom, but againſt himſelf; and ſo may any body elſe pardon wrongs done to themſelves; and he might, perhaps, pardon ſome other Offences, tho not always; but does it follow, becauſe in ſome Caſes he had the Right of ſaving a Malefactor's life, that therefore he muſt have a Right to deſtroy all good Men? If the King be impleaded in an inferior Court, he is not obliged to anſwer, but by his Attorney: Does it therefore follow, that when he is ſummon'd by all his Subjects to appear in Parliament, he may chuſe whether he will appear or no, and refuſe to anſwer in Perſon? You ſay, That we endeavour to juſtify what we have done by the Hollanders Example; and upon this occaſion, fearing the loſs of that Stipend with which the Hollanders feed ſuch a Murrain and Peſt as you are, if by reviling the Engliſh, you ſhould conſequentially reflect upon them that maintain you, you endeavour to demonſtrate how unlike their Actions and ours are. The Compariſon that you make betwixt them, I reſolve to omit (tho many things in it are moſt falſe, and other things flattery all over, which yet you thought your ſelf obliged to put down, to deſerve your Penſion.) For the Engliſh think they need not alledg the Examples of Foreigners for their Juſtification. They have Municipal Laws of their own, by which they have acted; Laws with relation to the matter in hand, the beſt in the World: They have the Examples of their Anceſtors, great and gallant Men, for their imitation, who never gave way to the Exorbitant Power of Princes, and who have put many of them to death, when their Government became inſupportable. They were born free, they ſtand in need of no other Nation, they can make what Laws they pleaſe for their own good Government. One Law in particular they have a great veneration for, and a very Ancient one it is, enacted by Nature it ſelf, That all Human Laws, all Civil Right and Government muſt have a reſpect to the ſafety and welfare of good Men, and not be ſubject to the Luſts of Princes. From hence to the end of your Book, I find nothing but Rubbiſh and Trifles, pick'd out of the former Chapters; of which you have here raiſed ſo great a heap, that I cannot imagine what other deſign you could have in it, than to preſage the ruin of your whole Fabrick. At laſt, after an infinite deal of tittle tattle you make an end, calling God to witneſs, that you undertook the defence of this Cauſe, not only becauſe you were deſired ſo to do, but becauſe your own Conſcience told you, that you could not poſſibly undertake the Defence of a better. Is it fit for you to intermeddle with our matters, with which you have nothing to do, becauſe you were deſired, when we our ſelves did not deſire you? to reproach with contumelious and opprobrious Language, and in a Printed Book, the Supreme Magiſtracy of the Engliſh Nation, when according to the authority and power that they are entruſted with, they do but their duty within their own Juriſdiction, and all this without the leaſt injury or provocation from them? (for they did not ſo much as know that there was ſuch a man in the world as you.) And I pray by whom were you deſired? By your Wife, I ſuppoſe, who, they ſay, exerciſes a Kingly Right and Juriſdiction over you; and whenever ſhe has a mind to it (as Fulvia is made to ſpeak in that obſcene Epigram, that you collected ſome Centoes out of, Pag. 320.) cries, Either write, or let's fight; That made you write perhaps, leſt the Signal ſhould be given. Or were you asked by Charles the Younger, and that profligate Gang of Vagabond Courtiers, and like a ſecond Balaam call'd upon by another Balak to reſtore a deſperate Cauſe by ill writing, that was loſt by ill fighting? That may be; but there's this difference, for he was a wiſe underſtanding man, and rid upon an Aſs that could ſpeak, to curſe the People of God: Thou art a very talkative Aſs thy ſelf, and rid by a Woman, and being ſurrounded with the healed heads of the Biſhops that heretofore thou hadſt wounded, thou ſeem'ſt to repreſent that Beaſt in the Revelation. But they ſay that a little after you had written this Book, you repented of what you had done. 'Tis well if it be ſo; and to make your repentance publick, I think the beſt courſe that you can take will be, for this long Book that you have writ, to take a Halter, and make one long Letter of your ſelf. So Judas Iſcariot repented, to whom you are like; and that young Charles knew, which made him ſend you the Purſe, Judas his Badg; for he had heard before, and found afterward by experience, that you were an Apoſtate and a Devil. Judas betray'd Chriſt himſelf, and you betray his Church; you have taught heretofore that Biſhops were Antichriſtian, and you are now revolted to their Party. You now undertake the Defence of their Cauſe, whom formerly you damn'd to the pit of Hell. Chriſt delivered all men from Bondage, and you endeavour to enſlave all Mankind. Never queſtion, ſince you have been ſuch

a Villain to God himſelf, his Church, and all Mankind in general, but that the ſame fate attends you that befel your equal, out of deſpair rather than repentance, to be weary of your life, and hang your ſelf, and burſt aſunder as he did; and to ſend before-hand that faithleſs and treacherous Conſcience of yours, that railing Conſcience at good and holy men, to that place of torment that's prepared for you. And now I think, through God's aſſiſtance, I have finiſhed the Work I undertook, to wit, the defence of the Noble Actions of my Country-men at home and abroad, againſt the raging and envious madneſs of this diſtracted Sophiſter; and the aſſerting of the common Rights of the People againſt the unjuſt domination of Kings, not out of any hatred to Kings, but Tyrants: Nor have I purpoſely left unanſwered any one argument alledged by my adverſary, nor any one example or authority quoted by him, that ſeem'd to have any force in it, or the leaſt colour of an argument. Perhaps I have been guilty rather of the other extreme, of replying to ſome of his fooleries and trifles, as if they were ſolid arguments, and thereby may ſeem to have attributed more to them than they deſerved. One thing yet remains to be done, which perhaps is of the greateſt concern of all, and that is, That you, my Country-men, refute this adverſary of yours your ſelves; which I do not ſee any other means of your effecting, than by a conſtant endeavour to outdo all mens bad words by your own good deeds. When you laboured under more ſorts of oppreſſion than one, you betook your ſelves to God for refuge, and he was graciouſly pleaſed to hear your moſt earneſt Prayers and Deſires. He has gloriouſly delivered you the firſt of Nations, from the two greateſt miſchiefs of this life, and moſt pernicious to Vertue, Tyranny and Superſtition; he has endued you with greatneſs of mind to be firſt of Mankind, who after having conquered their own King, and having had him delivered into their hands, have not ſcrupled to condemn him judicially, and purſuant to that Sentence of Condemnation, to put him to death. After the performing ſo glorious an Action as this, you ought to do nothing that's mean and little, not ſo much as to think of, much leſs to do any thing but what is great and ſublime. Which to attain to, this is your only way; as you have ſubdued your Enemies in Field, ſo to make appear, that unarmed, and in the higheſt outward Peace and Tranquillity, you of all Mankind are beſt able to ſubdue Ambition, Avarice, the love of Riches, and can beſt avoid the corruptions that Proſperity is apt to introduce, (which generally ſubdue and triumph over other Nations) to ſhow as great Juſtice, Temperance and Moderation in the maintaining your Liberty, as you have ſhown Courage in freeing your ſelves from Slavery. Theſe are the only Arguments by which you will be able to evince that you are not ſuch Perſons as this Fellow repreſents you, Traitors, Robbers, Murderers, Parricides, Madmen; that you did not put your King to death out of any ambitious deſign, or a deſire of invading the Rights of others, not out of any ſeditious Principles or ſiniſter Ends; that it was not an act of Fury or Madneſs; but that it was wholly out of love to your Liberty, your Religion, to Juſtice, Vertue, and your Countrey, that you puniſhed a Tyrant. But if it ſhould fall out otherwiſe (which God forbid) if as you have been valiant in War, you ſhould grow debauch'd in Peace, you that have had ſuch viſible demonſtrations of the Goodneſs of God to your ſelves, and his Wrath againſt your Enemies; and that you ſhould not have learned by ſo eminent, ſo remarkable an Example before your Eyes, to fear God, and work Righteouſneſs; for my part, I ſhall eaſily grant and confeſs (for I cannot deny it) whatever ill men may ſpeak or think of you, to be very true. And you will find in a little time, that God's Diſpleaſure againſt you, will be greater than it has been againſt your Adverſaries, greater than his Grace and Favour has been to your ſelves, which you have had larger experience of, than any other Nation under Heaven.

The Senate and People of England, to the moſt Noble Senate of the City of Hamborough.

FOR how long a Series of paſt Years, and for what important Reaſons the Friendſhip enter'd into by our Anceſtors with your moſt Noble City, has continu'd to this day, we both willingly acknowledg, together with your ſelves; nor is it a thing diſpleaſing to us, frequently alſo to call to our remembrance. But as to what we underſtand by your Letters dated the 25*th* of June, that ſome of our People deal not with that Fidelity and Probity, as they were wont to do in their Trading and Commerce among ye; we preſently referr'd it to the Conſideration of certain Perſons well skill'd in thoſe matters, to the end they might make a more ſtrict enquiry into the Frauds of the Clothiers and other Artificers of the Woolen Manufacture. And we farther promiſe to take ſuch effectual care, as to make you ſenſible of our unalterable Intentions, to preſerve ſincerity and juſtice among our ſelves, as alſo never to neglect any good Offices of our kindneſs that may redound to the welfare of your Commonwealth. On the other hand, there is ſomething likewiſe which we not only require, but which Equity it ſelf, and all the Laws of God and Man demand of your ſelves, That you will not only conſerve inviolable to the Merchants of our Nation their Privileges, but by your Authority and Power defend and protect their Lives and Eſtates, as it becomes your City to do. Which as we moſt earneſtly deſir'd in our former Letters; ſo upon the repeated Complaints of our Merchants that are daily made before us, we now more earneſtly ſolicite and requeſt it: they complaining, That their ſafety, and all that they have in the World, is again in great jeopardy among ye. For although they acknowledg themſelves to have reap'd ſome Benefit for a ſhort time of our former Letters ſent you, and to have had ſome reſpite from the Injuries of a ſort of profligate People; yet ſince the coming of the ſame Coc—m to your City (of whom we complain'd before) who pretends to be honour'd with a ſort of Embaſſy from —— the Son of the lately deceas'd King, they have been aſſaulted with all manner of ill Language, Threats, and naked Swords of Ruffians and Homicides, and have wanted your accuſtom'd Protection and Defence; inſomuch, that when two or three of the Merchants, together with the Preſident of the Society, were hurry'd away by ſurprize aboard a certain Privateer, and that the reſt implor'd your Aid, yet they could not obtain any Aſſiſtance from you, till the Merchants themſelves were forc'd to embody their own ſtrength, and reſcue from the hands of Pirates the Perſons ſeiz'd on in that River, of which your City is the Miſtreſs, not without extream hazard of their Lives. Nay, when they had fortunately brought 'em home again, and as it were by force of Arms recover'd 'em from an ignominious Captivity, and carry'd the Pirates themſelves into Cuſtody; we are inform'd that Coc—m was ſo audacious as to demand the releaſe of the Pirates, and that the Merchants might be deliver'd Priſoners into his hands. We therefore again, and again, beſeech and adjure ye, if it be your intention that Contracts and Leagues, and the very antient Commerce between both Nations ſhould be preſerv'd, the thing which you deſire, That our People may be able to aſſure themſelves of ſome certain and firm ſupport and reliance upon your Word, your Prudence and Authority; that you would lend 'em a favourable Audience concerning theſe matters, and that you would inflict deſerved Puniſhment as well upon Coc—m, and the reſt of his Accomplices in that wicked act, as upon thoſe who lately aſſaulted the Preacher, hitherto unpuniſh'd, or command 'em to depart your Territories; nor that you would believe that expell'd and exil'd Tarquins are to be prefer'd before the Friendſhip, and the Wealth, and Power of our Republick. For if you do not carefully provide to the contrary, but that the enemies of our Republick ſhall preſume to think lawful the committing of any Violences againſt us in your City, how unſafe, how ignominious the Reſidence of our People there will be, do you conſider with your ſelves. Theſe things we recommend to your Prudence and Equity, your ſelves to the Protection of Heaven.

To the Senate of Hamborough.

YOUR conſpicuous Favour in the doubtful Condition of our Affairs, is now the reaſon, that after Victory and proſperous Succeſs, we can no longer queſtion your good Will and friendly Inclination towards us. As for our parts, the War being almoſt now determin'd, and our Enemies every where vanquiſh'd, we have deem'd nothing more juſt, or more conducing to the firm Eſtabliſhment of the Republick, then that they who by our means (the Almighty being always our Captain and Conductor) have either recover'd their Liberty, or obtain'd their Lives and Fortunes, after the pernicious Ravages of a Civil War, of our free Gift and Grace, ſhould teſtify and pay in exchange to their Magiſtrates Allegiance and Duty in a ſolemn manner, if need requir'd: More eſpecially when ſo many turbulent and exaſperated Perſons, more then once receiv'd into Protection, will make no end, either at home or abroad, of acting perfidiouſly, and raiſing new Diſturbances. To that purpoſe we took care to enjoin a certain form of an Oath, by which all who held any Office in the Common-wealth, or being fortify'd with the Protection of the Law, enjoy'd both Safety, Eaſe, and all other conveniencies of Life, ſhould bind themſelves to Obedience in words preſcrib'd. This we alſo thought proper to be ſent to all Colonies abroad, or where-ever elſe our People reſided for the convenience of Trade; to the end that the Fidelity of thoſe over whom we are ſet, might be prov'd and known to us as it is but reaſonable and neceſſary. Which makes us wonder ſo much the more at what our Merchants write from your City, that they are not permitted to execute our Commands by ſome or other of your Order and Degree. Certainly what the moſt Potent United Provinces of the Low Countries, moſt jealous of their Power and their Intereſts, never thought any way belonging to their inſpection, namely whether the Engliſh Foreigners ſwore Fidelity and Allegiance to their Magiſtrates at home, either in theſe or thoſe Words, how that ſhould come to be ſo ſuſpected and troubleſom to your City, we muſt plainly acknowledg that we do not underſtand. But this proceeding from the private inclinations or fears of ſome, whom certain Vagabond Scots, expell'd their Country, are ſaid to have enforc'd by Menaces, on purpoſe to deter our Merchants from ſwearing Fidelity to us, we impute not to your City. Moſt earneſtly therefore we intreat and conjure ye (for it is not now the intereſt of Trade, but the honour of the Republick it ſelf that lies at ſtake) not to ſuffer any one among ye, who can have no reaſon to concern himſelf in this Affair, to interpoſe his Authority, whatever it be, with that Supremacy which we challenge over our own Subjects, not by the judgment and opinion of Foreigners, but by the Laws of our Country; for who would not take it amiſs, if we ſhould forbid your Hamburgers, reſiding here, to ſwear Fidelity to you that are their Magiſtrates at Home? Farewel.

Jan. 4. 1649.

To the moſt Serene and Potent Prince Philip the Fourth, King of Spain.
The Parliament of the Commonwealth of England, Greeting.

WE ſend to your Majeſty Anthony Aſcham, a perſon of Integrity, Learned, and deſcended of an ancient Family, to treat of matters very advantageous, as we hope, as well to the Spaniſh, as to the Engliſh Nation. Wherefore in friendly manner, we deſire that you would be pleas'd to grant, and order him a Safe and Honourable Paſſage to your Royal City, and the ſame in his return from thence, readily prepar'd to repay the kindneſs when occaſion offers. Or if your Majeſty be otherwiſe inclin'd, that it may be ſignify'd to him with the ſooneſt, what your Pleaſure is in this particular, and that he may be at liberty to depart without moleſtation.

To the moſt Serene and Potent Prince, Philip the Fourth, King of Spain.
The Parliament of the Commonwealth of England, Greeting.

WHAT is the Condition of our Affairs, and by what heinous Injuries provok'd and broken, at length we began to think of recovering our Liberty by force of Arms; what conſtituted form of Government we now make uſe of, can neither be conceal'd from your Majeſty, nor any other Perſon who has but caſt an impartial Eye upon our Writings publiſh'd on theſe Occaſions. Neither ought we to think it a difficult thing, among fit and proper judges of things, to render our Fidelity, our Equity, and Patience, manifeſt to all men, and juſtly meriting their Approbation; as alſo to defend our Authority, Honour, and Grandeur, againſt the infamous Tongues of Exiles and Fugitives. Now then, as to what is more the concern of foreign Nations, after having ſubdu'd and vanquiſh'd the Enemies of our Country through the miraculous Aſſiſtance of Heaven, we openly and cordially profeſs our ſelves readily prepar'd to have Peace and Friendſhip, more deſirable than all enlargement of Empire, with our Neighbour Nations. For theſe reaſons we have ſent into Spain to your Majeſty, Anthony Aſcham, of approv'd Dexterity and Probity, to treat with your Majeſty concerning Friendſhip, and the accuſtom'd Commerce between both Nations; or elſe, if it be your Pleaſure, to open a way for the ratifying of new Articles and Alliances. Our Requeſt therefore is, that you will grant him free Liberty of Acceſs to your Majeſty, and give ſuch Order that care may be taken of his Safety and Honour, while he reſides a Publick Miniſter with your Majeſty; to the end he may freely propoſe what he has in charge from us, for the Benefit, as we hope, of both Nations; and certify to us with the ſooneſt, what are your Majeſty's ſentiments concerning theſe matters.

To the moſt Serene Prince, John the Fourth, King of Portugal. The Parliament of the Commonwealth of England, Greeting.

AFTER we had ſuffer'd many, and thoſe the utmoſt Miſchiefs of a faithleſs Peace, and inteſtine War, Our being reduc'd to thoſe Exigencies, that if we had any regard to the ſafety of the Republick, there was a neceſſity of altering for the chiefeſt part the form of Government, is a thing which we make no queſtion is well known to your Majeſty, by what we have both publickly written and declar'd in juſtification of our Proceedings. To which, as it is but reaſon, if credit might be rather given than to the moſt malicious Calumnies of looſe and wicked men; perhaps we ſhould find thoſe Perſons more amicably inclin'd, who now abroad have the worſt ſentiments of our Actions. For as to what we juſtify our ſelves to have juſtly and ſtrenuouſly perform'd after the Example of our Anceſtors, in purſuance of our Rights, and for recovery of the native Liberty of Engliſhmen, certainly it is not the work of Human force or wit to eradicate the perverſe and obſtinate Opinions of People wickedly inclin'd concerning what we have done. But after all, in reference to what is common to us with all foreign Nations, and more for the general Intereſt on both ſides, we are willing to let the World know, that there is nothing which we more ardently deſire, than that the Friendſhip and Commerce which our People have been accuſtom'd to maintain with all our Neighbours, ſhould be enlarg'd and ſettled in the moſt ample and ſolemn manner. And whereas our People have always driven a very great Trade, and gainful to both Nations, in your Kingdom; we ſhall take care, as much as in us lies, that they may not meet with any Impediment to interrupt their dealings. However, we foreſee that all our Induſtry will be in vain, if, as it is reported, the Pyrates and Revolters of our Nation ſhall be ſuffer'd to have refuge in your Ports, and after they have taken and plunder'd the laden Veſſels of the Engliſh, ſhall be permitted to ſell their Goods by publick Outcries at Liſbon. To the end therefore that a more ſpeedy Remedy may be apply'd to this growing Miſchief, and that we may be more clearly ſatisfy'd concerning the Peace which we deſire, we have ſent to Your Majeſty the moſt noble Charles Vane, under the Character of our Agent, with Inſtructions and a Commiſſion, a plenary Teſtimonial of the Truſt we have repoſ'd, and the Employment we have conferr'd upon him. Him therefore we moſt earneſtly deſire your Majeſty graciouſly to hear, to give him Credit, and to take ſuch Order that he may be ſafe in his Perſon and his Honour, within the bounds of your Dominions. Theſe things, as they will be moſt acceptable to us, ſo we promiſe, whenever occaſion offers, that the ſame Offices of kindneſs to your Majeſty ſhall be mutually obſerv'd on all our parts.

Weſtminſter, Feb. 4. 1649.

To the moſt Serene Prince, John the Fourth, King of Portugal. The Parliament of the Commonwealth of England, Greeting.

ALmoſt daily and moſt grievous Complaints are brought before us, that certain of our Seamen and Officers who revolted from us the laſt Year, and treacherouſly and wickedly carry'd away the Ships with the Command of which they were entruſted, and who having made their eſcape from the Port of Ireland, where being blockt up for almoſt a whole Summer together, they very narrowly avoided the Puniſhment due to their Crimes, have now betaken themſelves to the Coaſt of Portugal, and the mouth of the River Tagus; that there they practiſe furious Piracy, taking and plundering all the Engliſh Veſſels they meet with ſailing to and fro upon the account of Trade; and that all the adjoining Seas are become almoſt impaſſable by reaſon of their notorious and infamous Robberies. To which increaſing Miſchief, unleſs a ſpeedy Remedy be apply'd, who does not ſee but that there will be a final end of that vaſt Trade ſo gainful to both Nations, which our People were wont to drive with the Portugueſes? Wherefore we again and again requeſt Your Majeſty, that you will command thoſe Pyrates and Revolters to depart the Territories of Portugal: And that if any pretended Embaſſadors preſent themſelves from * that you will not vouchſafe to give them Audience; but that you will rather acknowledg us, upon whom the Supream Power of England, by the conſpicuous Favour and Aſſiſtance of the Almighty, is devolv'd; and that the Ports and Rivers of Portugal, may not be bar'd and defended againſt your Friends and Confederates Fleet, no leſs ſerviceable to your Emolument, than the Trade of the Engliſh.

To Philip the Fourth, King of Spain.

HOw heinouſly, and with what Deteſtation your Majeſty reſented the villanous Murder of our Agent, Anthony Aſcham, and what has hitherto been done in the proſecution and puniſhment of his Aſſaſſinates, we have been given to underſtand, as well by your Majeſty's own Letters, as from your Embaſſador Don Alphonſo de Cardenos. Nevertheleſs, ſo often as we conſider the horridneſs of that bloody Fact, which utterly ſubverts the very Foundations of Correſpondence and Commerce, and of the Privilege of Embaſſadors, moſt ſacred among all Nations, ſo villanouſly violated without ſeverity of Puniſhment, We cannot but with utmoſt importunity repeat our moſt urgent ſuit to your Majeſty, That thoſe Parricides may with all the ſpeed imaginable be brought to Juſtice, and that you would not ſuffer their merited Pains to be ſuſpended any longer by any delay or pretence of Religion. For tho moſt certainly we highly value the Friendſhip of a Potent Prince; yet it behoves us to uſe our utmoſt endeavours, that the Authors of ſuch an enormous Parricide ſhould receive the deſerved Reward of their Impiety. Indeed, we cannot but with a grateful Mind acknowledg that Civility, of which by your Command, our People were not unſenſible, as alſo your ſurpaſſing Affection for us, which lately your Embaſſador at large unfolded to us: Nor will it be diſpleaſing to us to return the ſame good Offices to your Majeſty, and the Spaniſh Nation, whenever opportunity offers. Nevertheleſs, if Juſtice be not ſatisfy'd without delay, which we ſtill moſt earneſtly requeſt, we ſee not upon what foundations a ſincere and laſting Friendſhip can ſubſiſt. For the preſervation of which, however, we ſhall omit no juſt and laudable occaſion; to which purpoſe we are likewiſe apt to believe that the preſence of your Embaſſador does not a little conduce.

To the Spaniſh Embaſſador.

Moſt Excellent Lord,

THe Council of State, ſo ſoon as their weighty Affairs would permit 'em, having carried into Parlament the four Writings, which it pleas'd your Excellency to impart to the Council upon the 19th of December laſt, have receiv'd in Command from the Parlament to return this Anſwer to the firſt Head of thoſe Writings, touching the villanous Aſſaſſinates of their late Agent, Anthony Aſcham.

The Parlament have ſo long time, ſo often, and ſo juſtly demanded their being brought to deſerved Puniſhment, that there needs nothing further to be ſaid on a thing of ſo great importance, wherein (as your Excellency well obſerv'd) his Royal Majeſty's Authority it ſelf is ſo deeply concern'd, that unleſs Juſtice be done upon ſuch notorious Offenders, all the foundations of Human Society, all the ways of preſerving Friendſhip among Nations, of neceſſity muſt be overturn'd and aboliſh'd. Nor can we apprehend by any Argument drawn from Religion, that the Blood of the Innocent, ſhed by a propenſely malicious Murder, is not to be aveng'd. The Parlament therefore once more moſt urgently preſſes, and expects from his Royal Majeſty, according to their firſt Demands, That Satisfaction be given 'em effectually, and ſincerely in this matter.

To the moſt Serene Prince Leopold, Archduke of Auſtria, Governor of the Spaniſh Low Countries, under King Philip.

SO ſoon as word was brought us, not without a moſt grievous Complaint, that Jane Puckering, an Heireſs of an illuſtrious and opulent Family, while yet by reaſon of her Age, ſhe was under Guardians, not far from the Houſe wherein ſhe then liv'd at Greenwich, was violently forc'd from the Hands and Embraces of her Attendants; and of a ſudden in a Veſſel to that purpoſe ready prepar'd, carri'd off into Flanders by the Treachery of one Walſh, who has endeavour'd all the ways imaginable, in contempt of Law both Human and Divine, to conſtrain a wealthy Virgin to Marriage, even by terrifying her with menaces of preſent Death. We deeming it proper to apply ſome ſpeedy Remedy to ſo enormous and unheard-of piece of Villany, gave order to ſome Perſons to treat with the Governours of Newport and Oſtend (for the unfortunate Captive was ſaid to be landed in one of thoſe two places) about reſcuing the free-born Lady out of the Hands of the Raviſher. Who, both out of their ſingular Humanity and love of Vertue, lent their aſſiſting Aid to the young Virgin in ſervitude, and by down-right Robbery riff'd from her Habitation: So that to avoid the violence of her imperious Maſters, ſhe was as it were depoſited in a Nunnery, and committed to the charge of the Governeſs of the Society. Wherefore the ſame Walſh to get her again into his Clutches, has commenc'd a Suit againſt her in the Eccleſiaſtical Court of the Biſhop of Tyre, pretending a Matrimonial Contract between him and her. Now in regard that both the Raviſher and the Raviſh'd Perſon, are Natives of our Country, as by the Witneſſes upon their Oaths abundantly appears; as alſo for that the ſplendid Inheritance after which moſt certainly the Criminal chiefly gapes, lies within our Territories; ſo that we conceive that the whole cognizance and determination of this Cauſe belongs ſolely to our ſelves: Therefore let him repair hither, he who calls himſelf the Husband, here let him commence his Suit, and demand the delivery of the Perſon whom he claims for his Wife. In the mean time, this it is that we moſt earneſtly requeſt from your Highneſs, which is no more then what we have already requeſted by our Agent reſiding at Bruſſels, that you will permit an afflicted and many ways miſus'd Virgin, born of honeſt Parents, but pyrated out of her Native Country, to return, as far as lies in your Power, with freedom and ſafety home again. This not only We upon all opportunities offer'd, as readily prepar'd to return the ſame Favour and Kindneſs to your Highneſs, but alſo Humanity it ſelf, and that ſame hatred of Infamy, which ought to accompany all Perſons of Vertue and Courage in defending the Honour of the Female Sex, ſeem altogether jointly to require at your hands.

Weſtminſter, March 28. 1650.

To the moſt Serene Prime, John the Fourth, King of Portugal.

UNderſtanding that Your Majeſty had both honourably receiv'd our Agent, and immediately given him a favourable Audience, we thought it became us to aſſure your Majeſty without delay, by ſpeedy Letters from us, that nothing could happen more acceptable to us, and that there is nothing which we have decreed more ſacred, than not to violate by any word or deed of ours, not firſt provok'd, the Peace, the Friendſhip and Commerce, now for ſome time ſettl'd between us and the greateſt number of other Foreign Nations, and amongſt the reſt with the Portugueſes. Nor did we ſend the Engliſh Fleet to the mouth of the River Tagus with any other intention or deſign, then in purſuit of Enemies ſo often put to flight, and for recovery of our Veſſels, which being carry'd away from their Owners by Force and Treachery, the ſame Rabble of Fugitives conducted to your Coaſts, and even to Lisbon it ſelf, as to the moſt certain Fairs for the ſale of their Plunder. But we are apt to believe that by this time almoſt all the Portugueſes are abundantly convinc'd, from the flagitious manners of thoſe People, of their Audaciouſneſs, their Fury and their Madneſs. Which is the reaſon we are in hopes that we ſhall more eaſily obtain from your Majeſty, Firſt, That you will, as far as in you lies, be aſſiſtant to the moſt illuſtrious Edward Popham, whom we have made Admiral of our new Fleet, for the ſubduing thoſe deteſted Freebooters, and that you will no longer ſuffer 'em, together with their Captain, not Gueſts, but Pyrats, not Merchants, but the Peſts of Commerce, and Violaters of the Law of Nations, to harbour in the Ports and under the ſhelter of the Fortreſſes of your Kingdom; but that where-ever the Confines of Portugal extend themſelves, you will command 'em to expell'd as well by Land as by Sea. Or if you are unwilling to proceed to that extremity, at leaſt that with your leave it may be lawful for us with our proper Forces to aſſail our own Revolters and Sea-Robbers; and if it be the pleaſure of Heaven, to reduce 'em into our Power. This, as we have earneſtly deſired in our former Letters, ſo now again with the greateſt ardency and importunity we requeſt of your Majeſty. By this, whether Equity, or act of Kindneſs, you will not only enlarge the fame of your Juſtice over all well govern'd and civil Nations, but alſo in a greater meaſure bind both us and the People of England, who never yet had other than a good opinion of the Portugueſes, to your ſelf and to your Subjects. Farewel.

Weſtminſter, 27 April, 1650.

To the Hamburghers.

MOre then once we have written concerning the Controverſies of the Merchants, and ſome other things which more nearly concern the Dignity of our Republick, yet no Anſwer has been return'd. But underſtanding that Affairs of that nature can hardly be determin'd by Letters only, and that in the mean time certain ſeditious Perſons have been ſent to your City by * authoriz'd with no other Commiſſion than that of Malice and Audaciouſneſs, who make it their buſineſs utterly to extirpate the ancient Trade of our People in your City, eſpecially of thoſe whoſe fidelity to their Country is moſt conſpicuous; therefore we have commanded the worthy and moſt eminent Richard Bradſhaw to reſide as our Agent among ye, to the end he may be able more at large to treat and negotiate with your Lordſhips ſuch Matters and Affairs, as are interwoven with the Benefit and Advantages of both Republicks. Him therefore we requeſt ye, with the ſooneſt to admit to a favourable Audience; and that in all things that Credit may be given to him, that Honour paid him, as as is uſual in all Countries, and among all Nations paid to thoſe that bear his Character. Farewel.

Weſtminſter, April 2. 1650.

---

To the Hamburghers.

Moſt Noble, Magnificent, and Illuſtrious, our deareſt Friends;

THat your Sedulities in the Reception of our Agent were ſo cordial and ſo egregious, we both gladly underſtand, and earneſtly exhort ye that you would perſevere in your good Will and Affection toward us. And this we do with ſo much the greater vehemence, as being inform'd that the ſame Exiles of ours, concerning whom we have ſo frequently written, now carry themſelves more inſolently in your City than they were wont to do, and that they not only openly affront, but give out threatning language in a moſt deſpiteful manner againſt our Reſident. Therefore once more by theſe our Letters we would have the ſafety of his Perſon, and the Honour due to his Quality, recommended to your Care. On the other ſide, if you inflict ſevere and timely Puniſhment upon thoſe Fugitives and Ruffians, as well the old ones as the new comers, it will be moſt acceptable to us, and becoming your Authority and Prudence.

Weſtminſter, May 31. 1650.

To Philip the Fourth, King of Spain.

TO our infinite ſorrow we are given to underſtand, That Anthony Aſcham, by us lately ſent our Agent to your Majeſty, and under that Character moſt civilly and publickly receiv'd by your Governours, upon his firſt coming to your Royal City, naked of all defence and guard, was moſt bloodily murder'd in a certain Inn, together with John Baptiſta de Ripa his Interpreter, butcher'd at the ſame time. Wherefore we moſt earneſtly requeſt your Majeſty, That deſerved Puniſhment may be ſpeedily inflicted upon thoſe Parricides already apprehended, as it is reported, and committed to cuſtody, who have not only preſum'd to wound our ſelves through his ſides, but have alſo dar'd to ſtab as it were to the very Heart, your Faith of Word and Royal Honour. So that we make no queſtion but what we ſo ardently deſire, would nevertheleſs be done effectually, by a Prince of his own accord ſo juſt and pious, though no body requir'd it. As to what remains we make it our farther ſuit, That the breathleſs Carcaſs may be deliver'd to his Friends and Attendants to be brought back and inter'd in his own Country, and that ſuch care may be taken for the ſecurity of thoſe that remain alive, as is but requiſite; till having obtain'd an Anſwer to theſe Letters, if it may be done, they ſhall return to us the Witneſſes of your Piety and Juſtice.

To the moſt Excellent Lord, Anthony John Lewis dela Cerda, Duke of Medina Celi, Governor of Andaluſia. The Council of State conſtituted by Authority of Parliament, Greeting.

WE have receiv'd Advice from thoſe moſt accompliſh'd Perſons, whom we lately ſent with our Fleet into Portugal in purſuit of Traitors, and for the recovery of our Veſſels, that they were moſt civilly receiv'd by your Excellency, as often as they happen'd to touch upon the Coaſt of Gallæcia, which is under your Government, and aſſiſted with all things neceſſary to thoſe that perform long Voyages. This Civility of yours, as it was always moſt acceptable to us, ſo it is now more eſpecially at this time, while we are ſenſible of the ill will of others in ſome places towards us without any juſt cauſe giv'n on our ſide: Therefore we make it our requeſt to your Illuſtrious Lordſhip, that you will perſevere in the ſame good Will and Affection to us, and that you would continue your Favour and Aſſiſtance to our People, according to your wonted Civility, as often as our Ships put in to your Harbours: and be aſſur'd that there is nothing which we deſire of your Lordſhip in the way of Kindneſs, which we ſhall not be ready to repay both to you and yours, whenever the like occaſion ſhall be offer'd us.

Seal'd with the Seal of the Council,

To the Illuſtrious and Magnificent Senate of the City of Dantzick.

Magnificent and moſt Noble Lords, our deareſt Friends;

MAny Letters are brought us from our Merchants trading upon the Coaſt of Boruſſia, wherein they complain of a grievous Tribute impos'd upon 'em in the Grand Council of the Polanders, enforcing 'em to pay the tenth part of all their Goods for the Relief of the King of Scots, our Enemy. Which in regard it is plainly contrary to the Law of Nations, that Gueſts and Strangers ſhould be dealt withal in ſuch a manner; and moſt unjuſt that they ſhould be compell'd to pay publick Stipends in a Foreign Commonwealth to him from whom they are, by God's Aſſiſtance, deliver'd at home; we make no queſtion but that out of reſpect to that Liberty, which as we underſtand you your ſelves enjoy, you will not ſuffer ſo heavy a Burden to be laid upon Merchants in your City, wherein they have maintain'd a continual Amity and Commerce, to the extraordinary Advantage of the place for many years together. If therefore you think it convenient to undertake the Protection of our Merchants trading among ye, which we aſſuredly expect as well from your Prudence and Equity, as from the Dignity and Grandeur of your City; We ſhall take that care, that you ſhall be ſenſible from time to time, of our grateful acceptance of your Kindneſs, as often as the Dantzichers ſhall have any dealings within our Territories, or their Ships, as frequently it happens, put into our Ports.

To the Portugal Agent.

Moſt Illuſtrious Lord,

WE receiv'd your Letters dated from Hampton the 15th of this Month, wherein you ſignify, That you are ſent by the King of Portugal to the Parlament of the Commonwealth of England; but ſay not under what Character, whether of Embaſſador, or Agent, or Envoy, which we would willingly underſtand by your Credential Letters from the King, a Copy of which you may ſend us with all the ſpeed you can. We would alſo further know, whether you come with a Plenary Commiſſion, to give us Satisfaction for the Injuries, and to make Reparation for the Damages which your King has done this Republick, protecting our Enemy all the laſt Summer in his Harbours, and prohibiting the Engliſh Fleet, then ready to aſſail Rebels and Fugitives, which our Admiral had purſu'd ſo far; but never reſtraining the Enemy from falling upon ours. If you return us word that you have ample and full Commiſſion to give us Satisfaction concerning all theſe Matters, and ſend us withal a Copy of your Recommendatory Letters, we ſhall then take care, that you may with all ſpeed repair to us upon the Publick Faith: At which time, when we have read the King's Letters, you ſhall have liberty freely to declare what further Commands you have brought along with you.

The Parlament of the Common-wealth of England, to the moſt Serene Prince D. Ferdinand, Grand Duke of Tuſcany, &c.

WE have receiv'd your Highneſs's Letters, dated April 22. 1651. and deliver'd to us by your Reſident, Signor Almerick Salvetti, wherein we readily perceive how greatly your Highneſs favours the Engliſh Name, and the Value you have for this Nation; which not only our Merchants, that for many Years have traded in your Ports, but alſo certain of our young Nobility, either travelling through your Cities, or reſiding there for the improvement of their Studies, both teſtify and confirm. Which as they are things moſt grateful and acceptable to us; we alſo on our parts make this Requeſt to your Highneſs, That your Serenity will perſevere in your accuſtom'd good Will and Affection towards our Merchants, and other Citizens of our Republick, travelling through the Tuſcan Territories. On the other ſide, we promiſe and undertake, as to what concerns the Parliament, That nothing ſhall be wanting which may any way conduce to the Confirmation and Eſtabliſhment of that Commerce and mutual Friendſhip that now has been of long continuance between both Nations, and which it is our earneſt wiſh and deſire ſhould be preſerv'd to perpetuity by all Offices of Humanity, Civility, and mutual Obſervance.

The Parlament of the Commonwealth of England, to the Illuſtrious and Magnificent Senate of the City of Hamborough.

Moſt Noble, Magnificent, and Illuſtrious, our deareſt Friends;

THE Parlament of the Commonwealth of England, out of their earneſt deſire to continue and preſerve the ancient Friendſhip and mutual Commerce between the Engliſh Nation and your City, not long ſince ſent thither Richard Bradſhaw Eſq; with the Character of our Reſident; and among other Inſtructions tending to the ſame purpoſe, gave him an expreſs Charge to demand Juſtice againſt certain Perſons within your Juriſdiction, who endeavour'd to murder the Preacher belonging to the Engliſh Society, and who likewiſe laid impious hands upon the Deputy-Preſident, and ſome of the principal Merchants of the ſame Company, and hurri'd 'em away aboard a Privateer. And although the aforeſaid Reſident, upon his firſt Reception and Audience, made known to your Lordſhips in a particular manner the Commands which he receiv'd from us; upon which it was expected that you would have made thoſe Criminals ere this a ſevere Example of your Juſtice: yet when we underſtood our Expectations were not anſwer'd, conſidering with our ſelves what danger both our People and their Eſtates were in, if ſufficient Proviſion were not made for their Security and Protection againſt the Malice of their Enemies, We again ſent Orders to our aforeſaid Reſident, to repreſent to your Lordſhips our Judgment upon the whole Matter; as alſo to exhort and perſwade ye, in the Name of this Republick, to be careful of preſerving the Friendſhip and Alliance contracted between this Commonwealth and your City, as alſo the Traffick and Commerce no leſs advantagious for the Intereſt of both; and to that end, that you would not fail to protect our Merchants, together with their Privileges, from all Violation, and more particularly againſt the Inſolencies of one Garmes, who has carry'd himſelf contumeliouſly toward this Republick, and publickly cited to the Chamber of Spire, certain Merchants of the Engliſh Company reſiding in your City, to the great contempt of this Commonwealth, and trouble of our Merchants; for which we expect ſuch Reparation, as ſhall be conſentaneous to Equity and Juſtice.

To treat of theſe Heads, and whatever elſe more largely belongs to the common Friendſhip of both Republicks, we have order'd our Reſident aforeſaid to attend your Lordſhips, requeſting that ample Credit may be given to him in ſuch Matters as he ſhall propoſe relating to theſe Affairs.

The Parlament of the Commonwealth of England, to the moſt Serene Chriſtiana, Queen of the Swedes, Goths and Vandals, &c. Greeting.

Moſt Serene Queen;

WE have receiv'd and read your Majeſty's Letters to the Parlament of England, dated from Stockholm the 26th of September laſt, and deliver'd by Peter Spering Silvercroon; and there is nothing which we more vehemently and cordially deſire, than that the ancient Peace, Traffick and Commerce of long continuance between the Engliſh and Swedes, may prove diuturnal, and every day encreaſe. Nor did we queſtion but that your Majeſty's Embaſſador was come amply inſtructed to make thoſe Propoſals chiefly which ſhould be moſt for the Intereſt and Honour of both Nations, and which we were no leſs readily prepar'd to have heard, and to have done effectually that which ſhould have been thought moſt ſecure and beneficial on both ſides. But it pleas'd the Supreme Moderator and Governour of all things, that before he had deſir'd to be heard as to thoſe Matters which he had in charge from your Majeſty to propound to the Parlament, he departed this Life, (whoſe loſs we took with that heavineſs and ſorrow, as became Perſons whom it no leſs behov'd to acquieſce in the Will of the Almighty) whence it comes to paſs that we are prevented hitherto from knowing your Majeſty's Pleaſure, and that there is a ſtop at preſent put to this Negotiation. Wherefore we thought we could do no leſs then by theſe our Letters, which we have given to our Meſſenger on purpoſe ſent with theſe unhappy Tydings, to ſignify to your Majeſty, how acceptable your Letters, how grateful your publick Miniſter were to the Parlament of the Commonwealth of England; as alſo how earneſtly we expect your Friendſhip, and how highly we ſhall value the Amity of ſo great a Princeſs; aſſuring your Majeſty, that we have thoſe Thoughts of encreaſing the Commerce between this Republick and your Majeſty's Kingdom, as we ought to have of a thing of the higheſt Importance, which for that reaſon will be moſt acceptable to the Parlament of the Commonwealth of England. And ſo we recommend your Majeſty to the protection of the Divine Providence.

The Parlament of the Commonwealth of England, to the moſt Serene and Potent Prince, Philip the Fourth, King of Spain, Greeting.

THE Merchants of this Commonwealth, who trade in your Majeſties Territories, make loud Complaints of extraordinary Violence and Injuries offer'd 'em, and of new Tributes impoſ'd upon 'em by the Governours and other Officers of your Ports and Places where they traffick, and particularly in the Canary Iſlands, and this againſt the Articles of the League ſolemnly ratifi'd by both Nations on the account of Trade; the truth of which Complaints they have confirm'd by Oath. And they make it out before us, that unleſs they can enjoy their Privileges, and that their Loſſes be repair'd; laſtly, That except they may have ſome certain Safeguard and Protection for themſelves and their Eſtates againſt thoſe Violences and Injuries, they can no longer traffick in thoſe Places. Which Complaints of theirs being duly weigh'd by us, and believing the unjuſt Proceedings of thoſe Miniſters, either not at all to have reach'd your Knowledg, or elſe to have been untruly repreſented to your Majeſty, we deem'd it convenient to ſend the Complaints themſelves, together with theſe our Letters, to your Majeſty. Nor do we queſtion but that your Majeſty, as well out of your love of Juſtice, as for the ſake of that Commerce no leſs gainful to your Subjects than our People, will command your Governours to deſiſt from thoſe unjuſt Oppreſſions of our Merchants, and ſo order it, that they may obtain ſpeedy Juſtice, and due Satisfaction for thoſe Injuries done 'em by Don Pedro de Carillo de Guzman, and others; and that your Majeſty will take care that the Merchants aforeſaid may reap the Fruit of thoſe Articles; and be ſo far under your Protection, that both their Perſons and their Eſtates may be ſecure and free from all manner of Injury and Vexation. And this they believe they ſhall for the greateſt part obtain, if your Majeſty will be pleas'd to reſtore 'em that Expedient, taken from 'em, of a Judg Conſervator, who may be able to defend 'em from a new Conſulſhip more uneaſie to 'em; leſt if no ſhelter from Injuſtice be allow'd 'em, there ſhould follow a neceſſity of breaking off that Commerce which has hitherto brought great Advantages to both Nations, while the Articles of the League are violated in ſuch a manner.

To the moſt Serene Prince, the Duke of Venice, and the moſt Illuſtrious Senate.

Moſt Serene Prince, moſt Illuſtrious Senate, our deareſt Friends;

CErtain of our Merchants, by name John Dickins, and Job Throkmorton, with others, have made their Complaints unto us, That upon the 28*th* of November 1651, having ſeiz'd upon a hundred Buts of Caveare in the Veſſel called the Swallow, riding in the Downs, Iſdac Taylour Maſter, which were their own proper Goods, and laden aboard the ſame Ship in the Muſcovite Bay of Archangel, and this by the Authority of our Court of Admiralty; in which Court, the Suit being there depending, they obtain'd a Decree for the delivery of the ſaid Buts of Caveare into their poſſeſſion, they having firſt given Security to abide by the Sentence of that Court: And that the ſaid Court, to the end the ſaid Suit might be brought to a Concluſion, having written Letters, according to cuſtom, to the Magiſtrates and Judges of Venice; wherein they requeſted liberty to cite John Piatti to appear by his Proctor in the Engliſh Court of Admiralty, where the Suit depended, and prove his Right: Nevertheleſs that the ſaid Piatti, and one David Rutts a Hollander, while this Cauſe depends here in our Court, put the ſaid John Dickins, and thoſe other Merchants, to a vaſt deal of trouble about the ſaid Caveare, and ſolicite the Seizure of their Goods and Eſtates as forfeited for Debt. All which things, and whatever elſe has hitherto been done in our foreſaid Court, is more at large ſet forth in thoſe Letters of Requeſt aforemention'd; which after we had view'd, we thought proper to be tranſmitted to the moſt Serene Republick of Venice, to the end they might be aſſiſtant to our Merchants in this Cauſe. Upon the whole, therefore, it is our earneſt Requeſt to your Highneſs, and the moſt Illuſtrious Senate, That not only thoſe Letters may obtain their due Force and Weight; but alſo that the Goods and Eſtates of the Merchants, which the foreſaid Piatti and David Rutts, have endeavour'd to make liable to Forfeiture, may be diſcharg'd; and that the ſaid Defendants may be referr'd hither to our Court, to try what Right they have in their Claim to this Caveare. Wherein your Highneſs, and the moſt Serene Republick will do as well what is moſt juſt in it ſelf, as what is truly becoming the ſpotleſs Amity between both Republicks: And laſtly, what will gratefnlly be recompenc'd by the good Will and kind Offices of this Republick, whenever Occaſion offers.

To the Spaniſh Embaſſador.

Moſt Excellent Lord,

THE Council of State, according to a Command from the Parlament, dated the 2*d* of March, having taken into ſerious deliberation your Excellencies Paper of the 15*th* of February, deliver'd to the Commiſſioners of this Council, wherein it ſeem'd good to your Excellency to propoſe that a Reply might be given to two certain Heads therein ſpecify'd as previous, returns the following Anſwer to your Excellency.

The Parlament when they gave an Anſwer to thoſe things which were propos'd by your Excellency at your firſt Audience, as alſo in thoſe Letters which they wrote to the moſt Serene King of Spain, gave real and ample Demonſtrations how grateful and how acceptable that Friendſhip and that mutual Alliance which was offer'd by his Royal Majeſty, and by your ſelf in his Name, would be to 'em; and how fully they were reſolv'd, as far as in them lay, to make the ſame Returns of Friendſhip and good Offices.

After that, it ſeem'd good to your Excellency, at your firſt Audience in Council upon the 19*th* of December Oldſtile, to propound to this Council, as a certain Ground or Method for an auſpicious Commencement of a ſtricter Amity, that ſome of their Body might be nominated, who might hear what your Excellency had to propoſe; and who having well weigh'd the benefit that might redound from thence, ſhould ſpeedily report the ſame to the Council. To which requeſt of yours that ſatisfaction might be given, the Council appointed certain of their number to attend your Excellency, which was done accordingly. But inſtead of thoſe things which were expected to have bin propounded, the Conference produc'd no more than the abovemention'd Paper: To which the Anſwer of the Council is this.

When the Parlament ſhall have declar'd their Minds, and your Excellency ſhall have made the Progreſs as above expected, we ſhall be ready to confer with your Excellency, and to treat of ſuch Matters as you ſhall propoſe in the Name of the King your Maſter, as well in reference to the Friendſhip already concluded, as the entring into another more ſtrict and binding; or as to any thing elſe which ſhall be offer'd by our ſelves in the Name of this Republick: And when we deſcend to Particulars, we ſhall return ſuch Anſwers as are moſt proper, and the Nature of the thing propos'd ſhall require.

The Parlament of the Common-wealth of England, to the moſt Serene Prince Frederick the Third, King of Denmark, &c. Greeting.

Moſt Serene and Potent King,

WE have receiv'd your Majeſty's Letters, dated from Copenhagen the 21*ſt* of December laſt, and deliver'd to the Parlament of the Commonwealth of England by the Noble Henry Willemſem Roſenwyng de Lynſacker, and moſt gladly perus'd 'em, with that affection of mind which the Matters therein propounded juſtly merit, and requeſt your Majeſty to be fully perſwaded of this, That the ſame Inclinations, the ſame Deſires of continuing and preſerving the ancient Friendſhip, Commerce, and Alliance for ſo many Years maintain'd between England and Denmark, which are in your Majeſty, are alſo in us. Not being ignorant, that though it has pleas'd Divine Providence, beholding this Nation with ſuch a benign and favourable Aſpect, to change for the better the receiv'd Form of the former Government among us; nevertheleſs, that the ſame Intereſts on both ſides, the ſame common Advantages, the ſame mutual Alliance and Free Traffick which produc'd the former Leagues and Confederacies between both Nations, ſtill endure and obtain their former Force and Virtue, and oblige both to make it their common ſtudy, by rendring thoſe Leagues the moſt beneficial that may be to each other, to eſtabliſh alſo a nearer and ſounder Friendſhip for the time to come. And if your Majeſty ſhall be pleas'd to purſue thoſe Counſels which are manifeſted in your Royal Letters, the Parlament will be ready to embrace the ſame with all Alacrity and Fidelity, and to contribute all thoſe things to the utmoſt of their power, which they ſhall think may conduce to that end. And they perſwade themſelves that your Majeſty for this reaſon, will take thoſe Counſels in reference to this Republick, which may facilitate the good ſucceſs of thoſe things propounded by your Majeſty to our ſelves ſo deſirous of your Amity. In the mean time the Parlament wiſhes all Happineſs and Proſperity to your Majeſty and People.

The Parlament of the Common-wealth of England, to the moſt Illuſtriou and Magnificent, the Proconſuls and Senators of the Hanſe-Towns, Greeting.

Moſt Noble, Magnificent, and Illuſtrious, our deareſt Friends ;

THE Parlament of the Common-wealth of England, has both receiv'd and perus'd your Letters of the 16*th* of January laſt, deliver'd by your Publick Miniſter Leo ab Ayſema, and by their Authority have given him Audience; at what time he declar'd the cordial and friendly Inclinations of your Cities toward this Republick, and deſir'd that the ancient Friendſhip might ſtill remain on both ſides. The Parlament therefore, for their parts, declare and aſſure your Lordſhips, That they deem nothing more grateful to themſelves, than that the ſame Friendſhip and Alliance which has hitherto bin maintain'd between this Nation and thoſe Cities, ſhould be renew'd, and firmly ratify'd; and that they will be ready upon all occaſions fitly offer'd, what they promiſe in Words, ſolemnly to perform in real Deeds; and expect that their ancient Friends and Confederates ſhould deal by them with the ſame Truth and Integrity. But as to thoſe things which your Reſident has more particularly in charge, in regard they were by us referr'd entire to the Council of State, and his Propoſals were to be there conſider'd, they tranſacted with him there, and gave him ſuch Anſwers, as ſeem'd moſt conſentaneous to Equity and Reaſon, of which your Reſident is able to give you an Account; whoſe Prudence and conſpicuous Probity proclaim him worthy the publick Character by you conferr'd upon him.

Moſt Noble, Magnificent, and Illuſtrious, our deareſt Friends ;

THE Parlament of the Common-wealth of England has receiv'd and perus'd your Letters, dated from Hamborough the 15*th* of January laſt, and deliver'd by the Noble Leo ab Ayſema, yours and the reſt of the Hanſeatic Cities Reſident, and by their own Authority gave him Audience; and as to what other particular Commands he had from your City, they have referr'd 'em to the Council of State, and gave 'em Orders to receive his Propoſals, and to treat with him as ſoon as might be, concerning all ſuch things as ſeem'd to be Juſt and Equal: which was alſo done accordingly. And as the Parlament has made it manifeſt, that they will have a due regard to what ſhall be propos'd by your Lordſhips, and have teſtify'd their ſingular Goodwill toward your City, by ſending their Reſident thither, and commanding his Abode there; ſo on the other ſide they expect and deſervedly require from your Lordſhips, that the ſame Equity be return'd to them, in things which are to the Benefit of this Republick, either already propos'd, or hereafter to be propounded by our ſaid Reſident in their Name to your City, anciently our Friend and Confederate.

The Council of State of the Republick of England, to the moſt Serene Prince Ferdinand the Second, Grand Duke of Tuſcany, Greeting.

THE Council of State being inform'd by Letters from Charles Longland, who takes care of the Affairs of the Engliſh in your Highneſſes Court of Legborn, that lately fourteen Men of War, belonging to the United Provinces, came into that Harbour, and openly threatned to ſink or burn the Engliſh Ships that were riding in your Port; but that your Serenity, whoſe Protection and Succour the Engliſh Merchants implor'd, gave Command to the Governour of Legborn, that he ſhould aſſiſt and defend the Engliſh Veſſels, they deem'd it their Duty to certify to your Highneſs how acceptable that Kindneſs and Protection which you ſo favourably afforded the Engliſh Nation, was to this Republick; and do promiſe your Highneſs that they will always keep in remembrance the Merit of ſo deſerving a Favour, and will be ready upon all occaſions to make the ſame returns of Friendſhip and good Offices to your People, and to do all things elſe which may conduce to the preſervation and continuance of the uſual Amity and Commerce between both Nations. And whereas the Dutch Men of War, even in the time of Treaty offer'd by themſelves, were ſo highly perfidious, as to fall upon our Fleet in our own Roads, (in which foul Attempt, God, as moſt juſt Arbiter, ſhew'd himſelf offended and oppoſite to their Deſign) but alſo in the Ports of Foreigners endeavour'd to take or ſink our Merchant Veſſels; we thought it alſo neceſſary to ſend this Declaration alſo of the Parlament of the Commonwealth of England, to your Highneſs, the publiſhing of which was occaſion'd by the Controverſies at preſent ariſen between this Republick and the United Provinces. By which your Highneſs may eaſily perceive how unjuſt and contrary to all the Laws of God and of Nations thoſe People have acted againſt this Republick; and how cordially the Parlament labour'd, for the ſake of pnblick Tranquillity, to have retain'd their priſtin Friendſhip and Alliance.

To the Spaniſh Embaſſador.

Moſt Excellent Lord,

THE Council of State, upon mature deliberation of that Paper which they receiv'd from your Excellency, $\frac{27\ \textit{May}}{6\ \text{of}\ \textit{June}}$ 1652. as alſo upon that which your Excellency at your Audience the $\frac{6}{16}$ of this Month deliver'd to the Council, return this Anſwer to both thoſe Papers: That the Parlament, &c. was always very deſirous of preſerving the firm Friendſhip and good Peace ſettled at preſent between this Republick and his Royal Majeſty of Spain, from the time that firſt your Excellency ſignify'd the tendency of his Majeſty's Inclinations that way, and was always ready to ratify and confirm the ſame to the benefit and advantage of both Nations. And this the Council of State in the Name, and by Command of the Parlament, in their Papers oftimes made known to your Excellency; and particularly, according to your Excellency's deſire, made choice of Commiſſioners to attend and receive from your Excellency ſuch Propoſals as might conduce to the ſame purpoſe. At which meeting, inſtead of making ſuch Propoſals, it ſeem'd good to your Excellency only to propound ſome general Matters, as it were previous to a future Conference, concerning which it ſeem'd to the Council that the Parlament had in former Papers fully made known their Sentiments. Nevertheleſs, for more ample and accumulative ſatisfaction, and to remove all Scruples from your Excellency concerning thoſe Matters which they at that time propos'd, the Council in that Paper, dated $\frac{31\ \textit{March},}{10\ \textit{April},}$ declar'd themſelves ready to come to a Conference with your Excellency concerning thoſe things which you had in charge from his Royal Majeſty, as well in reference to the priſtin Amity, as to any farther Negotiation; as alſo touching ſuch Matters as ſhould be exhibited by us, in the name of this Republick; and when we came to ſuch Particulars as were to the purpoſe, and the nature of the thing requir'd, then to give convenient Anſwers. To which it ſeem'd good to your Excellency to make no Reply, nor to proceed any farther in that Affair for almoſt two Months. About that time the Council receiv'd from your Excellency your firſt Paper, dated $\frac{27\ \text{May,}}{6\ \text{June.}}$ wherein you only made this Propoſal, That the Articles of Peace and League between the late King Charles and your Maſter, dated the $\frac{6}{16}$ of November 1630. might be review'd, and that the ſeveral Heads of it might be either enlarg'd or left out according to the preſent condition of times and things, and the late Alteration of Government. Which being no more than what we our ſelves briefly and clearly ſignify'd in our foreſaid Paper of the $\frac{31\ \text{March,}}{10\ \text{April,}}$ the Council expected that ſome particular Articles would have bin propounded out of that League, with thoſe Amplifications and Alterations of which you made mention; ſince otherwiſe it is impoſſible for us to return any other Anſwer concerning this matter than what we have already given. And whereas your Excellency in your laſt Paper ſeems to charge us with delay, the Council therefore took a ſecond review of the foreſaid Paper of the $\frac{27\ \text{of May,}}{6\ \text{of Jun,}}$ and of what was therein propounded, and are ſtill of opinion, that they have fully ſatisfy'd your Excellency in that former Paper: to which they can only farther add, That ſo ſoon as your Excellency ſhall be pleas'd, either out of the Leagues already made, or in any other manner, to frame ſuch Conditions as ſhall be accommodated to the preſent ſtate of Things and Times, upon which you deſire to have the foundations of Friendſhip laid on your ſide, they will immediately return you ſuch Anſwers as by them ſhall be thought juſt and reaſonable, and which ſhall be ſufficient Teſtimonials that the Parlament ſtill perſeveres in the ſame deſires of preſerving an untainted and firm Amity with the King your Maſter, and that on their parts they will omit no honeſt Endeavours, and worthy of themſelves, to advance it to the higheſt Perfection.

Furthermore the Council deems it to be a part of their Duty, that your Excellency ſhould be put in mind of that Paper of ours, dated Jan. 30. 1651. to which in regard your Excellency has return'd no Anſwer as yet, we preſs and expect that ſatisfaction be given to the Parlament, as to what is therein mention'd.

The Anſwer of the Council of State to the Reply of the Lords Embaſſadors Extraordinary from the King of Denmark and Norway, deliver'd to the Commiſſioners of the Council, to the Anſwer which the Council gave to their fourteen Demands.

TO the end that Satisfaction may be given to the foreſaid Lords Embaſſadors in reference to the Anſwer of the Council to the fifth, ſixth, ſeventh, eighth and ninth Article, the Council conſents that this following Clauſe ſhall be added at the end of their Anſwers: That is to ſay, beſides ſuch Colonies, Iſlands, Ports and Places under the Dominion of either Party, to which it is by Law provided that no body ſhall reſort upon the account of Trade or Commerce, unleſs upon ſpecial leave firſt obtain'd of that Party to which that Colony, Iſland, Port or Places belong.

The receiving of any Perſon into any Ship that ſhall be driven in by ſtreſs of Weather into the Rivers, Ports or Bays belonging to either Party, ſhall not render that Veſſel liable to any trouble or ſearch, by the Anſwer of the Council to the eleventh Article, as the foreſaid Lords Embaſſadors in their Reply ſeem to have underſtood, unleſs it be where ſuch a receiving ſhall be againſt the Laws, Statutes, or Cuſtom of that Place where the Veſſel put in, wherein it ſeems to the Council, that there is nothing of ſeverity ordain'd, but what equally conduces to the ſecurity of both Republicks.

As to the proving the Property of ſuch Ships and Goods as ſhall be caſt aſhore by Shipwrack, the Council deems it neceſſary that an Oath be adminiſtred in thoſe Courts which are already, or ſhall hereafter be conſtituted; where the Claimers may be ſeverally heard, and every body's Right be determin'd and adjudg'd, which cannot be ſo clearly and ſtrictly done by written Certificates, whence many Scruples and Doubts may ariſe, and many Frauds and Deceits creep into that ſort of Proof, which it concerns both Parties to prevent. The Council alſo deems it juſt, that a certain time be prefix'd, before which time, whoever does not prove himſelf the lawful Owner of the ſaid Goods, ſhall be excluded to avoid Suits. But as to the manner of putting periſhable Goods to ſale that are caſt aſhore by Shipwrack, the Council thinks it meet to propoſe the way of ſelling by inch of Candle, as being the moſt probable means to procure the true Value of the Goods for the beſt advantage of the Proprietors. Nevertheleſs, if the foreſaid Lords Embaſſadors ſhall propoſe any other method already found out which may more properly conduce to this end, the Council will be no hinderance, but that what is juſt may be put in practice. Neither is it to be underſtood, that the Conſideration of this matter ſhall put any ſtop to the Treaty.

As to the Puniſhment of thoſe who ſhall violate the propounded Treaty, the Council has made that Addition which is mention'd in their Anſwer to the fourteenth Article, for the greater force and efficacy of that Article, and thereby to render the League it ſelf more firm and laſting.

As to the laſt Clauſe of the fourteenth Article, we think it not proper to give our Aſſent to thoſe Leagues and Alliances, of which mention is made in the aforeſaid Anſwers, and which are only generally propounded, before it be more clearly apparent to us what they are. Bnt when your Excellencies ſhall be pleas'd to explain thoſe Matters more clearly to the Council, we may be able to give a more expreſs Anſwer to thoſe Particulars.

A Reply of the Council of State to the Anſwer of the foreſaid Lords Embaſſadors, which was return'd to the ſix Articles propounded by the Council aforeſaid, in the Name of the Republick of England.

THE Council having view'd the Commiſſions of the foreſaid Lords Embaſſadors, giving them Power to tranſact with the Parlament or their Commiſſioners, concerning all things expedient to be tranſacted in order to the reviving the old Leagues or adding new ones, believ'd indeed the foreſaid Lords to have bin furniſh'd with that Authority as to be able to return Anſwers, and negotiate all things, as well ſuch as ſhould be propounded by this Republick, as on the behalf of the King of Denmark and Norway, and ſo did not expect the Replies which it has pleas'd the foreſaid Lords Embaſſadors to give to the firſt, ſecond, third and fifth Demand of the Council, whereby of neceſſity a ſtop will be put to this Treaty, in regard it is but juſt in it ſelf, and ſo reſolv'd on in Council to comprehend the whole League, and to treat at the ſame time as well concerning thoſe things which regard this Republick, as thoſe other Matters which concern the King of Denmark and Norway. Wherefore it is the earneſt deſire of the Council, that your Excellencies would be pleas'd to return an Anſwer to our firſt, ſecond, third and fifth Demand.

As to the fourth Article concerning the Cuſtoms of Gluckſtadt, in regard they are now aboliſh'd, as your Excellencies have mention'd in your Anſwer, the Council preſſes that their Abrogation may be ratifi'd by this Treaty, leſt they ſhould be re-impos'd hereafter.

As to the ſixth Article concerning Pyracy, the Council inſerted it, as equally appertaining to the benefit of both, and to the eſtabliſhing of Trade in common, which is much diſturb'd by Pyrates and Sea-Robbers. And whereas the Anſwer of the Lords Embaſſadors, as to this Article, relates only to Enemies, but makes no mention of Pyrates, the Council therefore deſires a more diſtinct Reply to it.

And whereas the foreſaid Lords Embaſſadors in their Reply to the Anſwer of the Council have paſs'd over both their tenth Article, and the Anſwer of the Council to it, the Council have thought it neceſſary to add this following Article to their following Demands:

That the people and Inhabitants of the Republick of England trading into any Kingdoms, Regions, or Territories of the King of Denmark and Norway, ſhall not for the future pay any more Cuſtoms, Tribute, Taxes, Duties or Stipends, or in any other manner than the People of the United Provinces, or any other Foreign Nation that pays the leaſt, coming in or going out of Harbour; and ſhall enjoy the ſame and as equally ample Freedom, Privileges and Immunities, both coming and going, and ſo long as they ſhall reſide in the Country, as alſo in fiſhing, trading, or in any other manner which any other People of a Foreign Nation enjoys, or may enjoy in the foreſaid Kingdoms, and throughout the whole Dominions of the ſaid King of Denmark and Norway: Which Privileges alſo the Subjects of the King of Denmark and Norway ſhall equally enjoy throughout all the Territories and Dominions of the Republick of England.

The Council of State of the Republick of England, to the moſt Serene Prince, Ferdinand the Second, Grand Duke of Tuſcany, Greeting.

Moſt Serene Prince, our deareſt Friend;

THE Council of State underſtanding, as well by your Highneſs's Agent here reſiding, as by Charles Longland, chief Factor for the Engliſh at Leghorn, with what Affection and Fidelity your Highneſs undertook the Protection of the Engliſh Veſſels putting into the Port of Leghorn for ſhelter, againſt the Dutch Men of War threatning 'em with nothing but Ranſack and Deſtruction, by their Leters of the 29th of July (which they hope are by this time come to your Highneſs's hands) have made known to your Highneſs how grateful and how acceptable it was to 'em; and at the ſame time ſent to your Serenity a Declaration of the Parlament of the Commonwealth of England concerning the preſent Differences between this Republick and the United Provinces. And whereas the Council has again bin inform'd by the ſame Charles Longland, what further Commands your Highneſs gave for the ſecurity and defence of the Engliſh Veſſels, notwithſtanding the oppoſite Endeavours of the Dutch, they deem'd this opportunity not to be paſs'd over, to let your Highneſs underſtand once more, how highly they eſteem your Juſtice and ſingular Conſtancy in defending their Veſſels, and how acceptable they took ſo great a piece of Service. Which being no mean teſtimony of your ſolid Friendſhip and Affection to this Republick, your Highneſs may aſſure your ſelf, that the ſame Offices of Kindneſs and good Will towards your Highneſs ſhall never be wanting in us; ſuch as may be able to demonſtrate how firmly we are reſolv'd to cultivate both long and conſtantly, to the utmoſt of our Power, that Friendſhip which is between your Serenity and this Republick. In the mean time we have expreſly commanded all our Ships upon their entrance into your Ports, not to fail of paying the accuſtom'd Salutes by firing their Guns, and to give all other due Honours to your Highneſs.

To the Spaniſh Embaſſador, Alphonſo de Cardenas.

Moſt Excellent Lord,

YOur Excellency's Letters of the $\frac{1}{11}$ of November 1652. deliver'd by your Secretary, together with two Petitions inclos'd, concerning the Ships, the Sampſon and Sun Salvadore, were read in Council. To which the Council returns this Anſwer, That the Engliſh Man of War meeting with the aforeſaid Ships, not in the Downs, as your Excellency writes, but in the open Sea, brought 'em into Port as Enemies Ships, and therefore lawful Prize; and the Court of Admiralty, to which it properly belongs to take cognizance of all Cauſes of this nature, have undertaken to determin the Right in diſpute. Where all Parties concern'd on both ſides ſhall be fully and freely heard, and you may be aſſur'd that Right ſhall take place. We have alſo ſent your Excellency's requeſt to the Judges of that Court, to the end we may more certainly underſtand what progreſs they have made in their proceeding to Judgment. Of which ſo ſoon as we are rightly inform'd, we ſhall take care that ſuch Orders ſhall be given in this matter, as ſhall correſpond with Juſtice, and become the Friendſhip that is between this Republick and your King. Nor are we leſs confident, that his Royal Majeſty will by no means permit the Goods of the Enemies of this Commonwealth to be conceal'd, and eſcape due Confiſcation under the ſhelter of being own'd by his Subjects.

To the Spaniſh Embaſſador.

Moſt Excellent Lord,

BUT lately the Council has bin inform'd by Captain Badiley, Admiral of the Fleet of this Republick in the Streights, that after he himſelf, together with three other Men of War, had for two days together engag'd eleven of the Dutch, put into Porto Longone, as well to repair the Damages he had receiv'd in the Fight, as alſo to ſupply himſelf with Warlike Ammunition; where the Governour of the Place perform'd all the good Offices of a moſt juſt and courteous Perſon, as well towards his own, as the reſt of the Men of War under his Conduct. Now in regard that that ſame Place is under the Dominion of the moſt Serene King of Spain, the Council cannot but look upon the ſingular Civility of that Gariſon to be the copious fruit of that ſtricter mutual Amity ſo auſpiciouſly commenc'd; and therefore deem it to be a part of their Duty to return their Thanks to his Majeſty for a Kindneſs ſo opportunely receiv'd, and deſire your Excellency to ſignify this to your moſt Serene King, and to aſſure him that the Parlament of the Commonwealth of England will be always ready to make the ſame returns of Friendſhip and Civility upon all occaſions offer'd.

The Parlament of the Commonwealth of England, to the moſt Serene Prince, Ferdinand the Second, Grand Duke of Tuſcany, Greeting.

Moſt Serene Prince, our deareſt Friend;

THE Parlament of the Commonwealth of England has receiv'd your Letters dated from Florence, Auguſt 17. concerning the reſtitution of a certain Ship laden with Rice, which Ship is claim'd by Captain Cardi of Legborn. And though the Judges of our Admiralty have already pronounc'd Sentence in that Cauſe againſt the foreſaid Cardi, and that there be an Appeal depending before the Delegates; yet upon your Highneſs's Requeſt, the Parlament, to teſtify how much they value the good Will and Alliance of a Prince ſo much their Friend, have given order to thoſe who are entruſted with this Affair, that the ſaid Ship, together with the Rice, or at leaſt the full Price of it be reſtor'd to the foreſaid Captain Cardi; the fruit of which Command his Proctor here has effectually already reap'd. And as your Highneſs by favourably affording your Patronage and Protection to the Ships of the Engliſh in your Port of Legborn, has in a more eſpecial manner ty'd the Parlament to your Serenity; ſo will they, on the other ſide, take care, as often as opportunity offers, that all their Offices of ſincere Friendſhip and good Will towards your Highneſs may be ſolidly effectual and permanent; withal recommending your Highneſs to the Divine Benignity and Protection of the Almighty.

The Parlament of the Commonwealth of England, to the moſt Serene and Potent Prince, King of Denmark, &c.

Moſt Serene and Potent King,

THE Parlament of the Commonwealth of England have receiv'd Information from their Admiral of that Fleet ſo lately ſent to Copenhagen, your Majeſty's Port, to convoy our Merchants homeward bound, that the foreſaid Ships are not permitted to return along with him, as being detain'd by your Majeſty's Command; and upon his producing your Royal Letters declaring your Juſtifications of the matter of Fact, the Parlament denies that the Reaſons laid down in thoſe Letters for the detaining of thoſe Ships are any way ſatisfactory to 'em. Therefore that ſome ſpeedy Remedy may be appli'd in a matter of ſo great moment, and ſo highly conducing to the proſperity of both Nations, for preventing a greater perhaps enſuing miſchief, the Parlament have ſent their Reſident at Hamborough, Richard Bradſhaw, Eſquire, a Perſon of great Worth and known Fidelity, with expreſs Commands to treat with your Majeſty, as their Agent alſo in Denmark, concerning this Affair: And therefore we entreat your Majeſty to give him a favourable Audience and ample Credit in whatever he ſhall propoſe to your Majeſty on our behalf, in reference to this matter; in the mean time recommending your Majeſty to the Protection of Divine Providence.

The Parlament of the Commonwealth of England, to the moſt Serene Prince the Duke of Venice, Greeting.

THE Parlament of the Commonwealth of England has receiv'd your Highneſs's Letters, dated June 1. 1652. and deliver'd by Lorenzo Pallutio, wherein they not only gladly perceive both yours, and the cordial Inclinations of the Senate toward this Republick, but have willingly laid hold of this opportunity to declare their ſingular Affection and good Will towards the moſt Serene Republick of Venice; which they ſhall be always ready to make manifeſt both really and ſincerely, as often as opportunity offers. To whom alſo all the ways and means that ſhall be propounded to 'em for the preſerving or encreaſing mutual Friendſhip and Alliance, ſhall be ever moſt acceptable. In the mean time we heartily pray that all things proſperous, all things favourable, may befal your Highneſs and the moſt Serene Republick.

The Parlament of the Republick of England, to the moſt Serene Prince, Ferdinand the Second, Grand Duke of Tuſcany, Greeting.

ALthough the Parlament of the Republick of England ſome time ſince redoubl'd their Commands to all the chief Captains and Maſters of Ships arriving in the Ports belonging to your Highneſs, to carry themſelves peacefully and civilly, and with becoming obſervance and Duty to a moſt Serene Prince, whoſe Friendſhip this Republick ſo earneſtly endeavours to preſerve, as having bin oblig'd by ſo many great Kindneſſes; an Accident altogether unexpected has fallen out, through the Inſolence, as they hear, of Captain Appleton in the Port of Leghorn, who offer'd Violence to the Sentinel then doing his Duty upon the Mole, againſt the Faith and Duty which he owes this Republick, and in contempt of the Reverence and Honour which is juſtly owing to your Highneſs: the relation of which Action, as it was really committed, the Parlament has underſtood by your Letters of the 7th and 9th of December, dated from Florence; as alſo more at large by the moſt Worthy Almeric Salvetti, your Reſident here. And they have ſo ſincerely laid to heart your Highneſs's Honour, which is the main concern of this Complaint, that they have referr'd it to the Council of State, to take care that Letters be ſent to Capt. Appleton, to come away without ſtop or ſtay by Land, in order to his giving an Account of this unwonted and extraordinary Act (a Copy of which Letters is ſent herewith enclos'd) who ſo ſoon as he ſhall arrive, and be accus'd of the Fact, we promiſe that ſuch a courſe ſhall be taken with him, as may ſufficiently teſtify that we no leſs heinouſly brook the violation of your Right, than the infringement of our own Authority. Moreover, upon mature Debate concerning the recover'd Ship, call'd the Phœnix of Leghorn, which Affair is alſo related and preſs'd by your Highneſs and your Reſident here, to have bin done by Captain Appleton, contrary to promiſe given, whereby he was oblig'd not to fall upon even the Hollanders themſelves within ſight of the Lantborn; and that your Highneſs, truſting to that Faith, promis'd ſecurity to the Hollanders upon your word; and therefore that we ought to take care for the ſatisfaction of thoſe who ſuffer damage under the Protection of your Promiſe; the Parlament begs of your Excellency to be aſſur'd, That this Fact, as it was committed without their Advice or Command, ſo it is moſt remote from their Will and Intention that your Highneſs ſhould undergo any Detriment or Diminution of your Honour by it. Rather they will make it their buſineſs that ſome Expedient may be found out for your Satisfaction, according to the nature of the Fact upon Examination of the whole matter. Which that they may ſo much the more fully underſtand, they deem it neceſſary that Captain Appleton himſelf ſhould be heard, who was bound by the ſame Faith, and is thought by your Excellency at leaſt to have conſented to the violation of it; eſpecially ſince he is ſo ſuddenly to return home. And ſo ſoon as the Parlament has heard him, and have more at large conferr'd with your Reſident concerning this matter of no ſmall moment, they will pronounce that Sentence that ſhall be Juſt, and conſentaneous to that extream good-will which they bear to your Highneſs, and no way unworthy the favours by you conferr'd upon 'em. Of which, that your Highneſs might not make the leaſt queſtion in the mean time, we were willing to certify your Highneſs by this Expreſs on purpoſe ſent, that we ſhall omit no opportunity to teſtify how greatly we value your Friendſhip.

The Council of State of the Republick of England, to the moſt Seren Prince, Frederick, Heire of Norway, Duke of Sleſwick, Holſatia, Stormaria, Ditmarſh, Count in Oldenburgh and Delmenhort, Greeting.

THough it has pleaſ'd the moſt wiſe God, and moſt merciful Moderator of all things, beſides the Burden which he laid upon us in common with our Anceſtors, to wage moſt juſt Wars in defence of our Liberty againſt Tyrannical Uſurpation, ſignally alſo to ſuccour us with thoſe Auſpices and that Divine Aſſiſtance, beyond what he afforded to our Predeceſſors, that we have bin able not only to extinguiſh a Civil War, but to extirpate the Cauſes of it for the future, as alſo to repel the unexpected Violences of Foreign Enemies; neverthleſs, with grateful minds, as much as in us lies, acknowledging the ſame Favour and Benignity of the ſupreme Deity towards us, we are not ſo puft up with the ſucceſs of our Affairs, but that rather inſtructed in the ſingular Juſtice and Providence of God, and having had long experience our ſelves, we abominate the thoughts of War, if poſſible to be avoided, and moſt eagerly embrace Peace with all men. Therefore as hitherto we never were the firſt that violated or deſir'd the violation of that Friendſhip, or thoſe antient Privileges of Leagues that have bin ratify'd between us and any Princes or People whatever; ſo your Highneſs, in conſideration of your antient Amity with the Engliſh, left us by our Anceſtors, may with a moſt certain Aſſurance, promiſe both your ſelf and your People all things equitable, and all things friendly from us. Laſtly, as we highly value, which is no more than what is juſt and reaſonable, the teſtimonies of your Affection and good Offices offer'd us, ſo we ſhall make it our buſineſs that you may not at any time be ſenſible of the want of ours, either to your ſelf or yours. And ſo we moſt heartily recommend your Highneſs to the Omnipotent Protection of the Almighty God.

To the Count of Oldenburgh.

Moſt Illuſtrious Lord,

THE Parlament of the Commonwealth of England have receiv'd an extraordinary Congratulation from your Excellency, moſt kindly and courteouſly deliver'd to us by word of mouth by Herman Mylius, your Counſellor and Doctor of Laws; who wiſh'd all things lucky and proſperous, in your Name, to the Parlament and Engliſh Intereſt, and deſir'd that the Friendſhip of this Republick might remain inviolable within your Territories. He alſo deſir'd Letters of ſafe Conduct, to the end your Subjects may the more ſecurely trade and ſail from place to place; together with our Orders to our publick Miniſters abroad, to be aiding and aſſiſting to your Excellency and your Intereſts with their good Offices and Counſels. To which Requeſts of his we willingly conſented, and granted both our Friendſhip, the Letters deſir'd, and our Orders to our Publick Miniſters under the Seal of the Parliament. And though it be ſome Months ago ſince your Publick Miniſter firſt came to us, however that delay neither aroſe from any unwillingneſs on our part to aſſent to the requeſt made in your Excellency's Name, or that your Deputy was at any time wanting in his Sedulity (whoſe Solicitations were daily and earneſt with all the Diligence and Importunity that became him, to the end he might be diſpatch'd) but only it happen'd ſo, that at that time the greateſt and moſt weighty Affairs of the Republick were under Debate and ſerious Negotiation. Of which we thought meet to certify your Illuſtrious Lordſhip, leſt any body through a falſe conſtruction of this delay, ſhould think thoſe

Favours unwillingly or hardly obtain'd, which were moſt gladly granted by the Parlament of the Commonwealth of England. In whoſe Name theſe are commanded to be Sign'd,

Henry Scobel, Clerk of the Parlament.

To the moſt Illuſtrious and Noble Senators, Scultets, Landam, and Senators of the Evangelick Cantons of Switzerland, Zurick, Bern, Glaris, Bale, Schaffhuſen, Appenzel, alſo of the Confederates of the ſame Religion in the Country of the Griſons, of Geneva, St. Gall, Mulhauſen and Bienne; our deareſt Friends.

YOUR Letters, moſt Illuſtrious Lords and deareſt Confederates, dated December 24. full of civility, good-will, and ſingular affection towards us and our Republick, and what ought always to be greater and more ſacred to us, breathing Fraternal and truly Chriſtian Charity, we have receiv'd. And in the firſt place we return Thanks to Almighty God, who has rais'd and eſtabliſh'd both you and ſo many noble Cities, not ſo much intrench'd and fortifi'd with thoſe encloſures of Mountains, as with your innate Fortitude, Piety, moſt prudent and juſt Adminiſtration of Government, and the Faith of mutual Confederacies, to be a firm and inacceſſible ſhelter for all the truly Orthodox. Now then that you, who over all Europe were the firſt of Mortals who after deluges of barbarous Tyrants from the North, Heaven proſpering your Valour, recover'd your Liberty, and being obtain'd, for ſo many Years have preſerv'd it untainted with no leſs Prudence and Moderation; that you ſhould have ſuch noble ſentiments of our Liberty recover'd; that you, ſuch ſincere Worſhippers of the Goſpel, ſhould be ſo conſtantly perſwaded of our Love and Affection for the Orthodox Faith, is that which is moſt acceptable and welcome to us. But as to your exhorting us to Peace, with a Pious and Affectionate intent, as we are fully aſſur'd, certainly ſuch an Admonition ought to be of great weight with us; as well in reſpect of the thing it ſelf which you perſwade, and which of all things is chiefly to be deſir'd, as alſo for the great Authority which is to be allow'd your Lordſhips above others in this particular, who in the midſt of loud tumultuous Wars on every ſide, enjoy the ſweets of Peace both at home and abroad, and have approv'd your ſelves the beſt example to all others of embracing and improving Peace; and laſtly, for that you perſwade us to the very thing which we our ſelves of our own accords, and that more than once, conſulting as well our own, as the intereſt of the whole Evangelical Communion, have begg'd by Embaſſadors, and other publick Miniſters, namely, Friendſhip and a moſt ſtrict League with the United Provinces. But how they treated our Embaſſadors ſent to 'em to negotiate, not a bare Peace, but a brotherly Amity and moſt ſtrict League; what Provocations to War they afterwards gave us, how they fell upon us in our own Roads in the midſt of their Embaſſadors Negotiations for Peace and Alliance, little dreaming any ſuch Violence, you will abundantly underſtand by our Declaration ſet forth upon this ſubject, and ſent you together with theſe our Letters. But as for our parts, we are wholly intent upon this, by God's Aſſiſtance, though proſperous hitherto, ſo to carry our ſelves, that we may neither attribute any thing to our own Strength or Forces, but all things to God alone, nor be inſolently puft up with our Succeſs; and we ſtill retain the ſame ready Inclinations to embrace all occaſions of making a juſt and honeſt Peace. In the mean time your ſelves, Illuſtrious and moſt excellent Lords, in whom this pious and noble Sedulity, out of meer Evangelical Affection, exerts it ſelf to reconcile and pacify contending Brethren, as ye are worthy of all applauſe among men, ſo doubtleſs will ye obtain the Celeſtial Reward of Peace-makers with God; to whoſe ſupreme Benignity and Favour we heartily recommend in our Prayers both you and yours, no leſs ready to make returns of all good Offices both of Friends and Brethren, if in any thing we may be ſerviceable to your Lordſhips.

To the Spaniſh Embaſſador.

Moſt Illuſtrious Lord,

UPON grievous Complaints brought before us by Philip Noel, John Godal, and the Society of Merchants of Foy in England, that a certain Ship of theirs call'd the Ann of Foy, an Engliſh Ship by them fitted out, and laden with their own Goods, in her return home to the Port of Foy about Michaelmas laſt, was unjuſtly, and without any cauſe ſet upon and taken by a certain Privateer of Oſtend, Eraſmus Bruer Commander, and the Seamen unworthily and barbarouſly us'd: The Council of State wrote to the Marquis of Leda concerning it (a Copy of which Letter we alſo ſend encloſ'd to your Excellency) and expected from him, that without delay Orders would have bin given for the doing of Juſtice in this matter. Nevertheleſs after all this, the foreſaid Noel, together with the ſaid Company make further heavy Complaint, that altho our Letters were deliver'd to the Marqueſs, and that thoſe Merchants from that time forward betook themſelves to Bruges to the Court there held for Maritim Cauſes, and there aſſerted and prov'd their Right, and the Verity of their Cauſe, yet that Juſtice was deni'd 'em; and that they were ſo hardly dealt with, that though the Cauſe had bin ripe for Trial above three Months, nevertheleſs they could obtain no Sentence from that Court, but that their Ship and Goods are ſtill detain'd, notwithſtanding the great Expences they have bin at in proſecuting their Claim. Now your Excellency well knows it to be contrary to the Law of Nations, of Traffick, and that Friendſhip which is at preſent ſettl'd between the Engliſh and Flemings, that any Oſtender ſhould take any Engliſh Veſſel, if bound for England with Engliſh Goods; and that whatever was inhumanly and barbarouſly done to the Engliſh Seamen by that Commander, deſerves a rigorous Puniſhment. The Council therefore recommends the whole matter to your Excellency, and makes it their requeſt that you would write into Flanders concerning it, and take ſuch ſpeedy care that this buſineſs may no longer be delay'd, but that Juſtice may be done in ſuch a manner that the foreſaid Ship, together with the Damages, Coſts and Intereſt, which the Engliſh have ſuſtain'd and bin out of Purſe, by reaſon of that illegal Seizure, may be reſtor'd and made good to 'em by the Authority of the Court, or in ſome other way; and that care be taken that hereafter no ſuch Violence may be committed, but that the Amity between our People and the Flemings may be preſerv'd without any Infringment.

Sign'd in the Name, and by the Command of the Council of State, appointed by Authority of Parlament.

To the Marquiſs of Leda.

GREAT Complaints are brought before us by Philip Noel, John Godal, and the Company of Foy Merchants, concerning a Ship of theirs, call'd the Ann of Foy, which being an Engliſh Veſſel by them fitted out, and laden with their own Goods, in her return home to her own Port about Michaelmas laſt, was taken unawares by a Freebooter of Oſtend, Eraſmus Bruer Commander. It is alſo further related, that the Oſtenders, when the Ship was in their Power, us'd the Seamen too inhumanly, by ſetting lighted Match to their Fingers, and plunging the Maſter of the Ship in the Sea till they had almoſt drown'd him, on purpoſe to extort a falſe Confeſſion from him, that the Ship and Goods belong'd to the French. Which though the Maſter and the reſt of the Ships Crew reſolutely deni'd, nevertheleſs the Oſtenders carri'd away the Ship and Goods to their own Port. Theſe things, upon ſtrict enquiry and examination of Witneſſes, have bin made manifeſt in the Admiralty Court in England, as will appear by the Copies of the Affidavits herewith ſent your Lordſhip. Now in regard that that ſame Ship, call'd the Ann of Foy, and all her lading of Merchandize and Goods belong truly and properly to the Engliſh, ſo that there is no apparent reaſon why the Oſtender ſhould ſeize by force either the one or the other, much leſs carry away the Maſter of the Ship, and uſe the Seamen ſo unmercifully: and whereas according to the Law of Nations, and in reſpect to the Friendſhip between the Flemings and Engliſh, that Ship and Goods ought to be reſtor'd, we make it our earneſt requeſt to your Excellency, that the Engliſh may have ſpeedy Juſtice done, and that Satisfaction may be given for their Loſſes, to the end the Traffick and Friendſhip which is between the Engliſh and Flemings may be long and inviolably preſerv'd.

To the Spaniſh Embaſſador.

THE Parlament of the Commonwealth of England, underſtanding that ſeveral of the People of this City daily reſort to the Houſes of your Excellency and other Embaſſadors and Publick Miniſters from Foreign Nations here reſiding, meerly to hear Maſs, gave Order to the Council of State to let your Excellency underſtand, That whereas ſuch Reſort is prohibited by the Laws of the Nation, and of very evil Example in this our Republick, and extreamly ſcandalous, that they deem it their duty to take care that no ſuch thing be permitted henceforward, and to prohibit all ſuch Aſſemblies for the future. Concerning which, 'tis our deſire that your Excellency ſhould have a fair Advertiſment, to the end that henceforth your Excellency may be more careful of admitting any of the People of this Republick to hear Maſs in your Houſe. And as the Parlament will diligently provide that your Excellencies Rights and Privileges ſhall be preſerv'd inviolable, ſo they perſwade themſelves that your Excellency, during your abode here, would by no means that the Laws of this Republick ſhould be violated by your ſelf or your Attendants.

To the Count of Oldenburgh.

Moſt Illuſtrious Lords,

BY your Letters dated January 20. 1654. I have bin given to underſtand, That the noble Frederick Matthias Woliſog, and Chriſtopher Griphiander were ſent with certain Commands from your Illuſtrious Lordſhip into England; who when they came to us, not only in your Name congratulated our having taken upon us the Government of the Engliſh Republick, but alſo deſir'd that you and your Territories might be comprehended in the Peace which we are about to make with the Low-Countries, and that we would confirm by our preſent Authority the Letters of ſafe Conduct lately granted your Lordſhip by the Parlament. Therefore in the firſt place we return your Lordſhip our hearty thanks for your friendly Congratulation, as it becomes us; and theſe will let you know that we have readily granted your two Requeſts. Nor ſhall you find us wanting upon any opportunity, which may at any time make manifeſt our Affection to your Lordſhip. And this we are apt to believe you will underſtand more at large from your Agents, whoſe Fidelity and Diligence in this Affair of yours, in our Court, has bin eminently conſpicuous. As to what remains, we moſt heartily wiſh the Bleſſings of Proſperity and Peace, both upon you and your Affairs.

Your Illuſtrious Lordſhip's moſt Affectionate, Oliver
Protector of England, Scotland, and Ireland, &c.

To the Count of Oldenburgh.

Moſt Illuſtrious Lord,

WE receiv'd your Letters, dated May 2. from Oldenburgh, moſt welcome upon more than one account; as well for that they were full of ſingular Civility and Good-will towards us, as becauſe they were deliver'd by the hand of the moſt Illuſtrious Count Antony, your beloved Son; which we look upon as ſo much the greater Honour, as not having truſted to Report, but with our own Eyes, and by our own Obſervation diſcern'd his Vertues becoming ſuch an illuſtrious Extraction, his noble Manners and Inclinations, and laſtly his extraordinary Affection toward our ſelves. Nor is it be queſtion'd but he diſplays to his own People the ſame fair hopes at home, that he will approve himſelf the Son of a moſt worthy and moſt excellent Father, whoſe ſignal Vertue and Prudence has all along ſo manag'd Affairs, that the whole Territory of Oldenburgh for many years has enjoy'd a profound Peace, and all the bleſſings of Tranquillity in the midſt of the raging confuſions of War thundring on every ſide. What reaſon therefore why we ſhould not value ſuch a Friendſhip that can ſo wiſely and providently ſhun the Enmity of all men? Laſtly, Moſt Illuſtrious Lord, 'tis for your Magnificent * Preſent that we return you Thanks; but 'tis of Right, and your Merits claim, that we are cordially

Greeting.*

Moſt Serene King,

THough it be already divulg'd over all the World that the Kingdom of the Swedes is tranſlated to your Majeſty with the extraordinary Applauſe and Deſires of the People, and the free Suffrages of all the Orders of the Realm; yet that your Majeſty ſhould rather chuſe that we ſhould underſtand the welcome News by your moſt friendly Letters, than by the common voice of Fame, we thought no ſmall Argument both of your good will toward us, and of the Honour done us among the firſt. Voluntarily therefore, and of Right we congratulate this acceſſion of Dignity to your egregious Merits, and the moſt worthy guerdon of ſo much Vertue. And that it may be lucky and proſperous to your Majeſty, to the Nation of the Swedes, and the true Chriſtian Intereſt, which is alſo what you chiefly wiſh, with joint Supplications we implore of God. And whereas your Majeſty aſſures us, That the preſerving entire the League and Alliance lately concluded between this Republick and the Kingdom of Sweden ſhall be ſo far your care, that the preſent Amity may not only continue firm and inviolable, but if poſſible, every day encreaſe and grow to a higher Perfection, to call it into queſtion, would be a piece of Impiety, after the Word of ſo great a Prince once interpos'd, whoſe ſurpaſſing Fortitude has not only purchas'd your Majeſty a hereditary Kingdom in a Foreign Land, but alſo could ſo far prevail, that the moſt auguſt Queen, the Daughter of Guſtavus, and a Heroeſs ſo matchleſs in all degrees of Praiſe and maſculine Renown, that many Ages backward have not produc'd her equal, ſurrender'd the moſt juſt poſſeſſion of her Empire to your Majeſty, neither expecting nor willing to accept it. Now therefore 'tis our main deſire, your Majeſty ſhould be every way aſſur'd, that your ſo ſingular Affection toward us, and ſo eminent a ſignification of your Mind can be no other than moſt dear and welcome to us; and that no Combat can offer it ſelf to us more glorious, than ſuch a one wherein we may, if poſſible, prove victorious in out-doing your Majeſty's Civility by our kind Offices that never ſhall be wanting.

To the moſt Illuſtrious Lord, Lewis Mendez de Haro.

VVHAT we have underſtood by your Letters, moſt Illuſtrious Lord, that there is an Embaſſador already nominated and appointed by the moſt Serene King of Spain, on purpoſe to come and congratulate our having undertaken the Government of the Republick, is not only deſervedly acceptable of it ſelf, but render'd much more welcome and pleaſing to us by your ſingular Affection, and the ſpeed of your Civility, as being deſirous we ſhould underſtand it firſt of all from your ſelf. For, to be ſo belov'd and approv'd by your Lordſhip, who by your Vertue and Prudence have obtain'd ſo great Authority with your Prince, as to preſide, his equal in Mind, over all the moſt important Affairs of that Kingdom, ought to be ſo much the more pleaſing to us, as well underſtanding that the Judgment of a ſurpaſſing Perſon cannot but be much to our Honour and Ornament. Now as to our cordial al Inclinations toward the King of Spain, and ready Propenſity to hold Friendſhip with that Kingdom, and encreaſe it to a ſtricter Perfection, we hope we have already ſatisfi'd the preſent Embaſſador, and ſhall more amply ſatisfy the other ſo ſoon as he arrives. As to what remains, Moſt Illuſtrious Lord, we heartily wiſh the Dignity and Favour wherein you now flouriſh with your Prince, perpetual to your Lordſhip; and that whatever Affairs you carry on for the Publick Good, may proſperouſly and happily ſucceed.

To the moſt Serene Prince Charles Guſtavus Adolphus, King of the Sweeds, Goths, and Vandals, &c.

Being ſo well aſſur'd of your Majeſty's good Will towards me by your laſt Letters, in anſwer to which I wrote back with the ſame Affection, methinks I ſhould do no more than what our mutual Amity requires, if as I communicate my grateful Tidings to reciprocal Joy, ſo when contrary Accidents fall out, that I ſhould lay open the Senſe and Grief of my Mind to your Majeſty, as my deareſt Friend. For my part this is my Opinion of my ſelf, That I am now advanc'd to this degree in the Commonwealth, to the end I ſhould conſult in the firſt place, and as much as in me lies, the common Peace of Proteſtants. Which is the reaſon, that of neceſſity it behoves me more grievouſly to lay to heart what we are ſorry to hear concerning the bloody Conflicts and mutual Slaughters of the Bremeners and Swedes. But this I chiefly bewail, that being both our Friends, they ſhould ſo deſpitefully combat one againſt another, and with ſo much danger to the Intereſts of the Proteſtants; and that the Peace of Munſter, which it was thought would have prov'd an Aſylum and Safeguard to all the Proteſtants, ſhould be the occaſion of ſuch an unfortunate War, that now the Arms of the Sweeds are turn'd upon thoſe whom but a little before, among the reſt, they moſt ſtoutly defended for Religion's ſake; and that this ſhould be done more eſpecially at this time when the Papiſts are ſaid to perſecute the Reformed all over Germany, and to return to their intermitted for ſome time Oppreſſions, and their priſtin Violencies. Hearing therefore that a Truce for ſome days was made at Breme, I could not forbear ſignifying to your Majeſty, upon this opportunity offer'd, how cordially I deſire, and how earneſtly I implore the God of Peace, that this Truce may prove ſucceſsfully happy for the Good of both Parties, and that it may conclude in a moſt firm Peace, by a commodious Accommodation on both ſides. To which purpoſe, if your Majeſty judges that my Aſſiſtance may any ways conduce, I moſt willingly offer and promiſe it, as in a thing, without queſtion, moſt acceptable to the moſt Holy God. In the mean time, from the bottom of my heart, I beſeech the Almighty to direct and govern all your Counſels for the common Welfare of the Chriſtian Intereſt, which I make no doubt but that your Majeſty chiefly deſires.

To the Magnificent and moſt Noble, the Conſuls and Senators of the City of Breme.

By your Letters deliver'd to us by your Reſident Henry Oldenburgh, that there is a difference kindled between your City and a moſt potent Neighbour, and to what ſtraits you are thereby reduc'd, with ſo much the more Trouble and Grief we underſtand, by how much the more we love and embrace the City of Breme, ſo eminent, above others, for their Profeſſion of the Orthodox Faith. Neither is there any thing which we account more ſacred in our wiſhes, than that the whole Proteſtant Name would knit and grow together in brotherly Unity and Concord. In the mean time, moſt certain it is, that the common Enemy of the Reformed rejoices at theſe our Diſſenſions, and more haughtily every where exerts his Fury. But in regard the Controverſie which at preſent exerciſes your contending Arms, is not within the power of our deciſion, we implore the Almighty God, that the Truce begun may obtain a happy iſſue. Aſſuredly, as to what you deſir'd, we have written to the King of the Swedes, exhorting him to Peace and Agreement, as being moſt chiefly grateful to Heaven, and have offer'd our Aſſiſtance in ſo pious a Work. On the other ſide we likewiſe exhort your ſelves to bear an equal Mind, and by no means to refuſe any honeſt Conditions of Reconciliation. And ſo we recommend your City to Divine Protection and Providence.

Oliver, Protector of the Republick of England, To the moſt Illuſtrious Prince of Tarentum.

YOUR Love of Religion apparently made known in your Letters to us deliver'd, and your excelling Piety and ſingular Affection to the Reformed Churches, more eſpecially conſidering the Nobility and Splendor of your Character, and in a Kingdom too wherein there are ſo many and ſuch abounding hopes propos'd to all of eminent Quality that revolt from the Orthodox Faith, ſo many Miſeries to be undergone by the reſolute and conſtant, gave us an occaſion of great Joy and Conſolation of Mind. Nor was it leſs grateful to us, that we had gain'd your good Opinion, upon the ſame account of Religion, which ought to render your Highneſs moſt chiefly belov'd and dear to our ſelves. We call God to witneſs, That whatever hopes or expectations the Churches, according to your relation, had of us, we may be able one day to give them ſatisfaction, if need require, or at leaſt to demonſtrate to all Men how much it is our deſire never to fail 'em. Nor ſhould we think any fruit of our Labours, or of this Dignity or Supream Employment which we hold in our Republick, greater than that we might be in a condition to be ſerviceable to the Enlargement, or the Welfare, or which is more ſacred, to the Peace of the Reformed Church. In the mean time, we exhort and beſeech your Lordſhip to remain ſtedfaſt to the laſt minute in the Orthodox Religion, with the ſame Reſolution and Conſtancy as you profeſs it receiv'd from your Anceſtors with Piety and Zeal. Nor indeed can there be any thing more worthy your ſelf, or your religious Parents, nor in conſideration of what you have deſerv'd of us, though we wiſh all things for your own ſake that we can wiſh more noble or advantagious to your Lordſhip, than that you would take ſuch Methods, and apply your ſelf to ſuch Studies, that the Churches, eſpecially of your Native Country, under the Diſcipline of which your Birth and Genius have render'd you Illuſtriouſly happy, may be ſenſible of ſo much the more aſſur'd Security in your Protection, by how much you excel others in Luſtre and Ability.

Whitehall,
April —, 1654.

Oliver the Protector, &c. To the moſt Serene Prince, Immanuel Duke of Savoy, Prince of Piemont, Greeting.

Moſt Serene Prince,

Letters have been ſent us from Geneva, as alſo from the Dauphinate, and many other Places bordering upon your Territories, wherein we are given to underſtand, That ſuch of your Royal Highneſs's Subjects as profeſs the Reformed Religion, are commanded by your Edict, and by your Authority, within three days after the Promulgation of your Edict, to depart their native Seats and Habitations, upon pain of capital Puniſhment, and Forfeiture of all their Fortunes and Eſtates, unleſs they will give Security to relinquiſh their Religion within twenty days, and embrace the Roman Catholick Faith. And that when they apply'd themſelves to your Royal Highneſs in a moſt ſuppliant manner, imploring a Revocation of the ſaid Edict, and that being receiv'd into priſtin favour, they might be reſtor'd to the Liberty granted 'em by your Predeceſſors, a part of your Army fell upon 'em, moſt cruelly ſlew ſeveral, put others in Chains, and compell'd the reſt to fly into deſert Places, and to the Mountains cover'd with Snow, where ſome hundreds of Families are reduc'd to ſuch Diſtreſs, that 'tis greatly to be fear'd they will in a ſhort time all miſerably periſh through Cold and Hunger. Theſe things, when they were related to us, we could not chuſe but be touch'd with extream Grief and Compaſſion for the Sufferings and Calamities of this afflicted People. Now in regard we muſt acknowledg our ſelves link'd together not only by the ſame tye of Humanity, but by joynt Communion of the ſame Religion, we thought it impoſſible for us to ſatisfy our Duty to God, to brotherly Charity, or our Profeſſion of the ſame Religion, if we ſhould only be affected with a bare Sorrow for the Miſery and Calamity of our Brethren, and not contribute all our Endeavours to relieve and ſuccour 'em in their unexpected Adverſity, as much as in us lies. Therefore in a greater meaſure we moſt earneſtly beſeech and conjure your Royal Highneſs, that you would call back to your Thoughts the Moderation of your moſt ſerene Predeceſſors, and the Liberty by them granted and confirm'd from time to time to their Subjects the Vaudois. In granting and confirming which, as they did that which without all queſtion was moſt grateful to God, who has been pleas'd to reſerve the Juriſdiction and Power over the Conſcience to himſelf alone, ſo there is no doubt but that they had a due conſideration of their Subjects alſo, whom they found ſtout and moſt faithful in War, and always obedient in Peace. And as your Royal Serenity in other things moſt laudably follows the Footſteps of your immortal Anceſtors, ſo we again and again beſeech your Royal Highneſs not to ſwerve from the Path wherein they trod in this particular; but that you would vouchſafe to abrogate both this Edict, and whatſoever elſe may be decreed to the Diſturbance of your Subjects upon the account of the Reform'd Religion; that you would ratify to 'em their conceded Privileges and priſtin Liberty, and command their Loſſes to be repair'd, and that an end be put to their Oppreſſions. Which if your Royal Highneſs ſhall be pleas'd to ſee perform'd, you will do a thing moſt acceptable to God, revive and comfort the miſerable in dire Calamity, and moſt highly oblige all your Neighbours that profeſs the Reformed Religion, but more eſpecially our ſelves, who ſhall be bound to look upon your Clemency and Benignity toward your Subjects, as the fruit of our earneſt Solicitation. Which will both engage us to a reciprocal return of all good Offices, and lay the ſolid Foundations not only of eſtabliſhing, but encreaſing Alliance and Friendſhip between this Republick and your Dominions. Nor do we leſs promiſe this to our ſelves from your Juſtice and Moderation; to which we beſeech Almighty God to encline your Mind and Thoughts. And ſo we cordially implore juſt Heaven to beſtow upon your Highneſs and your People the Bleſſings of Peace and Truth, and proſperous Succeſs in all your Affairs.

Whitehall,
May —, 1655.

Oliver, Protector of the Republick of England, to the moſt Serene Prin of Tranſilvania, Greeting.

Moſt Serene Prince,

BY your Letters of the 16th of November, 1654. you have made us ſenſible of your ſingular good Will and Affection toward us; and your Envoy, who deliver'd thoſe Letters to us, more amply declar'd your deſire of contracting Alliance and Friendſhip with us. Certainly for our parts, we do not a little rejoyce at this Opportunity offer'd us to declare and make manifeſt our Affection to your Highneſs, and how great a value we juſtly ſet upon your Perſon. But after fame had reported to us your egregious Merits and Labours undertaken in behalf of the Chriſtian Republick, when you were pleas'd that all theſe things, and what you have farther in your Thoughts to do in the defence and for promoting the Chriſtian Intereſt, ſhould be in friendly manner imparted to us by Letters from your ſelf, this afforded us a more plentiful occaſion of Joy and Satisfaction, to hear that God, in thoſe remoter Regions, had rais'd up to himſelf ſo potent and renowned a Miniſter of his Glory and Providence: And that this great Miniſter of Heaven, ſo fam'd for his Courage and Succeſs, ſhould be deſirous to aſſociate with us in the common Defence of the Proteſtant Religion, at this time wickedly aſſail'd by Words and Deeds. Nor is it to be queſtion'd but that God, who has infus'd into us both, though ſeparated by ſuch a ſpacious Interval of many Climates, the ſame Deſires and Thoughts of defending the Orthodox Religion, will be our Inſtructor and Author of the ways and means whereby we may be aſſiſtant and uſeful to our ſelves and the reſt of the Reformed Cities, provided we watch all Opportunities that God ſhall put into our hands, and be not wanting to lay hold of 'em. In the mean time we cannot without an extream and penetrating Sorrow forbear putting your Highneſs in mind how unmercifully the Duke of Savoy has perſecuted his own Subjects, profeſſing the Orthodox Faith, in certain Valleys, at the feet of the Alps. Whom he has not only conſtrain'd by a moſt ſevere Edict, as many as refuſe to embrace the Catholick Religion, to forſake their native Habitations, Goods and Eſtates, but has fall'n upon 'em with his Army, put ſeveral moſt cruelly to the Sword, others more barbarouſly tormented to Death, and driven the greateſt number to the Mountains, there to be conſum'd with Cold and Hunger, expoſing their Houſes to the Fury, and their Goods to the Plunder of his Executioners. Theſe things, as they have already been related to your Highneſs, ſo we readily aſſure our ſelves, that ſo much Cruelty cannot but be grievouſly diſpleaſing to your ears, and that you will not be wanting to afford your Aid and Succour to thoſe miſerable Wretches, if there be any that ſurvive ſo many Slaughters and Calamities. For our parts, we have written to the Duke of Savoy, beſeeching him to remove his incens'd Anger from his Subjects; as alſo to the King of France, that he would vouchſafe to do the ſame; and laſtly, to the Princes of the Reformed Religion, to the end they might underſtand our Sentiments concerning ſo fierce and ſavage a piece of Cruelty. Which though firſt begun upon thoſe poor and helpleſs People, however threatens all that profeſs the ſame Religion, and therefore impoſes upon all a greater neceſſity of providing for themſelves in general, and conſulting the common Safety; which is the Courſe that we ſhall always follow, as God ſhall be pleas'd to direct us. Of which your Highneſs may be aſſur'd, as alſo of our Sincerity and Affection to your Serenity, whereby we are engag'd to wiſh all proſperous Succeſs to your Affairs, and a happy iſſue of all your Enterprizes and Endeavours, in aſſerting the Liberty of the Goſpel, and the Worſhippers of it.

Whitehall,
May —, 1655.

Oliver

Oliver Protector, to the moſt Serene Prince, Charles Guſtavus ~~Adolphus~~, King of the Swedes, Greeting.

VVE make no queſtion but that the ſame of that moſt rigid Edict has reach'd your Dominions; whereby the Duke of Savoy has totally ruin'd his Proteſtant Subjects inhabiting the Alpine Valleys, and commanded 'em to be exterminated from their native Seats and Habitations, unleſs they will give ſecurity to renounce their Religion receiv'd from their Forefathers, in exchange for the Roman Catholick Superſtition, and that within twenty days at fartheſt; ſo that many being kill'd, the reſt ſtript to their Skins, and expos'd to moſt certain Deſtruction, are now forc'd to wander over deſert Mountains, and through perpetual Winter, together with their Wives and Children, half dead with Cold and Hunger: and that your Majeſty has laid it to heart, with a pious Sorrow and compaſſionate Conſideration we as little doubt. For that the Proteſtant Name and Cauſe, although they differ among themſelves in ſome things of little Conſequence, is neverthelesſ the ſame in general, and united in one common Intereſt, the hatred of our Adverſaries, alike incens'd againſt Proteſtants, very eaſily demonſtrates. Now there is no body can be ignorant, that the Kings of the Swedes have always joyn'd with the Reformed, carrying their Victorious Arms into Germany in defence of the Proteſtants without diſtinction. Therefore we make it our chief Requeſt, and that in a more eſpecial manner to your Majeſty, that you would ſolicit the Duke of Savoy by Letters, and by interpoſing your intermediating Authority, endeavour to avert the horrid Cruelty of this Edict, if poſſible, from People no leſs Innocent than Religious. For we think it ſuperfluous to admoniſh your Majeſty whither theſe rigorous Beginnings tend, and what they threaten to all the Proteſtants in general. But if he rather chuſe to liſten to his Anger, than to our joint Intreaties and Interceſſions; if there be any Tye, any Charity or Communion of Religion to be believ'd and regarded, upon Conſultations duly firſt communicated to your Majeſty, and the chief of the Proteſtant Princes, ſome other courſe is to be ſpeedily taken, that ſuch a numerous multitude of our innocent Brethren may not miſerably periſh for want of Succour and Aſſiſtance. Which in regard we make no queſtion but that it is your Majeſty's Opinion and Determination, there can be nothing in our Opinion more prudently reſolv'd, than to joyn our Reputation, Authority, Counſels, Forces, and whatever elſe is needful, with all the ſpeed that may be, in purſuance of ſo pious a Deſign. In the mean time we beſeech Almighty God to bleſs your Majeſty.

Oliver Protector, &c. to the High and Mighty Lords, the States of the United Provinces.

VVE make no queſtion but that you have already bin inform'd of the Duke of Savoy's Edict, ſet forth againſt his Subjects inhabiting the Valleys at the feet of the Alps, ancient Profeſſors of the Orthodox Faith; by which Edict they are commanded to abandon their Native Habitations, ſtript of all their Fortunes, unleſs within twenty days they embrace the Roman Faith; and with what Cruelty the Authority of this Edict has rag'd againſt a needy and harmleſs People, many being ſlain by the Soldiers, the reſt plunder'd and driven from their Houſes, together with their Wives and Children, to combat Cold and Hunger among deſert Mountains, and perpetual Snow. Theſe things with what commotion of Mind you heard related, what a fellow-feeling of the Calamities of Brethren pierc'd your Breaſts, we readily conjecture from the depth of our own Sorrow, which certainly is moſt heavy and afflictive. For being engag'd together by the ſame Tye of Religion, no wonder we ſhould be ſo deeply mov'd with the ſame Affections upon the dreadful and undeſerved Sufferings of our Brethren. Beſides, that your conſpicuous Piety and Charity toward the Orthodox, wherever overborn and op-oppreſs'd, has bin frequently experienc'd in the moſt urging Straits and Calamities of the Churches. For my own part, unleſs my thoughts deceive me, there is nothing wherein I ſhould deſire more willingly to be overcome, than in Good-will and Charity toward Brethren of the ſame Religion, afflicted and wrong'd in their quiet Enjoyments; as being one that would be accounted always ready to prefer the Peace and Safety of the Churches before my particular Intereſts. So far therefore as hitherto lay in our Power, we have written to the Duke of Savoy, even almoſt to Supplication, beſeeching him that he would admit into his Breaſt more placid Thoughts and kinder Effects of his Favour toward his moſt Innocent Subjects and Suppliants; that he would reſtore the Miſerable to their Habitations and Eſtates, and grant 'em their priſtine Freedom in the Exerciſe of their Religion. Moreover, we wrote to the chiefeſt Princes and Magiſtrates of the Proteſtants, whom we thought moſt nearly concern'd in theſe Matters, that they would lend us their Aſſiſtance to intreat and pacify the Duke of Savoy in their behalf. And we make no doubt but you have done the ſame, and perhaps much more. For this ſo dangerous a Precedent, and lately renew'd Severity of utmoſt Cruelty toward the Reformed, if the Authors of it meet with proſperous Succeſs, to what apparent Dangers it reduces our Religion, we need not admoniſh your Prudence. On the other ſide, If the Duke ſhall once but permit himſelf to be aton'd, and won by our united Applications, not only our afflicted Brethren, but we our ſelves ſhall reap the noble and abounding Harveſt and reward of this laborious Undertaking. But if he ſtill perſiſt in the ſame obſtinate Reſolutions of reducing to utmoſt Extremity thoſe People, among whom our Religion was either diſſeminated by the firſt Doctors of the Goſpel, and preſerv'd from the Defilement of Superſtition, or elſe reſtor'd to its priſtine Sincerity long before other Nations obtain'd that Felicity, and determines their utter Extirpation and Deſtruction; we are ready to take ſuch other Courſe and Counſels with your-ſelves, in common with the reſt of our Reformed Friends and Confederates, as may be moſt neceſſary for the preſervation of Juſt and Good Men, upon the brink of inevitable Ruin; and to make the Duke himſelf ſenſible, that we can no longer neglect the heavy Oppreſſions and Calamities of our Orthodox Brethren. Farewel.

To the Evangelick Cities of Switzerland.

VVE make no queſtion but the late Calamity of the Piemontois, profeſſing our Religion, reached your Ears before the unwelcome News of it arriv'd with us: Who being a People under the protection and juriſdiction of the Duke of Savoy, and by a ſevere Edict of their Prince commanded to depart their Native Habitations, unleſs within three days they gave Security to embrace the Roman Religion, ſoon after were aſſail'd by armed Violence, that turn'd their Dwellings into Slaughter-houſes, while others, without Number, were terrifi'd into Baniſhment, where now naked and afflicted, without Houſe or Home, or any Covering from the Weather, and ready to periſh through hunger and cold, they miſerably wander thorough deſert Mountains, and depths of Snow, together with their Wives and Children. And far leſs reaſon have we to doubt, but that ſo ſoon as they came to your knowledg, you laid theſe things to heart, with a Compaſſion no leſs ſenſible of their multipli'd Miſeries, than our ſelves; the more deeply imprinted perhaps in your minds, as being next Neighbours to the Sufferers. Beſides, that we have abundant proof of your ſingular Love and Affection for the Orthodox Faith, of your Conſtancy in retaining it, and your Fortitude in defending it. Seeing then, by the more ſtrict Communion of Religion, that you, together with our ſelves, are all Brethren alike, or rather one Body with thoſe unfortunate People, of which no Member can be afflicted without the feeling, without pain, without the detriment and hazard of the reſt; we thought it convenient to write to your Lordſhips concerning this Matter, and let you underſtand how much we believe it to be the general Intereſt of us all, as much as in us lies, with our common Aid and Succour, to relieve our exterminated and indigent Brethren; and not only to take care for removing their Miſeries and Afflictions, but alſo to provide that the Miſchief ſpread no farther, nor incroach upon our ſelves in general, encourag'd by Example and Succeſs. We have written Letters to the Duke of Savoy, wherein we have moſt earneſtly beſought him, out of his wonted Clemency, to deal more gently and mildly with his moſt faithful Subjects, and to reſtore 'em, almoſt ruin'd as they are, to their Goods and Habitations. And we are in hopes, that by theſe our Intreaties, or rather by the united Interceſſions of us all, the moſt Serene Prince at length will be aton'd, and grant what we have requeſted with ſo much importunity. But if his Mind be obſtinately bent to other Determinations, we are ready to communicate our Conſultations with yours, by what moſt prevalent means to relieve and re-eſtabliſh moſt innocent Men, and our moſt dearly beloved Brethren in Chriſt, tormented and overlaid with ſo many Wrongs and Oppreſſions; and preſerve 'em from inevitable and undeſerved Ruin. Of whoſe Welfare and Safety, as I am aſſur'd, that you, according to your wonted Piety, are moſt cordially tender; ſo, for our own parts, we cannot but in our Opinion prefer their Preſervation before our moſt important Intereſts, even the ſafeguard of our own Life. Farewel.

To the moſt Serene and Potent Prince, Lewis King of France.

Moſt Serene and Potent King;

BY your Majeſty's Letters which you wrote in anſwer to ours of the 25*th* of May, we readily underſtand, that we fail'd not in our Judgment, that the inhuman Slaughter, and barbarous Maſſacres of thoſe Men who profeſs the Reformed Religion in Savoy, perpetrated by ſome of your Regiments, were the Effects neither of your Orders nor Commands. And it afforded us a ſingular occaſion of Joy, to hear that your Majeſty had ſo timely ſignifi'd to your Colonels and Officers, whoſe violent Precipitancy ingag'd 'em in thoſe inhuman Butcheries without the encouragement of lawful Allowance, how diſpleaſing they were to your Majeſty; that you had admoniſh'd the Duke himſelf to forbear ſuch Acts of Cruelty; and that you had interpos'd with ſo much Fidelity and Humanity, all the high Veneration paid you in that Court, your near Alliance and Authority, for reſtoring to their ancient Abodes thoſe unfortunate Exiles. And it was our hopes, That that Prince would in ſome meaſure have condeſcended to the good Pleaſure and Interceſſions of your Majeſty. But finding not any thing obtain'd, either by your own, nor the Intreaties and Importunities of other Princes in the Cauſe of the Diſtreſſed, we deem'd it not foreign from our Duty to ſend this Noble Perſon, under the Character of our Extraordinary Envoy, to the Duke of Savoy, more amply and fully to lay before him, how deeply ſenſible we are of ſuch exaſperated Cruelties inflicted upon the Profeſſors of the ſame Religion with our ſelves, and all this too out of a hatred of the ſame Worſhip. And we have reaſon to hope a Succeſs of this Negotiation ſo much the more proſperous, if your Majeſty would vouchſafe to employ your Authority and Aſſiſtance once again with ſo much the more urgent Importunity; and as you have undertaken for thoſe Indigent People, that they will be Faithful and Obedient to their Prince, ſo you would be graciouſly pleas'd to take care of their Welfare and Safety, that no farther Oppreſſions of this nature, no more ſuch diſmal Calamities may be the Portion of the Innocent and Peaceful.

This being truly royal and juſt in it ſelf, and highly agreeable to your Benignity and Clemency, which every where protects in ſoft ſecurity ſo many of your Subjects profeſſing the ſame Religion, we cannot but expect, as it behoves us, from your Majeſty. Which Act of yours, as it will more cloſely bind to your Subjection all the Proteſtants throughout your ſpacious Dominions, whoſe Affection and Fidelity to your Predeceſſors and your ſelf in moſt important Diſtreſſes have bin often conſpicuouſly made known; ſo will it fully convince all Foreign Princes, that the Advice or Intention of your Majeſty were no way contributory to this prodigious Violence, whatever inflam'd your Miniſters and Officers to promote it. More eſpecially, if your Majeſty ſhall inflict deſerved Puniſhment upon thoſe Captains and Miniſters, who of their own Authority, and to gratifie their own Wills, adventur'd the perpetrating ſuch dreadful Acts of Inhumanity. In the mean while, ſince your Majeſty has aſſur'd us of your juſtly merited Averſion to theſe moſt inhuman and cruel Proceedings, we doubt not but you will afford a ſecure Sanctuary and Shelter within your Kingdom to all thoſe miſerable Exiles that ſhall flye to your Majeſty for Protection; and that you will not give permiſſion to any of your Subjects to aſſiſt the Duke of Savoy to their prejudice. It remains that we make known to your Majeſty, how highly we eſteem and value your Friendſhip: In teſtimony of which, we farther affirm there ſhall never be wanting upon all occaſions the real aſſurances and effects of our Proteſtation.

White-Hall, July 29. 1655.

Your Majeſty's moſt affectionate, Oliver
Protector of the Commonwealth of

To the moſt Eminent Lord, Cardinal Mazarine.

Moſt Eminent Lord Cardinal,

HAving deem'd it neceſſary to ſend this Noble Perſon to the King with Letters, a Copy of which is here encloſ'd, we gave him alſo farther in charge to ſalute your Excellency in our Name, as having entruſted to his Fidelity certain other matters to be communicated to your Eminency. In reference to which Affairs, I intreat your Eminency to give him entire Credit, as being a Perſon in whom I have repoſ'd a more than ordinary Confidence.

White-Hall, July 29. 1655.

Your Eminency's moſt affectionate,
Oliver Protector of the Commonwealth of England.

Oliver Protector of the Commonwealth of England, to the moſt Serene Prince, Frederick III. King of Denmark, Norway, &c.

WIth what a ſevere and unmerciful Edict Immanuel Duke of Savoy has expell'd from their Native Seats his Subjects inhabiting the Valleys of Piemont, Men otherwiſe harmleſs, only for many years remarkably famous for embracing the Purity of Religion; and after a dreadful ſlaughter of ſome numbers, how he has expoſ'd the reſt to the Hardſhips of thoſe deſert Mountains, ſtript to their Skins, and barr'd from all Relief, we believe your Majeſty has long ſince heard, and doubt not but your Majeſty is touch'd with a real Commiſeration of their Sufferings, as becomes ſo puiſſant a Defender and Prince of the Reformed Faith: For indeed the Inſtitutions of Chriſtian Religion require, that whatever Miſchiefs and Miſeries any part of us undergo, it ſhould behove us all to be deeply ſenſible of the ſame: Nor does any Man better than your Majeſty foreſee, if we may be thought able to give a right conjecture of your Piety and Prudence, what dangers the ſucceſs and example of this Fact portend to our ſelves in particular, and to the whole Proteſtant Name in general. We have written the more willingly to your ſelf, to the end we might aſſure your Majeſty, that the ſame Sorrow which we hope you have conceiv'd for the Calamity of our moſt innocent Brethren, the ſame Opinion, the ſame Judgment you have of the whole matter, is plainly and ſincerely our own. We have therefore ſent our Letters to the Duke of Savoy, wherein we have moſt importunately beſought him to ſpare thoſe miſerable People that implore his Mercy, and that he would no longer ſuffer that dreadful Edict to be in force: Which if your Majeſty and the reſt of the Reformed Princes would vouchſafe to do, as we are apt to believe they have already done, there is ſome hope that the Anger of the moſt Serene Duke may be aſſwag'd, and that his Indignation will relent upon the Interceſſion and Importunities of his Neighbour Princes. Or if he perſiſt in his Determinations, we proteſt our ſelves ready, together with your Majeſty, and the reſt of our Confederates of the Reformed Religion, to take ſuch ſpeedy methods as may enable us, as far as in us lies, to relieve the Diſtreſſes of ſo many miſerable Creatures, and provide for their Liberty and Safety. In the mean time we beſeech Almighty God to bleſs your Majeſty with all Proſperity.

White-hall, May——1655.

Oliver Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. to the moſt Noble the Conſuls and Senators of the City of Geneva.

WE had before made known to your Lordſhips our exceſſive Sorrow for the heavy and unheard of Calamities of the Proteſtants inhabiting the Valleys of Piemont, whom the Duke of Savoy perſecutes with ſo much Cruelty, but that we made it our buſineſs that you ſhould at the ſame time underſtand that we are not only affected with the multitude of their Sufferings, but are uſing the utmoſt of our Endeavours to relieve and comfort 'em in their Diſtreſſes. To that purpoſe we have taken care for a gathering of Alms to be made throughout this whole Republick; which upon good grounds we expect will be ſuch, as will demonſtrate the Affection of this Nation toward their Brethren labouring under the burden of ſuch horrid Inhumanities; and that as the Communion of Religion is the ſame between both People, ſo the ſenſe of their Calamities is no leſs the ſame. In the mean time while the Collections of the Money go forward, which in regard they will require ſome time to accompliſh, and for that the Wants and Neceſſities of thoſe deplorable People will admit of no delay, we thought it requiſite to remit beforehand two thouſand Pounds of the Value of England, with all poſſible ſpeed to be diſtributed among ſuch as ſhall be judg'd to be moſt in preſent need of Comfort and Succour. Now in regard we are not ignorant how deeply the Miſeries and Wrongs of thoſe moſt innocent People have affected your ſelves, and that you will not think amiſs of any Labour or Pains where you can be aſſiſting to their Relief, we made no ſcruple to commit the paying and diſtributing this Sum of Money to your Care; and to give ye this farther trouble, that according to your wonted Piety and Prudence, you would take care that the ſaid Money may be diſtributed equally to the moſt neceſſitous, to the end that though the Sum be ſmall, yet there may be ſomething to refreſh and revive the moſt poor and needy, till we can afford 'em a more plentiful Supply. And thus, not making any doubt but you will take in good part the trouble impos'd upon ye, we beſeech Almighty God to ſtir up the Hearts of all his People profeſſing the Orthodox Religion, to reſolve upon the common Defence of themſelves, and the mutual Aſſiſtance of each other againſt their imbitter'd and moſt implacable Enemies: In the proſecution of which we ſhould rejoyce that our helping hand might be any way ſerviceable to the Church. Farewel.

Fifteen hundred Pounds of the foreſaid two thouſand will be remitted by Gerard Hench from Paris, and the other five hundred Pounds will be taken care of by Letters from the Lord Stoup.

June 8. 1655.

Oliver Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. to the moſt Serene Prince, the Duke of Venice.

Moſt Serene Prince,

AS it has bin always a great occaſion of rejoycing to us when ever any proſperous Succeſs attended your Arms, but more eſpecially againſt the common Enemy of the Chriſtian Name; ſo neither are we ſorry for the late Advantage gain'd by your Fleet, though as we underſtand, it happen'd not a little to the Detriment of our People: For certain of our Merchants, William and Daniel Williams, and Edward Beale, have ſet forth in a Petition preſented to us, that a Ship of theirs, call'd the Great Prince, was lately ſent by them with Goods and Merchandize to Conſtantinople, where the ſaid Ship was detain'd by the Miniſters of the Port, to carry Souldiers and Proviſions to Crete; and that the ſaid Ship being conſtrain'd to ſail along with the ſame Fleet of the Turks, which was ſet upon and vanquiſh'd by the Gallies of the Venetians, was taken, carri'd away to Venice, and there adjudg'd lawful Prize by the Judges of the Admiralty. Now therefore in regard the ſaid Ship was preſs'd by the Turks, and forc'd into their Service without the Knowledg or Conſent of the Owners directly or indirectly obtain'd, and that it was impoſſible for her, being ſhip'd with Souldiers, to withdraw from the Engagement, we moſt earneſtly requeſt your Serenity, that you will remit that Sentence of your Admiralty, as a Preſent to our Friendſhip, and take ſuch care that the Ship may be reſtor'd to the Owners, no way deſerving the Diſpleaſure of your Republick by any Act of theirs. In the obtaining of which requeſt, more eſpecially upon our Interceſſion, while we find the Merchants themſelves ſo well aſſur'd of your Clemency, it behoves us not to queſtion it. And ſo we beſeech the Almighty God to continue his proſperous Bleſſings upon your noble Deſigns, and the Venetian Republick.

Weſtminſter, Decemb.—1655.

Your Serenity's, and the Venetian Republick's moſt affectionate, Oliver Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c.

Oliver Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. to the moſt Serene Prince, Lewis King of France.

Moſt Serene King,

CErtain of our Merchants, by name Samuel Mico, William Cockain, George Poyner, and ſeveral others, in a Petition to us have ſet forth, That in the year 1650. they laded a Ship of theirs, call'd the Unicorn, with Goods of a very conſiderable Value; and that the ſaid Ship being thus laden with Silk, Oil, and other Merchandize, amounting to above thirty four thouſand of our Pounds, was taken by the Admiral and Vice-Admiral of your Majeſty's Fleet in the Mediterranean Sea. Now it appears to us, that our People who were then in the Ship, by reaſon there was at that time a Peace between the French and us, that never had bin violated in the leaſt, were not willing to make any Defence againſt your Majeſty's Royal Ships, and therefore overrul'd beſides by the fair Promiſes of the Captains Paul and Terrery, who faithfully engag'd to diſmiſs our People, they paid their Obedience to the Maritime Laws, and produc'd their Bills of Lading. Moreover, we find that the Merchants aforeſaid ſent their Agent into France to demand Reſtitution of the ſaid Ship and Goods: And then it was, that after above three Years ſlipt away, when the Suit was brought ſo far that Sentence of Reſtitution or Condemnation was to have bin given, that his Eminency Cardinal Mazarine acknowledg'd to their Factor Hugh Morel, the Wrong that has bin done the Merchants, and undertook that Satiſfaction ſhould be given, ſo ſoon as the League between the two Nations, which was then under Negotiation, ſhould be ratifi'd and confirm'd. Nay, ſince that, his Excellency M. de Bourdeaux, your Majeſty's Embaſſador, aſſur'd us in expreſs words, by the Command of your Majeſty and your Council; That care ſhould be taken of that Ship and Goods in a particular Exception, apart from thoſe Controverſies, for the deciſion of which a general Proviſion was made by the League; of which promiſe, the Embaſſador, now opportunely arriv'd here to ſolicit ſome buſineſs of his own, is a Teſtimony no way to be queſtion'd. Which being true, and the right of the Merchants in redemanding their Ship and Goods ſo undeniably apparent, we moſt earneſtly requeſt your Majeſty, that they may meet with no delay in obtaining what is juſtly their due, but that your Majeſty will admit the grant of this Favour, as the firſt fruits of our reviv'd Amity, and the lately renew'd League between us. The refuſal of which, as we have no reaſon to doubt, ſo we beſeech Almighty God to bleſs with all Proſperity both your Majeſty and your Kingdom.

To the Evangelic Cities of Switzerland.

IN what Condition your Affairs are, which is not the beſt, we are abundantly inform'd, as well by your publick Acts tranſmitted to us by our Agent at Geneva, as alſo by your Letters from Zurick, bearing date the 27*th* of December. Whereby, although we are ſorry to find your Peace, and ſuch a laſting League of Confederacy broken; nevertheleſs ſince it appears to have happen'd through no fault of yours, we are in hopes that the iniquity and perverſeneſs of your Adverſaries are contriving new occaſions for ye to make known your long-ago experienc'd Fortitude and Reſolution in defence of the Evangelick Faith. For as for thoſe of the Canton of Schwits, who account it a capital Crime for any Perſon to embrace our Religion, what they are might and main deſigning, and whoſe inſtigations have incens'd 'em to reſolutions of Hoſtility againſt the Orthodox Religion, no body can be ignorant, who has not yet forgot that moſt deteſtable Slaughter of our Brethren in Piemont. Wherefore, moſt beloved Friends, what you were always wont to be, with God's Aſſiſtance ſtill continue, Magnanimous and Reſolute; ſuffer not your Privileges, your Confederacies, the Liberty of your Conſciences, your Religion it ſelf to be trampled under foot by the worſhippers of Idols; and ſo prepare your ſelves, that you may not ſeem to be the Defenders only of your own Freedom and Safety, but be ready likewiſe to aid and ſuccour, as far as in you lies, your neighbouring Brethren, more eſpecially thoſe moſt deplorable Piedmontois; as being certainly convinc'd of this, that a Paſſage was lately intended to have bin open'd over their ſlaughter'd Bodies to your ſides. As for our part be aſſur'd, that we are no leſs anxious and ſolicitous for your Welfare and Proſperity, than if this conflagration had broken forth in our Republick; or as if the Axes of the Schwits Canton had bin ſharpen'd for our Necks, or that their Swords had bin drawn againſt our Breaſts, as indeed they were againſt the boſoms of all the Reformed. Therefore ſo ſoon as we were inform'd of the Condition of your Affairs, and the obſtinate Animoſities of your Enemies, adviſing with ſome ſincere and honeſt Perſons, together with ſome Miniſters of the Church moſt eminent for their Piety, about ſending to your Aſſiſtance ſuch Succour as the preſent poſture of our Affairs would permit, we came to thoſe Reſults which our Envoy Pell will impart to your Conſideration. In the mean time we ceaſe not to implore the Bleſſing of the Almighty upon all your Counſels, and the Protection of your moſt juſt Cauſe, as well in War as in Peace.

Moſt Serene King,

SEeing it is a thing well known to all men, that there ought to be a Communication of Concerns among Friends, whether in Proſperity or Adverſity; it cannot but be moſt grateful to us, that your Majeſty ſhould vouchſafe to impart unto us by your Letters the moſt pleaſing and delightful part of your Friendſhip, which is your joy. In regard it is a mark of ſingular Civility, and truly Royal, as not to live only to a man's ſelf, ſo neither to rejoyce alone, unleſs he be ſenſible that his Friends and Confederates partake of his gladneſs. Certainly then, we have reaſon to rejoyce for the Birth of a young Prince born to ſuch an excellent King, and ſent into the World to be the Heir of his Father's Glory and Vertue; and this at ſuch a lucky ſeaſon, that we have no leſs cauſe to congratulate the Royal Parent with the memorable Omen that befel the famous Philip of Macedon, who at the ſame time receiv'd the Tydings of Alexander's Birth, and the Conqueſt of the Illyrians. For we make no queſtion, but the wreſting of the Kingdom of Poland from Papal Subjection, as it were a Horn diſmembred from the Head of the Beaſt, and the Peace ſo much deſir'd by all Good men, concluded with the Duke of Brandenburg, will be moſt highly conducing to the Tranquillity and Advantage of the Church. Heaven grant a Concluſion correſpondent to ſuch ſignal beginnings; and may the Son be like the Father in Vertue, Piety, and Renown, obtain'd by great Atchievments. Which is that we wiſh may luckily come to paſs, and which we beg of the Almighty, ſo propitious hitherto to your Affairs.

To the King of Denmark.

Moſt Serene and Potent Prince,

JOhn Freeman and Philip Traveſs, Citizens of this Republick, by a Petition preſented to us, in their own and the Name of ſeveral other Merchants of London, have made a Complaint, That whereas about the Month of March in the year 1653. they freighted a certain Ship of Sunderburgh, call'd the Saviour, Nicolas Weinskinks Maſter, with Woollen Cloth, and other Commodities to the Value of above three thouſand Pound, with Orders to the Maſter that he ſhould ſail directly up the Baltick for Dantzick, paying the uſual Tribute at Elſenore, to which purpoſe in particular they gave him Money; nevertheleſs that the ſaid Maſter, perfidiouſly and contrary to the Orders of the ſaid Merchants, ſlipping by Elſenore without paying the uſual Duty, thought to have proceeded in his Voyage, but that the Ship for this reaſon was immediately ſeiz'd and detain'd with all her Lading. After due conſideration of which Complaints, we wrote in favour of the Merchants to your Majeſty's Embaſſador reſiding at London, who promiſ'd, as they ſay, that as ſoon as he return'd to your Majeſty, he would take care that the Merchants ſhould be taken into Conſideration. But he being ſent to negotiate your Majeſty's Affairs in other Countries, the Merchants attended upon him in vain, both before and after his departure; ſo that they were forc'd to ſend their Agent to proſecute their Right and Claim at Copenhagen, and demand Reſtitution of the Ship and Goods; but all the benefit they reap'd by it, was only to add more expences to their former damages, and a great deal of labour and pains thrown away; the Goods being condemn'd to Confiſcation, and ſtill detain'd: Whereas by the Law of Denmark, as they ſet forth in their Petition, the Maſter is to be puniſh'd for his Offence, and the Ship is to be condemn'd, but not the Goods. And they look upon this misfortune to lie the more heavy upon 'em, in regard the Duty which is to be paid at Elſenore, as they tell us, is but very ſmall. Wherefore ſeeing our Merchants ſeem to have given no cauſe of Proſcription, and for that the Maſter confeſs'd before his Death, that this damage befel them only through his neglect; and the Father of the Maſter deceas'd, by his Petition to your Majeſty, as we are given to underſtand, by laying all the blame upon his Son, has acquitted the Merchants, we could not but believe the detaining of the ſaid Ship and Goods to be moſt unjuſt; and therefore we are confident, that ſo ſoon as your Majeſty ſhall be rightly inform'd of the whole matter, you will not only diſapprove of theſe Oppreſſions of your Miniſters, but give command that they be call'd to an account, that the Goods be reſtor'd to the Owners or their Factors, and Reparation made 'em for the Loſſes they have ſuſtain'd. All which we moſt earneſtly requeſt of your Majeſty, as being no more than what is ſo juſt and conſentaneous to reaſon, that a more equitable demand, or more legal Satisfaction cannot well be made, conſidering the Juſtice of our Merchants Cauſe, and which your own Subjects would think but fair and honeſt upon the like occaſions.

To the moſt Serene Prince, John the Fourth, King of Portugal, &c.

Moſt Serene King,

THE Peace and Friendſhip which your Majeſty deſir'd, by your noble and ſplendid Embaſſy ſent to us ſome time ſince, after certain Negotiations begun by the Parlament, in whom the Supream Power was veſted at that time, as it was always moſt affectionately wiſh'd for by us, with the aſſiſtance of God, and that we might not be wanting in the Adminiſtration of the Government which we have now taken upon us, at length we brought to a happy Concluſion, and as we hope, as a ſacred Act, have ratifi'd it to perpetuity. And therefore we ſend back to your Majeſty your extraordinary Embaſſador, the Lord John Roderigo de Sita Meneſes, Count of Pennagiliada, a Perſon both approv'd by your Majeſty's judgment, and by us experienc'd to excel in Civility, Ingenuity, Prudence and Fidelity, beſides the merited applauſe which he has juſtly gain'd by accompliſhing the ends of his Embaſſy, which is the Peace which he carries along with him to his Country. But as to what we perceive by your Letters dated from Lisbon the ſecond of April, that is to ſay, how highly your Majeſty eſteems our Amity, how cordially you favour our Advancement, and rejoice at our having taken the Government of the Republick upon us, which you are pleas'd to manifeſt by ſingular Teſtimonies of Kindneſs and Affection, we ſhall make it our buſineſs, that all the World may underſtand, by our readineſs at all times to ſerve your Majeſty, that there could be nothing more acceptable or grateful to us. Nor are we leſs earneſt in our Prayers to God for your Majeſty's ſafety, the welfare of your Kingdom, and the proſperous ſucceſs of your Affairs.

Oliver Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the High and Mighty States of the United Provinces.

Moſt High and Mighty Lords, our deareſt Friends;

CErtain Merchants, our Country-men, Thomas Baſſel, Richard Beare, and others their Co-Partners, have made their Complaints before us, That a certain Ship of theirs, the Edmund and John, in her Voyage from the Coaſt of Braſile to Lisbon, was ſet upon by a Privateer of Fluſhing, call'd the Red-Lyon, commanded by Lambert Bartelſon, but upon this condition, which the writing ſign'd by Lambert himſelf teſtifies, That the Ship and whatſoever Goods belong'd to the Engliſh ſhould be reſtor'd at Fluſhing: where when the Veſſel arriv'd, the Ship indeed with what peculiarly belong'd to the Seamen was reſtor'd, but the Engliſh Merchants Goods were detain'd and put forthwith to ſale: For the Merchants who had receiv'd the Damage, when they had ſu'd for their Goods in the Court of Fluſhing, after great Expences for five years together, loſt their Suit by the pronouncing of a moſt unjuſt Sentence againſt 'em by thoſe Judges, of which ſome being intereſted in the Privateer, were both Judges and Adverſaries, and no leſs criminal altogether. So that now they have no other hopes but only in your Equity and uncorrupted Faith, to which at laſt they fly for Succour; and which they believ'd they ſhould find the more inclinable to do 'em Juſtice, if aſſiſted by our Recommendation. And men are ſurely to be pardon'd, if, afraid of all things in ſo great a ſtruggle for their Eſtates, they rather call to mind what they have reaſon to fear from your Authority and high Power, than what they have to hope well of their Cauſe, eſpecially before ſincere and upright Judges: Though for our parts we make no queſtion, but that induc'd by your Religion, your Juſtice, your Integrity, rather than by our Intreaties, you will give that Judgment which is juſt and equal, and truly becoming your ſelves. God preſerve both you and your Republick to his own Glory, and the defence and ſuccour of his Church.

Oliver, Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the moſt Serene and Potent Prince, Lewis King of France.

Moſt Serene Prince,

JOHN Dethic, Mayor of the City of London for this Year, and William Wakefield Merchant, have made their Addreſſes to us by way of Petition, complaining, That about the middle of October, 1649, they freighted a certain Ship call'd the Jonas of London, Jonas Lightfoot Maſter, with Goods that were to be ſent to Oſtend; which Veſſel was taken in the Mouth of the River Thames, by one White of Barking, a Pyrate, robbing upon the Seas by virtue of a Commiſſion from the Son of King Charles deceas'd, and carry'd to Dunkirk, then under the Juriſdiction of the French. Now in regard that by your Majeſty's Edict in the Year 1647, renew'd in 1649, and by ſome other Decrees in favour of the Parlament of England, as they find it recorded, it was enacted, That no Veſſel or Goods taken from the Engliſh, in the time of that War, ſhould be carry'd into any of your Majeſty's Ports to be there put to ſale, they preſently ſent their Factor Hugh Morel to Dunkirk, to demand Reſtitution of the ſaid Ship and Goods from M. Leſtrade then Governor of the Town; more eſpecially finding them in the place for the moſt part untouch'd, and neither exchang'd or ſold. To which the Governor made anſwer, That the King had beſtow'd that Government upon him of his free Gift for Service done the King in his Wars, and therefore he would take care to make the beſt of the Reward of his Labour. So that having little to hope from an Anſwer ſo unkind and unjuſt, after a great Expence of Time and Money, the Factor return'd home. So that all the remaining hopes which the Petitioners have, ſeem wholly to depend upon your Majeſty's Juſtice and Clemency, to which they thought they might have the more eaſy acceſs by means of our Letters; and therefore that neither your Clemency nor your Juſtice may be wanting to People deſpoil'd againſt all Law and Reaſon, and contrary to your repeated Prohibitions, we make it our Requeſt. Wherein, if your Majeſty vouchſafe to gratify us, ſince there is nothing requir'd but what is moſt juſt and equitable, we ſhall deem it as obtain'd rather from your innate Integrity, than any Intreaty of ours.

Your Majeſty's moſt Affectionate,

Oliver, Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the High and Mighty Lords, the States of the United Provinces.

Moſt High and Mighty Lords, our deareſt Friends;

JOHN Brown, Nicholas Williams, and others, Citizens of London, have ſet forth in their Petition to us, that when they had every one brought in their Proportions, and freighted a certain Ship call'd the Good-hope of London, bound for the Eaſt-Indies, they gave Orders to their Factor to take up at Amſterdam two thouſand four hundred Dutch Pounds, to inſure the ſaid Ship; that afterwards this Ship in her Voyage to the Coaſt of India was taken by a Ship belonging to the Eaſt-India Company; upon which they who had engag'd to inſure the ſaid Veſſel refus'd to pay the Money, and have for this ſix Years by various delays eluded our Merchants, who with extraordinary Diligence, and at vaſt Expences, endeavour'd the recovery of their juſt Right. Which in regard it is an unjuſt Grievance that lies ſo heavy upon the Petitioners, for that ſome of thoſe who oblig'd themſelves are dead or become inſolvent, therefore that no farther Loſſes may accrue to their former Damages, we make it our earneſt Requeſt to your Lordſhips, that you will vouchſafe your Integrity to be the Harbour and Refuge for People toſs'd ſo many Years, and almoſt ſhipwrack'd in your Courts of Juſtice, and that ſpeedy Judgment may be given according to the Rules of Equity and Honeſty in their Cauſe, which they believe to be moſt juſt. In the mean time we wiſh you all Proſperity to the Glory of God, and the Welfare of his Church.

THE ſame Perſons in whoſe behalf we wrote to your Lordſhips in September the laſt year, Thomas and William Lower, the lawful Heirs of Nicholas Lower deceas'd, make grievous Complaints before us, that they are oppreſs'd either by the Favour or Wealth of their Adverſaries, notwithſtanding the Juſtice of their Cauſe; and when that would not ſuffice, although our Letters were often pleaded in their behalf, they have not been able hitherto to obtain Poſſeſſion of the Inheritance left 'em by their Father's Will. From the Court of Holland, where the Suit was firſt commenc'd, they were ſent to your Court, and from thence hurry'd away into Zealand, (to which three Places they carry'd our Letters) and now they are remanded, not unwillingly, back again to your ſupream Judicature; for where the ſupream Power is, there they expect ſupream Juſtice. If that hope fail 'em, eluded and fruſtrated, after being ſo long toſs'd from poſt to pillar for the recovery of their Right, where at length to find a reſting place they know not. For as for our Letters, if they find no benefit of theſe the fourth time written, they can never promiſe themſelves any advantage for the future from ſlighted Papers. However it would be moſt acceptable to us, if yet at length, after ſo many contempts, the injur'd Heirs might meet with ſome Relief by a ſpeedy and juſt Judgment, if not out of reſpect to any Reputation we have among ye, yet out of a regard to your own Equity and Juſtice. Wherefore we not only requeſt your Majeſty, but believe it mainly to concern your Honour, that they who have adventur'd upon ſo ſlight a pretence to violate the League and moſt ſacred Oath of their Sovereign, ſhould ſuffer the Puniſhment due to ſo much Perfidiouſneſs and daring Inſolence; and that in the mean time the Owners of thoſe Ships, though to their Loſs, ſhould be bound to ſatisfy our Merchants for the vaſt Detriment which they have ſo wrongfully ſuſtain'd. ## Oliver, Protector of the Commonwealth of England, To his Eminency Cardinal Mazarine.

Moſt Eminent Lord,

HAving an occaſion to ſend Letters to the King, we thought it likewiſe an offer'd opportunity to write to your Eminency. For we could not think it proper to conceal the ſubject of our writing from the ſole and only Perſon, whoſe ſingular Prudence governs the moſt important Intereſts of the French Nation, and the moſt weighty Affairs of the Kingdom with equal Fidelity, Counſel and Vigilance. Not without reaſon we complain, in ſhort, to find that League by your ſelf, as it were a crime to doubt, moſt ſacredly concluded, almoſt the very ſame day contemn'd and violated by one Giles a French-man, a petty Admiral of four Ships, and his Aſſociates equally concern'd, as your Eminency will readily find by our Letters to the King, and the Demands themſelves of our Merchants. Nor is it unknown to your Excellency, how much it concerns not only inferiour Magiſtrates, but even Royal Majeſty it ſelf, that thoſe firſt Violators of ſolemn Alliances ſhould be ſeverely puniſh'd. But they, perhaps, by this time being arriv'd in the Eaſt-Indies, whither they pretended to be bound, enjoy in undiſturb'd poſſeſſion the Goods of our People as lawful Prize won from an Enemy, which they robb'd and pillag'd from the Owners, contrary to all Law, and the pledg'd Faith of our late ſacred League. However, this is that which we requeſt from your Eminency, That whatever Goods were taken from our Merchants by the Admiral of thoſe Ships, as neceſſary for his Voyage, may be reſtor'd by the Owners of the ſame Veſſels, which was no more than what the Rovers themſelves thought juſt and equal; which, as we underſtand, it lies within your Power to do, conſidering the Authority and Sway you bear in the Kingdom.

Your Eminencies moſt Affectionate,

Oliver,

Oliver Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the moſt High and Mighty Lords, the States of the United Provinces.

Moſt High and Mighty Lords, our dear Friends and Confederates;

WE make no doubt but that all Men will bear us this Teſtimony, That no Conſiderations, in contracting Foreign Alliances, ever ſway'd us beyond thoſe of defending the Truth of Religion, or that we accounted any thing more ſacred, than to unite the Minds of all the Friends and Protectors of the Proteſtants, and of all others who at leaſt were not their Enemies. Whence it comes to paſs, that we are touch'd with ſo much the more grief of Mind, to hear that the Proteſtant Princes and Cities, whom it ſo much behoves to live in Friendſhip and Concord together, ſhould begin to be ſo jealous of each other, and ſo ill diſpos'd to mutual Affection; more eſpecially, that your Lordſhips and the King of Sweden, than whom the Orthodox Faith has not more magnanimous and couragious Defenders, nor our Republick Confederates more ſtrictly conjoin'd in Intereſts, ſhould ſeem to remit of your Confidence in each other; or rather, that there ſhould appear ſome too apparent Signs of tottering Friendſhip and growing Diſcord between ye. What the Cauſes are, and what Progreſs this Alienation of your Affection has made, we proteſt our ſelves to be altogether ignorant. However, we cannot but conceive an extraordinary trouble of mind for theſe beginnings of the leaſt Diſſenſion ariſen among Brethren, which infallibly muſt greatly endanger the Proteſtant Intereſts. Which if they ſhould gather ſtrength, how prejudicial it would prove to the Proteſtant Churches, what an occaſion of Triumph it would afford our Enemies, and more eſpecially the Spaniards, cannot be unknown to your Prudence, and moſt induſtrious Experience of Affairs. As for the Spaniards, it has already ſo enliven'd their Confidence, and rais'd their Courage, that they made no ſcruple by their Embaſſador reſiding in your Territories, boldly to obtrude their Counſels upon your Lordſhips, and that in reference to the higheſt Concerns of your Republick; preſuming partly with Threats of renewing the War, to terrify; and partly with a falſe proſpect of Advantage to ſollicit your Lordſhips to forſake your ancient and moſt faithful Friends, the Engliſh, French and Danes, and enter into a ſtrict Confederacy with your old Enemy, and once your domineering Tyrant, now ſeemingly aton'd; but what is moſt to be fear'd, only at preſent treacherouſly fawning to advance his own Deſigns. Certainly he, who of an inveterate Enemy, lays hold of ſo ſlight an occaſion of a ſudden to become your Counſellor, what is it that he would not take upon him? Where would his Inſolency ſtop, if once he could but ſee with his eyes, what now he only ruminates and labours in his thoughts; that is to ſay, Diviſion, and a Civil War among the Proteſtants? We are not ignorant that your Lordſhips, out of your deep Wiſdom, frequently revolve in your Minds what the Poſture of all Europe is, and what more eſpecially the Condition of the Proteſtants: That the Cantons of Switzerland adhering to the Orthodox Faith, are in daily expectation of new Troubles to be rais'd by their Country-men embracing the Popiſh Ceremonies; ſcarcely recover'd from that War, which for the ſake of Religion was kindled and blown up by the Spaniards, who ſuppli'd their Enemies both with Commanders and Money: That the Councils of the Spaniards are ſtill contriving to continue the Slaughter and Deſtruction of the Piemontois, which was cruelly put in execution the laſt Year: That the Proteſtants under the Juriſdiction of the Emperor, are moſt grievouſly haraſs'd, having much ado to keep poſſeſſion of their native Homes: That the King of Sweden, whom God, as we hope, has rais'd up to be a moſt ſtout Defender of the Orthodox Faith, is at preſent waging with all the Force of his Kingdom, a doubtful and bloody War with the moſt Potent Enemies of the Reformed Religion: That your own Provinces are threatned with hoſtile Confederacies of the Princes your Neighbours, headed by the Spaniards; and laſtly, that we our ſelves are buſied in a War proclaim'd againſt the King of Spain. In this poſture of Affairs, if any Conteſt ſhould happen between your Lordſhips and the King of Sweden, how miſerable would be the condition of all the Reformed Churches over all Europe, expos'd to the Cruelty and Fury of unſanctifi'd Enemies? Theſe Cares not ſlightly ſeize us; and we hope your Sentiments to be the ſame; and that out of your continu'd Zeal for the common Cauſe of the Proteſtants, and to the end the preſent Peace between Brethren profeſſing the ſame Faith, the ſame hope of Eternity, may be preſerv'd inviolable, your Lordſhips will accommodate your Counſels to theſe Conſiderations, which are to be preferr'd before all others; and that you will leave nothing neglected that may conduce to the eſtabliſhing Tranquillity and Union between your Lordſhips and the King of Sweden. Wherein if we can any way be uſeful, as far as our Authority, and the Favour you bear us will ſway with your Lordſhips, we freely offer our utmoſt Aſſiſtance, prepared in like manner to be no leſs ſerviceable to the King of Sweden, to whom we deſign a ſpeedy Embaſſy, to the end we may declare our Sentiments at large, concerning theſe Matters. We hope moreover, that God will bend your Minds on both ſides to moderate Counſels, and ſo reſtrain your Animoſities, that no Provocation may be given, either by the one or the other, to feſter your Differences to extremity: But that on the other ſide both Parties will remove whatever may give offence or occaſion of jealouſy to the other. Which if you ſhall vouchſafe to do, you will diſappoint your Enemies, prove the Conſolation of your Friends, and in the beſt manner provide for the Welfare of your Republick. And this we beſeech you to be fully convinc'd of, that we ſhall uſe our utmoſt care to make appear, upon all occaſions, our extraordinary Affection and Good-will to the States of the United Provinces. And ſo we moſt earneſtly implore the Almighty God to perpetuate his Bleſſings of Peace, Wealth and Liberty, upon your Republick; but above all things to preſerve it always flouriſhing in the Love of the Chriſtian Faith, and the true Worſhip of his Name. From our Palace at Weſtminſter, Aug.—1656.

Oliver Protector of the Commonwealth of England, to the moſt Serene Prince, John King of Portugal.

Moſt Serene Prince;

UPON the 11*th* of July laſt, Old-ſtile, we receiv'd by Thomas Maynard the Ratification of the Peace negotiated at London by your extraordinary Embaſſador; as alſo of the private and preliminary Articles, all now confirm'd by your Majeſty: And by our Letters from Philip Meadows, our Agent at Lisbon, dated the ſame time, we underſtand that our Ratification alſo of the ſame Peace and Articles, was by him, according to our Orders ſent him, deliver'd to your Majeſty: And thus the Inſtruments of the forementioned Ratification being mutually interchang'd on both ſides in the beginning of June laſt, there is now a firm and ſettl'd Peace between both Nations. And this Pacification has given us no ſmall occaſion of Joy and Satiſfaction, as believing it will prove to the common Benefit of both Nations, and to the no ſlight detriment of our common Enemies, who as they found out a Means to diſturb the former League, ſo they left nothing neglected to have hinder'd the renewing of this. Nor do we queſtion in the leaſt, that they will omit any occaſion of creating new Matter for Scandals and Jealouſies between us. Which we however have conſtantly determin'd, as much as in us lies, to remove at a remote diſtance from our thoughts; rather we ſo earneſtly deſire, that this our Alliance may beget a mutual Confidence, greater every day than other, that we ſhall take them for our Enemies, who ſhall by any Artifices endeavour to moleſt the Friendſhip by this Peace eſtabliſh'd between our ſelves and both our People. And we readily perſwade our ſelves, that your Majeſty's Thoughts and Intentions are the ſame. And whereas it has pleas'd your Majeſty, by your Letters dated the 24*th* of June, and ſome days after the delivery by our Agent of the interchang'd Inſtrument of confirm'd Peace, to mention certain Clauſes of the League, of which you deſir'd ſome little Alteration, being of ſmall moment to this Republick, as your Majeſty believes, but of great importance to the Kingdom of Portugal; we ſhall be ready to enter into a particular Treaty in order to thoſe Propoſals made by your Majeſty, or whatever elſe may conduce, in the judgment of both Parties, to the farther eſtabliſhment and more ſtrongly faſtning of the League: wherein we ſhall have thoſe due Conſiderations of your Majeſty and your Subjects, as alſo of our own People, that all may be ſatisfi'd; and it ſhall be in your choice, whether theſe things ſhall be negotiated at Lisbon, or at London. However, the League being now confirm'd, and duly ſeal'd with the Seals of both Nations, to alter any part of it, would be the ſame thing as to annul the whole; which we are certainly aſſur'd your Majeſty by no means deſires to do. We heartily wiſh all things lucky, all things proſperous to your Majeſty. From our Palace at Weſtminſter, Auguſt—— 1656.

Moſt Serene King;

WE have receiv'd the unwelcome News of a wicked and inhuman Attempt to have murder'd our Agent Philip Meadows, reſiding with your Majeſty, and by us ſent upon the bleſſed Errand of Peace; the hainouſneſs of which was ſuch, that his Preſervation is only to be attributed to the protection of Heaven. And we are given to underſtand, by your Letters dated the 26th of May laſt, and deliver'd to us by Thomas Maynard, that your Majeſty, juſtly incens'd at the horridneſs of the Fact, has commanded enquiry to be made after the Criminals, to the end they may be brought to condign Puniſhment: But we do not hear that any of the Ruffians are yet apprehended, or that your Commands have wrought any effect in this Particular. Wherefore we thought it our Duty openly to declare, how deeply we reſent this barbarous Outrage in part attempted, and in part committed: And therefore we make it our Requeſt to your Majeſty, That due Puniſhment may be inflicted upon the Authors, Aſſociates, and Encouragers of this abominable Fact. And to the end that this may be the more ſpeedily accompliſh'd, we farther demand, That Perſons of Honeſty and Sincerity, well-wiſhers to the Peace of both Nations, may be entruſted with the Examination of this Buſineſs, that ſo a due Scrutiny may be made into the bottom of this malicious Contrivance, to the end both Authors and Aſſiſtants may be the more ſeverely puniſh'd. Unleſs this be done, neither your Majeſty's Juſtice, nor the Honour of this Republick can be vindicated; neither can there be any ſtable aſſurance of the Peace between both Nations. We wiſh your Majeſty all things fortunate and proſperous. From our Palace at Whitehall, Auguſt—— 1656.

Oliver Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the moſt Illuſtrious Lord, the Conde d' Odemira.

Moſt Illuſtrious Lord,

YOur ſingular Good-will towards us and this Republick, has laid no mean Obligation upon us, nor ſlightly ti'd us to acknowledgment. We readily perceiv'd it by your Letters of the 25*th* of June laſt, as alſo by thoſe which we receiv'd from our Agent Philip Meadows, ſent into Portugal to conclude the Peace in Agitation, wherein he inform'd us of your extraordinary Zeal and Diligence to promote the Pacification, of which we moſt joyfully receiv'd the laſt Ratification; and we perſwade our ſelves, that your Lordſhip will have no cauſe to repent either of your Pains and Diligence in procuring this Peace, or of your Good-will to the Engliſh, or your Fidelity towards the King, your Sovereign; more eſpecially conſidering the great hopes we have that this Peace will be of high Advantage to both Nations, and not a little inconvenient to our Enemies. The only Accident that fell out unfortunate and mournful in this Negotiation, was that unhallow'd Villany nefariouſly attempted upon the Perſon of our Agent, Philip Meadows: The conceal'd Authors of which intended piece of Inhumanity, ought no leſs diligently to be ſought after, and made Examples to Poſterity, than the vileſt of moſt openly detected Aſſaſſinates. Nor can we doubt in the leaſt of your King's Severity and Juſtice in the puniſhment of a Crime ſo horrid, nor of your Care and Sedulity to ſee that there be no remiſsneſs of Proſecution, as being a Perſon bearing due Veneration to the Laws of God, and Sanctity among Men, and no leſs zealous to maintain the Peace between both Nations; which never can ſubſiſt if ſuch inhuman Barbarities as theſe eſcape unpuniſh'd and unreveng'd. But your abhorrence and deteſtation of the Fact is ſo well known, that there is no need of inſiſting any more at preſent upon this unpleaſing Subject. Therefore, having thus declar'd our Good-will and Affection to your Lordſhip, of which we ſhall be always ready to give apparent Demonſtrations, there nothing remains, but to implore the Bleſſings of Divine Favour and Protection upon you, and all yours.

Moſt Serene King, our deareſt Friend and Confederate;

BEing aſſur'd of your Majeſty's Concurrence both in Thoughts and Counſels, for the defence of the Proteſtant Faith againſt the Enemies of it, if ever, now at this time moſt dangerouſly vexatious; though we cannot but rejoyce at your proſperous Succeſſes, and the daily tidings of your Victories, yet on the other ſide we cannot but be as deeply afflicted to meet with one thing that diſturbs and interrupts our Joy; we mean the bad News intermix'd with ſo many welcome Tidings, that the antient Friendſhip between your Majeſty and the States of the United Provinces, looks with a dubious Aſpect, and that the Miſchief is exaſperated to that height, eſpecially in the Baltick Sea, as ſeems to bode an unhappy Rupture. We confeſs our ſelves ignorant of the Cauſes; but we too eaſily foreſee that the Events, which God avert, will be fatal to the Intereſts of the Proteſtants. And therefore, as well in reſpect to that moſt ſtrict Alliance between us and your Majeſty, as out of that Affection and Love to the Reformed Religion, by which we all of us ought chiefly to be ſway'd, we thought it our duty, as we have moſt earneſtly exhorted the States of the United Provinces to Peace and Moderation, ſo now to perſwade your Majeſty to the ſame. The Proteſtants have Enemies every where enow and to ſpare, inflam'd with inexorable Revenge; they never were known to have conſpir'd more perniciouſly to our Deſtruction, witneſs the Valleys of Piemont, ſtill reaking with the Blood and Slaughter of the miſerable; witneſs Auſtria, lately turmoil'd with the Emperor's Edicts and Proſcriptions; witneſs Switzerland. But to what purpoſe is it in many words to call back the bitter lamentations and remembrance of ſo many Calamities? Who ſo ignorant, as not to know that the Counſels of the Spaniards, and the Roman Pontiff, for theſe two Years have fill'd all theſe Places with Conflagrations, Slaughter, and Vexation of the Orthodox? If to theſe Miſchiefs there ſhould happen an acceſs of Diſſenſion among Proteſtant Brethren, more eſpecially between two Potent States, upon whoſe Courage, Wealth and Fortitude, ſo far as human Strength may be reli'd upon, the Support and Hopes of all the Reformed Churches depend, of neceſſity the Proteſtant Religion muſt be in great jeopardy, if not upon the brink of Deſtruction. On the other ſide, if the whole Proteſtant Name would but obſerve perpetual Peace among themſelves with that ſame brotherly Union as becomes their Profeſſion, there would be no occaſion to fear what all the Artifices or Puiſſance of our Enemies could do to hurt us, which our fraternal Concord and Harmony alone would eaſily repel and fruſtrate. And therefore we moſt earneſtly requeſt and beſeech your Majeſty to harbour in your Mind propitious thoughts of Peace, and Inclinations ready bent to repair the Breaches of your priſtin Friendſhip with the United Provinces, if in any part it may have accidentally ſuffer'd the decays of Miſtakes or Miſconſtruction. If there be any thing wherein our Labour, our Fidelity and Diligence may be uſeful toward this Compoſure, we offer and devote all to your ſervice. And may the God of Heaven favour and proſper your noble and pious Reſolutions, which together with all Felicity, and a perpetual courſe of Victory we cordially wiſh to your Majeſty.

Moſt High and Mighty Lords, our deareſt Friends;

IT has bin repreſented to us, by William Cooper a Miniſter of London, and our Country-man, that John le Maire of Amſterdam, his Father-in-law, about three and thirty Years ago deviſ'd a Project, by which the Revenues of your Republick might be very much advanc'd without any burden to the People, and made an Agreement with John Vandenbrook to ſhare between 'em the Reward which they ſhould obtain for their Invention, which was the ſetling of a little Seal to be made uſe of in all the Provinces of your Territories, and for which your High and Mightineſſes promiſ'd to pay the ſaid Vandenbrook and his Heirs the yearly Sum of 3000 Gilders, or 300 Engliſh Pounds. Now although the uſe and method of this little Seal has bin found very eaſy and expeditious, and that ever ſince great Incomes have thereby accru'd to your High and Mightineſſes, and ſome of your Provinces, nevertheleſs nothing of the ſaid Reward, tho with much importunity demanded, has bin paid to this day; ſo that the ſaid Vandenbrook and le Maire being tir'd out with long delays, the Right of the ſaid Grant is devolv'd to the foreſaid William Cooper, our Country-man; who deſirous to reap the fruit of his Father-in-law's Induſtry, has petition'd us, that we would recommend his juſt Demands to your High and Mightineſſes, which we thought not reaſonable to deny him. Wherefore, in moſt friendly wiſe, we requeſt your High and Mightineſſes favourably to hear the Petition of the ſaid William Cooper, and to take ſuch care that the Reward and Stipend, ſo well deſerv'd, and by contract agreed and granted, may be paid him annually from this time forward, together with the Arrears of the Years already paſs'd. Which not doubting but your High and Mightineſſes will vouchſafe to perform, as what is no more than juſt and becoming your Magnificence, we ſhall be ready to ſhew the ſame favour to the Petitions of your Country-men upon any occaſions of the ſame nature, whenever preſented to us.

Moſt Serene King, our deareſt Friend and Confederate;

AGainſt our will it is that we ſo often trouble your Majeſty with the Wrongs done by your Subjects, after a Peace ſo lately renew'd. But as we are fully perſwaded that your Majeſty diſapproves their being committed, ſo neither can we be wanting to the Complaints of our People. That the Ship Anthony of Dieppe was legally taken before the League, manifeſtly appears by the Sentence of the Judges of our Admiralty-Court. Part of the Lading, that is to ſay, four thouſand Hides, Robert Brown, a Merchant of London, fairly bought of thoſe who were entruſted with the Sale, as they themſelves teſtify. The ſame Merchant, after the Peace was confirm'd, carri'd to Dieppe about two hundred of the ſame Hides, and there having ſold 'em to a Currier, thought to have receiv'd his Money, but found it ſtopt and attach'd in the hands of his Factor; and a Suit being commenc'd againſt him, he could obtain no favour in that Court: Wherefore, we thought it proper to requeſt your Majeſty, that the whole matter may be referr'd to your Council, that ſo the ſaid Money may be diſcharg'd from an unjuſt and vexatious Action. For if Acts done and adjudg'd before the Peace, ſhall after Peace renew'd be call'd into queſtion and controverſy, we muſt look upon aſſurance of Treaties to be a thing of little moment. Nor will there be any end of theſe Complaints, if ſome of theſe Violators of Leagues be not made ſevere and timely Examples to others. Which we hope your Majeſty will ſpeedily take into your Care. To whom God Almighty in the mean time vouchſafe his moſt holy Protection.

THE Peace being happily concluded between this Republick and the Kingdom of Portugal, and what refers to Trade being duly provided for and ratifi'd, we deem'd it neceſſary to ſend to your Majeſty Thomas Maynard, from whom you will receive theſe Letters, to reſide in your Dominions, under the Character and Employment of a Conſul, and to take care of the Eſtates and Intereſts of our Merchants. Now in regard it may frequently ſo fall out, that he may be enforc'd to deſire the Privilege of free Admiſſion to your Majeſty, as well in matters of Trade, as upon other occaſions for the Intereſt of our Republick, we make it our requeſt to your Majeſty, that you will vouchſafe him favourable Acceſs and Audience, which we ſhall acknowledg as a ſingular demonſtration and teſtimony of your Majeſties good Will towards us. ALthough your Majeſty's wonted and ſpontaneous Favour and Good-will toward all deſerving men be ſuch, that all recommendations in their behalf may ſeem ſuperfluous, yet we were unwilling to diſmiſs without our Letters to your Majeſty, this noble Perſon, William Vavaſſour Knight, ſerving under your Banners, and now returning to your Majeſty: Which we have done ſo much the more willingly, being inform'd, that formerly following your Majeſty's fortunate Conduct, he had loſt his Blood in ſeveral Combats to aſſert the noble Cauſe for which you fight. Inſomuch, that the ſucceeding Kings of Sweedland in remuneration of his Military Skill, and bold Atchievements in War, rewarded him with Lands and Annual Penſions, as the Guerdons of his Prowes. Nor do we queſtion but that he may be of great uſe to your Majeſty in your preſent Wars, who has bin ſo long conſpicuous for his Fidelity and Experience in Military Affairs. 'Tis our deſire therefore that he may be recommended to your Majeſty according to his Merits; and we alſo farther requeſt, That he may be paid the Arrears due to him. THomas Evans, a Maſter of a Ship, and our Country-man, has preſented a Petition to us, wherein he ſets forth, that in the years 1649, and 1650, he ſerv'd the Braſile Company with his Ship the Scipio, being a Veſſel of four hundred Tuns, and of which he was Maſter: that the ſaid Ship was taken from him, with all the Lading and Furniture by your Majeſties Command; by which he has receiv'd great Damage, beſides the loſs of ſix years gain ariſing out of ſuch a Stock. The Commiſſioners by the League appointed on both ſides for the deciding Controverſies, valu'd the whole at ſeven thouſand of our Pounds, or twice as many Milreys of Portugal Money, as they made their report to us. Which Loſs falling ſo heavy upon the foreſaid Thomas, and being conſtrain'd to make a Voyage to Lisbon for the recovery of his Eſtate, he humbly beſought us that we would grant him our Letters to your Majeſty in favour of his demands. We therefore, although we wrote the laſt year in behalf of our Merchants in general to whom the Braſile Company was indebted, nevertheleſs that we may not be wanting to any that implore our Aid, requeſt your Majeſty, in regard to that Friendſhip which is between us, that conſideration may be had of this man in particular, and that your Majeſty would give ſuch Orders to all your Miniſters and Officers, that no obſtacle may hinder him from demanding and recovering without delay, what is owing to him from the Braſile Company, or any other Perſons. ## Oliver Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the Illuſtrious and Magnificent Senate of Hamborough.

Moſt Noble, Magnificent, and Right Worſhipful;

JAmes and Patrick Hays, Subjects of this Commonwealth, have made grievous Complaint before us, That they being lawful Heirs of their Brother Alexander, who dy'd Inteſtate, were ſo declar'd by a Sentence of your Court pronounc'd in their behalf againſt their Brother's Widow; and the Eſtates of their deceas'd Brother, together with the Profits, only the Widows Dowry excepted, being adjudg'd to them by virtue of that Sentence; nevertheleſs, to this very day they could never reap any benefit of their Pains and Expences in obtaining the ſaid Judgment, notwithſtanding their own declar'd Right, and Letters formerly written by King Charles in their behalf; for that the great Power and Wealth of Albertvan Eyzen, one of your Chief Magiſtrates, and with whom the greateſt part of the Goods was depoſited, was an Oppoſition too potent for them to ſurmount, whilſt he ſtrove all that in him lay that the Goods might not be reſtor'd to the Heirs. Thus diſappointed and tir'd out with delays, and at length reduc'd to utmoſt Poverty, they are become ſuppliants to us that we would not forſake 'em, wrong'd and oppreſs'd as they are in a Confederated City. We therefore believing it to be a chief part of our duty, not to ſuffer any Country-man of ours in vain to deſire our Patronage and Succour in diſtreſs, make this requeſt to your Lordſhips, which we are apt to think we may eaſily obtain from your City, That the Sentence pronounc'd in behalf of the two Brothers may be ratifi'd and duly executed according to the Intents and Purpoſes for which it was given; and that you will not ſuffer any longer delay of Juſtice, by any Appeal to the Chamber of Spire, upon any pretence whatever: For we have requir'd the Opinions of our Lawyers, which we have ſent to your Lordſhips fairly written and ſign'd. But if intreaty and fair means will nothing avail, of neceſſity (and which is no more than according to the cuſtomary Law of Nations, though we are unwilling to come to that extremity) the ſeverity of Retaliation muſt take its courſe; which we hope your Prudence will take care to prevent. From our Palace at Weſtminſter, Octob. 16. 1656.

Oliver Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the moſt Serene and Potent Lewis, King of France.

Moſt Serene and Potent King, our deareſt Friend and Confederate;

WE are apt to believe that your Majeſty receiv'd our Letters dated the 14*th* of May, of the laſt year, wherein we wrote that John Dethic, Mayor of London that year, and William Waterford, Merchant, had by their Petition ſet forth, That a certain Veſſel call'd the Jonas, freighted with Goods upon their Accompt, and bound for Dunkirk, then under the Juriſdiction of the French, was taken at the very Mouth of the Thames, by a Sea-Rover, pretending a Commiſſion from the Son of the late King Charles: Which being directly contrary to your Edicts, and the Decrees of your Council, That no Engliſh Ship taken by the Enemies of the Parlament, ſhould be admitted into any of your Ports, and there put to ſale, they demanded Reſtitution of the ſaid Ship and Goods from M. Leſtrade, then Governour of the Town, who return'd 'em an anſwer no way becoming a Perſon of his Quality, or who pretended Obedience to his Soveraign; That the Government was conferr'd upon him for his good Service in the Wars, and therefore he would make his beſt advantage of it, that is to ſay, by right or wrong; for that he ſeem'd to drive at: As if he had receiv'd that Government of your Majeſties free Gift, to authorize him in the robbing your Confederates, and contemning your Edicts ſet forth in their favour. For what the King of France forbids his Subjects any way to have a hand in, that the King's Governor has not only ſuffer'd to be committed in your Ports, but he himſelf becomes the Pirate, ſeizes the Prey, and openly avouches the Fact. With this Anſwer therefore the Merchants departed, altogether baffl'd and diſappointed; and this we ſignifi'd by our Letters to your Majeſty the laſt year with little better ſucceſs; for as yet we have receiv'd no reply to thoſe Letters. Of which we are apt to believe the reaſon was, becauſe the Governor was with the Army in Flanders; but now he reſides at Paris, or rather flutters unpuniſh'd about the City, and at Court, enrich'd with the Spoils of our Merchants. Once more therefore, we make it our requeſt to your Majeſty, which it is your Majeſty's Intereſt in the firſt place to take care of, That no perſon whatever may dare to juſtify the wrongs done to your Majeſty's Confederates by the contempt of your Royal Edicts. Nor can this cauſe be properly referr'd to the Commiſſioners appointed for deciding common Controverſies on both ſides; ſince in this Caſe, not only the rights of Confederates, but your Authority it ſelf, and the Veneration due to the Royal Name, are chiefly in diſpute. And it would be a wonder, that Merchants ſhould be more troubled for their Loſſes, than your Majeſty provok'd at Incroachments upon your Honour.' Which while you diſdain to brook, with the ſame labour you will demonſtrate that you neither repent of your friendly Edicts in favour of our Republick, nor conniv'd at the Injuries done by your Subjects, nor neglected to give due reſpect to our demands. From our Court at Weſtminſter, Novemb. —— 1656.

Oliver Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the moſt Serene and Potent Prince, Frederick III. King of Denmark, Norway, the Vandals and Goths; Duke of Sleſwic, Holſatia, Stormatia and Ditmarſh; Count in Oldenburgh and Delmenhorſt, &c.

Moſt Serene and Potent King, our deareſt Friend and Confederate;

WE receiv'd your Majeſty's Letters, dated the 16th of February, from Copenhagen, by the moſt worthy Simon de Pitkum, your Majeſty's Agent here reſiding. Which when we had peruſ'd, the demonſtrations of your Majeſty's Good-will towards us, and the importance of the Matter concerning which you write, affected us to that degree, that we deſign'd forthwith to ſend to your Majeſty ſome Perſon, who being furniſh'd with ample Inſtructions from us, might more at large declare to your Majeſty our Counſels in that Affair. And tho we have ſtill the ſame Reſolutions, yet hitherto we have not been at leiſure to think of a Perſon proper to be entruſted with thoſe Commands which the weight of the matter requires; tho in a ſhort time we hope to be more at liberty. In the mean while we thought it not convenient any longer to delay the letting your Majeſty underſtand, that the preſent Condition of Affairs in Europe has employ'd the greateſt part of our Care and Thoughts; while for ſome Years, to our great grief, we have beheld the Proteſtant Princes, and Supream Magiſtrates of the Reformed Republicks, (whom it rather behoves, as being engag'd by the common Tye of Religion and Safety, to combine and ſtudy all the ways imaginable conducing to mutual Defence) more and more at weakning Variance among themſelves, and jealous of each other's Actions and Deſigns; putting their Friends in fear, their Enemies in hope, that the poſture of Affairs bodes rather Enmity and Diſcord, than a firm Agreement of mind to defend and aſſiſt each other. And this ſollicitude has fix'd it ſelf ſo much the deeper in our thoughts, in regard there ſeems to appear ſome ſparks of Jealouſy between your Majeſty and the King of Sweden; at leaſt, that there is not that conjunction of Affections, which our Love and good Will in general toward the Orthodox Religion ſo importunately requires: Your Majeſty, perhaps, ſuſpecting that the Trade of your Dominions will be prejudic'd by the King of Sweden; and on the other ſide, the King of Sweden being jealous, that by your means the War, which he now wages, is made more difficult, and that you oppoſe him in his contracting thoſe Alliances which he ſeeks. 'Tis not unknown to your Majeſty, ſo eminent for your profound Wiſdom, how great the Danger is that threatens the Proteſtant Religion, ſhould ſuch Suſpicions long continue between two ſuch potent Monarchs; more eſpecially, which God avert, if any Symptom of Hoſtility ſhould break forth. However it be, for our parts, as we have earneſtly exhorted the King of Sweden, and the States of the United Provinces to Peace, and moderate Counſels, (and are beyond expreſſion glad to behold Peace and Concord renew'd between them, for that the Heads of that League are tranſmitted to us by their Lordſhips the States General) ſo we thought it our Duty, and chiefly becoming our Friendſhip not to conceal from your Majeſty what our Sentiments are concerning theſe Matters, (more eſpecially being affectionately invited ſo to do by your Majeſty's moſt friendly Letters, which we look upon, and embrace, as a moſt ſingular Teſtimony of your good Will toward us) but to lay before your eyes how great a neceſſity Divine Providence has impos'd upon us all that profeſs the Proteſtant Religion, to ſtudy Peace among our ſelves, and that chiefly at this time, when our moſt embittered Enemies ſeem to have on every ſide conſpir'd our Deſtruction. There's no neceſſity of calling to remembrance the Valleys of Piemont ſtill beſmear'd with the Blood and Slaughter of the miſerable Inhabitants; nor Auſtria, tormented at the ſame time with the Emperor's Decrees and Proſcriptions; nor the impetuous Onſets of the Popiſh upon the Proteſtant Switzers. Who can be ignorant that the Artifices and Machinations of the Spaniards, for ſome Years laſt paſt, have fill'd all theſe places with the confus'd and blended havock of Fire and Sword? To which unfortunate Pile of Miſeries, if once the Reformed Brethren ſhould come to add their own Diſſenſions among themſelves, and more eſpecially two ſuch potent Monarchs, the chiefeſt part of our Strength, and among whom ſo large a proviſion of the Proteſtants Security and Puiſſance lies ſtor'd and hoarded up againſt Times of Danger, moſt certainly the Intereſts of the Proteſtants muſt go to ruin, and ſuffer a total and irrecoverable Eclipſe. On the other ſide, If Peace continue firmly fix'd between two ſuch powerful Neighbours, and the reſt of the Orthodox Princes; if we would but make it our main Study to abide in brotherly Concord, there would be no cauſe, by God's aſſiſtance, to fear neither the Force nor Subtilty of our Enemies; all whoſe Endeavours and laborious Toils our Union alone would be able to diſſipate and fruſtrate. Nor do we queſtion but that your Majeſty, as you are freely willing, ſo your Willingneſs will be conſtant in contributing your utmoſt Aſſiſtance to procure this bleſſed Peace. To which purpoſe we ſhall be moſt ready to communicate and join our Counſels with your Majeſty; profeſſing a real and cordial Friendſhip, and not only determin'd inviolably to obſerve the Amity ſo auſpiciouſly contracted between us, but, as God ſhall enable us, to bind our preſent Alliance with a more ſtrict and fraternal Bond. In the mean time, the ſame eternal God grant all things proſperous and ſucceſsful to your Majeſty.

From our Court at White-hall, Decemb. ——, 1656.

Your Majeſties moſt cloſely united by Friendſhip, Alliance and good Will,

Oliver, Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c.

Oliver, Protector of the Commonweath of England, &c. To the moſt Serene and Illuſtrious Prince and Lord, the Lord William, Lantgrave of Heſs, Prince of Herefeldt, Count in Cutzenellebogen, Decia Ligenhain, Widda and Schaunburg, &c.

Moſt Serene Prince,

WE had return'd an Anſwer to your Letters ſent us now near a Twelvemonth ſince, for which we beg your Highneſs's Pardon, had not many, and thoſe the moſt important Affairs of the Republick under our care, conſtrain'd us to this unwilling Silence. For what Letters could be more grateful to us, then thoſe which are written from a moſt religious Prince, deſcended from religious Anceſtors, in order to ſettle the Peace of Religion, and the Harmony of the Church? Which Letters attribute to us the ſame Inclinations, the ſame Zeal to promote the Peace of Chriſtendom, not only in your own, but in the Opinion and Judgment of almoſt all the Chriſtian World, and which we are moſt highly glad to find ſo univerſally aſcrib'd to our ſelves. And how far our Endeavours have been ſignal formerly throughout theſe three Kingdoms, and what we have effected by our Exhortations, by our Sufferings, by our Conduct, but chiefly by Divine Aſſiſtance, the greateſt part of our People both well know, and are ſenſible of, in a deep Tranquillity of their Conſciences. The ſame Peace we have wiſh'd to the Churches of Germany, whoſe Diſſentions have been too ſharp, and of too long endurance; and by our Agent Dury, for many Years in vain endeavouring the ſame Reconciliation, we have cordially offer'd whatever might conduce on our part to the ſame purpoſe. We ſtill perſevere in the ſame Determinations, and wiſh the ſame fraternal Charity one among another, to thoſe Churches. But how difficult a task it is to ſettle Peace among thoſe Sons of Peace, as they give out themſelves to be, to our extream Grief, we more then abundantly underſtand. For that the Reformed, and thoſe of the Auguſtan Confeſſion, ſhould cement together in a Communion of one Church, is hardly ever to be expected: 'Tis impoſſible by Force to prohibit either from defending their Opinions, whether in private Diſputes, or by publick Writings. For Force can never conſiſt with Eccleſiaſtical Tranquillity. This only were to be wiſh'd, that they who differ, would ſuffer themſelves to be entreated, that they would diſagree more civilly, and with more Moderation; and notwithſtanding their Diſputes, love one another; not imbitter'd againſt each other as Enemies, but as Brethren, diſſenting only in Trifles, though in the Fundamentals of Faith moſt cordially agreeing. With inculcating and perſwading theſe things, we ſhall never be wearied; beyond that, there is nothing allow'd to human Force or Counſels: God will accompliſh his own work in his own time. In the mean while, you, moſt Serene Prince, have left behind ye a noble Teſtimony of your Affection to the Churches, an eternal Monument becoming the Vertue of your Anceſtors, and an Exemplar worthy to be follow'd by all Princes. It only then remains for us to implore the merciful and great God to crown your Highneſs with all the Proſperity in other things which you can wiſh for; but not to change your Mind, then which you cannot have a better, ſince a better cannot be, nor more piouſly devoted to his Glory.

Oliver, Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the moſt Serene Prince, the Duke of Curland.

Moſt Serene Prince,

WE have been abundantly ſatisfy'd of your Affection to us, as well at other times, as when you kindly entertain'd our Embaſſador in his Journey to the Duke of Muſcovy, for ſome days together making a ſtop in your Territories: Now we are no leſs confident that your Highneſs will give us no leſs obliging Teſtimonies of your Juſtice and Equity, as well out of your own good Nature, as at our Requeſt. For we are given to underſtand, That one John Johnſon, a Scotchman, and Maſter of a certain Ship of yours, having faithfully diſcharg'd his Duty for ſeven years together in the Service of your Highneſs, as to your Highneſs is well known, at length deliver'd the ſaid Ship, call'd the Whale, in the Mouth of the River, according as the Cuſtom is, to one of your Pilots, by him to be carried ſafe into Harbour. But it ſo fell out, that the Pilot being ignorant of his Duty, though frequently warned and admoniſh'd by the ſaid Johnſon, as he has prov'd by ſeveral Witneſſes, the ſaid Ship ran aground and ſplit to pieces, not through any fault of the Maſter, but through the want of Skill, or Obſtinacy of the Pilot. Which being ſo, we make it our earneſt Requeſt to your Highneſs, That neither the ſaid Shipwrack may be imputed to the forementioned Johnſon the Maſter, nor that he may upon that account be depriv'd of the Wages due to him; by the only enjoyment of which, he having lately ſuffer'd another Misfortune at Sea, he hopes however to ſupport and comfort himſelf in the extremity of his Wants.

Oliver, Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the moſt Noble the Conſuls and Senators of the Republick of Dantzick.

Moſt Noble and Magnificent, our deareſt Friends;

WE have always eſteem'd your City flouriſhing in Induſtry, Wealth, and ſtudious care to promote all uſeful Arts and Sciences, fit to be compar'd with any the moſt noble Cities of Europe. Now in regard that in this War that has long been hovering about your Confines, you have rather choſen to ſide with the Polanders, then with the Swedes; we are moſt heartily deſirous, that for the ſake of that Religion which you embrace, and of your ancient Commerce with the Engliſh, you would chiefly adhere to thoſe Counſels which may prove moſt agreeable to the Glory of God, and the Dignity and Splendor of your City. Wherefore we intreat ye, for the ſake of that Friendſhip which has been long eſtabliſh'd between your ſelves and the Engliſh Nation, and if our Reputation have obtain'd any Favour or Eſteem among ye, to ſet at liberty Count Coniſmark, conſpicuous among the Principal of the Swediſh Captains, and a Perſon ſingularly fam'd for his Conduct in War, but by the Treachery of his own People ſurpriz'd at Sea; wherein you will do no more then what the Laws of War, not yet exaſperated to the heighth, allow; or if you think this is not ſo agreeable to your Intereſts, that you will however deem him worthy a more eaſy and leſs ſevere Confinement. Which of theſe two Favours ſoever you ſhall determin to grant us, you will certainly perform an Act becoming the Reputation of your City, and highly oblige beſides the moſt famous Warriers and moſt eminent Captains of all Parties: and laſtly, lay upon our ſelves an Obligation not the meaneſt; and perhaps it may be worth your Intereſt to gratify us.

From our Court at Weſtminſter, April —, 1657.

Your Lordſhip's moſt Affectionate,

OLIVER, &c.

Oliver, Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, &c. To the moſt Serene and Potent Prince and Lord, Emperor and great Duke of all Ruſſia, ſole Lord of Volodomaria, Moſcow and Novograge, King of Cazan, Aſtracan and Syberia, Lord of Vobſcow, great Duke of Smolensko, Tuerſcoy, and other Places. Lord and great Duke of Novogrod, and the Lower Provinces of Chernigoy, Rezanſco, and others. Lord of all the Northern Climes; alſo Lord of Everſco, Cartalinſca, and many other Places.

ALL Men know how ancient the Friendſhip, and how vaſt the Trade has been for a long train of Years between the Engliſh Nation and the People of your Empire: But that ſingular Vertue, moſt Auguſt Emperor, which in your Majeſty far outſhines the Glory of your Anceſtors; and the high Opinion which all the Neighbouring Princes have of it, more eſpecially moves us to pay a more then ordinary Veneration and Affection to your Majeſty, and to deſire the imparting of ſome things to your Conſideration, which may conduce to the Good of Chriſtendom and your own Intereſts. Wherefore, we have ſent the moſt accompliſh'd Richard Bradſhaw, a Perſon of whoſe Fidelity, Integrity, Prudence, and Experience in Affairs, we are well aſſur'd, as having been imploy'd by us in ſeveral other Negotiations of this nature, under the Character of our Agent to your Majeſty; to the end he may more at large make known to your Majeſty our ſingular good Will and high Reſpect toward ſo puiſſant a Monarch, and tranſact with your Majeſty concerning the Matters above-mention'd. Him therefore we requeſt your Majeſty favourably to receive in our Name, and as often as ſhall be requiſite to grant him free Acceſs to your Perſon, and no leſs gracious Audience; and laſtly, to give the ſame Credit to him in all things which he ſhall propoſe or negotiate, as to our ſelves, if we were perſonally preſent. And ſo we beſeech Almighty God to bleſs your Majeſty and the Ruſſian Empire with all Proſperity.

From our Court at Weſtminſter, April —, 1657.

Oliver, Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the moſt Serene and Potent Prince Charles Guſtavus, King of the Swedes, Goths, and Vandals, &c.

Moſt Serene and Potent King, our deareſt Friend and Confederate;

THE moſt honourable William Jepſon, Colonel of Horſe, and a Senator in our Parlament, who will have the Honour to deliver theſe Letters to your Majeſty, will make known to your Majeſty, with what Diſturbance and Grief of Mind we receiv'd the News of the fatal War broke out between your Majeſty and the King of Denmark, and how much it is our cordial and real Endeavour, not to neglect any Labour or Duty of ours, as far as God enables us, that ſome ſpeedy Remedy may be apply'd to this growing Miſchief, and thoſe Calamities averted, which of neceſſity this War will bring upon the common Cauſe of Religion; more eſpecially at this time, now that our Adverſaries unite their Forces and pernicious Counſels againſt the Profeſſion and Profeſſors of the Orthodox Faith. Theſe and ſome other Conſiderations of great importance to the Benefit and Publick Intereſts of both Nations, have induc'd us to ſend this Gentleman to your Majeſty under the Character of our Extraordinary Envoy. Whom we therefore deſire your Majeſty kindly to receive, and to give Credit to him in all things which he ſhall have to impart to your Majeſty in our Name; as being a Perſon in whoſe Fidelity and Prudence we very much confide. We alſo farther requeſt, That your Majeſty will be pleas'd fully to aſſure your ſelf of our Good-will and moſt undoubted Zeal, as well toward your Majeſty, as for the Proſperity of your Affairs. Of which we ſhall be readily prepar'd with all imaginable willingneſs of mind to give unqueſtionable Teſtimonies upon all occaſions. From our Court at Weſtminſter, Auguſt—— 1657.

Oliver Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the moſt Serene Prince, the Lord Frederick William, Marqueſs of Brandenburgh, High Chamberlain of the Imperial Empire, and Prince Elector, Duke of Magdeburgh, Pruſſia, Juliers, Cleves, Monts, Stettin, Pomerania, of the Caſſiubiands and Vandals, as alſo of Sileſia, Croſna and Carnovia, Burgrave of Norrinburgh, Prince of Halberſtadt and Minda, Count of Mark and Ravensbergh, Lord in Ravenſtein.

Moſt Serene Prince, our deareſt Friend and Confederate;

SUCH is the Fame of your Highneſs's Vertue and Prudence, both in Peace and War, and ſo loudly ſpread through all the World, that all the Princes round about are ambitious of your Friendſhip; nor does any one deſire a more faithful or conſtant Friend and Aſſociate: Therefore to the end your Highneſs may know that we are alſo in the number of thoſe that have the higheſt and moſt honourable thoughts of your Perſon and Merits, ſo well deſerving of the Commonwealth of Chriſtendom; we have ſent the moſt Worthy Col. Will. Jepſon, a Senator in our Parlament, in our Name to kiſs your Higneſs's hands; and withal to wiſh the continuance of all Proſperity to your Affairs, and in words at large to expreſs our Good-will and Affection to your Serenity; and therefore make it our Requeſt, That you will vouchſafe to give him Credit in thoſe Matters concerning which he has Inſtructions to treat with your Highneſs, as if all things were atteſted and confirm'd by our perſonal Preſence. From our Court at Whitehall, Auguſt—— 1657.

Oliver Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the moſt Noble the Conſuls and Senators of the City of Hamborough.

Moſt Noble, moſt Magnificent and Worthy;

THE moſt accompliſh'd, Colonel William Jepſon, a Senator in our Parlament, being ſent by us to the moſt ſerene King of Sweden, is to travel through your City; and therefore we have given him in command, not to paſs by your Lordſhips unſaluted in our Name; and withal to make it our Requeſt, That you will be ready to aſſiſt him upon whatſoever occaſion he ſhall think it requiſite to crave the Aid of your Authority and Counſel. Which the more willingly you ſhall do, the more you ſhall find you have acquir'd our Favour.

To the moſt Noble the Conſuls and Senators of the City of Breme.

HOW great our Affection is toward your City, how particular our Good-will, as well upon the account of your Religion, as for the celebrated Splendor of your City, as formerly you have found; ſo when occaſion offers, you ſhall be further ſenſible. At preſent, in regard the moſt accompliſh'd Colonel William Jepſon, a Senator in our Parlament, is to travel through Bremen with the Character of our Envoy Extraordinary to the King of Sweden, 'tis our pleaſure that he ſalute your Lordſhips lovingly and friendly in our Name; and that if any Accident fall out, wherein your Aſſiſtance and Friendſhip may be ſerviceable to him, that he may have free admiſſion to deſire it, upon the ſcore of our Alliance. Wherein we are confident you will the leſs be wanting, by how much the more reaſon you will have to be aſſur'd of our ſingular Love and Kindneſs for your Lordſhips. From our Court at Whitehall, Auguſt — 1657.

Oliver Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the moſt Noble the Senators and Conſuls of the City of Lubeck.

Moſt Noble, Magnificent, and Right Worſhipful, our deareſt Friends;

COlonel William Jepſon, a Perſon of great Honour, and a Senator in our Parlament, is to paſs with the Character of a Publick Miniſter from your City to the King of Sweden, encamping not far from it. Wherefore we deſire your Lordſhips, that if occaſion require, upon the account of the Friendſhip and Commerce between us, you will be aſſiſtant to him in his Journey through your City, and the Territories under your Juriſdiction. As to what remains, it is our farther pleaſure, that you be ſaluted in our Name, and that you be aſſur'd of our Good-will and ready Inclinations to ſerve your Lordſhips. From our Court at Weſtminſter, Auguſt — 1657.

Oliver Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the City of Hamborough.

Moſt Noble, Magnificent, and Right Worſhipful;

P*Hilip Meadows*, who brings theſe Letters to your Lordſhips, is to travel through your City with the Character of our Agent to the King of Denmark. Therefore we moſt earneſtly recommend him to your Lordſhips, that if any occaſion ſhould happen for him to deſire it, you would be ready to aid him with your Authority and Aſſiſtance: And we deſire that this our Recommendation may have the ſame weight at preſent with your Lordſhips as formerly it wont to have; nor ſhall we be wanting to your Lordſhips upon the ſame Opportunities. From our Court at Whitehall, Auguſt — 1657.

Moſt Serene Prince, our deareſt Friend;

COlonel William Jepſon, a Perſon truly noble in his Country, and a Senator in our Parlament, is ſent by us, as our Envoy Extraordinary to the moſt Serene King of Sweden; and may it prove happy and proſperous for the common Peace and Intereſts of Chriſtendom. We have given him Inſtructions, ſtructions, among other things, That in his Journey, after he has kiſs'd your Serenities hands in our Name, and declar'd our former Good-will and conſtant Zeal for your Welfare, to requeſt of your Serenity alſo, That being guarded with your Authority, he may travel with ſafety and convenience through your Territories. By which kind act of Civility, your Highneſs will in a greater meaſure oblige us to returns of anſwerable kindneſs. From our Court at Weſtminſter, Aug.—1657.

Oliver Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the moſt Serene Prince, Ferdinand Great Duke of Tuſcany.

Moſt Serene Great Duke, our deareſt Friend;

THE Company of our Merchants, trading to the Eaſtern Coaſts of the Mediterranean Sea, by their Petition to us, have ſet forth, That William Ellis, Maſter of a Ship call'd the Little Lewis, being at Alexandria in Egypt, was hir'd by the Baſha of Memphis, to carry Rice, Sugar, and Coffee, either to Conſtantinople or Smyrna, for the uſe of the Grand Seignior; but that contrary to his Faith and Promiſe given, he bore away privately from the Ottoman Fleet, and brought his Ship and Lading to Legborn, where now he lives in poſſeſſion of his Prey. Which villanous Act being of dangerous Example, as expoſing the Chriſtian Name to ſcandal, and the Fortunes of our Merchants living under the Turks to violence and ranſack; we therefore make it our Requeſt to your Highneſs, That you will give Command that the ſaid Maſter be apprehended and impriſon'd, and that the Veſſel and Goods may remain under Seizure, till we ſhall have given notice of our Care for the reſtitution of thoſe Goods to the Sultan: Aſſuring your Highneſs of our readineſs to make ſutable Returns of Gratitude whenever opportunity preſents it ſelf. From our Court at Weſtm. Septemb.—1657.

---

Oliver Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the moſt Serene Prince, the Lord Frederic William, Marqueſs of Brandenburgh, &c.

Moſt Serene Prince, our moſt dear Friend and Confederate;

BY our laſt Letters to your Highneſs, either already or ſhortly to be deliver'd by our Embaſſador William Jepſon, we have imparted the Subſtance of our Embaſſy to your Highneſs; which we could not do without ſome mention of your great Vertues, and demonſtration of our own Good-will and Affection. Nevertheleſs, that we may not ſeem too ſuperficially to have glided over your tranſcending Deſervings of the Proteſtant Intereſts; we thought it proper to reſume the ſame Subject, and pay our Reſpect and Veneration, not more willingly, or with a greater fervency of Mind, but ſomewhat more at large to your Highneſs: And truly moſt deſervedly, when daily Information reaches our Ears, That your Faith and Conſcience, by all manner of Artifices tempted and aſſail'd, by all manner of Arts and Devices ſolicited, yet cannot be ſhaken, or by any Violence be rent from your Friendſhip and Alliance with a moſt magnanimous Prince and your Confederate: And this, when the Affairs of the Swedes are now reduc'd to that condition, that in adhering to their Alliance, 'tis manifeſt that your Highneſs rather conſults the common Cauſe of the Reformed Religion, than your own Advantage. And when your Highneſs is almoſt ſurrounded and beſieg'd by Enemies, either privately lurking, or almoſt at your Gates; yet ſuch is your Conſtancy and Reſolution of Mind, ſuch your Conduct and Proweſs becoming a great General, that the burden and maſſy Bulk of the whole Affair, and the Event of this important War, ſeems to reſt and depend upon your ſole Determination. Wherefore your Highneſs has no reaſon to queſtion but that you may rely upon our Friendſhip and unfeigned Affection; who ſhould think our ſelves worthy to be forſaken of all Mens good Word, ſhould we ſeem careleſs in the leaſt of your unblemiſh'd Fidelity, your Conſtancy, and the reſt of your applauded Vertues; or ſhould we pay leſs reſpect to your Highneſs upon the common ſcore of Religion. As to thoſe Matters propounded by the moſt accompliſh'd John Frederic Schlever, your Counſellor and Agent here reſiding, if hitherto we could not return an Anſwer, ſuch as we deſir'd to do, though with all aſſiduity and diligence labour'd by your Agent; we intreat your Highneſs to impute it to the preſent condition of our Affairs, and to be aſſur'd, that there is nothing which we account more ſacred, or more earneſtly deſire, than to be ſerviceable and aſſiſting to your Intereſts, ſo bound up with the Cauſe of Religion. In the mean time we beſeech the God of Mercy and Power, that ſo ſignal a Proweſs and Fortitude may never languiſh or be oppreſs'd, nor be depriv'd the Fruit and due Applauſe of all your pious Undertakings. From our Court at Weſtminſter, Sept. —— 1657.

Commonwealth of England, &c.

To the moſt Excellent Lord, M. de Bourdeaux, Extraordinary Embaſſador from the moſt Serene King of France.

Moſt Excellent Lord;

L*Ucas Lucie* Merchant of London, has made his Complaint to the moſt Serene Lord Protector, concerning a certain Ship of his, call'd the Mary; which in her Voyage from Ireland to Bayonne, being driven by Tempeſt into the Port of St. John de Luz, was there detain'd by virtue of an Arreſt, at the Suit of one Martin de Luzan; nor could ſhe be diſcharg'd till the Merchants had given Security to ſtand a Trial for the Property of the ſaid Ship and Lading. For Martin pretended to have a great Sum of Money owing to him by the Parlament for ſeveral Goods of his, which in the Year 1642, were ſeiz'd by Authority of Parlament, in a certain Ship call'd the Santa Clara. But is is manifeſt, That Martin was not the Owner of the ſaid Goods, only that he proſecuted the Claim of the true Owners Richard and Iriat, together with his Partner, whoſe Name was Antonio Fernendez; and that upon the ſaid Martin and Antonio's falling out among themſelves, the Parlament decreed that the ſaid Goods ſhould be ſtopp'd till the Law ſhould decide to which of the two they were to be reſtor'd. Upon this, Antony was deſirous that the Action ſhould proceed; on the other ſide, neither Martin, nor any body for him, has hitherto appear'd in Court: All which is evidently apparent by Lucas's Petition hereto annex'd. So that it ſeems moſt unreaſonable, That he who refus'd to try his pretended Title with Antonio, to other Mens Goods, in our own Courts, ſhould compel our People, and the true Owners, to go to Law for their own in a Foreign Dominion. And that the ſame is apparent to your Excellency's Equity and Prudence, the moſt Serene Lord Protector makes no queſtion; by whom I am therefore commanded in a particular manner to recommend this fair and honeſt Cauſe of Lucas Lucie to your Excellency's Conſideration; to the end that Martin, who neglects to try his pretended Right here, may not under that Pretence have an opportunity in the French Dominions to deprive others of their rightful Claims. Weſtm. Octob. —— 1657.

Your Excellency's moſt Affectionate.

Oliver Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the moſt Serene Duke, and Senate of the Republick of Venice.

Moſt Serene Duke and Senate, our deareſt Friends;

SO numerous are the Tydings brought us of your fortunate Succeſſes againſt the Turks, that there is nothing wherein we have more frequent occaſion to employ our Pens, than in congratulating your Serenities for ſome ſignal Victory. For this ſo recently obtain'd, we give ye Joy, as being not only moſt auſpicious and ſeaſonable to your Republick; but which is more glorious, ſo greatly tending to the deliverance of all the Chriſtians groaning under Turkiſh Servitude. More particularly we recommend to your Serenity and the Senate Thomas Galily, formerly Maſter of the Ship call'd the Relief, who for theſe five Years together has been a Slave; tho this be not the firſt time we have interceded in his behalf, yet now we do it the more freely, as in a time of more than ordinary Exultation. He having receiv'd your Commands, to ſerve your Republick with his Ship, and engaging alone with ſeveral of the Enemies Gallies, ſunk ſome, and made a great havock among the reſt: but at length his Ship being burnt, the brave Commander, and ſo well deſerving of the Venetian Republick, was taken, and ever ſince for five Years together, has endur'd a miſerable Bondage under the Barbarians. To redeem himſelf he had not wherewithal; for whatſoever he had, that he makes out was owing to him by your Highneſs and the Senate, upon the account either of his Ship, his Goods, or for his Wages. Now in regard he may not want Relief, and for that the Enemy refuſes to diſcharge him upon any other condition, than by exchange of ſome other Perſon of equal Value and Reputation to himſelf; we moſt earneſtly entreat your Highneſs, and the moſt Serene Senate; and the afflicted old Man, Father of the ſaid Thomas, full of Grief and Tears, which not a little mov'd us, by our Interceſſion begs, That in regard ſo many proſperous Combats have made ye Maſters of ſo many Turkiſh Priſoners, you will exchange ſome one of their Number, whom the Enemy will accept for ſo ſtout a Seaman taken in your Service, our Countryman, and the only Son of a moſt ſorrowful Father. Laſtly, That whatſoever is due to him from the Republick, upon the ſcore of Wages, or upon any other account, you will take care to ſee it paid to his Father, or to whom he ſhall appoint to receive it. The Effect of our firſt Requeſt, or rather of your Equity, was this, That the whole Matter was examin'd, and upon an exact ſtating of the Accounts the Debt was agreed; but perhaps by reaſon of more important Buſineſs intervening, no Paiment enſu'd upon it. Now the Condition of the miſerable Creature admits of no longer delay; and therefore ſome endeavour muſt be us'd, if it be worth your while to deſire his Welfare, that he may ſpeedily be deliver'd from the noyſom ſtench of Impriſonment. Which, as you flouriſh no leſs in Juſtice, Moderation and Prudence, than in Military Fame and Victorious Succeſs, we are confident you will ſee done, of your own innate Humanity and Free-will, without any Heſitation, without any Incitement of ours. Now that ye may long flouriſh, after a moſt potent Enemy ſubdu'd, our daily Prayers implore of the Almighty. From our Court at Weſtminſter, Octob. —— 1657.

Your Highneſs's moſt Affectionate, Oliver Protector
of the Commonwealth of England, &c.

Oliver Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the High and Mighty Lords, the States of the United Provinces.

Moſt High and Mighty Lords, our deareſt Friends and Confederates;

THE moſt Illuſtrious William Nuport, your extraordinary Embaſſador for ſome Years reſiding with us, is now returning to your Lordſhips; but with this condition, that after this reſpit obtain'd from your Lordſhips, he ſhall return again in a ſhort time. For he has remain'd among us, in the diſcharge of his Truſt, with that Fidelity, Vigilance, Prudence and Equity, that neither you nor we could deſire greater Vertue and Probity in an Embaſſador, and a Perſon of unblemiſhed Reputation; with thoſe inclinations and endeavours to preſerve Peace and Friendſhip between us, without any fraud or diſſimulation, that while he officiates the Duty of your Embaſſador, we do not find what occaſion of ſcruple or offence can ariſe in either Nation. And we ſhould brook his departure with ſo much the more anxiety of Mind, conſidering the preſent juncture of Times and Affairs, were we not aſſur'd, that no Man can better or more faithfully declare and repreſent to your Lordſhips, either the preſent condition of Affairs, or our Good-will and Affection to your Government. Being therefore every way ſo excellent a Perſon, and ſo well deſerving both of yours and our Republick, we requeſt your Lordſhips to receive him returning, ſuch as we unwillingly diſmiſs him, laden with the real Teſtimonials of our Applauſes. Almighty God grant all Proſperity to your Affairs, and perpetuate our Friendſhip, to his Glory, and the ſupport of his Orthodox Church.

Your High and Mightineſſes moſt devoted.

Oliver Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the High and Mighty Lords, the States of the United Provinces.

Moſt High and Mighty Lords, our deareſt Friends and Confederates;

G*Eorge Downing* is a Perſon of eminent Quality, and after a long trial of his Fidelity, Probity and Diligence, in ſeveral and various Negotiations, well approv'd and valu'd by us. Him we have thought fitting to ſend to your Lordſhips, dignify'd with the Character of our Agent, and amply furniſh'd with our Inſtructions. We therefore deſire your Lordſhips to receive him kindly, and that ſo often as he ſhall ſignify that he has any thing to impart in our Name to your Lordſhips, you will admit him free Audience, and give the ſame Credit to him, and entruſt him with whatſoever you have to communicate to us; which you may ſafely do, as if our ſelves were perſonally preſent. And ſo we beſeech Almighty God to bleſs your Lordſhips, and your Republick with all Proſperity, to the Glory of God, and the Support of his Church.

affectionate, Oliver, &c.

To the States of Holland.

THere being an Alliance between our Republick and yours, and thoſe Affairs to be tranſacted on both ſides, that without an Agent and Interpreter, ſent either by your ſelves, or from us, matters of ſuch great moment can hardly be adjuſted to the advantage of both Nations, we thought it conducing to the common good of both Republicks to ſend George Downing, a Perſon of eminent Quality, and long in our Knowledg and Eſteem for his undoubted Fidelity, Probity and Diligence, in many and various Negotiations, dignifi'd with the Character of our Agent, to reſide with your Lordſhips, and chiefly to take care of thoſe things, by which the Peace between us may be preſerv'd entire and diuturnal. Concerning which we have not only written to the States, but alſo thought it requiſite to give notice alſo of the ſame to your Lordſhips, ſupreme in the Government of your Province, and who make ſo conſiderable a part of the United Provinces; to the end you may give that reception to our Reſident which becomes him, and that whatever he tranſacts with your High and Mighty States, you may aſſure your ſelves ſhall be as firm and irrevocable, as if our ſelves had bin preſent in the Negotiation. Now the moſt merciful God direct all your Counſels and Actions to his Glory, and the Peace of his Church.

Oliver Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the moſt Serene Prince, Ferdinand Great Duke of Tuſcany.

Moſt Serene Great Duke, our much Honour'd Friend;

YOur Highneſs's Letters, bearing date from Florence the 10th of November, gave us no ſmall occaſion of Content and Satisfaction; finding therein your Good-will towards us, ſo much the more conſpicuous, by how much Deeds than Words, Performances than Promiſes, are the more certain marks of a cordial Affection. For what we requeſted of your Highneſs, that you would command the Maſter of the Little Lewis, William Ellis, who moſt ignominiouſly broke his Faith with the Turks, and the Ship and Goods to be ſeiz'd and detain'd, till Reſtitution ſhould be made to the Turks, leſt the Chriſtian Name ſhould receive any Blemiſh by Thieveries of the like nature; all thoſe things, and that too with an extraordinary Zeal, as we moſt gladly underſtood before, your Highneſs writes that you have ſeen diligently perform'd. We therefore return our Thanks for the Kindneſs receiv'd, and make it our farther requeſt, that when the Merchants have given Security to ſatisfie the Turks, the Maſter may be diſcharged, and the Ship, together with her Lading, be forthwith diſmiſs'd, to the end we may not ſeem to have had more care perhaps of the Turks Intereſt, than our own Country-men. In the mean time we take ſo kindly this ſurpaſſing Favour done us by your Highneſs, and moſt acceptable to us, that we ſhould not refuſe to be branded with Ingratitude, if we ſhould not ardently deſire a ſpeedy opportunity, with the ſame promptitude of Mind, to gratifie your Highneſs, whereby we might be enabl'd to demonſtrate our readineſs to return the ſame good Offices to ſo noble a Benefactor upon all occaſions.

Oliver Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the moſt Serene and Potent Prince, Charles Guſtavus, King of the Swedes, Goths, and Vandals, &c.

Moſt Serene and Potent Prince, our moſt Invincible Friend and Confederate;

BY your Majeſty's Letters, dated the 21ſt of February from your Camp in Seland, we found many reaſons to be affected with no ſmall Joy, as well for our own particular, as in regard of the whole Chriſtian Republick in general. In the firſt place, becauſe the King of Denmark, being become an Enemy, not induc'd thereto, as we are apt to believe, by his own Inclinations or Intereſts, but deluded by the Artifices of our common Adverſaries, is reduc'd to that condition by your ſudden irruption into the very Heart of his Kingdom, with very little Blood ſhed on either ſide, that what was really true, he will at length be perſwaded that Peace would have bin more beneficial to him, than the War which he has enter'd into againſt your Majeſty. Then again, when he ſhall conſider with himſelf, that he cannot obtain it by any more ſpeedy means, than by making uſe of our Aſſiſtance, long ſince offer'd him to procure a Reconciliation, in regard your Majeſty ſo readily intreated by the Letters only deliver'd by our Agent, by ſuch an eaſy conceſſion of Peace, moſt clearly made it apparent how highly you eſteem'd the Interceſſion of our Friendſhip, he will certainly apply himſelf to us; and then our Interpoſition in ſo pious a work, will chiefly require, that we ſhould be the ſole Reconciler and almoſt Author of that Peace, ſo beneficial to the Intereſts of the Proteſtants; which, as we hope, will ſuddenly be accompliſh'd. For when the Enemies of Religion ſhall deſpair of breaking your united Forces by any other means than ſetting both your Majeſties at variance, then their own fears will overtake 'em, leſt this unexpected Conjunction, which we ardently deſire, of your Arms and Minds, ſhould turn to the deſtruction of them that were the Kindlers of the War. In the mean time, moſt Magnanimous King, may your Prowess go on and proſper; and the ſame felicity which the Enemies of the Church have admir'd in the progreſs of your Atchievements, and the ſteady Career of your Victories againſt a Prince, now your Confederate, the ſame by God's Aſſiſtance, may you enforce 'em to behold once more in their Subverſion.

Oliver Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the moſt Serene Prince, Ferdinand Great Duke of Tuſcany.

Moſt Serene Prince;

THE Anſwer which we have given to your Agent here reſiding, we believe, will fully ſatisfy your Highneſs as to our Admiral, who but lately put into your Ports. In the mean time, John Hoſier, Maſter of a Ship, call'd the Owner, has ſet forth in a Petition to us, that in April 1656. he hir'd out his Ship by a Charter-party Agreement, to one Joſeph Arman, an Italian, who manifeſtly broke all the Covenants therein contain'd; ſo that he was enforc'd, leſt he ſhould loſe his Ship and Lading, together with his whole principal Stock, openly to ſet forth the fraud of his Freighter, after the manner of Merchants; and when he had caus'd it to be regiſter'd by a Publick Notary, to ſue him at Legborn. Joſeph, on the other ſide, that he might make good one Fraud by another, combining with two other litigious Traders, upon a feign'd Pretence, by Perjury, ſeiz'd upon ſix thouſand Pieces of Eight, the Money of one Thomas Clutterbuck. But as for his part, the ſaid Hoſier, after great Expences and loſs of time, could never obtain his Right and Due at Legborn: Nor durſt he there appear in Court, being threaten'd as he was, and waylay'd by his Adverſaries. We therefore requeſt your Highneſs, that you would vouchſafe your Aſſiſtance to this poor oppreſt Man, and according to your wonted Juſtice, reſtrain the Inſolence of his Adverſary. For in vain are Laws ordain'd for the Government of Cities by the Authority of Princes, if Wrong and Violence, when they cannot abrogate, ſhall be able by Threats and Terror to fruſtrate the Refuge and Sanctuary of the Laws. However, we make no doubt, but that your Highneſs will ſpeedily take care to puniſh a daring Boldneſs of this nature; beſeeching Almighty God to bleſs your Highneſs with Peace and Proſperity.

From our Court at Weſtminſter,

To

To the moſt Serene and Potent Prince, Lewis King of France.

Moſt Serene and Potent King, and moſt Auguſt Friend and Confederate;

YOur Majeſty may call to mind, that at the ſame time, when the renewing the League between us was in agitation, and no leſs auſpiciouſly concluded, as the many Advantages from thence accruing to both Nations, and the many Annoyances thence attending the common Enemy, ſufficiently teſtify thoſe dreadful Butcheries that befel the Piemontois, and that we recommended with great fervency of Mind and Compaſſion, their Cauſe on all ſides forſaken and afflicted, to your Commiſeration and Protection. Nor do we believe that your Majeſty, of your ſelf, was wanting in a Duty ſo pious, that we may not ſay, beſeeming common Humanity, as far as your Authority, and the Veneration due to your Perſon, could prevail with the Duke of Savoy. Certain we are, that neither our ſelves, nor many other Princes and Cities were wanting in our Performances, by the Interpoſition of Embaſſies, Letters, and Intreaties. After a moſt bloody Butchery of both Sexes, and all Ages, at length Peace was granted, or rather a certain clandeſtine Hoſtility cover'd over with the name of Peace. The Conditions of Peace were agreed in your Town of Pignerol; ſevere and hard, but ſuch as thoſe miſerable and indigent Creatures, after they had ſuffer'd all that could be endur'd that was oppreſſive and barbarous, would have been glad of, had they been but obſerv'd, as hard and unjuſt as they were. But by falſe Conſtructions, and various Evaſions, the Aſſurances of all theſe Articles are eluded and violated: Many are thruſt out from their ancient Abodes; many are forbid the Exerciſe of their Religion, new Tributes are exacted, a new Citadel is impos'd upon them; from whence the Souldiers frequently making Excurſions, either plunder or murder all they meet. Add to all this, that new Levies are privately preparing againſt 'em, and all that embrace the Proteſtant Religion are commanded to depart by a prefix'd day; ſo that all things ſeem to threaten the utter extermination of thoſe deplorable Wretches, whom the former Maſſacre ſpar'd. Which I moſt earneſtly beſeech and conjure ye, Moſt Chriſtian King, by that RIGHT HAND which ſign'd the League and Friendſhip between us, by that ſame goodly Ornament of your Title of MOST CHRISTIAN, by no means to ſuffer, nor to permit ſuch liberty of Rage and Fury uncontroul'd, we will not ſay, in any Prince, (for certainly ſuch barbarous Severity could never enter the Breaſt of any Prince, much leſs ſo tender in Years, nor into the female thoughts of his Mother) but in thoſe ſanctifi'd Cut-throats, who profeſſing themſelves to be the Servants and Diſciples of our Saviour Chriſt, who came into this World to ſave Sinners, abuſe his meek and peaceful Name and Precepts to the moſt cruel ſlaughter of the Innocent. Reſcue, you that are able in your towring Station, worthy to be able, reſcue ſo many Suppliants proſtrate at your feet, from the hands of Ruffians, who lately drunk with Blood, again thirſt after it, and think it their ſafeſt way to throw the Odium of their Cruelty upon Princes. But as for you, great Prince, ſuffer not, while you reign, your Titles, nor the Confines of your Kingdom, to be contaminated with this ſame Heaven-offending Scandal, nor the peaceful Goſpel of Chriſt to be defil'd with ſuch abominable Cruelty. Remember that they ſubmitted themſelves to your Grandfather Henry, moſt friendly to the Proteſtants, when the victorious Leſdiguieres purſu'd the retreating Savoyard o're the Alpes. There is alſo an Inſtrument of that Submiſſion regiſter'd among the publick Acts of your Kingdom, wherein it is excepted and provided among other things, That from that time forward the Piemontois ſhould not be deliver'd over into the Power of any Ruler, but upon the ſame Conditions upon which your invincible Grandfather receiv'd them into his Protection. This Protection of your Grandfather, theſe Suppliants now implore from you as Grandchild. 'Tis your Majeſty's part, to whom thoſe People now belong, to give 'em that Protection which they have choſen, by ſome exchange of Habitation, if they deſire it, and it may be done: Or if that be a Labour too difficult, at leaſt to ſuccour 'em with your Patronage, your Commiſeration, and your admittance into Sanctuary.

ctuary. And there are ſome Reaſons of State to encourage your Majeſty not to refuſe the Piemontois a ſafe Aſylum in your Kingdom: But I am unwilling that you, ſo great a King, ſhould be induc'd to the defence and ſuccour of the miſerable by any other Arguments than thoſe of your Anceſtor's pledg'd Faith, your own Piety, Royal Benignity and Magnanimity. Thus the immaculate and intire Glory of a moſt egregious Act will be your own, and you will find the Father of Mercy, and his Son, King Chriſt, whoſe Name and Doctrine you have vindicated from nefarious Inhumanity, ſo much the more favourable and propitious to your Majeſty, all your days. The God of Mercy and Power infuſe into your Majeſty's Heart a Reſolution to defend and ſave ſo many innocent Chriſtians, and maintain your own Honour.

Weſtminſter, May—1658.

To the Evangelick Cities of the Switzers.

Illuſtrious and moſt Noble Lords, our deareſt Friends;

HOW heavy and intolerable the Sufferings of the Piemontois, your moſt afflicted Neighbours, have bin, and how unmercifully they have been dealt with by their own Prince, for the ſake of their Religion, by reaſon of the fierceneſs of the Cruelties, we almoſt tremble to remember, and thought it ſuperfluous to put you in mind of thoſe things, which are much better known to your Lordſhips. We have alſo ſeen Copies of the Letters which your Embaſſadors, Promoters and Witneſſes of the Peace concluded at Pignerol, wrote to the Duke of Savoy, and the Preſident of his Council at Turin; wherein they ſet forth, and make it out, that all the Conditions of the ſaid Peace are broken, and were rather a Snare than a Security to thoſe miſerable People. Which Violation continu'd from the Concluſion of the Peace to this very moment, and ſtill grows more heavy every day than other; unleſs they patiently endure, unleſs they lay themſelves down to be trampl'd under foot, plaſh'd like Mortar, or abjure their Religion, the ſame Calamities, the ſame Slaughters hang over their Heads, which three years ſince made ſuch a dreadful havock of them, their Wives and Children; and which, if it muſt be undergone once more, will certainly prove the utter extirpation of their whole Race. What ſhall ſuch miſerable Creatures do? in whoſe behalf no Interceſſion will avail, to whom no breathing time is allow'd, nor any certain place of Refuge. They have to do with wild Beaſts, or Furies rather, upon whom the remembrance of their former Murders has wrought no Compaſſion upon their Countrymen, no ſenſe of Humanity, nor ſatiated their ravenous thirſt after Blood. Moſt certainly theſe things are not to be endur'd, if we deſire the ſafety of our Brethren the Piemontois, moſt antient Profeſſors of the Orthodox Faith, or the welfare of our Religion it ſelf. As for our ſelves, ſo far remote, we have not been wanting to aſſiſt 'em as far as in us lay, nor ſhall we ceaſe our future Aid. But you, who not only lie ſo near adjoining, as to behold the Butcheries, and hear the outcries and ſhrieks of the Diſtreſſed, but are alſo next expos'd to the fury of the ſame Enemies; conſider for the ſake of the Immortal God, and that in time, what it behoves ye now to do: conſult your Prudence, your Piety, and your Fortitude; what ſuccour, what relief and ſafeguard you are able, and are bound to afford your Neighbours and Brethren, who muſt elſe undoubtedly and ſpeedily periſh. Certainly the ſame Religion is the cauſe, why the ſame Enemies ſeek alſo your Perdition; why, at the ſame time the laſt year, they meditated your ruin, by inteſtine Broils among your ſelves. It ſeems to be only in your Power, next under God, to prevent the extirpation of this moſt antient Scien of the purer Religion, in theſe remainders of the Primitive Believers; whoſe preſervation, now reduc'd to the very brink of utter ruin, if you neglect, beware that the next Turn be not your own. Theſe Admonitions, while we give ye freely, and out of brotherly Love, we are not quite as yet caſt down: For what lies only in our Power ſo far diſtant, as we have hitherto, ſo ſhall we ſtill employ our utmoſt Endeavours, not only to procure the ſafety of our Brethren upon the precipice of danger, but alſo to relieve their Wants. May the Almighty God vouchſafe to both of us that Peace and Tranquillity at home, that ſettlement of Times and Affairs, that we may be able to employ all our Wealth and Force, all our Studies and Counſels in the defence of his Church againſt the Rage and Fury of her Enemies. From our Court at White-Hall, May — 1658.

To his Eminency Cardinal Mazarin.

Moſt Eminent Lord,

THE late moſt grievous Cruelties, and moſt bloody Slaughters perpetrated upon the Inhabitants of the Valleys of Piemont, within the Duke of Savoy's Dominions, occaſion'd the writing of the incloſ'd Letters to his Majeſty, and theſe other to your Eminency. And as we make no doubt but that ſuch Tyranny, Inhumanities, ſo rigorouſly inflicted upon harmleſs and indigent People, are highly diſpleaſing and offenſive to the moſt Serene King; ſo we readily perſwade our ſelves, that what we requeſt from his Majeſty in behalf of thoſe unfortunate Creatures, your Eminency will employ your endeavour, and your favour to obtain, as an accumulation to our Interceſſions. Seeing there is nothing which has acquir'd more good-will and affection to the French Nation, among all the neighbouring Profeſſors of the Reformed Religion, than that Liberty and thoſe Privileges, which by publick Acts and Edicts are granted in that Kingdom to the Proteſtants. And this among others was one main Reaſon, why this Republick ſo ardently deſir'd the Friendſhip and Alliance of the French People. For the ſetling of which we are now treating with the King's Embaſſador, and have made thoſe progreſſes, that the Treaty is almoſt brought to a Concluſion. Beſides that, your Eminency's ſingular Benignity and Moderation, which in the management of the moſt important Affairs of the Kingdom, you have always teſtifi'd to the Proteſtants of France, encourages us to expect what we promiſe to our ſelves from your Prudence and Generoſity; whereby you will not only lay the foundations of a ſtricter Alliance between this Republick and the Kingdom of France, but oblige us in particular to returns of all good Offices of Civility and Kindneſs: And of this we deſire your Eminency to reſt aſſur'd.

Your Eminency's moſt Affectionate.

Oliver Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the moſt Serene and Potent Prince, Lewis King of France.

Moſt Serene and Potent King, our moſt Auguſt Friend and Confederate;

IT being the intention of Thomas Viſcount Falconbridge, our Son-in-Law, to travel into France, and no leſs his deſire, out of his profound Reſpect and Veneration to your Majeſty, to be admitted to kiſs your Royal Hands; though by reaſon of his pleaſing Converſation we are unwilling to part with him, nevertheleſs not doubting but he will in a ſhort time return from the Court of ſo great a Prince, celebrated for the reſort of ſo many prudent and couragious Perſons, more nobly prepar'd for great Performances, and fully accompliſh'd in whatſoever may be thought moſt laudable and vertuous, we did not think it fit to put a ſtop to his generous Reſolutions. And though he be a Perſon, who, unleſs we deceive our ſelves, carries his own Recommendations about him, whereſoe're he goes; yet if he ſhall find himſelf ſomewhat the more favour'd by your Majeſty for our ſake, we ſhall think our ſelves honour'd and oblig'd by the ſame Kindneſs. God Almighty long preſerve your Majeſty in ſafety, and continue a laſting Peace between us, to the common Good of the Chriſtian World. From our Court at White-hall, May —— 1658.

Oliver Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the moſt Eminent Lord Cardinal Mazarin.

Moſt Eminent Lord,

HAving recommended to the moſt Serene King, Thomas Viſcount Falconbridge our Son-in-Law, deſirous to ſee France; we could not but acquaint your Eminency with it, and recommend him in like manner to your ſelf, not ignorant of what moment and importance it will be to our Recommendation firſt given him. For certainly, what benefit or advantage he ſhall reap by reſiding in your Country, which he hopes will not be ſmall, he cannot but be beholden for the greateſt part of it to your Favour and Good-will; whoſe ſingle Prudence and Vigilancy ſupports and manages the grand Affairs of that Kingdom. Whatever therefore grateful Obligation your Eminency ſhall lay upon him, you may be aſſur'd you lay upon our ſelves, and that we ſhall number it among your many Kindneſſes and Civilities already ſhew'd us.

Oliver Protector, &c. To the moſt Eminent Lord Cardinal Mazarin.

Moſt Eminent Lord,

HAving ſent the moſt illuſtrious Thomas Bellaſis, Viſcount Falconbridge, our Son-in-Law, to congratulate the King upon his arrival in the Camp at Dunkirk, I gave him Order to attend and wiſh your Eminency long Life and Health in our Name, and to return Thanks to your Eminency, by whoſe Fidelity, Prudence and Vigilancy, it chiefly comes to paſs, that the Affairs of France are carri'd on with ſuch Succeſs in ſeveral parts, but more eſpecially in near adjoining Flanders, againſt our common Enemy the Spaniard; from whom we hope that open and armed Courage now will ſoon exact a rigorous account of all his Frauds and Treacheries. Which that it may be ſpeedily done, we ſhall not be wanting, either with our Forces, as far as in us lies, or with our Prayers to Heaven.

Oliver Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the moſt Serene and Potent Prince, Lewis King of France.

Moſt Serene and Potent Prince, our moſt Auguſt Friend and Confederate;

SO ſoon as the News was brought us, That your Majeſty was arriv'd in your Camp, and was ſate down with ſo conſiderable an Army before Dunkirk, that infamous neſt of Pyrates, and place of Refuge for Sea-robbers, we were greatly overjoy'd, in certain aſſurance that in a ſhort time now, with God's Aſſiſtance, the Seas will be more open and leſs infeſted by thoſe plundering Rovers; and that your Majeſty, by your Military Proweſs, will now take ſpeedy Vengeance of the Spaniſh Frauds; by whom one Captain was by Gold corrupted to the betraying of Heſden, another treacherouſly ſurpriz'd at Oſtend. We therefore ſend the moſt Noble, Thomas Viſcount Falconbridge, our Son-in-Law, to congratulate your Majeſty's arrival in your Camp ſo near us, and that your Majeſty may underſtand from his own Lips, with what Affection we labour the Proſperity of your Atchievements, not only with our united Forces, but with our cordial Prayers, that God would long preſerve your Majeſty, and perpetuate our eſtabliſh'd Friendſhip, to the common Good of the Chriſtian World.

From our Court at Weſtminſter, May —— 1658.

To the moſt Serene Prince, Ferdinand Grand Duke of Tuſcany.

Moſt Serene Great Duke,

IN regard your Highneſs in all your Letters has ever ſignifi'd your extraordinary Affection toward us, we are not a little griev'd, that either it ſhould be ſo obſcurely imparted to your Governors and Miniſters, or by them ſo ill interpreted, that we can reap no benefit or ſign of it in your Port of Legborn, where your Friendſhip toward us ought to be moſt clearly and truly underſtood: Rather, that we ſhould find the Minds of your Subjects daily more averſe and hoſtile in their demeanour toward us. For how unkindly our Fleet was lately treated at Legborn, how little accommodated with neceſſary Supplies, in what a Hoſtile manner twice conſtrain'd to depart the Harbour, we are ſufficiently given to underſtand as well from undoubted Witneſſes upon the Place, as from our Admiral himſelf, to whoſe Relation we cannot but give Credit, when we have thought him worthy to command our Fleet. Upon his firſt arrival in January, after he had caus'd our Letters to be deliver'd to your Highneſs, and all Offices of Civility had paſs'd between our People and yours; when he deſir'd the Accommodation of Porto Ferraro; anſwer was made, it could not be granted, leſt the King of Spain, that is to ſay our Enemy, ſhould be offended. And yet what is there which a Prince in Friendſhip more frequently allows to his Confederate, than free entrance into his Ports and Harbours? Or what is there that we can expect from a Friendſhip of this nature, more ready to do us unkindneſs than befriend us, or aid us with the ſmalleſt Aſſiſtance, for fear of provoking the diſpleaſure of our Enemies? At firſt indeed, Prattick was allow'd, though only to two or three of our Seamen out of every Ship, who had the Favour to go aſhoar. But ſoon after, it being nois'd in the Town, that our Ships had taken a Dutch Veſſel laden with Corn for Spain, that little Prattick we had was prohibited; Longland, the Engliſh Conſul, was not permitted to go aboard the Fleet; the liberty of taking in freſh Water, which is ever free to all that are not open Enemies, was not ſuffer'd, but under armed Guards, at a ſevere rate; and our Merchants which reſide in the Town, to the vaſt emolument of your People, were forbid to viſit their Countrymen, or aſſiſt 'em in the leaſt. Upon his laſt arrival, toward the latter end of March, no body was ſuffer'd to come aſhoar. The fifth day after, when our Admiral had taken a ſmall Neapolitan Veſſel which fell into our hands by chance, above two hundred great ſhot were made at our Fleet from the Town, though without any damage to us. Which was an Argument; that what provok'd your Governors without a cauſe, as if the Rights of your Harbour had bin violated, was done out at Sea, at a great diſtance from your Town, or the Juriſdiction of the Caſtle. Preſently our Long-boats ſent to take in freſh Water, were aſſail'd in the Port, and one taken and detain'd? which being redemanded, anſwer was made, That neither the Skiff nor the Seamen ſhould be reſtor'd, unleſs the Neapolitan Veſſel were diſmiſs'd; though certain it is, that ſhe was taken in the open Sea, where it was lawful to ſeize her. So that ours, after many Inconveniencies ſuffer'd, were forc'd at length to ſet ſail, and leave behind 'em the Proviſion, for which they had paid ready Money. Theſe things, if they were not done by your Highneſs's Conſent and Command, as we hope they were not, we deſire you would make it appear by the puniſhment of the Governour, who ſo eaſily preſum'd to violate his Maſter's Alliances; but if they were done with your Highneſs's Approbation and Order, we would have your Highneſs underſtand, that as we always had a ſingular value for your Friendſhip, ſo we have learnt to diſtinguiſh between Injuries and acts of Kindneſs.

From our Court at White-hall,
May —— 1658.

Your good Friend, ſo far as we may, Oliver Protector
of the Commonwealth of England, &c.

Oliver Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the moſt Serene and Potent Prince, Lewis King of France.

Moſt Serene and Potent Prince, our moſt Auguſt Confederate and Friend;

BY ſo ſpeedily repaying our profound Reſpect to your Majeſty, with an accumulation of Honour, by ſuch an illuſtrious Embaſſy to our Court; you have not only made known to us, but to all the People of England, your ſingular Benignity and Generoſity of Mind, but alſo how much you favour our Reputation and Dignity: for which we return our moſt cordial Thanks to your Majeſty, as juſtly you have merited from us. As for the Victory which God has given, moſt fortunate, to our united Forces againſt our Enemies, we rejoice with your Majeſty for it; and that our People in that Battel were not wanting to your Aſſiſtance, nor the Military Glory of their Anceſtors, nor their own priſtine Fortitude, is moſt grateful to us. As for Dunkirk, which as your Majeſty wrote, you were in hope was near Surrender: 'tis a great addition to our Joy to hear from your Majeſty ſuch ſpeedy Tidings, that it is abſolutely now in your victorious hands; and we hope moreover, that the loſs of one City will not ſuffice to repay the twofold Treachery of the Spaniard, but that your Majeſty will in a ſhort time write us the welcome News of the Surrender alſo of the other Town. As to your Promiſe, That you will take care of our Intereſts, we miſtruſt it not in the leaſt, upon the Word of a moſt Excellent King, and our moſt aſſured Friend, confirm'd withal by your Embaſſador, the moſt accompliſh'd Duke of Crequi. Laſtly, We beſeech Almighty God to proſper your Majeſty and the Affairs of France, both in Peace and War. Weſtminſter, June —— 1658.

Oliver Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the moſt Eminent Lord, Cardinal Mazarine.

Moſt Eminent Lord;

VVHile we are returning Thanks to the moſt Serene King, who to honour and congratulate us, as alſo to intermix his Joy with ours for the late glorious Victory, has ſent a ſplendid Embaſſy to our Court; we ſhould be ungrateful, ſhould we not alſo by our Letters pay our due Acknowledgments to your Eminency; who to teſtify your Good-will towards us, and how much you make it your ſtudy to do us all the Honour which lies within your Power, have ſent your Nephew to us, a moſt excellent and moſt accompliſh'd young Gentleman; and if you had any nearer Relation, or any Perſon whom you valu'd more, would have ſent him more eſpecially to us, as you declare in your Letters; adding withal the Reaſon, which coming from ſo great a Perſonage, we deem no ſmall advantage to our Praiſe and Ornament; that is to ſay, to the end that they who are moſt nearly related to your Eminency in Blood, might learn to imitate your Eminency, in ſhewing Reſpect and Honour to our Perſon. And we would have it not to be their meaneſt ſtrife to follow your Example of Civility, Candour, and Friendſhip to us; ſince there are not more conſpicuous Examples of extraordinary Prudence and Vertue to be imitated than in your Eminency; from whence they may learn with equal Renown to govern Kingdoms, and manage the moſt important Affairs of the World. Which that your Eminency may long and happily adminiſter, to the proſperity of the whole Realm of France, to the common Good of the whole Chriſtian Republick, and your own Glory, we ſhall never be wanting in our Prayers to implore. From our Court at Whitehal, June —— 1658.

Your Excellency's moſt Affectionate.

Oliver Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the moſt Serene and Potent Prince, Charles Guſtavus, King of the Swedes, Goths and Vandals, &c.

Moſt Serene and Potent Prince, our deareſt Confederate and Friend;

AS often as we behold the buſy Counſels, and various Artifices of the common Enemies of Religion, ſo often do we revolve in our Minds how neceſſary it would be, and how much for the Safety of the Chriſtian World, that the Proteſtant Princes, and moſt eſpecially your Majeſty, ſhould be united with our Republick in a moſt ſtrict and ſolemn Confederacy. Which how ardently and zealouſly it has been ſought by our ſelves, how acceptable it would have been to us, if ours, and the Affairs of Swedeland, had been in that poſture and condition, if the ſaid League could have been ſacredly concluded to the good liking of both, and that the one could have been a ſeaſonable Succour to the other, we declar'd to your Embaſſadors, when firſt they enter'd into Treaty with us upon this Subject. Nor were they wanting in their Duty; but the ſame prudence which they were wont to ſhew in other things, the ſame Wiſdom and Sedulity they made known in this Affair. But ſuch was the perfidiouſneſs of our wicked and reſtleſs Countrymen at home, who being often receiv'd into our Protection, ceas'd not however to machinate new Diſturbances, and to reſume their formerly often fruſtrated and diſſipated Conſpiracies with our Enemies the Spaniards, that being altogether taken up with the preſervation of our ſelves from ſurrounding Dangers, we could not bend our whole Care, and our entire Forces, as we wiſh'd we could have done, to defend the common Cauſe of Religion. Nevertheleſs what lay in our Power, we have already zealouſly perform'd; and whatever for the future may conduce to your Majeſty's Intereſts, we ſhall not only ſhew our ſelves willing, but induſtrious to carry on, in Union with your Majeſty, upon all occaſions. In the mean time we moſt gladly congratulate your Majeſty's Victories, moſt prudently and couragiouſly atchiev'd, and in our daily Prayers implore Almighty God long to continue to your Majeſty a ſteady courſe of Conqueſt and Felicity, to the Glory of his Name. From our Court at Whitehall, June —— 1658.

Oliver Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the moſt Serene Prince, the King of Portugal.

Moſt Serene King, our Friend and Confederate;

JOhn Buffield of London Merchant, has ſet forth in a Petition to us, That in the Year 1649, he deliver'd certain Goods to Anthony, John and Manuel Ferdinando Caſtaneo, Merchants in Tamira, to the end that after they had ſold 'em, they might give him a juſt Account, according to the Cuſtom of Merchants: After which, in his Voyage for England, he fell into the hands of Pirats; and being plunder'd by 'em, receiv'd no ſmall Damage. Upon this News, Antony and Manuel, believing he had been kill'd, preſently look'd upon the Goods as their own, and ſtill detain 'em in their hands, refuſing to come to any Account; covering this Fraud of theirs with a Sequeſtration of Engliſh Goods that ſoon after enſu'd. So that he was forc'd the laſt Year, in the middle of Winter, to return to Portugal and demand his Goods, but all in vain. For that the ſaid John and Anthony could by no fair means be perſwaded, either to deliver the ſaid Goods, or to come to any Account; and which is more to be admir'd, juſtifi'd their private detention of the Goods, by the Publick Attainder. Finding therefore that being a Stranger, he ſhould get nothing by contending with the Inhabitants of Tamira in their own Countrey, he betook himſelf for Juſtice to your Majeſty; humbly demanded the Judgment of the Conſervator, appointed to determine the Cauſes of the Engliſh; but was ſent back to the Cognizance of that Court, from which he had appeal'd. Which though in it ſelf not unjuſt, yet ſeeing it is evident that the Merchants of Tamira make an ill uſe of your Publick Edict to juſtify their own private Cozenage, we make it our earneſt Requeſt to your Majeſty, that according to your wonted Clemency you would rather refer to the Conſervator, being the proper Judg in theſe Caſes, the Cauſe of this poor Man, afflicted by many Caſualties, and reduc'd to utmoſt Poverty, to the end he may recover the Remainder of his Fortunes from the faithleſs Partnerſhip of thoſe People. Which when you rightly underſtand the Buſineſs, we make no queſtion, but will be no leſs pleaſing to your Majeſty to ſee done than to our ſelves. From our Court at Weſtminſter, Aug. 1658.

To the moſt Serene Prince Leopold, Arch-Duke of Auſtria, Governour of the Low-Countries under Philip King of Spain.

Moſt Serene Lord ;

CHarles Harbord Knight, has ſet forth in his Petition to us, that having ſent certain Goods and Houſhold-ſtuff out of Holland to Bruges under your Juriſdiction, he is in great danger of having them arreſted out of his hands by Force and Violence. For that thoſe Goods were ſent him out of England in the Year 1643, by the Earl of Suffolk, for whom he ſtood bound in a great Sum of Money, to the end he might have wherewithal to ſatisfy himſelf, ſhould he be compell'd to pay the Debt. Which Goods are now in the poſſeſſion of Richard Greenville Knight, who broke open the doors of the place where they were in cuſtody, and made a violent ſeizure of the ſame, under pretence of we know not what due to him from Theophilus Earl of Suffolk, by virtue of a certain Decree of our Court of Chancery, to which thoſe Goods, as being the Earl's, were juſtly liable ; whereas by our Laws, neither the Earl now living, whoſe Goods they are, is bound by that Decree, neither ought the Goods to be ſeiz'd or detain'd ; which the Sentence of that Court, now ſent to your Serenity, together with theſe Letters, poſitively declares and proves. Which Letters the ſaid Charles Harbord has deſir'd of us, to the end we would make it our Requeſt to your Highneſs, that the ſaid Goods may be forthwith diſcharg'd from the violent Seizure, and no leſs unjuſt Action of the ſaid Richard Greenville, in regard it is apparently againſt the Cuſtom and Law of Nations, that any Perſon ſhould be allow'd the liberties to ſue in a Foreign Juriſdiction upon a Plaint wherein he can have no relief in the Country where the Cauſe of Action firſt aroſe. Therefore the Reaſon of Juſtice it ſelf, and your far celebrated Equanimity encourag'd us to recommend this Cauſe to your Highneſs ; aſſuring your Highneſs, that whenever any Diſpute ſhall happen in our Courts concerning the Rights and Properties of your People, you ſhall ever find us ready and quick in our Returns of Favour. Weſtminſter——

Your Highneſs's moſt Affectionate, Oliver Protector of the Commonwealth of England.

RICHARD, PROTECTOR.

Richard, Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the moſt Serene and Potent Prince, Lewis King of France.

Moſt Serene and Potent King, our Friend and Confederate;

SO ſoon as our moſt Serene Father, Oliver, Protector of the Commonwealth of England, by the Will of God ſo ordaining, departed this Life upon the Third of September, we being lawfully declar'd his Succeſſor in the Supream Magiſtracy, tho in the Extremity of Tears and Sadneſs, could do no leſs, than with the firſt Opportunity by theſe our Letters make known a Matter of this Concernment to your Majeſty; by whom, as you have been a moſt cordial Friend to our Father and this Republick, we are confident the mournful and unexpected Tidings will be as ſorrowfully received. Our buſineſs now is, to requeſt your Majeſty, that you would have ſuch an Opinion of us, as of one who has determin'd nothing more religiouſly and conſtantly than to obſerve the Friendſhp and Confederacy contracted between your Majeſty and our Renowned Father; and with the ſame Zeal and good Will to confirm and eſtabliſh the Leagues by him concluded, and to carry on the ſame Counſels and Intereſts with your Majeſty. To which intent it is our pleaſure that our Embaſſador reſiding at your Court, be empower'd by the ſame Commiſſion as formerly; and that you will give the ſame Credit to what he tranſacts in our Name, as if it had been done by our ſelves. In the mean time we wiſh your Majeſty all Proſperity.

From our Court at Whitehall, Sept. 5. 1658.

To the moſt Eminent Lord Cardinal Mazarine.

THO nothing could fall out more bitter and grievous to us, than to write the mournful News of our moſt Serene and moſt Renowned Father's Death; nevertheleſs, in regard we cannot be ignorant of the high Eſteem which he had for your Eminency, and the great Value which you had for him; nor have any reaſon to doubt, but that your Eminency, upon whoſe Care the Proſperity of France depends, will no leſs bewail the Loſs of your conſtant Friend, and moſt united Confederate, we thought it of great moment, by theſe our Letters, to make known this Accident ſo deeply to be lamented, as well to your Eminency as to the King; and to aſſure your Eminency, which is but Reaſon, that we ſhall moſt religiouſly obſerve all thoſe things which our Father of moſt Serene Memory was bound by the League to ſee confirm'd and ratify'd: and ſhall make it our buſineſs, that in the midſt of your mourning for a Friend ſo faithful and flouriſhing in all vertuous Applauſe, there may be nothing wanting to preſerve the Faith of our Confederacy. For the conſervation of which on your part alſo, to the good of both Nations, may God Almighty long preſerve your Eminency.

Weſtminſter, Sept. 1658.

Richard, Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the moſt Serene and Potent Prince Charles Guſtavus, King of the Swedes, Goths and Vandals, &c.

Moſt Serene and Potent King, our Friend and Confederate ;

WHen we conſider with our ſelves that it will be a difficult matter for us to be Imitators of our Father's Vertues, unleſs we ſhould obſerve and endeavour to hold the ſame Confederacies which he by his Proweſs acquir'd, and out of his ſingular Judgment thought moſt worthy to be embrac'd and obſerv'd ; your Majeſty has no reaſon to doubt, but that it behoves us to pay the ſame Tribute of Affection and good Will, which our Father of moſt Serene Memory always paid to your Majeſty. Therefore altho in this beginning of our Government and Dignity I may not find our Affairs in that Condition, as at preſent to anſwer to ſome Particulars which your Embaſſadors have propos'd, yet it is our Reſolution to continue the League concluded by our Father with your Majeſty, and to enter our ſelves into a ſtricter Engagement ; and ſo ſoon as we ſhall rightly underſtand the State of Affairs on both ſides, we ſhall always be ready on our part, to treat of thoſe things which ſhall be moſt chiefly for the united Benefit of both Republicks. In the mean time God long preſerve your Majeſty to his Glory, and the Defence and Safeguard of his Orthodox Church.

Richard, Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the moſt Serene and Potent Prince Charles Guſtavus, King of the Swedes, Goths and Vandals, &c.

Moſt Serene and Potent King, our Friend and Confederate ;

WE have receiv'd two Letters from your Majeſty, the one by your Envoy, the other tranſmitted to us from our Reſident Philip Meadows, whereby we not only underſtood your Majeſty's unfeigned Grief for the Death of our moſt Serene Father, in Expreſſions ſetting forth the real Thoughts of your Mind, and how highly your Majeſty eſteem'd his Proweſs and Friendſhip, but alſo what great hopes your Majeſty conceiv'd of our ſelves advanc'd in his room. And certainly, as an Accumulation of paternal Honour in deeming us worthy to ſucceed him, nothing more noble, more illuſtrious, could befal us than the Judgment of ſuch a Prince ; nothing more fortunately auſpicious could happen to us, at our firſt entrance upon the Government, than ſuch a Congratulator ; nothing laſtly that could more vehemently incite us to take poſſeſſion of our Father's Vertues, as our lawful Inheritance, than the Encouragement of ſo great a King. As to what concerns your Majeſty's Intereſts, already under Conſideration between us, in reference to the common Cauſe of the Proteſtants, we would have your Majeſty have thoſe Thoughts of us, that ſince we came to the Helm of this Republick, tho the Condition of our Affairs be ſuch at preſent, that they chiefly require our utmoſt Diligence, Care, and Vigilancy at home, yet that we hold nothing more Sacred, and that there is not any thing more determin'd by Us, than as much as in us lies, never to be wanting to the League concluded by our Father with your Majeſty. To that end, we have taken care to ſend a Fleet into the Baltic Sea, with thoſe Inſtructions which our Agent, to that purpoſe empower'd by us, will communicate to your Majeſty, whom God preſerve in long Safety, and proſper with Succeſs in the Defence of his Orthodox Religion.

From our Court at Weſt-minſter, Octob. 13. 1658.

Richard,

Richard, Protector, To the moſt Serene and Potent Prince, Charles Guſtavus, King of the Swedes, Goths and Vandals, &c.

Moſt Serene and moſt Potent King, our Friend and Confederate;

WE ſend to your Majeſty, nor could we ſend a Preſent more worthy or more excellent, the truly brave and truly noble Sir George Aſcue Knight, not only fam'd in War, and more eſpecially for his Experience in Sea Affairs, approv'd and try'd in many deſperate Engagements, but alſo endu'd with ſingular Probity, Modeſty, Ingenuity, Learning, and for the Sweetneſs of his Diſpoſition careſs'd by all Men; and which is the ſum of all, now deſirous to ſerve under the Banners of your Majeſty, ſo renown'd o're all the World for your Military Proweſs. And we would have your Majeſty be fully aſſur'd, that whatſoever high Employment you confer upon him, wherein Fidelity, Fortitude, Experience, may ſhine forth in their true Luſtre, you cannot entruſt a Perſon more faithful, more couragious, nor eaſily more skilful. Moreover, as to thoſe things we have given him in charge to communicate to your Majeſty, we requeſt that he may have quick Acceſs, and favourable Audience, and that you will vouchſafe the ſame Credit to him as to our ſelves, if perſonally preſent: Laſtly, that you will give him that Honour as you ſhall judg becoming a Perſon dignify'd with his own Merits and our Recommendation. Now God Almighty proſper all your Affairs with happy Succeſs, to his own Glory, and the Safeguard of his Orthodox Church.

Richard, Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the moſt Serene and Potent Prince Charles Guſtavus, King of the Swedes, Goths and Vandals, &c.

Moſt Serene and Potent King, our deareſt Friend and Confederate;

SAmuel Piggot of London Merchant, in a Petition deliver'd to Us, ſets forth, that he lately ſent from London into France, upon the account of Trade, two Veſſels, the one call'd the Poſt, Tiddie Jacob Maſter, the other the Water-Dog, Garbrand Peters Maſter. That from France, being laden with Salt, they ſail'd for Amſterdam; at Amſterdam the one took in Ballaſt only; the other laden with Herrings, in Copartnerſhip with one Peter Heinbergh, ſail'd away for Stettin in Pomerania, which is under your Juriſdiction, there to unlade her Freight; but now he hears that both thoſe Veſſels are detain'd ſomewhere in the Baltic Sea by your Forces; notwithſtanding that he took care to ſend a Writing with both thoſe Ships, ſeal'd with the Seal of the Admiralty Court, by which it appear'd that he alone was the lawful Owner of both the Veſſels and Goods, that part excepted which belong'd to Heinbergh. Of all which, in regard he has made full proof before us, we make it our Requeſt to your Majeſty (to prevent the Ruin and utter Shipwrack of the poor Man's Eſtate by the loſs of two Ships at one time) that you would command your Officers to take care for the ſpeedy diſcharge of the ſaid Veſſels. God long preſerve your Majeſty to his own Glory, and the Safeguard of his Orthodox Church.

Richard, Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the High and Mighty Lords, the States of Weſtfriezland.

Moſt High and Mighty Lords, our deareſt Friends and Confederates;

M*ary Grinder* Widow, in a Petition preſented to us, has made a moſt grievous Complaint, that whereas Thomas Killegrew, a Commander in your Service, has ow'd her for theſe eighteen Years a conſiderable Sum of Money, ſhe can by her Agents neither bring him to pay the ſaid Money, nor to try his Title at Law to the ſame, if he has any. Which that he may not be compell'd to do by the Widow's Attorney, he has petition'd your Highneſſes, that no body may be ſuffer'd to ſue him for any Money that he owes in England. But ſhould we ſignify no more than only this to your Highneſſes, that ſhe is a Widow, that ſhe is in great want, the Mother of many ſmall Children, which her Creditor endeavours to deprive of almoſt all that little Support they have in this World, we cannot believe we need make uſe of any greater Arguments to your Lordſhips, ſo well acquainted with thoſe Divine Precepts forbidding the Oppreſſion of the Widow and the Fatherleſs, to perſwade ye not to grant any ſuch Privilege upon a bare Petition, to the fraudulent Subverter of the Widow's Right: and which for the ſame reaſon we aſſure our ſelves you will never admit.

Richard, Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the moſt Serene and Potent Prince, Lewis King of France.

Moſt Serene and Potent Prince, our moſt Auguſt Confederate and Friend;

VVE have been given to underſtand, and that to our no ſmall Grief, That ſeveral Proteſtant Churches in Provence were ſo maliciouſly affronted and diſturb'd by a certain turbulent Humouriſt, that the Magiſtrates at Grenoble, who are the proper Judges of ſuch Cauſes, thought him worthy of exemplary Puniſhment: But that the Convention of the Clergy which was held not far from thoſe places obtain'd of your Majeſty, that the whole matter ſhould be remov'd up to Paris, there to be heard before your Royal Council. But they not having as yet made any Determination in the Buſineſs, thoſe Churches, and more eſpecially that of Tvoire, are forbid to meet for the Worſhip of God. Moſt earneſtly therefore we requeſt your Majeſty, That in the firſt place you would not prohibit thoſe from preaching in publick, whoſe Prayers to God for your Safety and the Proſperity of your Kingdom, you are ſo free to ſuffer; then that the Sentence given againſt that impertinent Diſturber of Divine Service, by the proper Judges of thoſe Cauſes at Grenoble, may be duly put in execution. God long preſerve your Majeſty in Safety and Proſperity; to the end that if you have any good Opinion of our Prayers, or think 'em prevalent with God, you may be ſpeedily induc'd to ſuffer the ſame to be publickly put up to Heaven by thoſe Churches, now forbid their wonted Meetings.

Weſtminſter, Feb. 18. 1658.

To the moſt eminent Lord Cardinal Mazarine.

Moſt Eminent Lord Cardinal;

THE moſt illuſtrious Lady, late Wife of the deceaſed Duke of Richmond, is now going into France, together with the young Duke her Son, with an intention to reſide there for ſome time. We therefore moſt earneſtly requeſt your Eminency, That if any thing fall out, wherein your Authority, Favour and Patronage may be aſſiſting to 'em, as Strangers, you would vouchſafe to protect their Dignity, and to indulge the Recommendation of it not the meaneſt, in ſuch a manner, that if any addition can be made to your Civility toward all People, eſpecially of illuſtrious Deſcent, we may be ſenſible our Letters have obtain'd it. Withal, your Excellency may aſſure your ſelf, your Recommendation, whenever you require the like from us, ſhall be of equal Force and Value in our Eſteem and Care.

Weſtminſter, Feb. 29. 1658.

Richard, Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the moſt Serene and Potent Prince, John King of Portugal.

Moſt Serene and Potent Prince, our Friend and Confederate;

ALthough there are many things which we are bound to impart by writing to a King our Friend, and in ſtrict Confederacy with our Republick, yet there is nothing which we ever did more willingly, than what we do at this preſent, by theſe our Letters to congratulate this laſt Victory, ſo glorious to the Kingdom of Portugal, obtain'd againſt our common Enemy the Spaniard. By which, how great an Advantage will accrue not only to your own, but to the Peace and Repoſe of all Europe, and that perhaps for many Years, there is no body but underſtands. But there is one thing more, wherein we muſt acknowledg your Majeſty's Juſtice, the moſt certain pledg of Victory; That Satisfaction has been given by the Commiſſioners appointed at London, according to the 24th Article of the League, to our Merchants, whoſe Veſſels were hir'd by the Braſile Company. Only there is one among 'em ſtill remaining, Alexander Bence of London Merchant, whoſe Ship call'd the Three Brothers, John Wilks Maſter, being hir'd and laden, and having perform'd two Voyages for the ſaid Company, yet ſtill they refuſe to pay him his Wages according to their Covenants; when the reſt that only perform'd ſingle Voyages are already paid. Which why it ſhould be done, we cannot underſtand, unleſs thoſe People think, in their Judgment, that Perſon more worthy of his Hire, who did 'em only ſingle Service, than he who earn'd his Wages twice. We therefore earneſtly requeſt your Majeſty, that Satisfaction may be given for his Service truly perform'd, to this ſame ſingle Alexander, to whom a double Stipend is due; and that by virtue of your Royal Authority you would prefix the Braſile Company as ſhort a day as may be, for the payment of his juſt due, and repairing his Loſſes; ſeeing that their Delays have been the occaſion that the Loſs ſuſtain'd by the Merchant has very near exceeded the Money it ſelf which is owing for his Wages. So God continue your Majeſty's proſperous Succeſſes againſt the common Enemy.

From our Court at Weſtminſter, Feb. 23. 1658.

Richard,

Richard, Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the moſt Eminent Lord Cardinal Mazarin.

Moſt Eminent Lord;

BY Letters to your Eminency, about eight Months ſince, dated June 13. we recommended to your Eminency the Cauſe of Peter Pet, a Perſon of ſingular Probity, and in all Naval Sciences moſt uſeful both to us and our Republick. His Ship call'd the Edward, in the Year 1646. as we formerly wrote, was taken in the mouth of the Thames by one Baſcon, and ſold in the Port of Boulogne; and though the King in his Royal Council, the 4*th* of November, 1647. decreed, That what Money the Council ſhould think fitting to be given in recompence of the Loſs, ſhould be forthwith paid in Satisfaction to the Owner; nevertheleſs, as he ſets forth, he could never reap the Benefit of that Order. Now in regard we make no queſtion but that your Eminency, at our Deſire, gave ſtrict Command for the ſpeedy execution of that Decree; we make it therefore our renew'd Requeſt, that you would vouchſafe to examine where the Impediment lies, or through whoſe Neglect or Contumacy it came to paſs, that in ten Years time the King's Decree was not obey'd; and employ your Authority ſo effectually, that the Money then decreed, which we thought long ſince ſatisfy'd, may be ſpeedily demanded and paid to our Petitioner. Thus your Eminency will perform an Act moſt grateful to Juſtice, and lay moreover a ſingular Obligation upon our ſelves.

From our Court at Weſtminſter, Feb. 25. 1658.

The two following Letters, after the Depoſal of Richard, were written in the Name of the Parlament Reſtor'd.

The Parlament of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the moſt Serene and Potent Prince Charles Guſtavus, King of the Swedes, Goths and Vandals, &c.

Moſt Serene and Potent King, our deareſt Friend;

SInce it has pleas'd the moſt merciful and omnipotent God, at whoſe Diſpoſal only the Revolutions of all Kingdoms and Republicks are, to reſtore us to our priſtin Authority, and the ſupream Adminiſtration of the Engliſh Affairs, we thought it convenient in the firſt place to make it known to your Majeſty, and to ſignify moreover as well our extraordinary Affection to your Majeſty, ſo potent a Proteſtant Prince, as alſo our moſt fervent Zeal to promote the Peace between your Majeſty and the King of Denmark, another moſt powerful Proteſtant King, not to be reconcil'd without our Aſſiſtance and the good Offices of our Affection. Our Pleaſure therefore is, that our Extraordinary Envoy Philip Meadows be continued in the ſame Employment with your Majeſty, with which he has been hitherto entruſted from this Republick. To which end we impower him by theſe our Letters to make Propoſals, act and negotiate with your Majeſty, in the ſame manner as was granted him by his laſt Recommendations: and whatſoever he ſhall tranſact and conclude in our Name, we faithfully promiſe and engage, by God's Aſſiſtance, to confirm and ratify. The ſame God long ſupport your Majeſty, the Pillar and Support of the Proteſtant Intereſts.

William Lenthal, Speaker of the Parlament of the Commonwealth of England.

The Parlament of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the moſt Serene Prince Frederick, King of Denmark.

Moſt Serene King, and moſt dear Friend;

SEeing it now is come to paſs, that by the Will and Pleaſure of the moſt merciful and powerful God, the ſupream Moderator of all things, we are reſtor'd to our priſtin Place and Dignity, in the Adminiſtration of the Publick Affairs, we thought it convenient in the firſt place, that a Revolution of this Government ſhould not be conceal'd from your Majeſty's notice, a Prince both our Neighbour and Confederate; and withal, to ſignify how much we lay to heart your ill Succeſs: which you will eaſily perceive by our Zeal and Diligence, that never ſhall be wanting in us to promote and accompliſh a Reconciliation between your Majeſty and the King of Sweden. And therefore we have commanded our Extraordinary Envoy with the moſt Serene King of Sweden, Philip Meadowes, to attend your Majeſty, in our Name, in order to theſe Matters, and to impart, propound, act and negotiate ſuch things as we have given him in charge to communicate to your Majeſty: and what credit you ſhall give to him in this his Employment, we requeſt your Majeſty to believe it given to our ſelves. God Almighty grant your Majeſty a happy and joyful Deliverance out of all your Difficulties and afflicting Troubles, under which you ſtand ſo undauntedly ſupported by your Fortitude and Magnanimity.

A # TREATISE
OF # Civil Power in Eccleſiaſtical Cauſes:

SHEWING,

That it is not lawful for any Power on Earth to compel in Matters of Religion.

---

To the Parlament of the Commonwealth of England, with the Dominions therof.

I Have prepar'd, ſupream Council, againſt the much expected time of your ſitting, this Treatiſe; which, though to all Chriſtian Magiſtrates equally belonging, and therefore to have bin written in the common Language of Chriſtendom, natural Duty and Affection hath confin'd, and dedicated firſt to my own Nation: and in a ſeaſon wherein the timely reading thereof, to the eaſier accompliſhment of your great work, may ſave you much labour and interruption: of two parts uſually propos'd, Civil and Eccleſiaſtical, recommending Civil only to your proper care, Eccleſiaſtical to them only from whom it takes both that Name and Nature. Yet not for this cauſe only do I require or truſt to find acceptance, but in a twofold reſpect beſides: firſt as bringing clear Evidence of Scripture and Proteſtant Maxims to the Parlament of England, who in all their late Acts, upon occaſion, have profeſs'd to aſſert only the true Proteſtant Chriſtian Religion, as it is contain'd in the holy Scriptures: next, in regard that your Power being but for a time, and having in your ſelves a Chriſtian Liberty of your own, which at one time or other may be oppreſs'd, therof truly ſenſible, it will concern you while you are in power, ſo to regard other Mens Conſciences, as you would your own ſhould be regarded in the power of others; and to conſider that any Law againſt Conſcience is alike in force againſt any Conſcience, and ſo may one way or other, juſtly redound upon your ſelves. One advantage I make no doubt of, that I ſhall write to many eminent Perſons of your number, already perfect and reſolv'd in this important Article of Chriſtianity. Some of whom I remember to have heard often for ſeveral Years, at a Council next in Authority to your own, ſo well joining Religion with civil Prudence, and yet ſo well diſtinguiſhing the different Power of either, and this not only voting, but frequently reaſoning why it ſhould be ſo, that if any there preſent had bin before of an opinion contrary, he might doubtleſs have departed thence a Convert in that point, and have confeſs'd, that then both Commonwealth and Religion will at length, if ever, flouriſh in Chriſtendom, when either they who govern diſcern between Civil and Religious, or they only who ſo diſcern ſhall be admitted to govern. Till then nothing but Troubles, Perſecutions, Commotions can be expected; the inward decay of true Religion among our ſelves, and the utter overthrow at laſt by a common Enemy. Of Civil Liberty I have written hertofore by the appointment, and not without the approbation of Civil Power: of Chriſtian Liberty I write now, which others long ſince having don with all freedom under Heathen Emperors, I ſhall do wrong to ſuſpect, that I now ſhall with leſs, under Chriſtian Governors, and ſuch eſpecially as profeſs openly their defence of Chriſtian Liberty; although I write this, not otherwiſe appointed or induc'd, than by an inward perſwaſion of the Chriſtian Duty, which I may uſefully diſcharge herin to the common Lord and Maſter of us all, and the certain hope of his approbation, firſt and chiefeſt to be ſought: In the hand of whoſe Providence I remain, praying all ſucceſs and good event on your publick Councels, to the defence of true Religion and our Civil Rights.

A Treatiſe of Civil Power in Eccleſiaſtical Cauſes.

TWO things there be which have bin ever found working much Miſchief to the Church of God, and the Advancement of Truth; Force on one ſide reſtraining, and Hire on the other ſide corrupting the Teachers thereof. Few Ages have bin ſince the Aſcenſion of our Saviour, wherin the one of theſe two, or both together have not prevail'd. It can be at no time therfore unſeaſonable to ſpeak of theſe things; ſince by them the Church is either in continual Detriment and Oppreſſion, or in continual danger. The former ſhall be at this time my Argument; the latter as I ſhall find God diſpoſing me, and opportunity inviting. What I argue, ſhall be drawn from the Scripture only; and therin from true fundamental Principles of the Goſpel, to all knowing Chriſtians undeniable. And if the Governors of this Commonwealth ſince the rooting out of Prelats have made leaſt uſe of Force in Religion, and moſt have favour'd Chriſtian Liberty of any in this Iland before them ſince the firſt preaching of the Goſpel, for which we are not to forget our Thanks to God, and their due Praiſe; they may, I doubt not, in this Treatiſe find that which not only will confirm them to defend ſtill the Chriſtian Liberty which we enjoy, but will incite them alſo to enlarge it, if in aught they yet ſtraiten it. To them who perhaps herafter, leſs experienc'd in Religion, may come to govern or give us Laws, this or other ſuch, if they pleaſe, may be a timely inſtruction: however to the Truth it will be at all times no unneedful Teſtimony; at leaſt ſome diſcharge of that general Duty which no Chriſtian but according to what he hath receiv'd, knows is requir'd of him if he have aught more conducing to the advancement of Religion then what is uſually endeavour'd, freely to impart it.

It will require no great labor of Expoſition to unfold what is here meant by matters of Religion; being as ſoon apprehended as defin'd, ſuch things as belong chiefly to the Knowledg and Service of God: and are either above the reach and light of Nature without Revelation from above, and therfore liable to be variouſly underſtood by human Reaſon, or ſuch things as are enjoin'd or forbidden by divine Precept, which els by the Light of Reaſon would ſeem indifferent to be don or not don; and ſo likewiſe muſt needs appeer to every Man as the Precept is underſtood. Whence I here mean by Conſcience or Religion, that full perſwaſion wherby we are aſſur'd that our Belief and Practice, as far as we are able to apprehend and probably make appear, is according to the Will of God and his holy Spirit within us, which we ought to follow much rather than any Law of Man, as not only his Word every where bids us, but the very Dictate of Reaſon tells us. Acts 4. 19. Whether it be right in the ſight of God, to hearken to you more than to God, judg ye. That for Belief or Practice in Religion according to this conſcientious Perſwaſion, no Man ought to be puniſh'd or moleſted by any outward Force on Earth whatſoever, I diſtruſt not, through God's implor'd Aſſiſtance, to make plain by theſe following Arguments.

Firſt, it cannot be deni'd, being the main Foundation of our Proteſtant Religion, that we of theſe Ages, having no other divine Rule or Autority from without us warrantable to one another as a common ground but the holy Scripture, and no other within us but the Illumination of the holy Spirit ſo interpreting that Scripture as warrantable only to our ſelves, and to ſuch whoſe Conſciences we can ſo perſwade, can have no other ground in matters of Religion but only from the Scriptures. And theſe being not poſſible to be underſtood without this Divine Illumination, which no Man can know at all times to be in himſelf, much leſs to be at any time for certain in any other, it follows cleerly, that no Man or body of Men in theſe times can be the infallible Judges or Determiners in matters of Religion to any other Mens Conſciences but their own. And therfore thoſe Bereans are commended, Acts 17. 11. who after the preaching even of S. Paul, ſearch'd the Scriptures daily, whether thoſe things were ſo. Nor did they more than what God himſelf in many places commands us by the ſame Apoſtle, to ſearch, to try, to judg of theſe things our ſelves: And gives us reaſon alſo, Gal. 6. 4, 5. Let every Man prove his own Work, and then ſhall he have rejoycing in himſelf alone, and not in another: for every Man ſhall bear his own burden. If then we count it ſo ignorant and irreligious in the Papiſt to think himſelf diſcharg'd in God's account, believing only as the Church believes, how much greater Condemnation will it be to the Proteſtant his Condemner, to think himſelf juſtified, believing only as the State believes? With good cauſe therfore it is the general conſent of all ſound Proteſtant Writers, that neither Traditions, Councils nor Canons of any viſible Church, much leſs Edicts of any Magiſtrate or Civil Seſſion, but the Scripture only can be the final Judg or Rule in matters of Religion, and that only in the Conſcience of every Chriſtian to himſelf. Which Proteſtation made by the firſt publick Reformers of our Religion againſt the Imperial Edicts of Charles the fifth, impoſing Church-Traditions without Scripture, gave firſt beginning to the name of Proteſtant; and with that name hath ever bin receiv'd this Doctrine, which prefers the Scripture before the Church, and acknowledges none but the Scripture ſole Interpreter of it ſelf to the Conſcience. For if the Church be not ſufficient to be implicitly believ'd, as we hold it is not, what can there els be nam'd of more Autority than the Church but the Conſcience, than which God only is greater, 1 Joh. 3. 20? But if any Man ſhall pretend, that the Scripture judges to his Conſcience for other Men, he makes himſelf greater not only than the Church, but alſo than the Scripture, than the Conſciences of other Men; a Preſumption too high for any Mortal, ſince every true Chriſtian, able to give a reaſon of his Faith, hath the Word of God before him, the promis'd Holy Spirit, and the Mind of Chriſt within him, 1 Cor. 2. 16. a much better and ſafer guide of Conſcience, which as far as concerns himſelf he may far more certainly know than any outward Rule impos'd upon him by others whom he inwardly neither knows nor can know; at leaſt knows nothing of them more ſure than this one thing, that they cannot be his Judges in Religion. 1 Cor. 2. 15. The ſpiritual Man judgeth all things, but he himſelf is judg'd of no Man. Chiefly for this cauſe do all true Proteſtants account the Pope Antichriſt, for that he aſſumes to himſelf this Infallibility over both the Conſcience and the Scripture; ſitting in the Temple of God, as it were oppoſite to God, and exalting himſelf above all that is called God, or is worſhipped, 2 Theſſ. 2. 4. That is to ſay not only above all Judges and Magiſtrates, who though they be call'd Gods, are far beneath infallible, but alſo above God himſelf, by giving Law both to the Scripture, to the Conſcience, and to the Spirit it ſelf of God within us. Whenas we find, James 4. 12. There is one Lawgiver, who is able to ſave and to deſtroy: Who art thou that judgeſt another? That Chriſt is the only Lawgiver of his Church, and that it is here meant in religious matters, no well-grounded Chriſtian will deny. Thus alſo S. Paul, Rom. 14. 4. Who art thou that judgeſt the Servant of another? to his own Lord he ſtandeth or falleth: but he ſhall ſtand; for God is able to make him ſtand. As therfore of one beyond expreſſion bold and preſumptuous, both theſe Apoſtles demand, Who art thou that preſum'ſt to impoſe other Law or Judgment in Religion than the only Lawgiver and Judg Chriſt, who only can ſave and deſtroy, gives to the Conſcience? And the forecited place to the Theſſalonians by compar'd Effects reſolves us, that be he or they who or wherever they be or can be, they are of far leſs Autority than the Church, whom in theſe things as Proteſtants they receive not, and yet no leſs Antichriſt in this main point of Antichriſtianiſm, no leſs a Pope or Popedom than he at Rome, if not much more; by ſetting up ſupream Interpreters of Scripture either thoſe Doctors whom they follow, or, which is far worſe, themſelves as a civil Papacy aſſuming unaccountable Supremacy to themſelves not in Civil only but in Eccleſiaſtical Cauſes. Seeing then that in matters of Religion, as hath been prov'd, none can jugd or determin here on Earth, no not Church-Governors themſelves, againſt the Conſciences of other Believers, my Inference is, or rather not mine but our Saviour's own, that in thoſe matters they neither can command nor uſe Conſtraint, leſt they run raſhly on a pernicious Conſequence, forewarn'd in that Parable, Mat. 13. from the 26th to the 31ſt Verſe: Leſt while ye gather up the Tares, ye root up alſo the Wheat with them. Let both grow together until the Harveſt: and in the time of Harveſt I will ſay to the Reapers, Gather ye together firſt the Tares, &c. Whereby he declares that this work neither his own Miniſters nor any els can diſcerningly anough or judgingly perform without his own immediat direction, in his own fit ſeaſon; and that they ought till then not to attempt it. Which is further confirm'd 2 Cor. 1. 24. Not that we have dominion over your Faith, but are helpers of your Joy. If Apoſtles had no Dominion or conſtraining Power over Faith or Conſcience, much leſs have ordinary Miniſters, 1 Pet. 5. 2, 3. Feed the Flock of God not by conſtraint, &c. neither as being Lords over God's Heritage. But ſome will object, that this overthrows all Church-diſcipline, all Cenſure of Errors, if no Man can determin. My Anſwer is, that what they hear is plain Scripture, which forbids not Church-ſentence or determining, but as it ends in violence upon the Conſcience unconvinc'd. Let whoſo will interpret or determin, ſo it be according to true Church-diſcipline, which is exercis'd on them only who have willingly join'd themſelves in that Cov'nant of Union, and proceeds only to a ſeparation from the reſt, proceeds never to any corporal inforcement or forfeiture of Money, which in ſpiritual things are the two Arms of Antichriſt, not of the true Church; the one being an Inquiſition, the other no better than a temporal indulgence of Sin for Money, whether by the Church exacted or by the Magiſtrate; both the one and the other a temporal Satisfaction for what Chriſt hath ſatisfied eternally; a popiſh commuting of Penalty, corporal for ſpiritual; a ſatisfaction to Man, eſpecially to the Magiſtrate, for what and to whom we owe none: theſe and more are the Injuſtices of force and fining in Religion, beſides what I moſt inſiſt on, the violation of God's expreſs Commandment in the Goſpel, as hath bin ſhewn. Thus then if Church-Governors cannot uſe Force in Religion, though but for this reaſon, becauſe they cannot infallibly determin to the Conſcience without convincement, much leſs have Civil Magiſtrates autority to uſe Force where they can much leſs judg, unleſs they mean only to be the civil Executioners of them who have no Civil Power to give them ſuch Commiſſion, no nor yet Eccleſiaſtical to any force or violence in Religion. To ſum up all in brief, if we muſt believe as the Magiſtrate appoints, why not rather as the Church? If not as either without Convincement, how can Force be lawful? But ſome are ready to cry out, what ſhall then be done to Blaſphemy? Them I would firſt exhort not thus to terrify and poſe the People with a Greek word; but to teach them better what it is, being a moſt uſual and common word in that Language to ſignifie any ſlander, any malicious or evil ſpeaking, whether againſt God or Man, or any thing to good belonging: Blaſphemy or evil ſpeaking againſt God maliciouſly, is far from Conſcience in Religion, according to that of Mar. 9. 39. There is none who doth a powerful work in my name, and can likely ſpeak evil of me. If this ſuffice not, I refer them to that prudent and well-deliberated Act, Auguſt 9. 1650. wher the Parlament defines Blaſphemy againſt God, as far as it is a Crime belonging to civil Judicature, plenius ac melius Chryſippo & Crantore; in plain Engliſh, more warily, more judiciouſly, more orthodoxally than twice their number of Divines have don in many a prolix Volume: although in all likelihood they whoſe whole ſtudy and profeſſion theſe things are, ſhould be moſt intelligent and authentic therin, as they are for the moſt part, yet neither they nor theſe unerring always, or infallible. But we ſhall not carry it thus; another Greek Apparition ſtands in our way, Hereſie and Heretic; in like manner alſo rail'd at to the People as in a Tongue unknown. They ſhould firſt interpret to them, that Hereſie, by what it ſignifies in that Language, is no word of evil note, meaning only the choiſe or following of any opinion good or bad in Religion or any other Learning: and thus not only in Heathen Authors, but in the New Teſtament it ſelf without cenſure or blame; Acts 15. 5. Certain of the Hereſy of the Phariſes which believ'd; and 26. 5. After the exacteſt Hereſy of our Religion I liv'd a Phariſe. In which ſenſe Presbyterian or Independent may without reproach be call'd a Hereſy. Where it is mention'd with blame, it ſeems to differ little from Schiſm; 1 Cor. 11. 18, 19. I hear that there be Schiſms among you, &c. for there muſt alſo Hereſies be among you, &c. Though ſome who write of Hereſy after thir own Heads, would make it far worſe than Schiſm; when as on the contrary, Schiſm ſignifies diviſion, and in the worſt ſenſe; Hereſy, choiſe only of one Opinion before another, which may be without Diſcord. In Apoſtolic times therfore, ere the Scripture was written, Hereſy was a Doctrin maintain'd againſt the Doctrin by them deliver'd; which in theſe times can be no otherwiſe defin'd than a Doctrin maintain'd againſt the Light, which we now only have of the Scripture. Seeing therefore that no Man, no Synod, no Seſſion of men, though call'd the Church, can judg definitively the ſenſe of Scripture to another mans Conſcience, which is well known to be a general maxim of the Proteſtant Religion; it follows plainly, that he who holds in Religion that belief, or thoſe opinions which to his Conſcience and utmoſt underſtanding appear with moſt evidence or probability in the Scripture, though to others he ſeem erroneous, can no more be juſtly cenſur'd for a Heretic than his cenſurers; who do but the ſame thing themſelves while they cenſure him for ſo doing. For ask them, or any Proteſtant, which hath moſt Autority, the Church or the Scripture? They will anſwer, doubtleſs, that the Scripture: and what hath moſt Autority, that no doubt but they will confeſs is to be follow'd. He then who to his beſt apprehenſion follows the Scripture, though againſt any point of Doctrine by the whole Church receiv'd, is not the Heretic; but he who follows the Church againſt his Conſcience and Perſwaſion grounded on the Scripture. To make this yet more undeniable, I ſhall only borrow a plain ſimily, the ſame which our own Writers, when they would demonſtrate plaineſt, that we rightly prefer the Scripture before the Church, uſe frequently againſt the Papiſt in this manner. As the Samaritans believ'd Chriſt, firſt for the Woman's Word, but next and much rather for his own, ſo we the Scripture: firſt on the Churches Word, but afterwards and much more for its own, as the Word of God; yea the Church it ſelf we believe then for the Scripture. The inference of it ſelf follows: if by the Proteſtant Doctrine we believe the Scripture, not for the Churches ſaying, but for its own as the Word of God, then ought we to believe what in our Conſcience we apprehend the Scripture to ſay, tho the Viſible Church, with all her Doctors gainſay: and being taught to believe them only for the Scripture, they who ſo do are not Heretics, but the beſt Proteſtants: and by thir opinions, whatever they be, can hurt no Proteſtant, whoſe Rule is not to receive them but from the Scripture; which to interpret convincingly to his own Conſcience, none is able but himſelf guided by the Holy Spirit; and not ſo guided, none than he to himſelf can be a worſe Deceiver. To Proteſtants therfore whoſe common Rule and Touchſtone is the Scripture, nothing can with more Conſcience, more Equity, nothing more Proteſtantly can be permitted, than a free and lawful Debate at all times by Writing, Conference, or diſputation of what Opinion ſoever, diſputable by Scripture: concluding, that no man in Religion is properly a Heretic at this day, but he who maintains Traditions or Opinions not probable by Scripture, who, for ought I know, is the Papiſt only; he the only Heretic, who counts all Heretics but himſelf. Such as theſe, indeed, were capitally puniſh'd by the Law of Moſes, as the only true Heretics, Idolaters, plain and open deſerters of God and his known Law: but in the Goſpel ſuch are puniſhd by Excommunion only. Tit. 3. 10. An Heretic, after the firſt and ſecond Admonition, reject. But they who think not this heavy enough, and underſtand not that dreadful aw and ſpiritual Efficacy which the Apoſtle hath expreſs'd ſo highly to be in Church-diſciplin, 2 Cor. 10. of which anon, and think weakly that the Church of God cannot long ſubſiſt but in a bodily fear, for want of other proof will needs wreſt that place of S. Paul, Rom. 13. to ſet up civil Inquiſition, and give Power to the Magiſtrate both of civil Judgment, and puniſhment in cauſes Eccleſiaſtical. But let us ſee with what ſtrength of Argument; Let every Soul be ſubject to the higher Powers. Firſt, how prove they that the Apoſtle means other Powers than ſuch as they to whom he writes were then under; who medl'd not at all in Eccleſiaſtical Cauſes, unleſs as Tyrants and Perſecuters? And from them, I hope, they will not derive either the right of Magiſtrates to judg in Spiritual things, or the duty of ſuch our Obedience. How prove they next, that he intitles them here to ſpiritual Cauſes, from whom he withheld, as much as in him lay, the judging of Civil? 1 Cor. 6. 1, &c. If he himſelf appeal'd to Ceſar, it was to judg his Innocence, not his Religion. For Rulers are not a Terror to good Works, but to the evil: then are they not a terror to Conſcience, which is the rule or judg of good Works grounded on the Scripture. But Hereſy, they ſay, is reckn'd among evil Works, Gal. 5. 20. as if all evil Works were to be puniſh'd by the Magiſtrate; whereof this place, thir own Citation, reck'ns up beſides Hereſy a ſufficient number to confute them, Uncleanneſs, Wantonneſs, Enmity, Strife, Emulations, Animoſities, Contentions, Envyings; all which are far more manifeſt to be judg'd by him than Hereſy, as they define it; and yet I ſuppoſe they will not ſubject theſe evil Works, nor many more ſuch like to his cognizance and Puniſhment. Wilt thou then not be afraid of the Power? Do that which is good, and thou ſhalt have praiſe of the ſame. This ſhews that Religious matters are not here meant; wherin, from the Power here ſpoken of, they could have no praiſe: For he is the Miniſter of God to thee for good: True; but in that Office, and to that end, and by thoſe means which in this place muſt be clearly found, if from this place they intend to argue. And how, for thy good by forcing, oppreſſing, and inſnaring thy Conſcience? Many are the Miniſters of God, and thir Offices no leſs different than many; none more different than State and Church-Government. Who ſeeks to govern both, muſt needs be worſe than any Lord Prelat, or Church-pluraliſt; for he in his own Faculty and Profeſſion, the other not in his own, and for the moſt part not throughly underſtood, makes himſelf ſupream Lord or Pope of the Church, as far as his Civil Juriſdiction ſtretches; and all the Miniſters of God therin, his Miniſters, or his Curates rather in the Function only, not in the Government; while he himſelf aſſumes to rule by Civil Power things to be rul'd only by Spiritual: when as this very Chapter Ver. 6. appointing him his peculiar Office, which requires utmoſt attendance, forbids him this worſe than Church-plurality from that full and weighty Charge, wherin alone he is the Miniſter of God, attending continually on this very thing. To little purpoſe will they here inſtance Moſes, who did all by immediate Divine direction; no nor yet Aſa, Jehoſaphat, or Joſia, who both might when they pleas'd, receive anſwer from God, and had a Commonwealth by him deliver'd them, incorporated with a National Church, exercis'd more in bodily, than in ſpiritual Worſhip; ſo as that the Church might be call'd a Commonwealth, and the whole Commonwealth a Church: nothing of which can be ſaid of Chriſtianity, deliver'd without the help of Magiſtrates, yea in the midſt of thir oppoſition; how little then with any reference to them, or mention of them, ſave only of our Obedience to thir Civil Laws, as they countenance Good, and deter Evil? which is the proper work of the Magiſtrate, following in the ſame Verſe, and ſhews diſtinctly wherin he is the Miniſter of God, a revenger to execute Wrath on him that doth evil. But we muſt firſt know who it is that doth Evil; the Heretic they ſay among the firſt. Let it be known then certainly who is a Heretic; and that he who holds opinions in Religion profeſſedly from Tradition, or his own Inventions, and not from Scripture, but rather againſt it, is the only Heretic; and yet though ſuch, not always puniſhable by the Magiſtrate, unleſs he do evil againſt a Civil Law, properly ſo call'd, hath been already prov'd without need of Repetition; But if thou do that which is evil, be afraid. To do by Scripture and the Goſpel, according to Conſcience, is not to do evil; if we therof ought not to be afraid, he ought not by his judging to give cauſe: cauſes therfore of Religion are not here meant; For he beareth not the Sword in vain. Yes altogether in vain, if it ſmite he knows not what; if that for Hereſy which not the Church it ſelf, much leſs he can determin abſolutely to be ſo; if Truth for Error, being himſelf ſo often fallible, he bears the Sword not in vain only, but unjuſtly and to evil. Be ſubject not only for wrath, but for Conſcience ſake: How for Conſcience ſake, againſt Conſcience? By all theſe reaſons it appears planely that the Apoſtle in this place gives no Judgment or coercive Power to Magiſtrates, neither to thoſe then, nor theſe now, in matters of Religion; and exhorts us no otherwiſe than he exhorted thoſe Romans. It hath now twice befaln me to aſſert, through God's Aſſiſtance, this moſt wreſted and vexd Place of Scripture; heretofore againſt Salmaſius, and regal Tyrany over the State; now againſt Eraſtus, and State-tyrany over the Church. If from ſuch uncertain, or rather ſuch improbable Grounds as theſe, they endue Magiſtracy with ſpiritual Judgment, they may as well inveſt him in the ſame ſpiritual kind with power of utmoſt Puniſhment, Excommunication; and then turn Spiritual into Corporal, as no worſe Authors did then Chryſoſtom, Jerom, and Auſtin, whom Eraſmus and others in thir notes on the New Teſtament have cited to interpret, that cutting off which S. Paul wiſh'd to them who had brought back the Galatians to Circumciſion, no leſs then the amercement of thir whole Virility: and Grotius adds, that this conciſing puniſhment of Circumciſers, became a Penal Law therupon among the Viſigothes: a dangerous example of beginning in the Spirit to end ſo in the Fleſh; wheras that cutting off much likelier ſeems meant a cutting off from the Church, not unuſually ſo term'd in Scripture, and a zealous imprecation, not a command. But I have mention'd this Paſſage, to ſhew how abſurd they often prove, who have not learn'd to diſtinguiſh rightly between Civil Power and Eccleſiaſtical. How many Perſecutions then, Impriſonments, Baniſhments, Penalties, and Stripes; how much bloodſhed have the forcers of Conſcience to anſwer for, and Proteſtants rather than Papiſts! For the Papiſt, judging by his Principles, puniſhes them who believe not as the Church believes, though againſt the Scripture: but the Proteſtant, teaching every one to believe the Scripture, though againſt the Church, counts Heretical, and perſecutes againſt his own Principles, them who in any particular ſo believe as he in general teaches them; them who moſt honour and believe divine Scripture, but not againſt it any human Interpretation though univerſal; them who interpret Scripture only to themſelves, which by his own poſition, none but they to themſelves can interpret: them who uſe the Scripture no otherwiſe by his own Doctrine to thir Edification, than he himſelf uſes it to thir puniſhing; and ſo whom his Doctrine acknowledges a true Believer, his Diſcipline perſecutes as a Heretic. The Papiſt exacts our belief as to the Church due above Scripture; and by the Church, which is the whole People of God, underſtands the Pope, the general Councils, prelatical only, and the ſurnam'd Fathers: but the forcing Proteſtant, though he deny ſuch belief to any Church whatſoever, yet takes it to himſelf and his Teachers, of far leſs Autority than to be call'd the Church, and above Scripture believ'd; which renders his practice both contrary to his belief, and far worſe than that Belief which he condemns in the Papiſt. By all which well conſider'd, the more he profeſſes to be a true Proteſtant, the more he hath to anſwer for his perſecuting than a Papiſt. No Proteſtant therfore, of what Sect ſoever, following Scripture only, which is the common Sect wherin they all agree, and the granted rule of every mans Conſcience to himſelf, ought, by the common Doctrine of Proteſtants, to be forc'd or moleſted for Religion. But as for Popery and Idolatry, why they alſo may not hence plead to be tolerated, I have much leſs to ſay. Thir Religion the more conſider'd, the leſs can be acknowledg'd a Religion; but a Roman Principality rather, endeavouring to keep up her old univerſal Dominion under a new name, and meer ſhadow of a Catholick Religion; being indeed more rightly nam'd a Catholick Hereſy againſt the Scripture, ſupported mainly by a Civil, and, except in Rome, by a forein Power: juſtly therefore to be ſuſpected, not tolerated by the Magiſtrate of another Country. Beſides, of an implicit Faith which they profeſs, the Conſcience alſo becomes implicit, and ſo by voluntary ſervitude to mans Law, forfeits her Chriſtian Liberty. Who then can plead for ſuch a Conſcience, as being implicitly enthrald to man inſtead of God, almoſt becoms no Conſcience, as the Will not free, becoms no Will? Nevertheleſs if they ought not to be tolerated, it is for juſt reaſon of State, more than of Religion; which they who force, though profeſſing to be Proteſtants, deſerve as little to be tolerated themſelves, being no leſs guilty of Popery, in the moſt Popiſh Point. Laſtly, for Idolatry, who knows it not to be evidently againſt all Scripture, both of the Old and New Teſtament, and therfore a true Hereſy, or rather an Impiety, wherein a right Conſcience can have naught to do; and the Works therof ſo manifeſt, that a Magiſtrate can hardly err in prohibiting and quite removing at leaſt the publick and ſcandalous Uſe therof?

From the riddance of theſe Objections, I proceed yet to another Reaſon why it is unlawful for the Civil Magiſtrate to uſe Force in Matters of Religion; which is, becauſe to judg in thoſe things, though we ſhould grant him able, which is prov'd he is not, yet as a Civil Magiſtrate he hath no right. Chriſt hath a Government of his own, ſufficient of it ſelf to all his Ends and Purpoſes in governing his Church, but much different from that of the Civil Magiſtrate; and the difference in this very thing principally conſiſts, that it governs not by outward Force; and that for two Reaſons. Firſt, Becauſe it deals only with the inward Man and his Actions, which are all Spiritual, and to outward Force not liable. 2ly, To ſhew us the Divine Excellence of his Spiritual Kingdom, able, without worldly Force, to ſubdue all the Powers and Kingdoms of this World, which are upheld by outward Force only. That the inward Man is nothing els but the inward part of Man, his Underſtanding and his Will; and that his Actions thence proceeding, yet not ſimply thence, but from the Work of Divine Grace upon them, are the whole Matter of Religion under the Goſpel, will appear plainly by conſidering what that Religion is; whence we ſhall perceive yet more plainly that it cannot be forc'd. What Evangelic Religion is, is told in two words, Faith and Charity, or Belief and Practice. That both theſe flow, either the one from the Underſtanding, the other from the Will, or both jointly from both; once indeed naturally free, but now only as they are regenerate and wrought on by Divine Grace, is in part evident to common Senſe and Principles unqueſtioned, the reſt by Scripture: Concerning our Belief, Mat. 16. 17. Fleſh and Blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in Heaven. Concerning our practice, as it is religious, and not meerly civil, Gal. 5. 22, 23. and other places, declare it to be the Fruit of the Spirit only. Nay, our whole practical Duty in Religion is contain'd in Charity, or the Love of God and our Neighbour, no way to be forc'd, yet the fulfilling of the whole Law; that is to ſay, our whole practice in Religion. If then both our Belief and Practice, which comprehend our whole Religion, flow from Faculties of the inward Man, free and unconſtrainable of themſelves by Nature, and our Practice not only from Faculties endu'd with freedom, but from Love and Charity beſides, incapable of Force, and all theſe things by Tranſgreſſion loſt, but renewed and regenerated in us by the Power and Gift of God alone; how can ſuch Religion as this admit of Force from Man, or Force be any way appli'd to ſuch Religion, eſpecially under the free Offer of Grace in the Goſpel, but it muſt forthwith fruſtrate and make of no effect, both the Religion and the Goſpel? And that to compel outward Profeſſion, which they will ſay perhaps ought to be compell'd, though inward Religion cannot, is to compel Hypocriſy, not to advance Religion, ſhall yet, though of it ſelf clear enough, be ere the concluſion further manifeſt. The other reaſon why Chriſt rejects outward Force in the Government of his Church, is, as I ſaid before, to ſhew us the Divine Excellence of his Spiritual Kingdom, able without worldly Force to ſubdue all the Powers and Kingdoms of this World, which are upheld by outward Force only: By which to uphold Religion otherwiſe than to defend the Religious from outward Violence, is no Service to Chriſt or his Kingdom, but rather a Diſparagement, and degrades it from a Divine and Spiritual Kingdom, to a Kingdom of this World: which he denies it to be, becauſe it needs not Force to confirm it: Joh. 18. 36. If my Kingdom were of this World, then would my Servants fight, that I ſhould not be deliver'd to the Jews. This proves the Kingdom of Chriſt not govern'd by outward Force, as being none of this World, whoſe Kingdoms are maintain'd all by Force only: and yet diſproves not that a Chriſtian Commonwealth may defend it ſelf againſt outward Force, in the Cauſe of Religion as well as in any other; though Chriſt himſelf coming purpoſely to die for us, would not be ſo defended. 1 Cor. 1. 27. God hath choſen the weak things of the World, to confound the things which are mighty. Then ſurely he hath not choſen the Force of this World to ſubdue Conſcience, and conſcientious Men, who in this World are counted weakeſt; but rather Conſcience, as being weakeſt, to ſubdue and regulate Force, his Adverſary, not his Aid or Inſtrument in governing the Church: 2 Cor. 10. 3, 4, 5, 6. For though we walk in the Fleſh, we do not war after the Fleſh: For the Weapons of our Warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of ſtrong holds, caſting down Imaginations, and every high thing that exalts it ſelf againſt the knowledg of God, and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Chriſt: And having in a readineſs to avenge all diſobedience. It is evident by the firſt and ſecond Verſes of this Chapter, that the Apoſtle here ſpeaks of that Spiritual Power by which Chriſt governs his Church, how allſufficient it is, how powerful to reach the Conſcience, and the inward Man with whom it chiefly deals, and whom no Power els can deal with. In compariſon of which, as it is here thus magnificently deſcrib'd, how uneffectual and weak is outward Force with all her boiſtrous Tools, to the ſhame of thoſe Chriſtians, and eſpecially thoſe Churchmen, who to the exerciſing of Church Diſcipline, never ceaſe calling on the Civil Magiſtrate to interpoſe his fleſhly Force? an Argument that all true miniſterial and ſpiritual Power is dead within them; who think the Goſpel, which both began and ſpread over the whole World for above three hundred Years, under heathen and perſecuting Emperors, cannot ſtand or continue, ſupported by the ſame Divine Preſence and Protection, to the World's end, much eaſier under the defenſive Favour only of a Chriſtian Magiſtrate, unleſs it be enacted and ſettled, as they call it, by the State, a Statute or a State-Religion; and underſtand not that the Church it ſelf cannot, much leſs the State, ſettle or impoſe one tittle of Religion upon our Obedience implicit, but can only recommend or propound it to our free and conſcientious examination: unleſs they mean to ſet the State higher than the Church in Religion, and with a groſs Contradiction give to the State in their ſettling Petition, that command of our implicit Belief, which they deny in their ſettled Confeſſion, both to the State and to the Church. Let them ceaſe then to importune and interrupt the Magiſtrate from attending to his own Charge in Civil and Moral things, the ſettling of things Juſt, things Honeſt, the defence of things Religious, ſettled by the Churches within themſelves; and the repreſſing of their Contraries determinable by the common Light of Nature; which is not to conſtrain or to repreſs Religion, probable by Scripture, but the Violaters and Perſecutors therof: Of all which things he hath anough and more than anough to do, left yet undon; for which the Land groans, and Juſtice goes to wrack the while. Let him alſo forbear Force wher he hath no right to judg, for the Conſcience is not his Province, leſt a worſe Woe arrive him, for worſe offending than was denounc'd by our Saviour, Matth. 23. 23. againſt the Phariſees: Ye have forc'd the Conſcience, which was not to be forc'd; but Judgment and Mercy ye have not executed; this ye ſhould have done, and the other let alone. And ſince it is the Counſel and ſet Purpoſe of God in the Goſpel, by ſpiritual Means which are counted weak, to overcom all Power which reſiſts him; let them not go about to do that by worldly ſtrength, which he hath decreed to do by thoſe means which the World counts Weakneſs, leſt they be again obnoxious to that Saying which in another place is alſo written of the Phariſees, Luke 7. 30. that they fruſtrated the Counſel of God. The main Plea is, and urg'd with much vehemence to their imitation, that the Kings of Juda, as I touch'd before, and eſpecially Joſia, both judg'd and us'd Force in Religion: 2 Chron. 34. 33. He made all that were preſent in Iſrael to ſerve the Lord their God: an Argument, if it be well weighed, worſe than that us'd by the falſe Prophet Shemaia to the High Prieſt, that in imitation of Jehojada, he ought to put Jeremiah in the Stocks, Jer. 29. 24, 26, &c. for which he receiv'd his due Denouncement from God. But to this beſides I return a threefold Anſwer: Firſt, That the State of Religion under the Goſpel is far differing from what it was under the Law; then was the State of Rigour, Childhood, Bondage and Works, to all which Force was not unbefitting; now is the State of Grace, Manhood, Freedom and Faith, to all which belongs Willingneſs and Reaſon, not Force: The Law was then written on Tables of Stone, and to be perform'd according to the Letter, willingly or unwillingly; the Goſpel, our New Cov'nant, upon the Heart of every Believer, to be interpreted only by the ſenſe of Charity and inward Perſwaſion: The Law had no diſtinct

Government or Governors of Church and Commonwealth, but the Prieſts and Levites judg'd in all Cauſes, not Eccleſiaſtical only, but Civil, Deut. 17. 8, &c. which under the Goſpel is forbidden to all Church-Miniſters, as a thing which Chriſt their Maſter in his Miniſtry diſclaim'd, Luke 12. 14. as a thing beneath them, 1 Cor. 6. 4. and by many of our Statutes, as to them who have a peculiar and far differing Government of thir own. If not, why different the Governours? why not Church-miniſters in State-affairs, as well as State-miniſters in Church-affairs? If Church and State ſhall be made one Fleſh again as under the Law, let it be withal conſider'd, that God who then join'd them, hath now ſever'd them; that which, he ſo ordaining, was then a lawful Conjunction, to ſuch on either ſide as join again what he hath ſever'd, would be nothing now but thir own preſumptuous Fornication. Secondly, The Kings of Juda, and thoſe Magiſtrates under the Law might have recours, as I ſaid before, to divine Inſpiration; which our Magiſtrates under the Goſpel have not, more than to the ſame Spirit, which thoſe whom they force have oft-times in greater meaſure than themſelves: and ſo, inſtead of forcing the Chriſtian, they force the Holy Ghoſt; and, againſt that wiſe forewarning of Gamaliel, fight againſt God. Thirdly, Thoſe Kings and Magiſtrates us'd Force in ſuch things only as were undoubtedly known and forbidden in the Law of Moſes, Idolatry and direct Apoſtacy from that national and ſtrict enjoin'd Worſhip of God; wherof the corporal Puniſhment was by himſelf expreſly ſet down: But Magiſtrates under the Goſpel, our free, elective and rational Worſhip, are moſt commonly buſieſt to force thoſe things which in the Goſpel are either left free, nay ſomtimes aboliſh'd when by them compell'd, or els controverted equally by Writers on both ſides, and ſomtimes with odds on that ſide which is againſt them. By which means they either puniſh that which they ought to favour and protect, or that with corporal Puniſhment, and of thir own inventing, which not they but the Church hath receiv'd command to chaſtiſe with a ſpiritual Rod only. Yet ſome are ſo eager in thir Zeal of Forcing, that they refuſe not to deſcend at length to the utmoſt ſhift of that parabolical Proof, Luke 14. 16, &c. Compel them to come in: Therfore Magiſtrates may compel in Religion. As if a Parable were to be ſtrain'd through every Word or Phraſe, and not expounded by the general ſcope therof; which is no other here than the earneſt expreſſion of God's Diſpleaſure on thoſe Recuſant Jews, and his purpoſe to prefer the Gentiles on any terms before them; expreſs'd here by the word Compel. But how compels he? doubtleſs no otherwiſe than he draws, without which no Man can come to him, John 6. 44. and that is by the inward perſwaſive Motions of his Spirit, and by his Miniſters; not by the outward compulſions of a Magiſtrate or his Officers. The true People of Chriſt, as is foretold Pſal. 110. 3. are a willing People in the day of his Power; then much more now when he rules all things by outward weakneſs, that both his inward Power and thir Sincerity may the more appear. God loveth a chearful Giver: then certainly is not pleas'd with an unchearful Worſhipper; as the very words declare of his Evangelical Invitations, Eſa. 55. 1. Ho, every one that thirſteth, come. John 7. 37. If any Man thirſt. Rev. 3. 18. I counſel thee. And 22. 17. Whoſoever will, let him take the Water of Life freely. And in that grand Commiſſion of Preaching, to invite all Nations, Mark 16. 16. as the Reward of them who come, ſo the Penalty of them who come not, is only Spiritual. But they bring now ſome Reaſon with thir Force, which muſt not paſs unanſwer'd, that the Church of Thyatira was blam'd, Rev. 2. 20. for ſuffering the falſe Propheteſs to teach and to ſeduce. I anſwer, That Seducement is to be hinder'd by fit and proper means ordain'd in Church-diſcipline, by inſtant and powerful Demonſtration to the contrary; by oppoſing Truth to Error, no unequal match; Truth the ſtrong, to Error the weak, though ſlie and ſhifting. Force is no honeſt Confutation, but uneffectual, and for the moſt part unſucceſsful, oft-times fatal to them who uſe it: Sound Doctrine, diligently and duly taught, is of her ſelf both ſufficient, and of her ſelf (if ſome ſecret Judgment of God hinder not) always prevalent againſt Seducers. This the Thyatirians had neglected, ſuffering, againſt Church-diſcipline, that Woman to teach and ſeduce among them: Civil Force they had not then in thir Power, being the Chriſtian part only of that City, and then eſpecially under one of thoſe ten great Perſecutions, whereof this the ſecond was raiſ'd by Domitian: Force therfore in theſe Matters could not be requir'd of them, who were then under Force themſelves.

I have ſhewn that the Civil Power hath neither Right, nor can do right, by forcing religious things: I will now ſhew the wrong it doth, by violating the fundamental Privilege of the Goſpel, the new birth-right of every true Beleever, Chriſtian Liberty: 2 Cor. 3. 17. Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is Liberty. Gal. 4. 26. Jeruſalem, which is above, is free; which is the Mother of us all. And v. 31. We are not Children of the Bond-woman, but of the free. It will be ſufficient in this place to ſay no more of Chriſtian Liberty, than that it ſets us free not only from the Bondage of thoſe Ceremonies, but alſo from the forcible impoſition of thoſe Circumſtances, Place and Time, in the Worſhip of God: which though by him commanded in the old Law, yet in reſpect of that Verity and Freedom which is Evangelical, St. Paul comprehends both kinds alike, that is to ſay, both Ceremony and Circumſtance, under one and the ſame contemptuous name of weak and beggarly Rudiments, Gal. 4. 3, 9, 10. Col. 2. 8, with 16. conformable to what our Saviour himſelf taught, John 4. 21, 23. Neither in this Mountain, nor yet at Jeruſalem. In Spirit and in Truth; for the Father ſeeketh ſuch to worſhip him: that is to ſay, not only ſincere of Heart, for ſuch he ſought ever; but alſo, as the words here chiefly import, not compell'd to Place, and by the ſame reaſon, not to any ſet time; as his Apoſtle by the ſame Spirit hath taught us, Rom. 14. 6, &c. One Man eſteemeth one day above another, another, &c. Gal. 4. 10. Ye obſerve Days, and Months, &c. Col. 2. 16. Theſe and other ſuch places of Scripture the beſt and learnedeſt reformed Writers have thought evident anough to inſtruct us in our Freedom, not only from Ceremonies, but from thoſe Circumſtances alſo, though impos'd with a confident Perſwaſion of Morality in them, which they hold impoſſible to be in place or time. By what warrant then our Opinions and Practices herin are of late turn'd quite againſt all other Proteſtants, and that which is to them Orthodoxal, to us become ſcandalous and puniſhable by Statute, I wiſh were once again better conſider'd; if we mean not to proclame a Schiſm in this point from the beſt and moſt reformed Churches abroad. They who would ſeem more knowing, confeſs that theſe things are indifferent, but for that very cauſe by the Magiſtrate may be commanded. As if God of his ſpecial Grace in the Goſpel had to this end freed us from his own Commandments in theſe things, that our Freedom ſhould ſubject us to a more greevous Yoke, the Commandments of Men. As well may the Magiſtrate call that common or unclean which God hath cleans'd, forbidden to St. Peter, Acts 10. 15. as well may he loos'n that which God hath ſtrait'nd, or ſtrait'n that which God hath loos'nd, as he may injoin thoſe things in Religion which God hath left free, and lay on that Yoke which God hath taken off. For he hath not only given us this Gift as a ſpecial Privilege and Excellence of the free Goſpel above the ſervile Law, but ſtrictly alſo hath commanded us to keep it and enjoy it. Gal. 5. 13. You are call'd to Liberty. 1 Cor. 7. 23. Be not made the Servants of Men. Gal. 5. 14. Stand faſt therfore in the Liberty wherwith Chriſt hath made us free; and be not intangl'd again with the Yoke of Bondage. Neither is this a meer Command, but for the moſt part in theſe forecited places accompanied with the very waightieſt and inmoſt Reaſons of Chriſtian Religion: Rom. 14. 9, 10. For to this end Chriſt both dy'd, and roſe, and reviv'd, that he might be Lord both of the dead and living. But why doſt thou judg thy Brother? &c. How preſum'ſt thou to be his Lord, to be whoſe only Lord, at leaſt in theſe things, Chriſt both dy'd, and roſe, and liv'd again? We ſhall all ſtand before the Judgment-ſeat of Chriſt. Why then doſt thou not only judg, but perſecute in theſe things for which we are to be accountable to the Tribunal of Chriſt only, our Lord and Law-giver? 1 Cor. 7. 23. Ye are bought with a price; be not made the Servants of Men. Some trivial price belike, and for ſome frivolous pretences paid in thir opinion, if bought and by him redeem'd who is God from what was once the Service of God, we ſhall be enthral'd again, and forc'd by Men to what now is but the Service of Men. Gal. 4. 31. with 5. 1. We are not Children of the Bond-woman, &c. ſtand faſt therefore, &c. Col. 2. 8. Beware leſt any Man ſpoil you, &c. after the Rudiments of the World, and not after Chriſt. Solid Reaſons whereof are continu'd through the whole Chapter. Ver. 10. Ye are complete in him, which is the head of all Principality and Power: Not completed therfore or made the more religious by thoſe Ordinances of Civil Power, from which Chriſt thir Head hath diſcharged us; blotting out the hand-writing of Ordinances that was againſt us, which was contrary to us; and took it out of the way, nailing it to his Croſs, ver. 14. blotting out Ordinances written by God himſelf, much more thoſe ſo boldly written over again by Men: Ordinances which were againſt us, that is, againſt our Frailty, much more thoſe which are againſt our Conſcience. Let no Man therfore judg you in reſpect of, &c. v. 16. Gal. 4. 3, &c. Even ſo we, when we were Children, were in bondage under the Rudiments of the World: But when the fulneſs of Time was come, God ſent forth his Son, &c. to redeem them that were under the Law, that we might receive the Adoption of Sons, &c. Wherfore thou art no more a Servant, but a Son, &c. But now, &c. how turn ye again to the weak and beggarly Rudiments, wherunto ye deſire again to be in bondage? Ye obſerve days, &c. Hence it planely appeers, that if we be not free we are not Sons, but ſtill Servants unadopted; and if we turn again to thoſe weak and beggarly Rudiments, we are not free; yea though willingly, and with a miſguided Conſcience, we deſire to be in bondage to them; how much more then if unwillingly and againſt our Conſcience? Ill was our Condition chang'd from Legal to Evangelical, and ſmall Advantage gotten by the Goſpel, if for the Spirit of Adoption to Freedom promis'd us, we receive again the Spirit of Bondage to Fear; if our Fear, which was then ſervile towards God only, muſt be now ſervile in Religion towards Men: Strange alſo and prepoſterous Fear, if when and wherin it hath attain'd by the Redemption of our Saviour to be filial only towards God, it muſt be now ſervile towards the Magiſtrate. Who by ſubjecting us to his Puniſhment in theſe things, brings back into Religion that Law of Terror and Satisfaction belonging now only to civil Crimes; and therby in effect aboliſhes the Goſpel by eſtabliſhing again the Law to a far worſe Yoke of Servitude upon us then before. It will therefore not miſbecome the meaneſt Chriſtian to put in mind Chriſtian Magiſtrates, and ſo much the more freely by how much the more they deſire to be thought Chriſtian, (for they will be therby, as they ought to be in theſe things, the more our Brethren and the leſs our Lords) that they meddle not raſhly with Chriſtian Liberty, the Birthright and outward Teſtimony of our Adoption: leſt while they little think it, nay think they do God Service, they themſelves, like the Sons of that Bond-woman, be found perſecuting them who are free-born of the Spirit; and by a Sacrilege of not the leaſt aggravation, bereaving them of that ſacred Liberty which our Saviour with his own Blood purchas'd for them.

A fourth Reaſon why the Magiſtrate ought not to uſe Force in Religion, I bring from the Conſideration of all thoſe ends which he can likely pretend to the interpoſing of his Force therin: and thoſe hardly can be other than firſt the Glory of God; next either the ſpiritual Good of them whom he forces, or the temporal Puniſhment of thir Scandal to others. As for the promoting of God's Glory, none, I think, will ſay that his Glory ought to be promoted in religious things by unwarrantable means, much leſs by means contrary to what he hath commanded. That outward Force is ſuch, and that God's Glory in the whole Adminiſtration of the Goſpel according to his own Will and Counſel ought to be fulfill'd by Weakneſs, at leaſt ſo refuted, not by Force; or if by Force inward and ſpiritual, not outward and corporeal, is already prov'd at large. That outward Force cannot tend to the Good of him who is forc'd in Religion, is unqueſtionable. For in Religion, whatever we do under the Goſpel, we ought to be therof perſwaded without ſcruple; and are juſtified by the Faith we have, not by the Work we do: Rom. 14. 5. Let every Man be fully perſwaded in his own Mind. The other Reaſon which follows neceſſarily is obvious, Gal. 2. 16. and in many other places of St. Paul, as the Ground-work and Foundation of the whole Goſpel, that we are juſtified by the Faith of Chriſt, and not by the Works of the Law. If not by the Works of God's Law, how then by the Injunctions of Man's Law? Surely Force cannot work Perſwaſion, which is Faith; cannot therfore juſtify nor pacify the Conſcience; and that which juſtifies not in the Goſpel, condemns; is not only not good, but ſinful to do: Rom. 14. 23. Whatſoever is not of Faith is Sin. It concerns the Magiſtrate then to take heed how he forces in Religion conſcientious Men: leſt by compelling them to do that wherof they cannot be perſwaded, that wherin they cannot find themſelves juſtified, but by thir own Conſciences condemn'd, inſtead of aiming at their ſpiritual Good, he force them to do Evil; and while he thinks himſelf Aſa, Joſia, Nehemiah, he be found Jeroboam, who caus'd Iſrael to ſin; and therby draw upon his own head all thoſe Sins and Shipwracks of implicit Faith and Conformity, which he hath forc'd, and all the Wounds given to thoſe little ones, whom to offend he will find worſe one day than that violent drowning mentioned Mat. 18. 6. Laſtly, as a Preface to force, it is the uſual pretence, That although tender Conſciences ſhall be tolerated, yet Scandals therby given ſhall not be unpuniſh'd, prophane and licentious Men ſhall not be encourag'd to neglect the performance of religious and holy Duties by color of any Law giving Liberty to tender Conſciences. By which contrivance the way lies ready open to them herafter who may be ſo minded, to take away by little and little that Liberty which Chriſt and his Goſpel, not any Magiſtrate, hath right to give: though this kind of his giving be but to give with one hand, and take away with the other, which is a deluding, not a giving. As for Scandals, if any Man be offended at the conſcientious Liberty of another, it is a taken Scandal, not a given. To heal one Conſcience we muſt not wound another: and Men muſt be exhorted to beware of Scandals in Chriſtian Liberty, not forc'd by the Magiſtrate; leſt while he goes about to take away the Scandal, which is uncertain whether given or taken, he take away our Liberty, which is the certain and the ſacred Gift of God, neither to be touch'd by him, nor to be parted with by us. None more cautious of giving Scandal than St. Paul. Yet while he made himſelf Servant to all, that he might gain the more, he made himſelf ſo of his own accord, was not made ſo by outward Force, teſtifying at the ſame time that he was free from all Men, 1 Cor. 9. 19. and therafter exhorts us alſo, Gal. 5. 13. Ye were call'd to Liberty, &c. but by Love ſerve one another: then not by Force. As for that Fear, leſt prophane and licentious Men ſhould be encourag'd to omit the performance of religious and holy Duties, how can that care belong to the Civil Magiſtrate, eſpecially to his Force? For if prophane and licentious Perſons muſt not neglect the performance of religious and holy Duties, it implies, that ſuch Duties they can perform, which no Proteſtant will affirm. They who mean the outward performance, may ſo explain it; and it will then appeer yet more planely, that ſuch performance of religious and holy Duties, eſpecially by prophane and licentious Perſons, is a diſhonoring rather than a worſhipping of God; and not only by him not requir'd, but deteſted: Prov. 21. 27. The Sacrifice of the wicked is an Abomination; how much more when he bringeth it with a wicked Mind? To compel therfore the prophane to things holy in his Prophaneneſs, is all one under the Goſpel, as to have compell'd the unclean to ſacrifice in his Uncleanneſs under the Law. And I add withal, that to compel the licentious in his Licentiouſneſs, and the conſcientious againſt his Conſcience, comes all to one; tends not to the Honor of God, but to the multiplying and the aggravating of Sin to them both. We read not that Chriſt ever exercis'd Force but once; and that was to drive prophane ones out of his Temple, not to force them in: and if thir being there was an Offence, we find by many other Scriptures that thir praying there was an Abomination: and yet to the Jewiſh Law that Nation, as a Servant, was oblig'd; but to the Goſpel each Perſon is left voluntary, call'd only, as a Son, by the preaching of the Word; not to be driven in by Edicts and force of Arms. For if by the Apoſtle, Rom. 12. 1. we are beſeech'd as Brethren by the Mercies of God to preſent our Bodies a living Sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God, which is our reaſonable Service or Worſhip, then is no Man to be forc'd by the compulſive Laws of Men to preſent his Body a dead Sacrifice, and ſo under the Goſpel moſt unholy and unacceptable, becauſe it is his unreaſonable Service, that is to ſay, not only unwilling but unconſcionable. But if prophane and licentious Perſons may not omit the performance of holy Duties, why may they not partake of holy things? why are they prohibited the Lord's Supper, ſince both the one and the other Action may be outward; and outward performance of Duty may attain at leaſt an outward participation of Benefit? The Church denying them that Communion of Grace and Thankſgiving, as it juſtly doth, why doth the Magiſtrate compel them to the Union of performing that which they neither truly can, being themſelves unholy, and to do ſeemingly is both hateful to God, and perhaps no leſs dangerous to perform holy Duties irreligiouſly, than to receive holy Signs or Sacraments unworthily? All prophane and licentious Men, ſo known, can be conſider'd but either ſo without the Church as never yet within it, or departed thence of their own Accord, or excommunicate: If never yet within the Church, whom the Apoſtle, and ſo conſequently the Church, have naught to do to judg, as he profeſſes, 1 Cor. 5. 12. then by what Autority doth the Magiſtrate judg; or, which is worſe, compel in relation to the Church? If departed of his own Accord, like that loſt Sheep, Luke 15. 4, &c. the true Church either with her own or any borrow'd Force worries him not in again, but rather in all charitable manner ſends after him; and if ſhe find him, lays him gently on her Shoulders; bears him, yea bears his Burdens, his Errors, his Infirmities any way tolerable; ſo fulfilling the Law of Chriſt, Gal. 6. 2. If excommunicate, whom the Church hath bid go out, in whoſe name doth the Magiſtrate compel to go in? The Church indeed hinders none from hearing in her publick Congregation, for the doors are open to all: nor excommunicates to Deſtruction; but, as much as in her lies, to a final ſaving. Her meaning therfore muſt needs be, that as her driving out brings on no outward Penalty, ſo no outward Force or Penalty of an improper and only a deſtructive Power ſhould drive in again her infectious Sheep; therfore ſent out becauſe infectious, and not driven in but with the danger not only of the whole and ſound, but alſo of his own utter periſhing. Since Force neither inſtructs in Religion, nor begets Repentance or Amendment of Life, but on the contrary, Hardneſs of Heart, Formality, Hypocriſie, and, as I ſaid before, every way increaſe of Sin, more and more alienates the Mind from a violent Religion, expelling out and compelling in, and reduces it to a condition like that which the Britains complain of in our Story, driven to and fro between the Picts and the Sea. If after Excommunion he be found intractable, incurable, and will not hear the Church, he becomes as one never yet within her pale, a Heathen or a Publican, Mat. 18. 17. not further to be judg'd, no not by the Magiſtrate, unleſs for civil Cauſes; but left to the final Sentence of that Judg, whoſe coming ſhall be in flames of fire; that Maran atha, 1 Cor. 16. 22. than which to him ſo left nothing can be more dreadful, and oft-times to him particularly nothing more ſpeedy, that is to ſay, the Lord cometh: In the mean while deliver'd up to Satan, 1 Cor. 5. 5. 1 Tim. 1. 20. that is, from the Fold of Chriſt and Kingdom of Grace to the World again, which is the Kingdom of Satan; and as he was receiv'd from Darkneſs to Light, and from the Power of Satan to God, Acts 26. 18. ſo now deliver'd up again from Light to Darkneſs, and from God to the Power of Satan; yet ſo as is in both places manifeſted, to the intent of ſaving him, brought ſooner to Contrition by ſpiritual than by any corporeal Severity. But grant it belonging any way to the Magiſtrate, that prophane and licentious Perſons omit not the performance of holy Duties, which in them were odious to God even under the Law, much more now under the Goſpel; yet ought his Care both as a Magiſtrate and a Chriſtian, to be much more that Conſcience be not inwardly violated, than that Licenſe in theſe things be made outwardly conformable: ſince his part is undoubtedly as a Chriſtian, which puts him upon this Office much more than as a Magiſtrate, in all reſpects to have more care of the conſcientious than of the prophane; and not for thir ſakes to take away (while they pretend to give) or to diminiſh the rightful Liberty of religious Conſciences.

On theſe four ſcriptural Reaſons, as on a firm ſquare, this Truth, the Right of Chriſtian and Evangelic Liberty, will ſtand immovable againſt all thoſe pretended Conſequences of Licenſe and Confuſion, which for the moſt part Men moſt licentious and confus'd themſelves, or ſuch as whoſe Severity would be wiſer than Divine Wiſdom, are ever apteſt to object againſt the ways of God: as if God without them, when he gave us this Liberty, knew not of the worſt which theſe Men in their Arrogance pretend will follow: yet knowing all their worſt, he gave us this Liberty as by him judg'd beſt. As to thoſe Magiſtrates who think it thir work to ſettle Religion, and thoſe Miniſters or others, who ſo oft call upon them to do ſo, I truſt, that having well conſider'd what hath been here argu'd, neither they will continue in that intention, nor theſe in that expectation from them: when they ſhall find that the Settlement of Religion belongs only to each particular Church by perſwaſive and ſpiritual means within it ſelf, and that the Defence only of the Church belongs to the Magiſtrate. Had he once learnt not further to concern himſelf with Church-Affairs, half his Labor might be ſpar'd, and the Commonwealth better tended. To which end, that which I premis'd in the beginning, and in due place treated of more at large, I deſire now concluding, that they would conſider ſeriouſly what Religion is: and they will find it to be, in ſum, both our Beleef and our Practice depending upon God only. That there can be no place then left for the Magiſtrate or his Force in the Settlement of Religion, by appointing either what we ſhall beleeve in divine things, or practiſe in religious, (neither of which things are in the power of Man either to perform himſelf, or to enable others) I perſwade me in the Chriſtian Ingenuity of all religious Men, the more they examin ſeriouſly, the more they will find cleerly to be true: and find how falſe and deceivable that common ſaying is, which is ſo much rely'd upon, that the Chriſtian Magiſtrate is cuſtos utriuſque tabulæ, Keeper of both Tables, unleſs is meant by Keeper the Defender only: neither can that Maxim be maintain'd by any Proof or Argument which hath not in this Diſcourſe firſt or laſt been refuted. For the two Tables, or ten Commandments, teach our Duty to God and our Neighbour from the Love of both; give Magiſtrates no Autority to force either: they ſeek that from the judicial Law, though on falſe grounds, eſpecially in the firſt Table, as I have ſhewn; and both in firſt and ſecond execute that Autority for the moſt part, not according to God's judicial Laws but thir own. As for civil Crimes, and of the outward Man, which all are not, no not of thoſe againſt the ſecond Table, as that of coveting; in them what Power they have, they had from the beginning, long before Moſes or the two Tables were in being. And whether they be not now as little in being to be kept by any Chriſtian as they are two legal Tables, remanes yet as undecided, as it is ſure they never were yet deliver'd to the keeping of any Chriſtian Magiſtrate. But of theſe things perhaps more ſome other time; what may ſerve the preſent hath been above diſcours'd ſufficiently out of the Scriptures: and to thoſe produc'd might be added Teſtimonies, Examples, Experiences of all ſucceeding Ages to theſe times aſſerting this Doctrine: but having herin the Scripture ſo copious and ſo plane, we have all that can be properly call'd true Strength and Nerve; the reſt would be but Pomp and Incumbrance. Pomp and Oſtentation of reading is admir'd among the Vulgar: but doubtleſs in Matters of Religion he is learnedeſt who is planeſt. The brevity I uſe, not exceeding a ſmall Manual, will not therfore, I ſuppoſe, be thought the leſs conſiderable, unleſs with them perhaps who think that great Books only can determin great Matters. I rather choſe the common Rule, not to make much ado where leſs may ſerve. Which in Controverſies, and thoſe eſpecially of Religion, would make them leſs tedious, and by conſequence read ofter by many more, and with more Benefit.

conſider what hath been here ſaid, whether they will continue in that intention [illegible] expect [illegible] from them [illegible] they ſhall find that the ſettlement of Religion belongs only to each particular Church by perſuaſive and ſpiritual means within itſelf, and that the Defence only of the Church belongs to the Magiſtrate. Had he once learnt not further to concern himſelf with Church Affairs, half his Labour might be ſpared, and the Commonwealth better tended. To which end, that which I premis'd in the beginning, and in due place treated of more at large, [illegible] that they would conſider ſeriouſly what Religion is; and they will find it to be, in ſum, both our Belief and our Practice depending upon God only. That there can be no place then left for the Magiſtrate or his Force in the ſettlement of Religion, by appointing either what we ſhall believe in divine things, or practiſe in Religion, neither of which are in the power of Man either to perform himſelf, or to enable others. I perſwade me in the Chriſtian ingenuity of all religious Men, the more they examine ſeriouſly, the more they will find clearly to be true: and find how falſe and deceivable that common ſaying is, which is ſo much relied upon, that the Chriſtian Magiſtrate is cuſtos utriuſque tabulæ, Keeper of both Tables, unleſs is meant by Keeper the Defender only: neither can that Maxim be maintain'd by any Proof or Argument which hath not in this Diſcourſe firſt or laſt been refuted. For the two Tables, or ten Commandments, teach our Duty to God and our Neighbour from the Love of both; give Magiſtrates no Authority to force either: they ſeek that from the Judicial Law, though on falſe grounds, eſpecially in the firſt Table, as I have ſhewn; and both in firſt and ſecond execute that Authority for the moſt part, not according to God's Judicial Laws, but their own. As for civil Crimes, and of the outward Man, which all are not, no not of thoſe againſt the ſecond Table, as that of coveting; in them what Power they have, they had from the beginning, long before Moſes or the two Tables were in being. And whether they be not now as little in being to be kept by any Chriſtian as they are two legal Tables, remains yet as undecided, as it is ſure they never were yet deliver'd to the keeping of any Chriſtian Magiſtrate. But of theſe things perhaps more ſome other time; what may ſerve the preſent hath been above diſcours'd ſufficiently out of the Scriptures: and to thoſe produced might be added Teſtimonies, Examples, Experiences of all ſucceeding Ages to theſe times, aſſerting this Doctrine: but having herein the Scripture ſo copious and ſo plain, we have all that can be properly call'd true Strength and Nerve; the reſt would be but Pomp and Incumbrance. Pomp and Oſtentation of reading is admir'd among the Vulgar: but doubtleſs in Matters of Religion he is learnedeſt who is plaineſt. The brevity I uſe, not exceeding a ſmall Manual, will not therefore, I ſuppoſe, be thought the leſs conſiderable, unleſs with them perhaps who think that great Books only can determine great Matters. I rather chooſe the common Rule, not to make much ado where leſs may ſerve. Which in Controverſies, and thoſe eſpecially of Religion, would make them leſs tedious, and by conſequence read ofter, by many more, and with more Benefit.

To the Parlament of the Commonwealth of England, with the Dominions therof.

OWing to your Protection, ſupream Senate, this liberty of writing which I have us'd theſe eighteen Years on all occaſions to aſſert the juſt Rights and Freedoms both of Church and State, and ſo far approv'd, as to have bin truſted with the repreſentment and defence of your Actions to all Chriſtendom againſt an Adverſary of no mean repute; to whom ſhould I addreſs what I ſtill publiſh on the ſame Argument, but to you, whoſe magnanimous Councels firſt open'd and unbound the Age from a double Bondage under Prelatical and Regal Tyranny; above our own hopes heartning us to look up at laſt like Men and Chriſtians from the ſlaviſh Dejection, wherin from Father to Son we were bred up and taught; and therby deſerving of theſe Nations, if they be not barbarouſly ingrateful, to be acknowledg'd, next under God, the Authors and beſt Patrons of Religious and Civil Liberty, that ever theſe Ilands brought forth? The care and tuition of whoſe Peace and Safety, after a ſhort, but ſcandalous night of Interruption, is now again by a new dawning of God's miraculous Providence among us, revolv'd upon your ſhoulders. And to whom more appertain theſe Conſiderations which I propound, than to your ſelves, and the Debate before you, though I truſt of no difficulty, yet at preſent of great expectation, not whether ye will gratifie, were it no more then ſo, but whether ye will hearken to the juſt Petition of many thouſands beſt affected both to Religion and to this your Return, or whether ye will ſatisfie, which you never can, the covetous Pretences and Demands of inſatiable Hirelings, whoſe Diſaffection ye well know both to your ſelves and your Reſolutions? That I, though among many others in this common concernment, interpoſe to your Deliberations what my Thoughts alſo are, your own Judgment and the ſucceſs therof hath given me the confidence: which requeſts but this, that if I have proſperouſly, God ſo favouring me, defended the publick Cauſe of this Commonwealth to Foreiners, ye would not think the reaſon and ability, wheron ye truſted once, and repent not, your whole Reputation to the world, either grown leſs by more maturity and longer ſtudy, or leſs available in Engliſh then in another tongue: but that if it ſuffic'd ſom years paſt to convince and ſatisfie the uningag'd of other Nations in the juſtice of your doings, though then held paradoxal, it may as well ſuffice now againſt weaker oppoſition in matters, except here in England with a ſpiritualitie of Men devoted to thir temporal Gain, of no Controverſie els among Proteſtants. Neither do I doubt, ſeeing daily the acceptance which they find who in thir Petitions venture to bring advice alſo and new models of a Commonwealth, but that you will interpret it much more the duty of a Chriſtian to offer what his Conſcience perſwades him may be of moment to the freedom and better conſtituting of the Church: ſince it is a deed of higheſt charity to help undeceive the People, and a work worthieſt your Autority, in all things els Authors, Aſſertors and now Recoverers of our Liberty, to deliver us, the only People of all Proteſtants left ſtill undeliver'd, from the Oppreſſions of a ſimonious decimating Clergy, who ſhame not, againſt the judgment and practice of all other Churches reform'd, to maintain, though very weakly, thir Popiſh and oft refuted Poſitions, not in a point of Conſcience, wherin they might be blameleſs, but in a point of Covetouſneſs and unjuſt Claim to other mens Goods; a Contention foul and odious in any Man, but moſt of all in Miniſters of the Goſpel, in whom Contention, though for thir own right, ſcarce is allowable. Till which Grievances be remov'd, and Religion ſet free from the monopoly of Hirelings, I dare affirm, that no Model whatſoever of a Commonwealth will prove ſucceſsful or undiſturb'd; and ſo perſwaded, implore Divine Aſſiſtance on your pious Councels and Proceedings to unanimity in this and all other Truth.

CON-

CONSIDERATIONS
TOUCHING
The likelieſt means to remove Hirelings out of the CHURCH.

THE former Treatiſe, which leads in this, began with two things ever found working much miſchief to the Church of God, and the advancement of Truth; Force on the one ſide reſtraining, and Hire on the other ſide corrupting the Teachers therof. The latter of theſe is by much the more dangerous: for under Force, though no thank to the Forcers, true Religion oft-times beſt thrives and flouriſhes; but the Corruption of Teachers, moſt commonly the Effect of Hire, is the very bane of Truth in them who are ſo corrupted. Of Force not to be us'd in matters of Religion, I have already ſpoken; and ſo ſtated matters of Conſcience and Religion in Faith and Divine Worſhip, and ſo ſever'd them from Blaſphemy and Hereſy, the one being ſuch properly as is deſpiteful, the other ſuch as ſtands not to the Rule of Scripture, and ſo both of them not matters of Religion, but rather againſt it, that to them who will yet uſe Force, this only choiſe can be left, whether they will force them to believe, to whom it is not given from above, being not forc'd therto by any Principle of the Goſpel, which is now the only Diſpenſation of God to all Men; or whether being Proteſtants, they will puniſh in thoſe things wherin the Proteſtant Religion denies them to be Judges, either in themſelves infallible, or to the Conſciences of other Men; or whether, laſtly, they think fit to puniſh Error, ſuppoſing they can be infallible that it is ſo, being not wilful, but conſcientious, and, according to the beſt light of him who errs, grounded on Scripture: which kind of Error all Men religious, or but only reaſonable, have thought worthier of pardon, and the growth thereof to be prevented by ſpiritual Means and Church-diſcipline, not by civil Laws and outward Force, ſince it is God only who gives as well to believe aright, as to believe at all; and by thoſe means which he ordain'd ſufficiently in his Church to the full execution of his divine Purpoſe in the Goſpel. It remains now to ſpeak of Hire, the other evil ſo miſchievous in Religion: wherof I promis'd then to ſpeak further, when I ſhould find God diſpoſing me, and opportunity inviting. Opportunity I find now inviting; and apprehend therin the concurrence of God diſpoſing; ſince the Maintenance of Church-Miniſters, a thing not properly belonging to the Magiſtrate, and yet with ſuch importunity call'd for, and expected from him, is at preſent under publick debate. Wherin leſt any thing may happen to be determin'd and eſtabliſh'd prejudicial to the right and freedom of Church, or advantagious to ſuch as may be found Hirelings therin, it will be now moſt ſeaſonable, and in theſe matters wherin every Chriſtian hath his free Suffrage, no way miſbecoming Chriſtian Meeknes to offer freely, without diſparagement to the wiſeſt, ſuch Advice as God ſhall incline him and inable him to propound. Since hertofore in Commonwealths of moſt fame for Government, Civil Laws were not eſtabliſh'd till they had been firſt for certain days publiſh'd to the view of all Men, that whoſo pleas'd might ſpeak freely his Opinion therof, and give in his Exceptions, ere the Law could paſs to a full eſtabliſhment. And where ought this Equity to have more place, than in the liberty which is unſeparable from Chriſtian Religion? This, I am not ignorant, will be a work unpleaſing to ſome: but what Truth is not hateful to ſome or other, as this, in likelihood, will be to none but Hirelings. And if there be among them who hold it thir duty to ſpeak impartial Truth, as the work of thir Miniſtry, though not perform'd without Money, let them not envy others who think the ſame no leſs thir duty by the general office of Chriſtianity, to ſpeak truth, as in all reaſon may be thought, more impartially and unſuſpectedly without Money.

Hire of it ſelf is neither a thing unlawful, nor a word of any evil note, ſignifying no more than a due Recompence or Reward; as when our Saviour ſaith, the Labourer is worthy of his Hire. That which makes it ſo dangerous in the Church, and properly makes the Hireling a word always of evil Signification, is either the exceſs therof, or the undue manner of giving and taking it. What harm the exceſs therof brought to the Church, perhaps was not found by experience till the days of Conſtantine; who out of his zeal thinking he could be never too liberally a nurſing Father of the Church, might be not unfitly ſaid to have either overlaid it or choak'd it in the Nurſing. Which was foretold, as is recorded in Eccleſiaſtical Traditions, by a Voice heard from Heaven on the very day that thoſe great Donations and Church-revenues were given, crying aloud, This day is Poiſon pour'd into the Church. Which the event ſoon after veriſi'd, as appears by another no leſs antient Obſervation, That Religion brought forth Wealth, and the Daughter devour'd the Mother. But long ere Wealth came into the Church, ſo ſoon as any Gain appear'd in Religion, Hirelings were apparent; drawn in long before by the very ſcent therof. Judas therfore, the firſt Hireling, for want of preſent Hire anſwerable to his coveting, from the ſmall number of the meanneſs of ſuch as then were the Religious, ſold the Religion it ſelf with the Founder therof, his Maſter. Simon Magus the next, in hope only that preaching and the Gifts of the Holy Ghoſt would prove gainful, offer'd beforehand a Sum of Money to obtain them. Not long after, as the Apoſtle foretold, Hirelings like Wolves came in by Herds; Acts 20. 29. For I know this, that after my departing ſhall grievous Wolves enter in among you, not ſparing the Flock. Tit. 1. 11. Teaching things which they ought not, for filthy lucres ſake. 2 Pet. 2. 3. And through Covetouſneſs ſhall they with feigned words make Merchandiſe of you. Yet they taught not fals Doctrin only, but ſeeming Piety; 1 Tim. 6. 5. Suppoſing that Gain is Godlineſs. Neither came they in of themſelves only, but invited oft-times by a corrupt Audience: 2 Tim. 4. 3. For the time will come when they will not endure ſound Doctrin, but after thir own Luſts they will heap to themſelves Teachers, having itching Ears: and they on the other ſide, as faſt heaping to themſelves Diſciples, Acts 20. 30. doubtles had as itching Palms: 2 Pet. 2. 15. Following the way of Balaam, the Son of Boſor, who lov'd the wages of Unrighteouſneſs. Jude 11. They ran greedily after the error of Balaam for reward. Thus we ſee that not only the exceſs of Hire in wealthieſt times, but alſo the undue and vitious taking or giving it, though but ſmall or mean, as in the Primitive times, gave to Hirelings occaſion, though not intended, yet ſufficient to creep at firſt into the Church. Which argues alſo the difficulty, or rather the impoſſibility, to remove them quite, unleſs every Miniſter were, as St. Paul, contented to teach gratis; but few ſuch are to be found. As therfore we cannot juſtly take away all Hire in the Church, becauſe we cannot otherwiſe quite remove all Hirelings, ſo are we not for the impoſſibility of removing them all, to uſe therfore no endeavor that feweſt may come in; but rather, in regard the Evil, do what we can, will always be incumbent and unavoidable, to uſe our utmoſt diligence how it may be leaſt dangerous: which will be likelieſt effected, if we conſider, firſt, what recompence God hath ordain'd ſhould be given to Miniſters of the Church; (for that a Recompence ought to be given them, and may by them juſtly be received, our Saviour himſelf from the very light of Reaſon and of Equity hath declar'd, Luke 10. 7. The Labourer is worthy of his Hire); next by whom; and laſtly, in what manner.

What Recompence ought be given to Church-miniſters, God hath anſwerably ordain'd according to that difference which he hath manifeſtly put between thoſe his two great Diſpenſations, the Law and the Goſpel. Under the Law he gave them Tithes; under the Goſpel, having left all things in his Church to Charity and Chriſtian Freedom, he hath given them only what is juſtly given them. That, as well under the Goſpel, as under the Law, ſay our Engliſh Divines, and they only of all Proteſtants, is Tithes; and they ſay true, if any man be ſo minded to give them of his own the tenth or twentieth; but that the Law therfore of Tithes is in force under the Goſpel, all other Proteſtant Divines, though equally concern'd, yet conſtantly deny. For although Hire to the Labourer be of moral and perpetual Right, yet that ſpecial kind of Hire, the tenth, can be of no Right or Neceſſity, but to that ſpecial Labor for which God ordain'd it. That ſpecial Labor was the Levitical and Ceremonial ſervice of the Tabernacle, Numb. 18. 21, 31. which is now aboliſh'd: the right therfore of that ſpecial Hire muſt needs be withal aboliſh'd, as being alſo Ceremonial. That Tithes were Ceremonial, is plain, not being given to the Levites till they had been firſt offer'd a heav Offering to the Lord, Ver. 24, 28. He then who by that Law brings Tithes into the Goſpel, of neceſſity brings in withal a Sacrifice, and an Altar; without which Tithes by that Law were unſanctifi'd and polluted, Ver. 32. and therfore never thought on in the firſt Chriſtian times, till Ceremonies, Altars, and Oblations, by an antienter Corruption were brought back long before. And yet the Jews ever ſince thir Temple was deſtroyd, though they have Rabbies and Teachers of thir Law, yet pay no Tithes, as having no Levites to whom, no Temple where to pay them, no Altar wheron to hallow them: which argues that the Jews themſelves never thought Tithes Moral, but Ceremonial only. That Chriſtians therfore ſhould take them up, when Jews have laid them down, muſt needs be very abſurd and prepoſterous. Next, it is as clear in the ſame Chapter, that the Prieſts and Levites had not Tithes for thir labor only in the Tabernacle, but in regard they were to have no other Part nor Inheritance in the Land, Ver. 20, 24. and by that means for a Tenth, loſt a Twelfth. But our Levites undergoing no ſuch Law of Deprivement, can have no right to any ſuch compenſation: nay, if by this Law they will have Tithes, can have no inheritance of Land, but forfeit what they have. Beſides this, Tithes were of two ſorts, thoſe of every Year, and thoſe of every third Year; of the former, every one that brought his Tithes, was to eat his ſhare; Deut. 14. 23. Thou ſhalt eat before the Lord thy God, in the place which he ſhall chuſe to place his name there, the Tithe of thy Corn, of thy Wine, and of thine Oil, &c. Nay, though he could not bring his Tithe in kind, by reaſon of his diſtant dwelling from the Tabernacle or Temple, but was therby forc'd to turn it into Money, he was to beſtow that Money on whatſoever pleas'd him, Oxen, Sheep, Wine, or ſtrong Drink; and to eat and drink therof there before the Lord, both he and his Houſhold, Ver. 24, 25, 26. As for the Tithes of every third year, they were not given only to the Levite, but to the Stranger, the Fatherles, and the Widow, Ver. 28, 29. and Chap. 26. 12, 13. So that ours, if they will have Tithes, muſt admit of theſe ſharers with them. Nay, theſe Tithes were not paid in at all to the Levite, but the Levite himſelf was to come with thoſe his fellow Gueſts, and eat his ſhare of them only at his Houſe who provided them; and this not in regard of his miniſterial Office, but becauſe he had no Part nor Inheritance in the Land. Laſtly, the Prieſts and Levites, a Tribe, were of a far different Conſtitution from this of our Miniſters under the Goſpel: in them were Orders and Degrees both by Family, Dignity, and Office, mainly diſtinguiſh'd; the High Prieſt, his Brethren, and his Sons, to whom the Levites themſelves paid Tithes, and of the beſt, were eminently ſuperior, Numb. 18. 28, 29. No Proteſtant, I ſuppoſe, will liken one of our Miniſters to a High Prieſt, but rather to a common Levite. Unleſs then, to keep their Tithes, they mean to bring back again Biſhops, Archbiſhops, and the whole gang of Prelatry, to whom will they themſelves pay Tithes, as by that Law it was a ſin to them if they did not, Ver. 32. Certainly this muſt needs put them to a deep demurr, while the deſire of holding faſt thir Tithes without ſin, may tempt them to bring back again Biſhops, as the likeneſs of that Hierarchy that ſhould receive Tithes from them; and the deſire to pay none, may adviſe them to keep out of the Church all Orders above them. But if we have to do at preſent, as I ſuppoſe we have, with true reformed Proteſtants, not with Papiſts or Prelates, it will not be deni'd that in the Goſpel there be but two miniſterial Degrees, Presbyters and Deacons: which if they contend to have any ſucceſſion, reference, or conformity with thoſe two degrees under the Law, Prieſts and Levites, it muſt needs be ſuch wherby our Presbyters or Miniſters may be anſwerable to Prieſts, and our Deacons to Levites; by which rule of Proportion it will follow, that we muſt pay our Tithes to the Deacons only, and they only to the Miniſters. But if it be truer yet that the Prieſthood of Aaron typifi'd a better reality, 1 Pet. 2. 5. ſignifying the Chriſtian true and holy Prieſthood, to offer up ſpiritual Sacrifice; it follows hence, that we are now juſtly exempt from paying Tithes to any who claim from Aaron, ſince that Prieſthood is in us now real, which in him was but a ſhadow. Seeing then by all this which hath bin ſhewn, that the Law of Tithes is partly Ceremonial, as the work was for which they were given, partly judicial, not of common, but of particular right to the Tribe of Levi, nor to them alone, but to the owner alſo and his Houſhold, at the time of thir Offering, and every three year to the Stranger, the Fatherles, and the Widow, thir appointed Sharers, and that they were a Tribe of Prieſts and Deacons improperly compar'd to the conſtitution of our Miniſtry; and the Tithes given by that People to thoſe Deacons only; it follows that our Miniſters at this day, being neither Prieſts nor Levites, nor fitly anſwering to either of them, can have no juſt title or pretence to Tithes, by any conſequence drawn from the Law of Moſes. But they think they have yet a better Plea in the example of Melchiſedec, who took Tithes of Abram ere the Law was given; whence they would infer Tithes to be of Moral right. But they ought to know, or to remember, that not Examples, but expreſs Commands oblige our obedience to God or man: next, that whatſoever was don in Religion before the Law written, is not preſently to be counted Moral, when as ſo many things were then don both Ceremonial and Judaically judicial, that we need not doubt to conclude all times before Chriſt, more or leſs under the Ceremonial Law. To what end ſerv'd els thoſe Altars and Sacrifices, that diſtinction of clean and unclean entring into the Ark, Circumciſion, and the raiſing up of Seed to the elder Brother? Gen. 38. 8. If theſe things be not Moral, though before the Law, how are Tithes, though in the example of Abram and Melchiſedec? But this inſtance is ſo far from being the juſt ground of a Law, that after all Circumſtances duly weigh'd both from Gen. 14. and Heb. 7. it will not be allow'd them ſo much as an example. Melchiſedec, beſides his Prieſtly Benediction, brought with him Bread and Wine ſufficient to refreſh Abram and his whole Army; incited to do ſo, firſt, by the ſecret Providence of God, intending him for a Type of Chriſt and his Prieſthood; next by his due thankfulnes and honor to Abram, who had freed his borders of Salem from a potent Enemy: Abram on the other ſide honors him with the tenth of all, that is to ſay (for he took not ſure his whole Eſtate with him to that War) of the Spoils, Heb. 7. 4. Incited he alſo by the ſame ſecret Providence, to ſignify as Grandfather of Levi, that the Levitical Prieſthood was excell'd by the Prieſthood of Chriſt. For the giving of a Tenth declar'd it ſeems in thoſe Countreys and Times, him the greater who receiv'd it. That which next incited him, was partly his gratitude to requite the Preſent, partly his Reverence to the Perſon and his Benediction: to his Perſon, as a King and Prieſt; greater therfore than Abram; who was a Prieſt alſo, but not a King. And who unhir'd will be ſo hardy as to ſay, that Abram at any other time ever paid him Tithes, either before or after; or had then, but for this accidental meeting and obligement; or that els Melchiſedec had demanded or exacted them, or took them otherwiſe than as the voluntary gift of Abram? But our Miniſters, though neither Prieſts nor Kings more than any other Chriſtian, greater in thir own eſteem than Abraham and all his Seed, for the verbal labor of a ſeventh days Preachment, not bringing, like Melchiſedec, Bread or Wine at thir own coſt, would not take only at the willing hand of Liberality or Gratitude, but require and exact as due the tenth, not of Spoils, but of our whole Eſtates and Labors; nor once, but yearly. We then it ſeems by the example of Abram, muſt pay Tithes to theſe Melchiſedecs: but what if the Perſon of Abram can neither no way repreſent us, or will oblige the Miniſters to pay Tithes no leſs then other men? Abram had not only a Prieſt in his Loins, but was himſelf a Prieſt, and gave Tithes to Melchiſedec either as Grandfather of Levi, or as Father of the faithful. If as Grandfather (though he underſtood it not) of Levi, he oblig'd not us but Levi only, the inferior Prieſt, by that Homage (as the Apoſtle to the Hebrews clearly enough explanes) to acknowledg the greater. And they who by Melchiſedec claim from Abram as Levi's Grandfather, have none to ſeek thir Tithes of but the Levites, where they can find them. If Abram as Father of the Faithful paid Tithes to Melchiſedec, then certainly the Miniſters alſo, if they be of that number, paid in him equally with the reſt. Which may induce us to believe, that as both Abram and Melchiſedec, ſo Tithes alſo in that action

Typical and Ceremonial, ſignifi'd nothing els but that ſubjection which all the Faithful, both Miniſters and People, owe to Chriſt, our High Prieſt and King.

In any literal Senſe, from this Example, they never will be able to extort that the People in thoſe days paid Tithes to Prieſts; but this only, that one Prieſt once in his Life, of Spoils only, and in requital partly of a liberal Preſent, partly of a Benediction, gave voluntary Tithes, not to a greater Prieſt than himſelf, as far as Abram could then underſtand, but rather to a Prieſt and King join'd in one Perſon. They will reply, perhaps, that if one Prieſt paid Tithes to another, it muſt needs be underſtood that the People did no leſs to the Prieſt. But I ſhall eaſily remove that Neceſſity, by remembring them that in thoſe days was no Prieſt, but the Father, or the firſt-born of each Family; and by conſequence no People to pay him Tithes, but his own Children and Servants, who had not wherwithal to pay him, but of his own. Yet grant that the People then paid Tithes, there will not yet be the like reaſon to enjoin us; they being then under Ceremonies, a meer Laity, we now under Chriſt a Royal Prieſthood, 1 Pet. 2. 9. as we are Coheirs, Kings and Prieſts with him, a Prieſt for ever after the order or manner of Melchiſedec. As therfore Abram paid Tithes to Melchiſedec becauſe Levi was in him, ſo we ought to pay none becauſe the true Melchiſedec is in us, and we in him who can pay to none greater, and hath freed us, by our Union with himſelf, from all compulſive Tributes and Taxes in his Church. Neither doth the collateral place, Heb. 7. make other uſe of this Story, than to prove Chriſt, perſonated by Melchiſedec, a greater Prieſt than Aaron: Verſ. 4. Now conſider how great this Man was, &c. and proves not in the leaſt manner that Tithes be of any right to Miniſters, but the contrary: firſt, the Levites had a Commandment to take Tithes of the People according to the Law, that is, of thir Brethren, though they come out of the Loins of Abraham, Verſ. 5. The Commandment then was, it ſeems, to take Tithes of the Jews only, and according to the Law. That Law changing of neceſſity with the Prieſthood, no other ſort of Miniſters, as they muſt needs be another ſort under another Prieſthood, can receive that Tribute of Tithes which fell with that Law, unleſs renu'd by another expreſs Command, and according to another Law; no ſuch Law is extant. Next, Melchiſedec not as a Miniſter, but as Chriſt himſelf in Perſon, bleſs'd Abraham who had the Promiſes, Verſ. 6. and in him bleſs'd all both Miniſters, and People, both of the Law and Goſpel: That Bleſſing declar'd him greater and better than whom he bleſs'd, Ver. 7. receiving Tithes from them all, not as a Maintenance, which Melchiſedec needed not, but as a ſign of Homage and Subjection to thir King and Prieſt: wheras Miniſters bear not the Perſon of Chriſt in his Prieſthood or Kingſhip, bleſs not as he bleſſes, are not by thir Bleſſing greater than Abraham; and all the Faithful with themſelves included in him, cannot both give and take Tithes in Abram, cannot claim to themſelves that ſign of our Allegiance due only to our Eternal King and Prieſt, cannot therfore derive Tithes from Melchiſedec. Laſtly, The eighth Verſe hath thus; Here Men that die receive Tithes: There he received them, of whom it is witneſſed that he liveth. Which words intimate, that as he offer'd himſelf once for us, ſo he received once of us in Abraham, and in that place the typical acknowledgment of our Redemption: which had it been a perpetual annuity to Chriſt, by him claim'd as his due, Levi muſt have paid it yearly, as well as then, Verſ. 9. and our Miniſters ought ſtill, to ſome Melchiſedec or other, as well now as they did in Abraham. But that Chriſt never claim'd any ſuch Tenth as his annual Due, much leſs reſign'd it to the Miniſters, his ſo officious Receivers, without expreſs Commiſſion or Aſſignment, will be yet clearer as we proceed. Thus much may at length aſſure us, that this Example of Abraham and Melchiſedec, though I ſee of late they build moſt upon it, can ſo little be the ground of any Law to us, that it will not ſo much avail them as to the Autority of an Example. Of like impertinence is that Example of Jacob, Gen. 28. 22. who of his free choice, not enjoin'd by any Law, vow'd the Tenth of all that God ſhould give him: which, for ought appears to the contrary, he vow'd as a thing no leſs indifferent before his Vow, than the foregoing part therof: That the Stone which he had ſet there for a Pillar, ſhould be God's Houſe. And to whom vow'd he this Tenth, but to God? not to any Prieſt, for we read of none to him greater than himſelf: and to God, no doubt, but he paid what he vow'd, both in the building of that Bethel, with other Altars elſewhere, and the expence of his continual Sacrifices, which none but he had right to offer. However therfore he paid his Tenth, it could in no likelihood, unleſs by ſuch an occaſion as befel his Grandfather, be to any Prieſt. But, ſay they, All the Tithe of the Land, whether of the Seed of the Land, or of the Fruit of the Tree, is the Lord's, holy unto the Lord, Lev. 27. 30. And this before it was given to the Levites; therfore ſince they ceas'd. No queſtion; For the whole Earth is the Lord's, and the fulnes thereof, Pſal. 24. 1. and the Light of Nature ſhews us no leſs: But that the Tenth is his more than the reſt, how know I, but as he ſo declares it? He declares it ſo here of the Land of Canaan only, as by all Circumſtances appears, and paſſes, by Deed of Gift, this Tenth to the Levite; yet ſo as offer'd to him firſt a Heav-offering, and conſecrated on his Altar, Numb. 18. all which I had as little known, but by that Evidence. The Levites are ceas'd, the Gift returns to the giver. How then can we know that he hath given it to any other? or how can theſe Men preſume to take it unoffer'd firſt to God, unconſecrated, without another clear and expreſs Donation, wherof they ſhew no Evidence or Writing? Beſides, he hath now alienated that holy Land; who can warrantably affirm, that he hath ſince hallow'd the tenth of this Land, which none but God hath Power to do or can warrant? Thir laſt proof they cite out of the Goſpel, which makes as little for them, Mat. 23. 23. where our Saviour denouncing Wo to the Scribes and Phariſees, who paid Tithe ſo exactly, and omitted weightier Matters, tels them, that theſe they ought to have done, that is, to have paid Tithes. For our Saviour ſpake then to thoſe who obſerv'd the Law of Moſes, which was yet not fully abrogated, till the deſtruction of the Temple. And by the way here we may obſerve, out of thir own proof, that the Scribes and Phariſees, though then chief Teachers of the People, ſuch at leaſt as were not Levites, did not take Tithes, but paid them: So much leſs covetous were the Scribes and Phariſees in thoſe worſt times then ours at this day. This is ſo apparent to the Reformed Divines of other Countries, that when any one of ours hath attempted in Latin to maintain this Argument of Tithes, though a Man would think they might ſuffer him, without oppoſition, in a Point equally tending to the advantage of all Miniſters, yet they forbear not to oppoſe him, as in a Doctrin not fit to paſs unoppos'd under the Goſpel. Which ſhews the Modeſty, the Contentedneſs of thoſe Forein Paſtors, with the Maintenance given them, thir ſincerity alſo in the Truth, though leſs gainful, and the Avarice of ours; who through the love of their old Papiſtical Tithes, conſider not the weak Arguments, or rather Conjectures and Surmiſes which they bring to defend them. On the other ſide, although it be ſufficient to have prov'd in general the aboliſhing of Tithes, as part of the Judaical or Ceremonial Law, which is aboliſh'd all, as well that before as that after Moſes; yet I ſhall further prove them abrogated by an expreſs Ordinance of the Goſpel, founded not on any Type, or that Municipal Law of Moſes, but on moral and general Equity, given us inſtead: 1 Cor. 9. 13, 14. Know ye not, that they who miniſter about holy things, live of the things of the Temple; and they which wait at the Altar, are partakers with the Altar? So alſo the Lord hath ordain'd, that they who preach the Goſpel, ſhould live of the Goſpel. He ſaith not, ſhould live on things which were of the Temple, or of the Altar, of which were Tithes, for that had given them a clear Title: but abrogating that former Law of Moſes, which determin'd what and how much, by a later Ordinance of Chriſt, which leaves the what and how much indefinit and free, ſo it be ſufficient to live on: he ſaith, The Lord hath ſo ordain'd, that they who preach the Goſpel, ſhould live of the Goſpel; which hath neither Temple, Altar, nor Sacrifice: Heb. 7. 13. For he of whom theſe things are ſpoken, pertaineth to another Tribe, of which no Man gave attendance at the Altar: His Miniſters therfore cannot thence have Tithes. And where the Lord hath ſo ordain'd, we may find eaſily in more than one Evangeliſt: Luke 10. 7, 8. In the ſame houſe remain, eating and drinking ſuch things as they give: For the labourer is worthy of his hire, &c. And into whatſoever City you enter, and they receive you, eat ſuch things as are ſet before you. To which Ordinance of Chriſt it may ſeem likelieſt, that the Apoſtle refers us both here, and 1 Tim. 5. 18. where he cites this as the Saying of our Saviour, That the labourer is worthy of his hire. And both by this place of Luke, and that of Mat. 10.9,10,11. it evidently appears that our Saviour ordain'd no certain Maintenance for his Apoſtles or Miniſters, publicly or privately, in Houſe or City receiv'd, but that, whatever it were, which might ſuffice to live on: and this not commanded or proportion'd by Abram or by Moſes, whom he might eaſily have here cited, as his manner was, but declar'd only by a Rule of common Equity, which proportions the Hire as well to the Ability of him who gives, as to the labour of him who receives, and recommends him only as worthy, not inveſts him with a legal Right. And mark wheron he grounds this his Ordinance; not on a perpetual right of Tithes from Melchiſedec, as Hirelings pretend, which he never claim'd, either for himſelf, or for his Miniſters, but on the plane and common equity of rewarding the Laborer; worthy ſomtimes of ſingle, ſomtimes of double Honor, not proportionable by Tithes. And the Apoſtle in this forecited Chapter to the Corinthians, Verſ. 11. affirms it to be no great Recompence, if carnal things be reap'd for ſpiritual ſown; but to mention Tithes, neglects here the fitteſt occaſion that could be offer'd him, and leaves the reſt free and undetermin'd. Certainly if Chriſt or his Apoſtles had approv'd of Tithes, they would have, either by Writing or Tradition, recommended them to the Church; and that ſoon would have appeard in the practice of thoſe Primitive and the next Ages. But for the firſt three hundred Years and more, in all the Eccleſiaſtical Story, I find no ſuch Doctrin or Example: though Error by that time had brought back again Prieſts, Altars and Oblations; and in many other Points of Religion had miſerably judaiz'd the Church. So that the defenders of Tithes, after a long pomp, and tedious preparation out of Heathen Authors, telling us that Tithes were paid to Hercules and Apollo, which perhaps was imitated from the Jews, and as it were beſpeaking our Expectation, that they will abound much more with Autorities out of Chriſtian Story, have nothing of general Approbation to begin with from the firſt three or four Ages, but that which abundantly ſerves to the Confutation of thir Tithes; while they confeſs that Churchmen in thoſe Ages liv'd meerly upon free-will Offerings. Neither can they ſay, that Tithes were not then paid for want of a civil Magiſtrate to ordain them, for Chriſtians had then alſo Lands, and might give out of them what they pleas'd; and yet of Tithes then given we find no mention. And the firſt Chriſtian Emperors, who did all things as Biſhops advis'd them, ſupply'd what was wanting to the Clergy not out of Tithes, which were never motion'd, but out of thir own imperial Revenues; as is manifeſt in Euſebius, Theodoret, and Sozomen, from Conſtantine to Arcadius. Hence thoſe ancienteſt reformed Churches of the Waldenſes, if they rather continu'd not pure ſince the Apoſtles, deny'd that Tithes were to be given, or that they were ever given in the primitive Church, as appeers by an ancient Tractate inſerted in the Bohemian Hiſtory. Thus far hath the Church bin always, whether in her prime or in her ancienteſt Reformation, from the approving of Tithes: nor without Reaſon; for they might eaſily perceive that Tithes were fitted to the Jews only, a national Church of many incomplete Synagogues, uniting the Accompliſhment of divine Worſhip in one Temple; and the Levites there had thir Tithes paid where they did thir bodily Work; to which a particular Tribe was ſet apart by divine Appointment, not by the Peoples Election: but the Chriſtian Church is univerſal; not ty'd to Nation, Dioceſs, or Pariſh, but conſiſting of many particular Churches complete in themſelves, gather'd not by compulſion, or the accident of dwelling nigh together, but by free Conſent, chuſing both thir particular Church and thir Church-Officers. Wheras if Tithes be ſet up, all theſe Chriſtian Privileges will be diſturb'd and ſoon loſt, and with them Chriſtian Liberty.

The firſt Autority which our Adverſaries bring, after thoſe fabulous Apoſtolic Canons, which they dare not inſiſt upon, is a provincial Councel held at Cullen, where they voted Tithes to be God's Rent, in the year three hundred fifty ſix; at the ſame time perhaps when the three Kings reign'd there, and of like Autority. For to what purpoſe do they bring theſe trivial Teſtimonies, by which they might as well prove Altars, Candles at noon, and the greateſt part of thoſe Superſtitions fetch'd from Paganiſm or Jewiſm, which the Papiſt, inveigl'd by this fond Argument of Antiquity, retains to this day?

To what purpoſe thoſe Decrees of I know not what Biſhops, to a Parlament and People who have thrown out both Biſhops and Altars, and promiſ'd all Reformation by the Word of God? And that Altars brought Tithes hither, as one Corruption begot another, is evident by one of thoſe Queſtions which the Monk Auſtin propounded to the Pope, concerning thoſe things, which by Oferings of the faithful came to the Altar; as Beda writes, l. 1. c. 27. If then by theſe Teſtimonies we muſt have Tithes continu'd, we muſt again have Altars. Of Fathers, by cuſtom ſo call'd, they quote Ambroſe, Auguſtin, and ſome other ceremonial Doctors of the ſame Leven: whoſe Aſſertion, without pertinent Scripture, no reformed Church can admit; and what they vouch is founded on the Law of Moſes, with which, every where pitifully miſtaken, they again incorporate the Goſpel; as did the reſt alſo of thoſe titular Fathers, perhaps an Age or two before them, by many Rights and Ceremonies, both Jewiſh and Heatheniſh, introduc'd; wherby thinking to gain all, they loſt all: and inſtead of winning Jews and Pagans to be Chriſtians, by too much condeſcending they turn'd Chriſtians into Jews and Pagans. To heap ſuch unconvincing Citations as theſe in Religion, wherof the Scripture only is our Rule, argues not much Learning nor Judgment, but the loſt Labor of much unprofitable reading. And yet a late hot Queriſt for Tithes, whom ye may know by his Wits lying ever beſide him in the Margin, to be ever beſide his Wits in the Text, a fierce Reformer once, now ranckl'd with a contrary heat, would ſend us back, very reformedly indeed, to learn Reformation from Tyndarus and Rebuffus, two canonical Promooters. They produce next the ancient Conſtitutions of this Land, Saxon Laws, Edicts of Kings, and their Councils, from Athelſtan, in the year nine hundred twenty eight, that Tithes by Statute were paid: and might produce from Ina, above two hundred years before, that Romeſcot, or Peter's Penny, was by as good Statute Law paid to the Pope; from ſeven hundred twenty five, and almoſt as long continu'd. And who knows not that this Law of Tithes was enacted by thoſe Kings and Barons upon the opinion they had of thir divine Right? as the very Words import of Edward the Confeſſor, in the cloſe of that Law: For ſo bleſſed Auſtin preach'd and taught; meaning the Monk, who firſt brought the Romiſh Religion into England from Gregory the Pope. And by the way I add, that by theſe Laws, imitating the Law of Moſes, the third part of Tithes only was the Prieſts due; the other two were appointed for the Poor, and to adorn or repare Churches; as the Canons of Ecbert and Elfric witneſs: Concil. Brit. If then theſe Laws were founded upon the Opinion of divine Autority, and that Autority be found miſtaken and erroneous, as hath bin fully manifeſted, it follows, that theſe Laws fall of themſelves with thir falſe Foundation. But with what Face or Conſcience can they allege Moſes, or theſe Laws for Tithes, as they now enjoy or exact them? wherof Moſes ordains the Owner, as we heard before, the Stranger, the Fatherleſs, and the Widow, Partakers with the Levite; and theſe Fathers which they cite, and theſe though Romiſh rather than Engliſh Laws, allotted both to Prieſt and Biſhop the third part only. But theſe our Proteſtant, theſe our new reformed Engliſh Presbyterian Divines, againſt thir own cited Authors, and to the ſhame of thir pretended Reformation, would engroſs to themſelves all Tithes by Statute; and ſupported more by thir wilful Obſtinacy and Deſire of filthy Lucre, than by theſe both inſufficient and impertinent Autorities, would perſwade a Chriſtian Magiſtracy and Parlament, whom we truſt God hath reſtor'd for a happier Reformation, to impoſe upon us a Judaical Ceremonial Law, and yet from that Law to be more irregular and unwarrantable, more complying with a covetous Clergy, than any of thoſe Popiſh Kings and Parlaments alleg'd. Another ſhift they have to plead, that Tithes may be moral as well as the Sabbath, a tenth of Fruits as well as a ſeventh of Days. I anſwer, that the Prelats who urge this Argument have leaſt reaſon to uſe it, denying Morality in the Sabbath, and therin better agreeing with Reformed Churches abroad than the reſt of our Divines. As therfore the ſeventh day is not moral, but a convenient Recourſe of Worſhip in fit ſeaſon, whether ſeventh or other number, ſo neither is the tenth of our Goods, but only a convenient Subſiſtence morally due to Miniſters. The laſt and loweſt ſort of thir Arguments, that Men purchas'd not thir Tithe with thir Land, and ſuch like Pettifoggery, I omit; as refuted ſufficiently by others: I omit alſo thir violent and irreligious Exactions, related no leſs credibly; thir ſeiſing of Pots and Pans from the Poor, who have as good right to Tithes as they; from ſome, the very Beds; thir ſuing and impriſoning; worſe than when the Canon Law was in force; worſe than when thoſe wicked Sons of Eli were Prieſts, whoſe manner was thus to ſeiſe thir pretended prieſtly Due by force; 1 Sam. 2. 12, &c. Whereby Men abhorr'd the Offering of the Lord. And it may be fear'd that many will as much abhor the Goſpel, if ſuch Violence as this be ſuffer'd in her Miniſters, and in that which they alſo pretend to be the Offering of the Lord. For thoſe Sons of Belial within ſome Limits made ſeiſure of what they knew was thir own by an undoubted Law; but theſe, from whom there is no Sanctuary, ſeiſe out of Mens Grounds, out of Mens Houſes, thir other Goods of double, ſometimes of treble value, for that which, did not Covetouſneſs and Rapine blind them, they know to be not thir own by the Goſpel which they preach. Of ſome more tolerable than theſe, thus ſeverely God hath ſpoken; Iſa. 46. 10, &c. They are greedy dogs; they all look to thir own way, every one for his gain, from his quarter. With what Anger then will he judg them who ſtand not looking, but under colour of a divine Right, fetch by Force that which is not thir own, taking his Name not in vain, but in violence? Nor content, as Gebazi was, to make a cunning, but a conſtrain'd Advantage of what thir Maſter bids them give freely, how can they but return ſmitten, worſe than that ſharking Miniſter, with a ſpiritual Leproſy? And yet they cry out Sacrilege, that Men will not be gull'd and baffl'd the tenth of thir eſtates by giving credit to frivolous Pretences of divine Right. Where did God ever cleerly declare to all Nations, or in all Lands, (and none but Fools part with thir Eſtates without cleereſt Evidence, on bare Suppoſals and Preſumptions of them who are the Gainers therby) that he requir'd the tenth as due to him or his Son perpetually and in all places? Where did he demand it, that we might certainly know, as in all claims of temporal Right is juſt and reaſonable? or if demanded, where did he aſſign it, or by what evident conveyance to Miniſters? Unleſs they can demonſtrate this by more than Conjectures, thir Title can be no better to Tithes than the Title of Gebazi was to thoſe things which by abuſing his Maſter's name he rook'd from Naaman. Much leſs where did he command that Tithes ſhould be fetch'd by force, where left not under the Goſpel whatever his Right was, to the Freewill-offerings of Men? Which is the greater Sacrilege, to bely divine Autority, to make the name of Chriſt acceſſory to Violence, and robbing him of the very Honor which he aim'd at in beſtowing freely the Goſpel, to commit Simony and Rapin, both ſecular and eccleſiaſtical; or on the other ſide, not to give up the tenth of Civil Right and Propriety to the Tricks and Impoſtures of Clergy-men, contriv'd with all the Art and Argument that thir Bellies can invent or ſuggeſt; yet ſo ridiculous and preſuming on the Peoples Dulneſs or Superſtition, as to think they prove the divine Right of thir Maintenance by Abram paying Tithes to Melchiſedec, when as Melchiſedec in that paſſage rather gave Maintenance to Abram; in whom all, both Prieſts and Miniſters, as well as Lay-men, paid Tithes, not receiv'd them. And becauſe I affirm'd above, beginning this firſt part of my Diſcourſe, that God hath given to Miniſters of the Goſpel that Maintenance only which is juſtly given them, let us ſee a little what hath bin thought of that other Maintenance beſides Tithes, which of all Proteſtants our Engliſh Divines either only or moſt apparently both require and take. Thoſe are Fees for Chriſtnings, Marriages, and Burials: which, though whoſo will may give freely, yet being not of Right, but of free Gift, if they be exacted or eſtabliſh'd, they becom unjuſt to them who are otherwiſe maintain'd; and of ſuch evil note, that even the Council of Trent, l. 2. p. 246. makes them liable to the Laws againſt Simony, who take or demand Fees for the adminiſtring of any Sacrament: Che la ſinodo volendo levare gli abuſi introdotti, &c. And in the next Page, with like Severity, condemns the giving or taking for a Benefice, and the celebrating of Marriages, Chriſtnings, and Burials, for Fees exacted or demanded: nor counts it leſs Simony to ſell the Ground or Place of Burial. And in a State-Aſſembly at Orleans, 1561. it was decreed, Che non ſi poteſſe eſſiger coſa alcuna, &c. p. 429. That nothing ſhould be exacted for the adminiſtring of Sacraments, Burials, or any other ſpiritual Function. Thus much that Councel, of all others the moſt Popiſh, and this Aſſembly of Papiſts, though, by thir own Principles, in bondage to the Clergy, were induc'd, either by thir own reaſon and ſhame, or by the light of Reformation then ſhining in upon them, or rather by the known Canons of many Councels and Synods long before, to condemn of Simony ſpiritual Fees demanded. For if the Miniſter be maintain'd for his whole Miniſtry, why ſhould he be twice paid for any part therof? Why ſhould he, like a Servant, ſeek Vails over and above his Wages? As for Chriſtnings, either they themſelves call Men to Baptiſm, or Men of themſelves com: if Miniſters invite, how ill had it becom'd John the Baptiſt to demand Fees for his baptizing, or Chriſt for his chriſtnings? Far leſs becoms it theſe now, with a greedines lower than that of Tradeſmen calling Paſſengers to thir Shop, and yet paid beforehand, to ask again for doing that which thoſe thir Founders did freely. If Men of themſelves com to be baptiz'd, they are either brought by ſuch as already pay the Miniſter, or com to be one of his Diſciples and Maintainers: of whom to ask a Fee as it were for entrance, is a piece of paltry craft or caution, befitting none but beggarly Artiſts. Burials and Marriages are ſo little to be any part of thir Gain, that they who conſider well, may find them to be no part of thir Function. At Burials thir attendance they alledg on the Corps; all the Gueſts do as much unhir'd. But thir Prayers at the Grave, ſuperſtitiouſly requir'd: yet if requir'd, thir laſt performance to the deceas'd of thir own Flock. But the Funeral Sermon, at thir choiſe, or if not, an occaſion offer'd them to preach out of ſeaſon, which is one part of thir Office. But ſomthing muſt be ſpoken in praiſe; if due, thir duty; if undue, thir corruption: a peculiar Simonie of our Divines in England only. But the ground is broken, and eſpecially thir unrighteous Poſſeſſion, the Chancel. To ſell that will not only raiſe up in judgment the Council of Trent againſt them, but will loſe them the beſt Champion of Tithes, thir zealous Antiquary, Sir Hen. Spelman, who in a Book written to that purpoſe, by many cited Canons, and ſom even of times corrupteſt in the Church, proves that Fees exacted or demanded for Sacraments, Marriages, Burials, and eſpecially for interring, are wicked, accurſed, ſimoniacal and abominable: Yet thus is the Church, for all this noiſe of Reformation, left ſtill unreform'd, by the cenſure of thir own Synods, thir own Favourers, a den of Thieves and Robbers. As for Marriages, that Miniſters ſhould meddle with them, as not ſanctifi'd or legitimat without thir Celebration, I find no ground in Scripture either of Precept or Example. Likelieſt it is (which our Selden hath well obſerv'd, l. 2. c. 28. ux. Eb.) that in imitation of Heathen Prieſts who were wont at Nuptials to uſe many Rites and Ceremonies, and eſpecially, judging it would be profitable, and the increaſe of their Autority, not to be Spectators only in buſineſs of ſuch concernment to the Life of Man, they inſinuated that Marriage was not holy without thir Benediction, and for the better colour, made it a Sacrament; being of it ſelf a Civil Ordinance, a houſhold Contract, a thing indifferent and free to the whole race of Mankind, not as religious, but as Men: beſt, indeed, undertaken to religious ends, and as the Apoſtle ſaith, 1 Cor. 7. In the Lord. Yet not therefore invalid or unholy without a Miniſter and his pretended neceſſary hallowing, more than any other Act, Enterpriſe or Contract of civil Life, which ought all to be don alſo in the Lord and to his Glory: All which, no leſs than Marriage, were by the cunning of Prieſts hertofore, as material to thir Profit, tranſacted at the Altar. Our Divines deny it to be a Sacrament; yet retain'd the Celebration, till prudently a late Parlament recover'd the Civil Liberty of Marriage from thir incroachment, and transferr'd the ratifying and regiſtring therof from the Canonical Shop to the proper cognisance of Civil Magiſtrates. Seeing then, that God hath given to Miniſters under the Goſpel, that only which is juſtly given them, that is to ſay, a due and moderat Livelihood, the hire of thir labor, and that the heav-offering of Tithes is aboliſh'd with the Altar, yea though not aboliſh'd, yet lawles, as they enjoy them; thir Melchiſedecian Right alſo trivial and groundles, and both Tithes and groundles, and both Tithes and Fees, if exacted or eſtabliſh'd, unjuſt and ſcandalous; we may hope, with them remov'd, to remove Hirelings in ſom good meaſure, whom theſe tempting Baits, by Law eſpecially to be recover'd, allure into the Church.

The next thing to be conſider'd in the maintenance of Miniſters, is by whom it ſhould be given. Wherin though the Light of Reaſon might ſufficiently inform us, it will be beſt to conſult the Scripture: Gal. 6. 6. Let him that is taught in the word, communicate to him that teacheth, in all good things: that is to ſay in all manner of Gratitude, to his ability. 1 Cor. 9. 11. If we have ſown unto you ſpiritual things, is it a great matter if we reap your carnal things? To whom therfore hath not bin ſown, from him wherfore ſhould be reap'd? 1 Tim. 5. 17. Let the Elders that rule well, be counted worthy of double honour; eſpecially they who labour in word and doctrin. By theſe places we ſee, that Recompence was given either by every one in particular who had bin inſtructed, or by them all in common, brought into the Church-Treaſury, and diſtributed to the Miniſters according to thir ſeveral labors: and that was judg'd either by ſom extraordinary Perſon, as Timothy, who by the Apoſtle was then left Evangeliſt at Epheſus, 2 *Tim.*4.5. or by ſom to whom the Church deputed that care. This is ſo agreeable to reaſon and ſo clear, that any one may perceive what Iniquity and Violence hath prevail'd ſince in the Church, wherby it hath bin ſo order'd, that they alſo ſhall be compell'd to recompence the Parochial Miniſter, who neither choſe him for thir Teacher, nor have receiv'd Inſtruction from him, as being either inſufficient, or not reſident, or inferior to whom they follow; wherin to bar them thir Choiſe, is to violate Chriſtian Liberty. Our Law-books teſtifie, that before the Councel of Lateran, in the year 1179, and the fifth of our Henry 2. or rather before a decretal Epiſtle of Pope Innocent the Third, about 1200, and the firſt of King John, any Man might have given his Tithes to what ſpiritual Perſon he would: and, as the L. Coke notes on that place, Inſtit. part 2. that this decretal bound not the Subjects of this Realm, but as it ſeem'd juſt and reaſonable. The Pope took his reaſon rightly from the above cited place, 1 Cor. 9. 11. but falſly ſuppos'd every one to be inſtructed by his Pariſh-Prieſt. Whether this were then firſt ſo decreed, or rather long before, as may ſeem by the Laws of Edgar and Canute, that Tithes were to be paid, not to whom he would that paid them, but to the Cathedral Church or the Pariſh Prieſt, it imports not; ſince the reaſon which they themſelves bring, built on fals ſuppoſition, becomes alike infirm and abſurd, that he ſhould reap from me, who ſows not to me, be the cauſe either his defect, or my free choiſe. But here it will be readily objected, What if they who are to be inſtructed be not able to maintain a Miniſter, as in many Villages? I anſwer, that the Scripture ſhews in many places what ought to be don herin. Firſt I offer it to the reaſon of any Man, whether he think the knowledg of Chriſtian Religion harder than any other Art or Science to attain. I ſuppoſe he will grant that it is far eaſier, both of it ſelf, and in regard of God's aſſiſting Spirit, not particularly promis'd us to the attainment of any other Knowledg, but of this only: ſince it was preach'd as well to the Shepherds of Bethleem by Angels, as to the Eaſtern Wiſemen by that Star: and our Saviour declares himſelf anointed to preach the Goſpel to the poor, Luke 4. 18. then ſurely to thir Capacity. They who after him firſt taught it, were otherwiſe unlearned Men: they who before Hus and Luther firſt reform'd it, were for the meannes of thir condition call'd, the poor Men of Lions: and in Flanders at this day, les gueus, which is to ſay, Beggars. Therfore are the Scriptures tranſlated into every vulgar Tongue, as being held in main matters of Belief and Salvation, plain and eaſie to the pooreſt: and ſuch no leſs than thir Teachers have the Spirit to guide them in all Truth, Joh. 14. 26. and 16. 13. Hence we may conclude, if Men be not all thir life-time under a Teacher to learn Logic, natural Philoſophy, Ethics or Mathematics, which are more difficult, that certainly it is not neceſſary to the attainment of Chriſtian Knowledg that Men ſhould ſit all thir life long at the feet of a pulpited Divine; while he, a lollard indeed over his elbow-cuſhion, in almoſt the ſeventh part of forty or fifty years teaches them ſcarce half the Principles of Religion; and his Sheep ofttimes ſit the while to as little purpoſe of benefiting as the Sheep in thir Pues at Smithfield; and for the moſt part by ſom Simony or other, bought and ſold like them: or, if this Compariſon be too low, like thoſe Women, 1 Tim.

3.7. Ever learning and never attaining; yet not ſo much through thir own fault, as through the unskilful and immethodical teaching of thir Paſtor, teaching here and there at random out of this or that Text, as his eaſe or fanſie, and oft-times as his ſtealth guides him. Seeing then that Chriſtian Religion may be ſo eaſily attain'd, and by meaneſt Capacities, it cannot be much difficult to find ways, both how the poor, yea all Men may be ſoon taught what is to be known of Chriſtianity, and they who teach them, recompenc'd. Firſt, if Miniſters of thir own accord, who pretend that they are call'd and ſent to preach the Goſpel, thoſe eſpecially who have no particular Flock, would imitate our Saviour and his Diſciples who went preaching through the Villages, not only through the Cities, Matth. 9. 35. Mark 6. 6. Luke 13. 22. Acts 8. 25. and there preach'd to the poor as well as to the rich, looking for no recompence but in Heaven: John 4. 35, 36. Look on the fields, for they are white already to Harveſt: and he that reapeth, receiveth wages, and gathereth fruit unto Life eternal. This was thir Wages. But they will ſoon reply, we our ſelves have not wherwithal; who ſhall bear the Charges of our Journey? To whom it may as ſoon be anſwer'd, that in likelihood they are not poorer than they who did thus; and if they have not the ſame Faith which thoſe Diſciples had to truſt in God and the Promiſe of Chriſt for thir Maintenance as they did, and yet intrude into the Miniſtery without any livelihood of thir own, they caſt themſelves into a miſerable hazard or temptation, and oft-times into a more miſerable neceſſity, either to ſtarve, or to pleaſe thir Paimaſters rather than God; and give Men juſt cauſe to ſuſpect, that they came neither call'd nor ſent from above to preach the Word, but from below, by the inſtinct of thir own hunger, to feed upon the Church. Yet grant it needful to allow them both the Charges of thir Journey and the Hire of thir Labor, it will belong next to the Charity of richer Congregations, where moſt commonly they abound with Teachers, to ſend ſome of thir number to the Villages round, as the Apoſtles from Jeruſalem ſent Peter and John to the City and Villages of Samaria, Acts 8. 14, 25. or as the Church at Jeruſalem ſent Barnabas to Antioch, chap. 11. 22. and other Churches joining ſent Luke to travail with Paul, 2 Cor. 8. 19. though whether they had thir Charges born by the Church or no, it be not recorded. If it be objected that this itinerary preaching will not ſerve to plant the Goſpel in thoſe places, unleſs they who are ſent, abide there ſom competent time; I anſwer, that if they ſtay there a year or two, which was the longeſt time uſually ſtaid by the Apoſtles in one place, it may ſuffice to teach them, who will attend and learn, all the Points of Religion neceſſary to Salvation; then ſorting them into ſeveral Congregations of a moderat number, out of the ableſt and zealouſeſt among them to create Elders, who, exerciſing and requiring from themſelves what they have learn'd (for no Learning is retain'd without conſtant exerciſe and methodical repetition) may teach and govern the reſt: and ſo exhorted to continue faithful and ſtedfaſt, they may ſecurely be committed to the Providence of God and the guidance of his holy Spirit, till God may offer ſom opportunity to viſit them again, and to confirm them: which when they have don, they have don as much as the Apoſtles were wont to do in propagating the Goſpel, Acts 14. 23. And when they had ordain'd them Elders in every Church, and had pray'd with faſting, they commended them to the Lord, on whom they believ'd. And in the ſame Chapter, Verſ. 21, 22. When they had preach'd the Goſpel to that City, and had taught many, they returned again to Lyſtra and to Iconium and Antioch, confirming the Souls of the Diſciples, and exhorting them to continue in the Faith. And Chap. 15. 36. Let us go again and viſit our Brethren. And Verſ. 41. He went thorow Syria and Cilicia, confirming the Churches. To theſe I might add other helps, which we enjoy now, to make more eaſie the attainment of Chriſtian Religion by the meaneſt: the entire Scripture tranſlated into Engliſh with plenty of Notes; and ſom where or other, I truſt, may be found ſom wholſom body of Divinity, as they call it, without School Terms and Metaphyſical Notions, which have obſcur'd rather than explan'd our Religion, and made it ſeem difficult without cauſe. Thus taught once for all, and thus now and then viſited and confirm'd, in the moſt deſtitute and pooreſt places of the Land, under the Government of thir own Elders performing all Miniſterial Offices among them, they may be truſted to meet and edifie one another whether in Church or Chappel, or, to ſave them the trudging of many miles thither, neerer home, though in a Houſe or Barn. For notwithſtanding the gaudy Superſtition of ſom devoted ſtill ignorantly to Temples, we may be well aſſur'd that he who diſdain'd not to be laid in a Manger, diſdains not to be preach'd in a Barn; and that by ſuch meetings as theſe, being indeed moſt Apoſtolical and Primitive, they will in a ſhort time advance more in Chriſtian Knowledg and Reformation of Life, than by the many years preaching of ſuch an Incumbent, I may ſay, ſuch an Incubus oft-times, as will be meanly hir'd to abide long in thoſe places. They have this left perhaps to object further, that to ſend thus, and to maintain, though but for a year or two, Miniſters and Teachers in ſeveral places, would prove chargeable to the Churches, though in Towns and Cities round about. To whom again I anſwer, that it was not thought ſo by them who firſt thus propagated the Goſpel, though but few in number to us, and much leſs able to ſuſtain the Expence. Yet this Expence would be much leſs than to hire Incumbents, or rather Incumbrances, for life-time; and a great means (which is the ſubject of this Diſcourſe) to diminiſh Hirelings. But be the Expence leſs or more, if it be found burdenſom to the Churches, they have in this Land an eaſie remedy in thir recourſe to the Civil Magiſtrate; who hath in his hands the diſpoſal of no ſmall Revenues, left, perhaps, anciently to ſuperſtitious, but meant undoubtedly to good and beſt uſes; and therfore, once made publick, appliable by the preſent Magiſtrate to ſuch uſes as the Church, or ſolid Reaſon from whomſoever, ſhall convince him to think beſt. And thoſe uſes may be, no doubt, much rather than as Glebes and Augmentations are now beſtow'd, to grant ſuch requeſts as theſe of the Churches; or to erect in greater number all over the Land Schools, and competent Libraries to thoſe Schools, where Languages and Arts may be taught free together, without the needleſs, unprofitable and inconvenient removing to another place. So all the Land would be ſoon better civiliz'd, and they who are taught freely at the publick Coſt, might have thir Education given them on this condition, that therwith content, they ſhould not gad for Preferment out of thir own Country, but continue there thankful for what they receiv'd freely, beſtowing it as freely on thir Country, without ſoaring above the meannes wherin they were born. But how they ſhall live when they are thus bred and diſmis'd, will be ſtill the ſluggiſh Objection. To which is anſwer'd, that thoſe publick Foundations may be ſo inſtituted, as the Youth therin may be at once brought up to a competence of Learning and to an honeſt Trade; and the hours of teaching ſo order'd, as thir ſtudy may be no hinderance to thir labor or other calling. This was the breeding of S. Paul, though born of no mean Parents, a free Citizen of the Roman Empire: ſo little did his Trade debaſe him, that it rather enabl'd him to uſe that magnanimity of preaching the Goſpel through Aſia and Europe at his own charges: thus thoſe Preachers among the poor Waldenſes, the ancient ſtock of our Reformation, without theſe helps which I ſpeak of, bred up themſelves in Trades, and eſpecially in Phyſic and Surgery, as well as in the ſtudy of Scripture (which is the only true Theology) that they might be no burden to the Church; and by the Example of Chriſt, might cure both Soul and Body, through induſtry joining that to thir Miniſtery, which he join'd to his by gift of the Spirit. Thus relates Peter Gilles in his Hiſtory of the Waldenſes in Piemont. But our Miniſters think ſcorn to uſe a Trade, and count it the reproach of this Age, that Tradeſmen preach the Goſpel. It were to be wiſh'd they were all Tradeſmen; they would not then ſo many of them, for want of another Trade, make a Trade of thir preaching: and yet they clamor that Tradeſmen preach; and yet they preach, while they themſelves are the worſt Tradeſmen of all. As for Church-Endowments and Poſſeſſions, I meet with none conſiderable before Conſtantine, but the Houſes and Gardens where they met, and thir places of burial: and I perſwade me, that from them the ancient Waldenſes, whom deſervedly I cite ſo often, held, That to endow Churches is an evil thing; and, that the Church then fell off and turn'd Whore ſitting on that Beaſt in the Revelation, when under Pope Sylveſter ſhe receiv'd thoſe Temporal Donations. So the forecited Tractat of thir Doctrin teſtifies. This alſo thir own Traditions of that heavenly Voice witneſs'd, and ſom of the ancient Fathers then living foreſaw and deplor'd. And indeed, how could theſe Endowments thrive better with the Church, being unjuſtly taken by thoſe Emperors, without ſuffrage of the People, out of the Tributes and publick Lands of each City, wherby the People became liable to be oppreſs'd with other Taxes. Being therfore given for the moſt part by Kings and other publick Perſons, and ſo likelieſt out of the Publick, and if without the Peoples conſent, unjuſtly, however to publick ends of much concernment, to the good or evil of a Commonwealth, and in that regard made publick though given by private Perſons, or which is worſe, given, as the Clergy then perſwaded men, for thir Souls Health, a pious Gift; but as the truth was, oft-times a bribe to God, or to Chriſt for Abſolution, as they were then taught, for Murders, Adulteries, and other hainous Crimes; what ſhall be found hertofore given by Kings or Princes out of the publick, may juſtly by the Magiſtrate be recall'd and reappropriated to the Civil Revenue: what by privat or publick Perſons out of thir own, the price of Blood or Luſt, or to ſom ſuch purgatorious and ſuperſtitious Uſes, not only may but ought to be taken off from Chriſt, as a foul diſhonour laid upon him, or not impiouſly given, nor in particular to any one, but in general to the Churches good, may be converted to that uſe which ſhall be judg'd tending more directly to that general end. Thus did the Princes and Cities of Germany in the firſt Reformation; and defended thir ſo doing by many reaſons, which are ſet down at large in Sleidan, Lib. 6. Anno 1526, and Lib. 11. Anno 1537, and Lib. 13. Anno 1540. But that the Magiſtrate either out of that Church Revenue which remains yet in his hand, or eſtabliſhing any other Maintenance inſtead of Tithe, ſhould take into his own Power the ſtipendiary maintenance of Church-miniſters, or compel it by Law, can ſtand neither with the Peoples right, nor with Chriſtian liberty, but would ſuſpend the Church wholly upon the State, and turn her Miniſters into State-Penſioners. And for the Magiſtrate in Perſon of a nurſing Father to make the Church his meer Ward, as always in Minority, the Church, to whom he ought as a Magiſtrate, Eſa. 49. 23. To bow down with his face toward the Earth, and lick up the duſt of her Feet; her to ſubject to his political Drifts or conceiv'd opinions, by maſtering her Revenue; and ſo by his examinant committies to circumſcribe her free election of Miniſters, is neither juſt nor Pious; no honor don to the Church, but a plain diſhonor: and upon her whoſe only head is in Heaven, yea upon him, who is her only Head, ſets another in effect, and which is moſt monſtrous, a human on a Heavenly, a carnal on a Spiritual, a political Head on an Eccleſiaſtical Body; which at length by ſuch heterogeneal, ſuch inceſtuous conjunction, transforms her oft-times into a Beaſt of many Heads and many Horns. For if the Church be of all Societies the holieſt on Earth, and ſo to be reverenc'd by the Magiſtrate, not to truſt her with her own Belief and Integrity; and therfore not with the keeping, at leaſt with the diſpoſing of what Revenue ſhall be found juſtly and lawfully her own, is to count the Church not a Holy Congregation, but a pack of giddy or diſhoneſt Perſons, to be rul'd by Civil Power in Sacred Affairs. But to proceed further in the Truth yet more freely, ſeeing the Chriſtian Church is not National, but conſiſting of many particular Congregations, ſubject to many changes, as well through Civil Accidents, as through Schiſm and various Opinions, not to be decided by any outward judg, being matters of Conſcience, wherby theſe pretended Church Revenues, as they have bin ever; ſo are like to continue endles matter of Diſſention both between the Church and Magiſtrate, and the Churches among themſelves, there will be found no better remedy to theſe evils, otherwiſe incurable, then by the incorrupteſt Council of thoſe Waldenſes, or firſt Reformers, to remove them as a Peſt, an apple of diſcord in the Church, (for what els can be the effect of Riches, and the ſnare of Money in Religion?) and to convert them to thoſe more profitable Uſes above expreſs'd, or other ſuch as ſhall be judg'd moſt neceſſary; conſidering that the Church of Chriſt was founded in Poverty rather than in Revenues, ſtood pureſt and proſper'd beſt without them, receiv'd them unlawfully from them who both erroneouſly and unjuſtly, ſomtimes impiouſly, gave them, and ſo juſtly was enſnar'd and corrupted by them. And leſt it be thought that theſe Revenues withdrawn and better imploy'd, the Magiſtrate ought inſtead to ſettle by Statute ſom maintenance of Miniſters, let this be conſider'd firſt, that it concerns every mans Conſcience to what Religion he contributes; and that the Civil Magiſtrate is intruſted with Civil Rights only, not with Conſcience, which can have no Deputy or repreſenter of it ſelf, but one of the ſame Mind: next, that what each man gives to the Miniſter, he gives either as to God, or as to his Teacher; if as to God, no Civil Power can juſtly conſecrate to religious Uſes any part either of Civil Revenue, which is the Peoples, and muſt ſave them from other Taxes, or of any mans propriety, but God by ſpecial command, as he did by Moſes, or the owner himſelf by voluntary intention and the perſwaſion of his giving it to God. Forc'd Conſecrations out of another mans Eſtate are no better then forc'd Vows, hateful to God, who loves a chearful giver; but much more hateful, wrung out of mens Purſes to maintain a diſapprov'd Miniſtry againſt thir Conſcience; however unholy, infamous, and diſhonorable to his Miniſters, and the free Goſpel maintain'd in ſuch unworthy manner as by Violence and Extortion. If he give it as to his Teacher, what Juſtice or Equity compels him to pay for learning that Religion which leaves freely to his choice, whether he will learn it or no, whether of this Teacher or another, and eſpecially to pay for what he never learn'd, or approves not; wherby, beſides the wound of his Conſcience, he becoms the leſs able to recompence his true Teacher? Thus far hath bin enquir'd by whom Church-miniſters ought to be maintain'd, and hath bin prov'd moſt natural, moſt equal and agreeable with Scripture, to be by them who receive thir Teaching; and by whom, if they be unable? Which ways well obſerv'd, can diſcourage none but Hirelings, and will much leſſen thir number in the Church.

It remains laſtly to conſider, in what manner God hath ordain'd that Recompence be given to Miniſters of the Goſpel; and by all Scripture it will appear that he hath given it them not by Civil Law and Freehold, as they claim, but by the Benevolence and free Gratitude of ſuch as receive them: Luke 10. 7, 8. Eating and drinking ſuch things as they give you. If they receive you, eat ſuch things as are ſet before you. Matth. 10. 7, 8. As ye go, preach, ſaying, The Kingdom of God is at hand, &c. Freely ye have receiv'd, freely give. If God have ordain'd Miniſters to preach freely, whether they receive recompence or no, then certainly he hath forbid both them to compel it, and others to compel it for them. But freely given, he accounts it as given to himſelf: Philip. 4. 16, 17, 18. Ye ſent once and again to my neceſſity: Not becauſe I deſire a Gift; but I deſire Fruit that may abound to your account. Having receiv'd of Epaphroditus the things which were ſent from you, an odor of ſweet ſmell, a ſacrifice acceptable, well pleaſing to God: Which cannot be from force or unwillingnes. The ſame is ſaid of Alms, Heb. 13. 16. To do good and to communicate, forget not; for with ſuch Sacrifices God is well pleas'd. Whence the Primitive Church thought it no ſhame to receive all thir maintenance as the Alms of thir Auditors. Which they who defend Tithes, as if it made for thir cauſe, when as it utterly confutes them, omit not to ſet down at large; proving to our hands out of Origen, Tertullian, Cyprian, and others, that the Clergy liv'd at firſt upon the meer benevolence of thir Hearers; who gave what they gave, not to the Clergy, but to the Church; out of which the Clergy had thir Portions given them in Baskets, and were thence call'd ſportularii, basket-clerks: that thir Portion was a very mean allowance, only for a bare livelihood; according to thoſe Precepts of our Saviour, Matth. 10. 7, &c. the reſt was diſtributed to the Poor. They cite alſo out of Proſper, the diſciple of St. Auſtin, that ſuch of the Clergy as had means of thir own, might not without ſin partake of Church-maintenance; not receiving thereby food which they abound with, but feeding on the ſins of other men: that the Holy Ghoſt ſaith of ſuch Clergy men, they eat the ſins of my People; and that a Council at Antioch, in the year 340, ſuffer'd not either Prieſt or Biſhop to live on Church-maintenance without Neceſſity. Thus far Tithers themſelves have contributed to thir own confutation, by confeſſing that the Church liv'd primitively on Alms. And I add, that about the year 359, Conſtantius the Emperor having ſummon'd a general Council of Biſhops to Ariminum in Italy, and provided for thir ſubſiſtence there, the Britiſh and French Biſhops judging it not decent to live on the Publick, choſe rather to be at thir own charges.

Three only out of Britain conſtrain'd through want, yet refuſing offer'd aſſiſtance from the reſt, accepting the Emperor's Proviſion; judging it more convenient to ſubſiſt by publick than by private ſuſtenance. Whence we may conclude, that Biſhops then in this Iland had thir livelihood only from benevolence; in which regard this relater Sulpitius Severus, a good Author of the ſame time, highly praiſes them. And the Waldenſes, our firſt Reformers, both from the Scripture and theſe Primitive examples, maintain'd thoſe among them who bore the Office of Miniſters, by Alms only. Take thir very words from the Hiſtory written of them in French, Part 3. Lib. 2. Chap. 2. La nourriture & ce de quoy nous ſommes couverts, &c. Our Food and Clothing is ſufficiently adminiſter'd and given to us by way of gratuity and Alms, by the good People whom we teach. If then by Alms and Benevolence, not by legal force, not by tenure of Freehold or Copyhold: for Alms, though juſt, cannot be compell'd; and Benevolence forc'd, is Malevolence rather, violent and inconſiſtent with the Goſpel; and declares him no true Miniſter therof, but a rapacious Hireling rather, who by force receiving it, eats the bread of Violence and Exaction, no holy or juſt livelihood, no not civilly counted honeſt; much leſs beſeeming ſuch a ſpiritual Miniſtry. But, ſay they, our Maintenance is our due, Tithes the right of Chriſt, unſeparable from the Prieſt, no where repeal'd; if then, not otherwiſe to be had, by Law to be recover'd; for though Paul were pleas'd to forgo his due, and not to uſe his Power, 1 Cor. 9. 12. yet he had a Power, Ver. 4. and bound not others. I anſwer firſt, becauſe I ſee them ſtill ſo loth to unlearn their decimal Arithmetic, and ſtill graſp thir Tithes as inſeparable from a Prieſt, that Miniſters of the Goſpel are not Prieſts; and therfore ſeparated from Tithes by thir own excluſion, being neither call'd Prieſts in the New Teſtament, nor of any Order known in Scripture: not of Melchiſedec, proper to Chriſt only; not of Aaron, as they themſelves will confeſs; and the third Prieſthood only remaining, is common to all the Faithful. But they are Miniſters of our High Prieſt. True, but not of his Prieſthood, as the Levites were to Aaron; for he performs that whole Office himſelf incommunicably. Yet Tithes remain, ſay they, ſtill unreleas'd, the due of Chriſt; and to whom payable, but to his Miniſters? I ſay again, that no man can ſo underſtand them, unleſs Chriſt in ſom place or other ſo claim them. That example of Abram argues nothing but his voluntary act; honor once only don, but on what conſideration, whether to a Prieſt or to a King, whether due the honor, arbitrary that kind of honor or not, will after all contending be left ſtill in meer conjecture: which muſt not be permitted in the claim of ſuch a needy and ſuttle ſpiritual Corporation, pretending by divine right to the Tenth of all other mens Eſtates; nor can it be allow'd by wiſe men, or the verdit of common Law. And the tenth part, though once declar'd Holy, is declar'd now to be no holier than the other nine, by that command to Peter, Acts 10. 15, 28. whereby all diſtinction of Holy and Unholy is remov'd from all things. Tithes therfore though claim'd, and Holy under the Law, yet are now releas'd and quitted both by that command to Peter, and by this to all Miniſters abovecited, Luke 10. eating and drinking ſuch things as they give you: made Holy now by thir free Gift only. And therfore S. Paul, 1 Cor. 9. 4. aſſerts his Power indeed; but of what? not of Tithes, but, to eat and drink ſuch things as are given in reference to this command; which he calls not Holy things, or things of the Goſpel, as if the Goſpel had any conſecrated things in anſwer to things of the Temple, Ver. 13. but he calls them your Carnal things, Ver. 11. without changing thir property. And what Power had he? Not the Power of Force, but of Conſcience only, wherby he might lawfully and without ſcruple live on the Goſpel; receiving what was given him, as the recompence of his Labor. For if Chriſt the Maſter hath profeſs'd his Kingdom to be not of this World, it ſuits not with that profeſſion, either in him or his Miniſters, to claim temporal Right from ſpiritual Reſpects. He who refus'd to be the divider of an Inheritance between two Brethren, cannot approve his Miniſters, by pretended right from him, to be dividers of Tenths and Freeholds out of other mens Poſſeſſions, making therby the Goſpel but a cloak of carnal Intereſt, and, to the contradiction of thir Maſter, turning his heavenly Kingdom into a Kingdom of this World, a Kingdom of Force and Rapin:

pin: To whom it will be one day thunder'd more terribly than to Gehazi, for thus diſhonouring a far greater Maſter and his Goſpel; is this a time to receive Money, and to receive Garments, and Olive-yards, and Vineyards, and Sheep, and Oxen? The Leproſy of Naaman link'd with that Apoſtolic curſe of periſhing imprecated on Simon Magus, may be fear'd will cleave to ſuch and to thir ſeed for ever. So that when all is don, and Belly hath us'd in vain all her cunning ſhifts, I doubt not but all true Miniſters, conſidering the demonſtration of what hath bin here prov'd, will be wiſe, and think it much more tolerable to hear that no maintenance of Miniſters, whether Tithes or any other, can be ſettl'd by Statute, but muſt be given by them who receive Inſtruction; and freely given, as God hath ordain'd. And indeed what can be a more honorable Maintenance to them than ſuch, whether Alms or willing Oblations, as theſe; which being accounted both alike as given to God, the only acceptable Sacrifices now remaining, muſt needs repreſent him who receives them much in the care of God, and nearly related to him, when not by worldly force and conſtraint, but with religious aw and reverence; what is given to God, is given to him; and what to him, accounted as given to God. This would be well anough, ſay they; but how many will ſo give? I anſwer, as many, doubtles, as ſhall be well taught, as many as God ſhall ſo move. Why are ye ſo diſtruſtful, both of your own Doctrin and of God's Promiſes, fulfill'd in the experience of thoſe Diſciples firſt ſent: Luke 22. 35. When I ſent you without Purſe, and Scrip, and Shooes, lacked ye any thing? And they ſaid, Nothing. How then came ours, or who ſent them thus deſtitute, thus poor and empty both of Purſe and Faith? Who ſtile themſelves Embaſſadors of Jeſus Chriſt, and ſeem to be his Tithe-gatherers, though an Office of thir own ſetting up to his Diſhonor, his Exacters, his Publicans rather, not truſting that he will maintain them in thir embaſſy, unleſs they bind him to his Promiſe by a Statute-law, that we ſhall maintain them. Lay down for ſhame that magnific Title, while ye ſeek Maintenance from the People: It is not the manner of Embaſſadors to ask Maintenance of them to whom they are ſent. But he who is Lord of all things, hath ſo ordain'd: truſt him then; he doubtles will command the People to make good his Promiſes of Maintenance more honorably unask'd, unrak'd for. This they know, this they preach, yet believe not: but think it as impoſſible, without a Statute-law, to live of the Goſpel, as if by thoſe words they were bid go eat thir Bibles, as Ezekiel and John did thir Books; and ſuch Doctrins as theſe are as bitter to thir Bellies; but will ſerve ſo much the better to diſcover Hirelings, who can have nothing, though but in appearance, juſt and ſolid to anſwer for themſelves againſt what hath bin here ſpoken, unleſs perhaps this one remaining Pretence, which we ſhall quickly ſee to be either fals or uningenuous.

They pretend that thir Education, either at School or Univerſity, hath bin very chargeable, and therfore ought to be repair'd in future by a plentiful Maintenance: Whenas it is well known that the better half of them, and oft-times poor and pitiful Boys, of no merit or promiſing hopes that might intitle them to the publick Proviſion, but thir Poverty and the unjuſt favour of Friends, have had the moſt of thir breeding, both at School and Univerſity, by Scholarſhips; Exhibitions and Fellowſhips at the Publick Coſt, which might engage them the rather to give freely, as they have freely receiv'd. Or if they have miſs'd of theſe helps at the latter place, they have after two or three Years left the cours of thir ſtudies there, if they ever well began them, and undertaken, though furniſh'd with little els but Ignorance, Boldneſs and Ambition, if with no worſe Vices, a Chaplainſhip in ſom Gentleman's houſe, to the frequent imbaſing of his Sons with illiterate and narrow Principles. Or if they have liv'd there upon thir own, who knows not that ſeven years Charge of living there, to them who fly not from the Government of thir Parents to the licenſe of a Univerſity, but com ſeriouſly to ſtudy, is no more than may be well defraid and reimburs'd by one year's Revenue of an ordinary good Benefice? If they had then means of Breeding from thir Parents, 'tis likely they have more now; and if they have, it needs muſt be mechanick and uningenuous in them, to bring a Bill of Charges for the learning of thoſe liberal Arts and Sciences, which they have learn'd (if they have indeed learn'd them, as they ſeldom have) to thir own benefit and accompliſhcompliſhment. But they will ſay, we had betaken us to ſom other Trade or Profeſſion, had we not expected to find a better Livelihood by the Miniſtry. This is that which I look'd for, to diſcover them openly neither true lovers of Learning, and ſo very ſeldom guilty of it, nor true Miniſters of the Goſpel. So long ago out of date is that old true ſaying, 1 Tim. 3. 1. If a Man deſire a Biſhoprick, he deſires a good work: for now commonly he who deſires to be a Miniſter, looks not at the Work, but at the Wages; and by that Lure or Loubel, may be toald from Pariſh to Pariſh all the Town over. But what can be plainer Simony, than thus to be at Charges beforehand, to no other end than to make thir Miniſtry doubly or trebly beneficial? To whom it might be ſaid, as juſtly as to that Simon, Thy Mony periſh with thee, becauſe thou haſt thought that the Gift of God may be purchas'd with Money; thou haſt neither part nor lot in this matter. Next, it is a fond Error, though too much believ'd among us, to think that the Univerſity makes a Miniſter of the Goſpel; what it may conduce to other Arts and Sciences, I diſpute not now: but that which makes fit a Miniſter, the Scripture can beſt inform us to be only from above, whence alſo we are bid to ſeek them; Mat. 9. 38. Pray ye therfore to the Lord of the Harveſt, that he will ſend forth Laborers into his Harveſt. Acts 20. 28. The Flock, over which the Holy Ghoſt hath made you Overſeers. Rom. 10. 15. How ſhall they preach, unleſs they be ſent? By whom ſent? by the Univerſity, or the Magiſtrate, or thir Belly? No ſurely, but ſent from God only, and that God who is not thir Belly. And whether he be ſent from God, or from Simon Magus, the inward ſenſe of his Calling and ſpiritual Ability will ſufficiently tell him; and that ſtrong Obligation felt within him, which was felt by the Apoſtle, will often expreſs from him the ſame words: 1 Cor. 9. 16. Neceſſity is laid upon me, yea, Wo is me if I preach not the Goſpel. Not a beggarly neceſſity, and the Wo fear'd otherwiſe of perpetual want, but ſuch a neceſſity as made him willing to preach the Goſpel gratis, and to embrace Poverty, rather than as a Wo to fear it. 1 Cor. 12. 28. God hath ſet ſom in the Church, firſt Apoſtles, &c. Epheſ. 4. 11, &c. He gave ſom Apoſtles, &c. For the perfecting of the Saints, for the work of the Miniſtry, for the edifying of the Body of Chriſt, till we all come to the Unity of the Faith. Wherby we may know, that as he made them at the firſt, ſo he makes them ſtill, and to the World's end. 2 Cor. 3. 6. Who hath alſo made us fit or able Miniſters of the New Teſtament. 1 Tim. 4. 14. The Gift that is in thee, which was given thee by Propheſy, and the laying on of the Hands of the Preſbytery. Theſe are all the means which we read of requir'd in Scripture to the making of a Miniſter. All this is granted, you will ſay; but yet that it is alſo requiſite he ſhould be train'd in other Learning; which can be no where better had than at Univerſities. I anſwer, that what Learning, either Human or Divine, can be neceſſary to a Miniſter, may as eaſily and leſs chargeably be had in any private houſe. How deficient els, and to how little purpoſe are all thoſe piles of Sermons, Notes, and Comments on all parts of the Bible, Bodies and Marrows of Divinity, beſides all other Sciences, in our Engliſh Tongue; many of the ſame Books which in Latin they read at the Univerſity? And the ſmall neceſſity of going thither to learn Divinity, I prove firſt from the moſt part of themſelves, who ſeldom continue there till they have well got through Logic, thir firſt Rudiments; though, to ſay truth, Logic alſo may much better be wanting in Diſputes of Divinity, than in the ſubtile Debates of Lawyers and Stateſmen, who yet ſeldom or never deal with Syllogiſms. And thoſe Theological Diſputations there held by Profeſſors and Graduates, are ſuch as tend leaſt of all to the Edification or Capacity of the People, but rather perplex and leven pure Doctrin with ſcholaſtical Traſh, than enable any Miniſter to the better preaching of the Goſpel. Whence we may alſo compute, ſince they com to reckonings, the charges of his needful Library: which, though ſome ſhame not to value at 600 l. may be competently furniſh'd for 60 l. If any Man for his own curioſity or delight be in Books further expenſive, that is not to be reckon'd as neceſſary to his miniſterial, either Breeding or Function. But Papiſts and other Adverſaries, cannot be confuted without Fathers and Councils, immenſe Volumes, and of vaſt charges. I will ſhew them therfore a ſhorter and a better way of confutation: Tit. 1. 9. Holding faſt the faithful Word, as he hath bin taught, that he may be able by ſound Doctrin, both to exhort and to convince Gainſayers : who are confuted as ſoon as heard, bringing that which is either not in Scripture, or againſt it. To perſue them further through the obſcure and intangl'd Wood of Antiquity, Fathers and Councils fighting one againſt another, is needleſs, endleſs, not requiſite in a Miniſter, and refus'd by the firſt Reformers of our Religion. And yet we may be confident, if theſe things be thought needful, let the State but erect in publick good ſtore of Libraries, and there will not want men in the Church, who of thir own Inclinations will become able in this kind againſt Papiſts or any other Adverſary. I have thus at large examin'd the uſual Pretences of Hirelings, colour'd over moſt commonly with the cauſe of Learning and Univerſities; as if with Divines Learning ſtood and fell, wherin for the moſt part thir Pittance is ſo ſmall: and, to ſpeak freely, it were much better there were not one Divine in the Univerſity, no School-divinity known, the idle Sophiſtry of Monks, the Canker of Religion; and that they who intended to be Miniſters, were train'd up in the Church only by the Scripture, and in the Original Languages therof at School; without fetching the compaſs of other Arts and Sciences, more than what they can well learn at ſecondary leaſure, and at home. Neither ſpeak I this in contempt of Learning, or the Miniſtry, but hating the common cheats of both; hating that they who have preach'd out Biſhops, Prelats and Canoniſts, ſhould, in what ſerves thir own ends, retain thir fals Opinions, thir Phariſaical Leven, thir Avarice, and cloſely, thir Ambition, thir Pluralities, thir Nonreſidences, thir odious Fees, and uſe thir legal and Popiſh Arguments for Tithes: That Independents ſhould take that Name, as they may juſtly from the true freedom of Chriſtian Doctrin and Church-diſciplin ſubject to no ſuperior Judg but God only, and ſeek to be Dependents on the Magiſtrate for thir Maintenance; which two things, Independence and State-hire in Religion, can never conſiſt long or certainly together. For Magiſtrates at one time or other, not like theſe at preſent our Patrons of Chriſtian Liberty, will pay none but ſuch whom by thir Committies of Examination, they find conformable to thir Intereſt and Opinions: And Hirelings will ſoon frame themſelves to that Intereſt, and thoſe Opinions which they ſee beſt pleaſing to thir Paymaſters; and to ſeem right themſelves, will force others as to the truth. But moſt of all they are to be revil'd and ſham'd, who cry out with the diſtinct Voice of notorious Hirelings; that if ye ſettle not our Maintenance by Law, farewel the Goſpel; then which nothing can be utter'd more fals, more ignominious, and, I may ſay, more blaſphemous againſt our Saviour; who hath promis'd, without this Condition, both his Holy Spirit, and his own preſence with his Church to the World's end: Nothing more fals (unleſs with thir own Mouths they condemn themſelves for the unworthieſt and moſt mercenary of all other Miniſters) by the experience of 300 Years after Chriſt, and the Churches at this day in France, Auſtria, Polonia, and other places, witneſſing the contrary under an advers Magiſtrate, not a favorable; nothing more ignominious, levelling, or rather undervaluing Chriſt beneath Mahomet. For if it muſt be thus, how can any Chriſtian object it to a Turk, that his Religion ſtands by Force only; and not juſtly fear from him this Reply, yours both by Force and Money in the judgment of your own Preachers? This is that which makes Atheiſts in the Land, whom they ſo much complain of: not the want of Maintenance, or Preachers, as they allege, but the many Hirelings and Cheaters that have the Goſpel in thir hands; hands that ſtill crave, and are never ſatisfi'd. Likely Miniſters indeed, to proclaim the Faith, or to exhort our truſt in God, when they themſelves will not truſt him to provide for them in the Meſſage wheron, they ſay, he ſent them; but threaten, for want of temporal means, to deſert it; calling that want of means, which is nothing els but the want of thir own Faith; and would force us to pay the hire of building our Faith to thir covetous Incredulity. Doubtleſs, if God only be he who gives Miniſters to his Church till the World's end; and through the whole Goſpel never ſent us for Miniſters to the Schools of Philoſophy, but rather bids us beware of ſuch vain deceit, Col. 2. 8. (which the Primitive Church, after two or three Ages not remembring, brought her ſelf quickly to confuſion) if all the Faithful be now a Holy and a Royal Prieſthood, 1 Pet. 2. 5, 9. not excluded from the Diſpenſation penſation of things holieſt, after free election of the Church, and impoſition of hands, there will not want Miniſters elected out of all ſorts and orders of Men, for the Goſpel makes no difference from the Magiſtrate himſelf to the meaneſt Artificer, if God evidently favour him with Spiritual Gifts, as he can eaſily, and oft hath done, while thoſe Batchelor Divines and Doctors of the Tippet have bin paſs'd by. Heretofore in the firſt Evangelic Times, (and it were happy for Chriſtendom if it were ſo again) Miniſters of the Goſpel were by nothing els diſtinguiſh'd from other Chriſtians, but by thir ſpiritual Knowledg and Sanctity of Life, for which the Church elected them to be her Teachers and Overſeers, though not therby to ſeparate them from whatever calling ſhe then found them following beſides, as the Example of St Paul declares, and the firſt times of Chriſtianity. When once they affected to be call'd a Clergy, and became, as it were, a peculiar Tribe of Levites, a Party, a diſtinct Order in the Commonwealth, bred up for Divines in babling Schools, and fed at the Publick Coſt, good for nothing els but what was good for nothing, they ſoon grew idle: that Idleneſs, with fulneſs of Bread, begat pride and perpetual contention with thir Feeders the deſpis'd Laity, through all Ages ever ſince; to the perverting of Religion, and the diſturbance of all Chriſtendom. And we may confidently conclude, it never will be otherwiſe while they are thus upheld undepending on the Church, on which alone they anciently depended, and are by the Magiſtrate publickly maintain'd a numerous Faction of indigent Perſons, crept for the moſt part out of extream want and bad nurture, claiming by divine right and freehold the tenth of our Eſtates, to monopolize the Miniſtry as thir peculiar, which is free and open to all able Chriſtians, elected by any Church. Under this pretence exempt from all other Imployment, and inriching themſelves on the publick, they laſt of all prove common Incendiaries, and exalt thir Horns againſt the Magiſtrate himſelf that maintains them, as the Prieſt of Rome did ſoon after againſt his Benefactor the Emperor, and the Preſbyters of late in Scotland. Of which hireling Crew, together with all the Miſchiefs, Diſſentions, Troubles, Wars meerly of thir kindling, Chriſtendom might ſoon rid her ſelf and be happy, if Chriſtians would but know thir own Dignity, thir Liberty, thir Adoption, and let it not be wonder'd if I ſay, thir ſpiritual Prieſthood, wherby they have all equally acceſs to any miniſterial Function, whenever call'd by thir own Abilities, and the Church, though they never came near Commencement or Univerſity. But while Proteſtants, to avoid the due labor of underſtanding thir own Religion, are content to lodg it in the Breaſt, or rather in the Books of a Clergyman, and to take it thence by ſcraps and mammocks, as he diſpenſes it in his Sundays Dole; they will be always learning, and never knowing; always Infants; always either his Vaſſals, as Lay-papiſts are to thir Prieſts; or at odds with him, as reformed Principles give them ſom light to be not wholly conformable; whence infinit diſturbances in the State, as they do, muſt needs follow. Thus much I had to ſay; and, I ſuppoſe, what may be anough to them who are not avariciouſly bent otherwiſe, touching the likelieſt means to remove Hirelings out of the Church; then which nothing can more conduce to Truth, to Peace and all Happineſs both in Church and State. If I be not heard nor believ'd, the Event will bear me witneſs to have ſpoken Truth; and I, in the mean while, have born my Witneſs, not out of ſeaſon to the Church and to my Countrey.

A LETTER TO A FRIEND,

Concerning the Ruptures of the Commonwealth. Publiſh'd from the Manuſcript.

SIR,

UPON the ſad and ſerious Diſcourſe which we fell into laſt night, concerning theſe dangerous Ruptures of the Commonwealth, ſcarce yet in her Infancy, which cannot be without ſome inward flaw in her Bowels; I began to conſider more intenſly theron than hitherto I have bin wont, reſigning my ſelf to the Wiſdom and Care of thoſe who had the Government; and not finding that either God, or the Publick requir'd more of me, than my Prayers for them that govern. And ſince you have not only ſtir'd up my thoughts, by acquainting me with the ſtate of Affairs, more inwardly than I knew before; but alſo have deſired me to ſet down my Opinion therof, truſting to your Ingenuity, I ſhall give you freely my apprehenſion, both of our preſent Evils, and what Expedients, if God in Mercy regard us, may remove them. I will begin with telling you how I was over-joy'd, when I heard that the Army, under the working of God's holy Spirit, as I thought, and ſtill hope well, had bin ſo far wrought to Chriſtian Humility, and Self-denial, as to confeſs in publick thir backſliding from the good Old Cauſe, and to ſhew the fruits of thir Repentance, in the righteouſneſs of thir reſtoring the old famous Parliament, which they had without juſt Authority diſſolved: I call it the famous Parliament, tho not the harmles, ſince none well-affected, but will confes, they have deſerved much more of theſe Nations, than they have undeſerved. And I perſwade me, that God was pleas'd with thir Reſtitution, ſigning it, as he did, with ſuch a ſignal Victory, when ſo great a part of the Nation were deſperately conſpir'd to call back again thir Egytian Bondage. So much the more it now amazes me, that they, whoſe Lips were yet ſcarce clos'd from giving Thanks for that great Deliverance, ſhould be now relapſing, and ſo ſoon again backſliding into the ſame fault, which they confeſt ſo lately, and ſo ſolemnly to God and the World, and more lately puniſh'd in thoſe Cheſhire Rebels; that they ſhould now diſſolve that Parliament, which they themſelves re-eſtabliſh'd, and acknowledg'd for thir Supreme Power in thir other days humble Repreſentation: and all this, for no apparent cauſe of publick Concernment to the Church or Commonwealth, but only for diſcommiſſioning nine great Officers in the Army; which had not bin don, as is reported, but upon notice of thir Intentions againſt the Parliament. I preſume not to give my Cenſure on this Action, not knowing, as yet I do not, the bottom of it. I ſpeak only what it appears to us without doors, till better cauſe be declar'd, and I am ſure to all other Nations moſt illegal and ſcandalous, I fear me barbarous, or rather ſcarce to be exampl'd among any Barbarians, that a paid Army ſhould, for no other cauſe, thus ſubdue the Supream Power that ſet them up. This, I ſay, other Nations will judg to the ſad diſhonour of that Army, lately ſo renown'd for the civileſt and beſt order'd in the World, and by us here at home, for the moſt conſcientious. Certainly, if the great Officers and Souldiers of the Holland, French or Venetian Forces, ſhould thus ſit in Council, and write from Gariſon to Gariſon againſt their Superiors, they might as eaſily reduce the King of France, or Duke of Venice, and put the United Provinces in like Diſorder and Confuſion. Why do they not, being moſt of them held ignorant of true Religion? becauſe the Light of Nature, the Laws of Human Society, the Reverence of their Magiſtrates, Covenants, Engagements, Loyalty, Allegiance, keeps them in awe. How grievous will it then be? how infamous to the true Religion which we profeſs? how diſhonorable to the Name of God, that his Fear and the power of his Knowledg in an Army profeſſing to be his, ſhould not work that Obedience, that Fidelity to thir Supream Magiſtrates, that levied them, and paid them, when the Light of Nature, the Laws of Human Society, Covenants, and Contracts, yea common Shame works in other Armies, amongſt the worſt of them? Which will undoubtedly pull down the heavy Judgment of God among us, who cannot but avenge theſe Hypocriſies, Violations of Truth and Holines; if they be indeed ſo as they yet ſeem. For, neither do I ſpeak this in reproach to the Army, but as jealous of thir Honour, inciting them to manifeſt and publiſh, with all ſpeed, ſome better cauſe of theſe thir late Actions, than hath hitherto appear'd, and to find out the Achan amongſt them, whoſe cloſe Ambition in all likelihood abuſes thir honeſt Natures againſt thir meaning to theſe Diſorders; thir readieſt way to bring in again the common Enemy, and with him the Deſtruction of true Religion, and civil Liberty. But, becauſe our Evils are now grown more dangerous and extream, than to be remedi'd by Complaints, it concerns us now to find out what Remedies may be likelieſt to ſave us from approaching Ruin. Being now in Anarchy, without a counſelling and governing Power; and the Army, I ſuppoſe, finding themſelves inſufficient to diſcharge at once both Military and Civil Affairs, the firſt thing to be found out with all ſpeed, without which no Commonwealth can ſubſiſt, muſt be a Senate, or General Council of State, in whom muſt be the Power, firſt, to preſerve the publick Peace, next the Commerce with Foreign Nations; and laſtly, to raiſe Monies for the Management of theſe Affairs: this muſt either be the Parliament readmitted to ſit, or a Council of State allow'd of by the Army, ſince they only now have the Power. The Terms to be ſtood on are, Liberty of Conſcience to all profeſſing Scripture to be the Rule of thir Faith and Worſhip; and the Abjuration of a ſingle Perſon. If the Parliament be again thought on, to ſalve Honour on both ſides, the well-affected Party of the City, and the congregated Churches, may be induced to mediate by publick Addreſſes, and brotherly beſeechings, which, if there be that Saintſhip among us which is talk'd of, ought to be of higheſt and undeniable Perſwaſion to Reconcilement. If the Parliament be thought well diſſolv'd, as not complying fully to grant Liberty of Conſcience, and the neceſſary Conſequence therof, the removal of a forc'd Maintenance from Miniſters, then muſt the Army forthwith chooſe a Council of State, wherof as many to be of the Parliament, as are undoubtedly affected to theſe two Conditions propos'd. That which I conceive only able to cement, and unite for ever the Army, either to the Parliament recall'd, or this choſen Council, muſt be a mutual League and Oath, private or publick, not to deſert one another till Death: That is to ſay, that the Army be kept up, and all theſe Officers in thir places during Life, and ſo likewiſe the Parliament, or Counſellors of State; which will be no way unjuſt, conſidering thir known Merits on either ſide, in Councel or in Field, unleſs any be found falſe to any of theſe two Principles, or otherwiſe perſonally criminous in the Judgment of both Parties. If ſuch a Union as this be not accepted on the Army's part, be confident there is a ſingle Perſon underneath. That the Army be upheld, the neceſſity of our Affairs and Factions will conſtrain long enough perhaps, to content the longeſt Liver in the Army. And whether the Civil Government be an annual Democracy, or a perpetual Ariſtocracy, is not to me a Conſideration for the Extremities wherin we are, and the hazard of our Safety from our common Enemy, gaping at preſent to devour us. That it be not an Oligarchy, or the Faction of a few, may be eaſily prevented by the Numbers of thir own chooſing, who may be found infallibly conſtant to thoſe two Conditions forenam'd, full Liberty of Conſcience, and the Abjuration of Monarchy propos'd: and the well-order'd Committies of thir faithfulleſt Adherents in every County may give this Government the reſemblance and effects of a perfect Democracy. As for the Reformation of Laws, and the places of Judicature, whether to be here, as at preſent, or in every County, as hath bin long aim'd at, and many ſuch Propoſals, tending no doubt to publick good, they may be conſider'd in due time when we are paſt theſe pernicious Pangs, in a hopeful way of Health, and firm Conſtitution. But unleſs theſe things, which I have above propos'd, one way or other, be once ſettl'd, in my fear, which God avert, we inſtantly ruin; or at beſt become the Servants of one or other ſingle Perſon, the ſecret Author and Fomenter of theſe Diſturbances. You have the ſum of my preſent Thoughts, as much as I underſtand of theſe Affairs freely imparted, at your requeſt, and the Perſwaſion you wrought in me, that I might chance herby to be ſome way ſerviceable to the Commonwealth, in a time when all ought to be endeavouring what good they can, whether much, or but little. With this you may do what you pleaſe, put out, put in, communicate or ſuppreſs: you offend not me, who only have obey'd your Opinion, that in doing what I have don, I might happen to offer ſomthing which might be of ſom uſe in this great time of need. However, I have not bin wanting to the opportunity which you preſented before me, of ſhewing the readines which I have in the midſt of my Unfitnes, to what ever may be requir'd of me, as a publick Duty.

of Conscience, and the Abjuration of Monarchy propos'd; and the well-order'd Committees of their Forces in every County [illegible] this Government the [illegible] for the Reformation of Laws, and the [illegible] whether to be here, as at present, or in every County, as hath bin long since [illegible], and many other Proposals, tending no doubt to publick good, they may be considered in due time when we are [illegible] in a peaceful way of Health, and free Conscience. But unless these things, which I have above propos'd, one way or other, be once settl'd, in my fear, which God avert, we instantly ruine; or at best become the Servants of one or other single Person, the secret Author and Fomenter of these Disturbances.

You have the sum of my present Thoughts, as much as I understand of these Affairs freely imparted; at your request, and the perswasion you wrought in me, that I might chance hereby to be some way serviceable to the Commonwealth, in a time when all ought to be endeavouring what good they can, whether much, or but little. With this you may do what you please, put out, put in, communicate or suppress: you offend not me, who only have obey'd your Opinion, that in doing what I have done, I might happen to offer something which might be of some use in this great time of need. However, I have not bin wanting to the opportunity which you presented before me, of shewing the readiness which I have in the midst of my Unfitness, to what ever may be required of me, as a publick Duty.

ALthough ſince the writing of this Treatiſe, the face of things hath had ſom change, Writs for new Elections have bin recall'd, and the Members at firſt choſen, readmitted from excluſion; yet not a little rejoicing to hear declar'd the Reſolution of thoſe who are in Power, tending to the eſtabliſhment of a Free Commonwealth, and to remove, if it be poſſible, this noxious humor of returning to Bondage, inſtill'd of late by ſom Deceivers, and nouriſh'd from bad Principles and fals Apprehenſions among too many of the People, I thought beſt not to ſuppreſs what I had written, hoping that it may now be of much more uſe and concernment to be freely publiſh'd, in the midſt of our Elections to a Free Parlament, or thir ſitting to conſider freely of the Government; whom it behoves to have all things repreſented to them that may direct thir Judgment therin; and I never read of any State, ſcarce of any Tyrant grown ſo incurable, as to refuſe Counſel from any in a time of publick Deliberation, much leſs to be offended. If thir abſolute Determination be to enthral us, before ſo long a Lent of Servitude, they may permit us a little Shroving-time firſt, wherin to ſpeak freely, and take our leaves of Liberty. And becauſe in the former Edition, through haſte, many Faults eſcap'd, and many Books were ſuddenly diſpers'd, ere the Note to mend them could be ſent, I took the opportunity from this occaſion to reviſe and ſomwhat to enlarge the whole Diſcourſe, eſpecially that part which argues for a perpetual Senate. The Treatiſe thus reviſ'd and enlarg'd, is as follows.

The Parlament of England, aſſiſted by a great number of the People who appear'd and ſtuck to them faithfulleſt in defence of Religion and thir Civil Liberties, judging Kingſhip by long experience a Government unneceſſary, burdenſom and dangerous, juſtly and magnanimouſly aboliſh'd it, turning regal Bondage into a free Commonwealth, to the Admiration and Terrour of our emulous Neighbours. They took themſelves not bound by the Light of Nature or Religion to any former Covnant, from which the King himſelf, by many Forfeitures of a latter date or diſcovery, and our own longer conſideration theron, had more and more unbound us, both to himſelf and his poſterity; as hath been ever the Juſtice and the Prudence of all wiſe Nations that have ejected Tyranny. They covnanted to preſerve the King's Perſon and Authority, in the preſervation of the true Religion, and our Liberties; not in his endeavouring to bring in upon our Conſciences, a Popiſh Religion; upon our Liberties, Thraldom; upon our Lives, Deſtruction, by his occaſioning, if not complotting, as was after diſcovered, the Iriſh Maſſacre; his fomenting and arming the Rebellion; his covert leaguing with the Rebels againſt us; his refuſing, more than ſeven times, Propoſitions moſt juſt and neceſſary to the true Religion and our Liberties, tender'd him by the Parlament both of England and Scotland. They made not thir Covnant concerning him with no difference between a King and a God; or promis'd him, as Job did to the Almighty, to truſt in him though he ſlay us: They underſtood that the ſolemn Ingagement, wherin we all forſwore Kingſhip, was no more a breach of the Covnant, than the Covnant was of the Proteſtation before, but a faithful and prudent going on both in words well weigh'd, and in the true ſenſe of the Covnant, without reſpect of Perſons, when we could not ſerve two contrary Maſters, God and the King, or the King and that more ſupreme Law, ſworn in the firſt place to maintain, our Safety and our Liberty. They knew the People of England to be a free People, themſelves the Repreſenters of that Freedom; and although many were excluded, and as many fled (ſo they pretended) from Tumults to Oxford, yet they were left a ſufficient Number to act in Parlament, therfore not bound by any Statute of preceding Parlaments, but by the Law of Nature only, which is the only Law of Laws truly and properly to all Mankind fundamental; the beginning and the end of all Government; to which no Parlament or People that will throughly reform, but may and muſt have recourſe, as they had, and muſt yet have, in Church-Reformation (if they throughly intend it) to Evangelic Rules; not to Eccleſiaſtical Canons, though never ſo ancient, ſo ratifi'd and eſtabliſh'd in the Land by Statutes, which for the moſt part are meer poſitive Laws, neither natural nor moral; and ſo by any Parlament, for juſt and ſerious Conſiderations, without ſcruple to be at any time repeal'd. If others of thir Number in theſe things were under Force, they were not, but under free Conſcience; if others were excluded by a Power which they could not reſiſt, they were not therfore to leave the Helm of Government in no hands, to diſcontinue thir care of the Public Peace and Safety, to deſert the People in Anarchy and Confuſion, no more than when ſo many of thir Members left them, as made up in outward Formality a more legal Parlament of three Eſtates againſt them. The beſt affected alſo, and beſt principl'd of the People, ſtood not numbring or computing, on which ſide were moſt Voices in Parlament, but on which ſide appear'd to them moſt Reaſon, moſt Safety, when the Houſe divided upon main Matters: What was well motion'd and adviſ'd, they examin'd not whether Fear or Perſwaſion carried it in the Vote, neither did they meaſure Votes and Counſels by the Intentions of them that voted; knowing that Intentions either are but gueſs'd at, or not ſoon anough known; and although good, can neither make the Deed ſuch, nor prevent the Conſequence from being bad: Suppoſe bad Intentions in things otherwiſe well don; what was well don, was by them who ſo thought, not the leſs obey'd or follow'd in the State; ſince in the Church, who had not rather follow Iſcariot or Simon the Magician, though to covetous Ends, preaching, than Saul, though in the uprightneſs of his Heart perſecuting the Goſpel? Safer they therfore judg'd what they thought the better Counſels, though carried on by ſome perhaps to bad Ends, then the wors by others, though endeavor'd with beſt Intentions: and yet they were not to learn that a greater Number might be corrupt within the Walls of a Parlament, as well as of a City; wherof in Matters of neareſt concernment all Men will be judges; nor eaſily permit, that the Odds of Voices in thir greateſt Council, ſhall more endanger them by corrupt or credulous Votes, than the Odds of Enemies by open Aſſaults; judging that moſt Voices ought not always to prevail where main Matters are in queſtion. If others hence will pretend to diſturb all Counſels; what is that to them who pretend not, but are in real danger; not they only ſo judging, but a great, tho not the greateſt Number of thir choſen Patriots, who might be more in Weight than the others in Number; there being in Number little Vertue, but by Weight and Meaſure Wiſdom working all things: and the Dangers on either ſide they ſeriouſly thus weigh'd: From the Treaty, ſhort Fruits of long Labours, and 7 years War; Security for 20 Years, if we can hold it; Reformation in the Church for three Years: then put to ſhift again with our vanquiſh'd Maſter. His Juſtice, his Honour, his Conſcience declar'd quite contrary to ours; which would have furniſh'd him with many ſuch Evaſions, as in a Book entitl'd, An Inquiſition for Blood, ſoon after were not conceal'd: Biſhops not totally remov'd, but left, as it were, in Ambuſh, a Reſerve, with Ordination in thir ſole Power; thir Lands already ſold, not to be alienated, but rented, and the ſale of them call'd Sacrilege; Delinquents, few of many brought to condign Puniſhment; Acceſſories puniſh'd; the chief Author, above Pardon, though after utmoſt Reſiſtance, vanquiſh'd; not to give, but to receive Laws; yet beſought, treated with, and to be thank'd for his gracious Conceſſions, to be honour'd, worſhip'd, glorifi'd. If this we ſwore to do, with what Righteouſneſs in the ſight of God, with what Aſſurance that we bring not by ſuch an Oath, the whole Sea of Blood-guiltineſs upon our own Heads? If on the other ſide we prefer a Free Government, though for the preſent not obtain'd, yet all thoſe ſuggeſted Fears and Difficulties, as the Event will prove, eaſily overcome, we remain finally ſecure from the exaſperated Regal Power, and out of Snares; ſhall retain the beſt part of our Liberty, which is our Religion, and the civil part will be from theſe who defer us, much more eaſily recover'd, being neither ſo ſuttle nor ſo awful as a King reinthron'd. Nor were thir Actions leſs both at home and abroad, than might become the hopes of a glorious riſing Commonwealth: Nor were the Expreſſions both of Army and People, whether in thir publick Declarations, or ſeveral Writings other than ſuch as teſtifi'd a Spirit in this Nation, no leſs noble and well fitted to the Liberty of a Commonwealth, than in the ancient Greeks or Romans. Nor was the heroic Cauſe unſucceſfully defended to all Chriſtendom, againſt the Tongue of a famous and thought invincible Adverſary; nor the Conſtancy and Fortitude that ſo nobly vindicated our Liberty, our Victory at once againſt two the moſt prevailing Uſurpers over Mankind, Superſtition and Tyranny unprais'd or uncelebrated in a written Monument, likely to outlive Detraction, as it hath hitherto convinc'd or ſilenc'd not a few of our Detractors, eſpecially in parts abroad. After our Liberty and Religion thus proſperouſly fought for, gain'd, and many Years poſſeſs'd, except in thoſe unhappy Interruptions, which God hath remov'd; now that nothing remains, but in all reaſon the certain hopes of a ſpeedy and immediat Settlement for ever in a firm and free Commonwealth, for this extoll'd and magnifi'd Nation, regardleſs both of Honour won, or Deliverances voutſaf't from Heaven, to fall back, or rather to creep back ſo poorly, as it ſeems the multitude would, to thir once abjur'd and deteſted Thraldom of Kingſhip, to be our ſelves the ſlanderers of our own juſt and religious Deeds, though don by ſom to covetous and ambitious Ends, yet not therfore to be ſtain'd with thir Infamy, or they to aſperſe the Integrity of others; and yet theſe now by revolting from the Conſcience of Deeds well done, both in Church and State, to throw away and forſake, or rather to betray a juſt and noble Cauſe for the mixture of bad Men who have ill manag'd and abus'd it, (which had our Fathers done heretofore, and on the ſame pretence deſerted true Religion, what had long ere this become of our Goſpel, and all Proteſtant Reformation ſo much intermixt with the Avarice and Ambition of ſom Reformers?) and by thus relapſing, to verify all the bitter Predictions of our triumphing Enemies, who will now think they wiſely diſcern'd and juſtly cenſur'd both us and all our Actions as raſh, rebellious, hypocritical and impious, not only argues a ſtrange degenerate Contagion ſuddenly ſpread among us, fitted and prepar'd for new Slavery, but will render us a Scorn and Deriſion to all our Neighbours. And what will they at beſt ſay of us, and of the whole Engliſh Name, but ſcoffingly, as of that fooliſh Builder mention'd by our Saviour, who began to build a Tower, and was not able to finiſh it? Where is this goodly Tower of a Commonwealth, which the Engliſh boaſted they would build to overſhadow Kings, and be another Rome in the Weſt? The Foundation indeed they laid gallantly, but fell into a wors Confuſion, not of Tongues, but of Factions, than thoſe at the Tower of Babel; and have left no Memorial of thir Work behind them remaining, but in the common Laughter of Europe. Which muſt needs redound the more to our ſhame, if we but look on our Neighbours the United Provinces, to us inferior in all outward Advantages; who notwithſtanding, in the midſt of greater Difficulties, couragiouſly, wiſely, conſtantly went through with the ſame Work, and are ſettl'd in all the happy enjoyments of a potent and flouriſhing Republic to this day.

Beſides this, if we return to Kingſhip, and ſoon repent, as undoubtedly we ſhall, when we begin to find the old encroachments coming on by little and little upon our Conſciences, which muſt neceſſarily proceed from King and Biſhop united inſeparably in one Intereſt, we may be forc'd perhaps to fight over again all that we have fought, and ſpend over again all that we have ſpent, but are never like to attain thus far as we are now advanc'd to the recovery of our Freedom, never to have it in poſſeſſion as we now have it, never to be vouchſaft hereafter the like Mercies and ſignal Aſſiſtances from Heaven in our Cauſe; if by our ingrateful backſliding we make theſe fruitleſs, flying now to regal Conceſſions from his divine condeſcenſions, and gracious anſwers to our once importuning Prayers againſt the Tyranny which we then groan'd under; making vain and viler than dirt, the Blood of ſo many thouſand faithful and valiant Engliſh men, who left us in this Liberty, bought with thir Lives; loſing by a ſtrange after-game of Folly, all the battels we have won, together with all Scotland as to our Conqueſt, hereby loſt, which never any of our Kings could conquer, all the Treaſure we have ſpent, not that corruptible Treaſure only, but that far more precious of all our late miraculous Deliverances; treading back again with loſt labour, all our happy ſteps in the progreſs of Reformation, and moſt pitifully depriving our ſelves the inſtant fruition of that free Government which we have ſo dearly purchas'd, a free Commonwealth, not only held by wiſeſt men in all Ages the nobleſt, the manlieſt, the equalleſt, the juſteſt Government, the moſt agreeable to all due Liberty and proportion'd Equality, both Human, Civil, and Chriſtian, moſt cheriſhing to Vertue and true Religion, but alſo (I may ſay it with greateſt probability) plainly commended, or rather enjoin'd by our Saviour himſelf, to all Chriſtians, not without remarkable diſallowance, and the brand of Gentiliſm upon Kingſhip. God in much diſpleaſure gave a King to the Iſraelites, and imputed it a ſin to them that they ſought one: but Chriſt apparently forbids his Diſciples to admit of any ſuch heatheniſh Government; The Kings of the Gentiles, ſaith he, exerciſe Lordſhip over them; and they that exerciſe Authority upon them are call'd Benefactors: but ye ſhall not be ſo; but he that is greateſt among you, let him be as the younger; and he that is chief, as he that ſerveth. The occaſion of theſe his words was the ambitious deſire of Zebede's two Sons, to be exalted above thir Brethren in his Kingdom, which they thought was to be ere long upon Earth. That he ſpeaks of Civil Government, is manifeſt by the former part of the Compariſon, which infers the other part to be always in the ſame kind. And what Government comes nearer to this precept of Chriſt, than a free Commonwealth; wherin they who are greateſt, are perpetual Servants and drudges to the public at thir own coſt and charges, neglect thir own Affairs, yet are not elevated above thir Brethren; live ſoberly in thir Families, walk the Streets as other men, may be ſpoken to freely, familiarly, friendly, without Adoration? Wheras a King muſt be ador'd like a Demigod, with a diſſolute and haughty Court about him, of vaſt expence and Luxury, Masks and Revels, to the debauching of our prime Gentry both Male and Female; not in thir paſtimes only, but in earneſt, by the loos imployments of Court-ſervice, which will be then thought honorable. There will be a Queen of no leſs charge; in moſt likelihood Outlandiſh and a Papiſt, beſides a Queen-mother ſuch already; together with both thir Courts and numerous Train: then a Royal iſſue, and ere long ſeverally thir ſumptuous Courts; to the multiplying of a ſervil Crew, not of Servants only, but of Nobility and Gentry, bred up then to the hopes not of Publick, but of Court-Offices, to be Stewards, Chamberlains, Uſhers, Grooms, even of the Cloſe-ſtool; and the lower thir Minds debas'd with Court-opinions, contrary to all Vertue and Reformation, the haughtier will be thir Pride and Profuſeneſs. We may well remember this not long ſince at home; or need but look at preſent into the French Court, where Enticements and Preferments daily draw away and pervert the Proteſtant Nobility. As to the burden of expence, to our coſt we ſhall ſoon know it; for any good to us deſerving to be term'd no better than the vaſt and laviſh price of our ſubjection, and thir Debauchery, which we are now ſo greedily cheapning, and would ſo fain be paying moſt inconſideratly to a ſingle Perſon; who for any thing wherin the public really needs him, will have little els to do, but to beſtow the eating and drinking of exceſſive Dainties, to ſet a pompous face upon the ſuperficial actings of State, to pageant himſelf up and down in Progreſs among the perpetual bowing and cringings of an abject People, on either ſide deifying and adoring him for nothing done that can deſerve it. For what can he more than another man? who even in the expreſſion of a late Court-poet, ſits only like a great Cypher ſet to no purpoſe before a long row of other ſignificant Figures. Nay, it is well and happy for the People if thir King be but a Cypher, being oft times a Miſchief, a Peſt, a ſcourge of the Nation, and which is wors, not to be remov'd, not to be controul'd, much leſs accus'd or brought to puniſhment, without the danger of a common ruin, without the ſhaking and almoſt ſubverſion of the whole Land: wheras in a free Commonwealth, any Governor or chief Counſelor offending, may be remov'd and puniſh'd without the leaſt Commotion. Certainly then that People muſt needs be mad or ſtrangely infatuated, that build the chief hope of thir common happineſs or ſafety on a ſingle Perſon; who if he happen to be good, can do no more than another man; if to be bad, hath in his hands to do more evil without check, then millions of other men. The happineſs of a Nation muſt needs be firmeſt and certaineſt in a full and free Council of thir own electing, where no ſingle Perſon, but Reaſon only ſways. And what madneſs is it for them who might manage nobly thir own Affairs themſelves, ſluggiſhly and weakly to devolve all on a ſingle Perſon; and more like Boys under Age than Men, to commit all to his patronage and diſpoſal, who neither can perform what he undertakes, and yet for undertaking it, though royally paid, will not be thir Servant, but thir Lord? How unmanly muſt it needs be, to count ſuch a one the breath of our Noſtrils, to hang all our felicity on him, all our ſafety, our well-being, for which if we were aught els but Sluggards or Babies, we need depend on none but God and our own Counſels, our own active Vertue and Induſtry. Go to the Ant, thou ſluggard, ſaith Solomon; conſider her ways, and be wiſe; which having no Prince, Ruler, or Lord, provides her Meat in the Summer, and gathers her food in the Harveſt: which evidently ſhews us, that they who think the Nation undon without a King, though they look grave or haughty, have not ſo much true Spirit and Underſtanding in them as a Piſmire: neither are theſe diligent Creatures hence concluded to live in lawleſs anarchy, or that commended, but are ſet the examples to imprudent and ungovern'd men, of a frugal and ſelf-governing Democraty or Commonwealth; ſafer and more thriving in the joint Providence and Counſel of many induſtrious equals, than under the ſingle domination of one imperious Lord. It may be well wonder'd that any Nation ſtiling themſelves free, can ſuffer any man to pretend Hereditary right over them as thir Lord; when as by acknowledging that Right, they conclude themſelves his Servants and his Vaſſals, and ſo renounce thir own freedom. Which how a People and thir Leaders eſpecially can do, who have fought ſo gloriouſly for Liberty; how they can change thir noble Words and Actions, heretofore ſo becoming the majeſty of a free People, into the baſe neceſſity of Court-flatteries and Proſtrations, is not only ſtrange and admirable, but lamentable to think on. That a Nation ſhould be ſo valorous and courageous to win thir Liberty in the Field, and when they have won it, ſhould be ſo heartleſs and unwiſe in thir Councils, as not to know how to uſe it, value it, what to do with it, or with themſelves; but after ten or twelve years proſperous War and conteſtation with Tyranny, baſely and beſottedly to run thir Necks again into the Yoke which they have broken, and proſtrate all the fruits of thir Victory for naught at the feet of the vanquiſh'd, beſides our loſs of Glory, and ſuch an example as Kings or Tyrants never yet had the like to boaſt of, will be an ignominy if it befal us, that never yet befel any Nation poſſeſs'd of thir Liberty; worthy indeed themſelves, whatſoever they be, to be for ever ſlaves; but that part of the Nation which conſents not with them, as I perſwade me, of a great number, far worthier than by their means to be brought into the ſame Bondage. Conſidering theſe things ſo plain, ſo rational, I cannot but yet furder admire on the other ſide, how any man who hath the true principles of Juſtice and Religion in him, can preſume or take upon him to be a King and Lord over his Brethren, whom he cannot but know whether as Men or Chriſtians, to be for the moſt part every way equal or ſuperior to himſelf: how he can diſplay with ſuch Vanity and Oſtentation his regal ſplendor ſo ſupereminently above other Mortal men; or being a Chriſtian, can aſſume ſuch extraordinary Honour and Worſhip to himſelf, while the Kingdom of Chriſt our common King and Lord, is hid to this World, and ſuch gentiliſh imitation forbid in expreſs words by himſelf to all his Diſciples. All Proteſtants hold that Chriſt in his Church hath left no Vicegerent of his Power; but himſelf without Deputy, is the only Head therof, governing it from Heaven: how then can any Chriſtian man derive his Kingſhip from Chriſt, but with wors uſurpation than the Pope his headſhip over the Church, ſince Chriſt not only hath not left the leaſt ſhadow of a command for any ſuch Vicegerence from him in the State, as the Pope pretends for his in the Church, but hath expreſly declar'd, that ſuch regal Dominion is from the Gentiles, not from him, and hath ſtrictly charg'd us not to imitate them therin?

I doubt not but all ingenuous and knowing men will eaſily agree with me, that a free Commonwealth without ſingle Perſon, or Houſe of Lords, is by far the beſt Government if it can be had; but we have all this while, ſay they, bin expecting it, and cannot yet attain it. 'Tis true indeed, when Monarchy was diſſolv'd, the form of a Commonwealth ſhould have forthwith bin fram'd, and the practice therof immediatly begun; that the People might have ſoon bin ſatisfi'd and delighted with the decent Order, Eaſe, and Benefit therof: we had bin then by this time firmly rooted paſt fear of Commotions or Mutations, and now flouriſhing: this care of timely ſetling a new Government inſtead of the old, too much neglected, hath bin our miſchief. Yet the cauſe therof may be aſcrib'd with moſt reaſon to the frequent diſturbances, interruptions, and diſſolutions which the Parlament hath had, partly from the impatient or diſaffected People, partly from ſom ambitious Leaders in the Army; much contrary, I believe, to the mind and approbation of the Army it ſelf and thir other Commanders, once undeceiv'd, or in thir own Power. Now is the opportunity, now the very ſeaſon wherin we may obtain a free Commonwealth, and eſtabliſh it for ever in the Land, without difficulty or much delay. Writs are ſent out for Elections, and which is worth obſerving in the name, not of any King, but of the keepers of our Liberty, to ſummon a free Parlament; which then only will indeed be free, and deſerve the true honour of that ſupream Title, if they preſerve us a free People. Which never Parlament was more free to do; being now call'd, not as heretofore, by the ſummons of a King, but by the voice of Liberty: and if the People, laying aſide prejudice and impatience, will ſeriouſly and calmly now conſider thir own good, both Religious and Civil, thir own Liberty and the only means therof, as ſhall be here laid down before them, and will elect thir Knights and Burgeſſes able men, and according to the juſt and neceſſary Qualifications (which for aught I hear, remain yet in force unrepeal'd, as they were formerly decreed in Parlament) men not addicted to a ſingle Perſon or Houſe of Lords, the work is don; at leaſt the foundation firmly laid of a free Commonwealth, and good part alſo erected of the main Structure. For the ground and baſis of every juſt and free Government (ſince men have ſmarted ſo oft for commiting all to one Perſon) is a general Council of ableſt men, choſen by the People to conſult of publick Affairs from time to time for the common good. In this Grand Council muſt the Sovranty, not transferr'd, but delegated only, and as it were depoſited, reſide; with this Caution they muſt have the forces by Sea and Land committed to them for preſervation of the common Peace and Liberty; muſt raiſe and manage the publick Revenue, at leaſt with ſom Inſpectors deputed for ſatisfaction of the People, how it is imploid; muſt make or propoſe, as more expreſly ſhall be ſaid anon, Civil Laws, treat of Commerce, Peace, or War with forein Nations, and for the carrying on ſom particular Affairs with more ſecrecy and Expedition, muſt elect, as they have already out of thir own number and others, a Council of State.

And although it may ſeem ſtrange at firſt hearing, by reaſon that mens minds are prepoſſeſſed with the notion of ſucceſſive Parlaments, I affirm that the Grand or General Council being well choſen, ſhould be perpetual: for ſo thir buſineſs is or may be, and oft-times urgent; the opportunity of Affairs gain'd or loſt in a moment. The day of Council cannot be ſet as the day of a Feſtival; but muſt be ready always to prevent or anſwer all occaſions. By this continuance they will become every way skilfulleſt, beſt provided of Intelligence from abroad, beſt acquainted with the People at home, and the People with them. The Ship of the Commonwealth is always under ſail; they ſit at the Stern, and if they ſteer well, what need is ther to change them, it being rather dangerous? Add to this, that the Grand Council is both Foundation and main Pillar of the whole State; and to move Pillars and Foundations, not faulty, cannot be ſafe for the Building. I ſee not therfore, how we can be advantag'd by ſucceſſive and tranſitory Parlaments; but that they are much likelier continually to unſettle rather than to ſettle a free Government, to breed Commotions, Changes, Novelties and Uncertainties, to bring neglect upon preſent Affairs and Opportunities, while all Minds are ſuſpenſe with expectation of a new Aſſembly, and the Aſſembly for a good ſpace taken up with the new ſetling of it ſelf. After which, if they find no great work to do, they will make it, by altering or repealing former Acts, or making and multiplying new; that they may ſeem to ſee what thir Predeceſſors ſaw not, and not to have aſſembl'd for nothing: till all Law be loſt in the multitude of claſhing Statutes. But if the Ambition of ſuch as think themſelves injur'd that they alſo partake not of the Government, and are impatient till they be choſen, cannot brook the perpetuity of others choſen before them; or if it be fear'd that long continuance of Power may corrupt ſincereſt Men, the known Expedient is, and by ſom lately propounded, that annually (or if the ſpace be longer, ſo much perhaps the better) the third part of Senators may go out according to the precedence of thir Election, and the like number be choſen in thir places, to prevent the ſetling of too abſolute a Power, if it ſhould be perpetual: and this they call partial Rotation. But I could wiſh that this wheel or partial wheel in State, if it be poſſible, might be avoided, as having too much affinity with the wheel of Fortune. For it appears not how this can be don, without danger and miſchance of putting out a great number of the beſt and ableſt: in whoſe ſtead new Elections may bring in as many raw, unexperienc'd and otherwiſe affected, to the weakning and much altering for the wors of publick Tranſactions. Neither do I think a perpetual Senat, eſpecially choſen and entruſted by the People, much in this land to be fear'd, where the well-affected either in a ſtanding Army, or in a ſetled Militia have thir Arms in thir own hands. Safeſt therfore to me it ſeems, and of leaſt hazard or interruption to Affairs, that none of the Grand Council be mov'd, unleſs by Death or juſt conviction of ſom Crime: for what can be expected firm or ſtedfaſt from a floating Foundation? however, I forejudg not any probable Expedient, any Temperament that can be found in things of this nature ſo diſputable on either ſide. Yet leſt this which I affirm, be thought my ſingle Opinion, I ſhall add ſufficient Teſtimony. Kingſhip it ſelf is therfore counted the more ſafe and durable, becauſe the King, and for the moſt part his Council, is not chang'd during Life: but a Commonwealth is held immortal, and therin firmeſt, ſafeſt and moſt above Fortune: for the Death of a King cauſeth oft-times many dangerous Alterations; but the Death now and then of a Senator is not felt, the main body of them ſtill continuing permanent in greateſt and nobleſt Commonwealths, and as it were eternal. Therfore among the Jews, the ſupreme Council of Seventy, call'd the Sanhedrim, founded by Moſes, in Athens that of Areopagus, in Sparta that of the Ancients, in Rome the Senat, conſiſted of Members choſen for term of Life; and by that means remain'd as it were ſtill the ſame to Gnerations. In Venice they change indeed ofter than every year ſom particular Council of State, as that of ſix, or ſuch other; but the true Senat, which upholds and ſuſtains the Government, is the whole Ariſtocracy immovable. So in the United Provinces, the States General, which are indeed but a Council of State deputed by the whole Union, are not uſually the ſame Perſons for above three or ſix Years; but the States of every City in whom the Soveraignty hath bin plac'd time out of mind, are a ſtanding Senat, without out Succeſſion, and accounted chiefly in that regard the main prop of thir Liberty. And why they ſhould be ſo in every well-order'd Commonwealth, they who write of Policy, give theſe Reaſons; “ That to make the Senat “ ſucceſſive, not only impairs the dignity and luſtre of the Senat, but weakens the whole Commonwealth, and brings it into manifeſt danger; while “ by this means the Secrets of State are frequently divulg'd, and matters of “ greateſt conſequence committed to inexpert and novice Counſellors, utterly to ſeek in the full and intimate knowledg of Affairs paſt. I know not therfore what ſhould be peculiar in England to make ſucceſſive Parlaments thought ſafeſt, or convenient here more than in other Nations, unleſs it be the fickl'neſs which is attributed to us as we are Ilanders: but good Education and acquiſit Wiſdom ought to correct the fluxible fault, if any ſuch be, of our watry ſituation. It will be objected, that in thoſe places where they had perpetual Senats, they had alſo popular Remedies againſt thir growing too imperious: as in Athens, beſides Areopagus, another Senat of four or five hundred; in Sparta, the Ephori; in Rome, the Tribunes of the People. But the Event tels us, that theſe Remedies either little avail the People, or brought them to ſuch a licentious and unbridl'd Democraty, as in fine ruin'd themſelves with thir own exceſſive power. So that the main reaſon urg'd why popular Aſſemblies are to be truſted with the Peoples Liberty, rather than a Senat of principal Men, becauſe great Men will be ſtill endeavouring to inlarge thir Power, but the common ſort will be contented to maintain thir own Liberty, is by Experience found falſe; none being more immoderat and ambitious to amplify thir Power, than ſuch Popularities, which were ſeen in the People of Rome; who at firſt contented to have thir Tribunes, at length contended with the Senat that one Conſul, then both, ſoon after, that the Cenſors and Prætors alſo ſhould be created Plebeian, and the whole Empire put into thir hands; adoring laſtly thoſe, who moſt were advers to the Senat, till Marius by fulfilling thir inordinate Deſires, quite loſt them all the Power for which they had ſo long bin ſtriving, and left them under the Tyranny of Sylla: the ballance therfore muſt be exactly ſo ſet, as to preſerve and keep up due Autority on either ſide, as well in the Senat as in the People. And this annual Rotation of a Senat to conſiſt of three hundred, as is lately propounded, requires alſo another popular Aſſembly upward of a thouſand, with an anſwerable Rotation. Which beſides that it will be liable to all thoſe Inconveniencies found in the foreſaid Remedies, cannot but be troubleſome and chargeable, both in thir Motion and thir Seſſion, to the whole Land, unweildie with thir own bulk, unable in ſo great a number to mature thir Conſultations as they ought, if any be allotted them, and that they meet not from ſo many parts remote to ſit a whole year Lieger in one place, only now and then to hold up a foreſt of Fingers, or to convey each Man his bean or ballot into the Box, without reaſon ſhewn or common deliberation; incontinent of Secrets, if any be imparted to them, emulous and always jarring with the other Senat. The much better way doubtleſs will be in this wavering condition of our Affairs, to defer the changing or circumſcribing of our Senat, more than may be done with eaſe, till the Commonwealth be throughly ſetl'd in Peace and Safety, and they themſelves give us the occaſion. Military Men hold it dangerous to change the form of Battel in view of an Enemy: neither did the People of Rome bandy with thir Senat while any of the Tarquins liv'd, the Enemies of thir Liberty, nor ſought by creating Tribunes to defend themſelves againſt the fear of thir Patricians, till ſixteen years after the expulſion of thir Kings, and in full ſecurity of thir State, they had or thought they had juſt cauſe given them by the Senat. Another way will be, to well qualifie and refine Elections: not committing all to the noiſe and ſhouting of a rude Multitude, but permitting only thoſe of them who are rightly qualifi'd, to nominate as many as they will; and out of that number others of a better breeding, to chuſe a leſs number more judiciouſly, till after a third or fourth ſifting and refining of exacteſt choice, they only be left choſen who are the due number, and ſeem by moſt voices the worthieſt. To make the People fitteſt to chuſe, and the choſen fitteſt to govern, will be to mend our corrupt and faulty Education, to teach the People Faith not without Vertue, Temperance, Modeſty, Sobriety, Parſimony, Juſtice; not to admire Wealth or Honour; to hate Turbulence and Ambition; to place every one his privat Welfare and Happineſs in the publick Peace, Liberty and Safety. They ſhall not then need to be much miſtruſtful of thir choſen Patriots in the Grand Council; who will be then rightly call'd the true Keepers of our Liberty, though the moſt of thir buſineſs will be in forein Affairs. But to prevent all Miſtruſt, the People then will have thir ſeveral ordinary Aſſemblies (which will henceforth quite annihilate the odious Power and Name of Committies) in the chief Towns of every County, without the Trouble, Charge, or time loſt of ſummoning and aſſembling from far in ſo great a number, and ſo long reſiding from thir own Houſes, or removing of thir Families, to do as much at home in thir ſeveral ſhires, entire or ſubdivided, toward the ſecuring of thir Liberty, as a numerous Aſſembly of them all form'd and conven'd on purpoſe with the warieſt Rotation. Wherof I ſhall ſpeak more ere the end of this Diſcourſe: for it may be referr'd to time, ſo we be ſtill going on by degrees to perfection. The People well weighing and performing theſe things, I ſuppoſe would have no cauſe to fear, though the Parlament aboliſhing that Name as originally ſignifying but the Parlie of our Lords and Commons with thir Norman King when he pleas'd to call them, ſhould, with certain limitations of thir Power, ſit perpetual, if thir ends be faithful and for a free Commonwealth, under the name of a Grand or General Council. Till this be don, I am in doubt whether our State will be ever certainly and throughly ſetl'd; never likely till then to ſee an end of our Troubles and continual Changes, or at leaſt never the true Settlement and Aſſurance of our Liberty. The Grand Council being thus firmly conſtituted to Perpetuity, and ſtill, upon the Death or Default of any Member, ſupply'd and kept in full number, ther can be no cauſe alleg'd why Peace, Juſtice, plentiful Trade, and all Proſperity, ſhould not therupon enſue throughout the whole Land; with as much aſſurance as can be of human things, that they ſhall ſo continue (if God favour us, and our wilful Sins provoke him not) even to the coming of our true and rightful, and only to be expected King, only worthy as he is our only Saviour, the Meſſiah, the Chriſt, the only Heir of his eternal Father, the only by him anointed and ordained ſince the Work of our Redemption finiſh'd, univerſal Lord of all Mankind. The way propounded is plane, eaſy and open before us; without Intricacies, without the Introducement of new or obſolete Forms or Terms, or exotic Models; Idea's that would effect nothing; but with a number of new Injunctions to manacle the native Liberty of Mankind; turning all Vertue into Preſcription, Servitude, and Neceſſity, to the great impairing and fruſtrating of Chriſtian Liberty. I ſay again, this way lies free and ſmooth before us; is not tangl'd with Inconveniencies; invents no new Incumbrances; requires no perilous, no injurious Alteration or Circumſcription of Mens Lands and Proprieties; ſecure, that in this Commonwealth, temporal and ſpiritual Lords remov'd, no Man or number of Men can attain to ſuch Wealth or vaſt poſſeſſion, as will need the hedg of an Agrarian Law (never ſucceſsful, but the cauſe rather of Sedition, ſave only where it began ſeaſonably with firſt poſſeſſion) to confine them from endangering our public Liberty. To conclude, it can have no conſiderable Objection made againſt it, that it is not practicable; leſt it be ſaid hereafter, that we gave up our Liberty for want of a ready way or diſtinct Form propos'd of a free Commonwealth. And this Facility we ſhall have above our next neighbouring Commonwealth (if we can keep us from the fond Conceit of ſomthing like a Duke of Venice, put lately into many Mens heads by ſom one or other ſutly driving on under that notion his own ambitious ends to lurch a Crown) that our Liberty ſhall not be hamper'd or hover'd over by any ingagement to ſuch a potent Family as the Houſe of Naſſaw, of whom to ſtand in perpetual Doubt and Suſpicion, but we ſhall live the cleereſt and abſoluteſt free Nation in the World.

On the contrary, if there be a King, which the inconſiderat multitude are now ſo mad upon, mark how far ſhort we are like to com of all thoſe Happineſſes, which in a Free State we ſhall immediatly be poſſeſs'd of. Firſt, the Grand Council, which, as I ſhew'd before, ſhould ſit perpetually (unleſs thir leiſure give them now and then ſom Intermiſſions or Vacations, eaſily manageable by the Council of State left ſitting) ſhall be call'd, by the King's good

Will and utmoſt Endeavor, as ſeldom as may be. For it is only the King's Right, he will ſay, to call a Parlament; and this he will do moſt commonly about his own Affairs rather than the Kingdom's, as will appeer planely ſo ſoon as they are call'd. For what will thir buſineſs then be, and the chief Expence of thir time, but an endleſs tugging between Petition of Right and Royal Prerogative, eſpecially about the negative Voice, Militia, or Subſidies, demanded and oft-times extorted without reaſonable cauſe appeering to the Commons, who are the only true Repreſentatives of the People and thir Liberty, but will be then mingl'd with a Court-faction; beſides which within thir own Walls, the ſincere part of them who ſtand faithful to the People, will again have to deal with two troubleſom counter-working Adverſaries from without, meer Creatures of the King, ſpiritual, and the greater part, as is likelieſt, of temporal Lords, nothing concern'd with the Peoples Liberty. If theſe prevail not in what they pleaſe, though never ſo much againſt the Peoples Intereſt, the Parlament ſhall be ſoon diſſolv'd, or ſit and do nothing; not ſuffer'd to remedy the leaſt Greevance, or enact aught advantageous to the People. Next, the Council of State ſhall not be choſen by the Parlament, but by the King, ſtill his own Creatures, Courtiers and Favorites; who will be ſure in all thir Counſels to ſet thir Maſter's Grandure and abſolute Power, in what they are able, far above the Peoples Liberty. I deny not but that ther may be ſuch a King, who may regard the common Good before his own, may have no vitious Favorite, may hearken only to the wiſeſt and incorrupteſt of his Parlament: but this rarely happens in a Monarchy not elective; and it behoves not a wiſe Nation to commit the ſum of thir well-being, the whole ſtate of thir Safety to Fortune. What need they; and how abſurd would it be, when as they themſelves to whom his chief Vertue will be but to hearken, may with much better Management and Diſpatch, with much more Commendation of thir own Worth and Magnanimity govern without a Maſter? Can the Folly be parallel'd, to adore and be the Slaves of a ſingle Perſon, for doing that which it is ten thouſand to one whether he can or will do, and we without him might do more eaſily, more effectually, more laudably our ſelves? Shall we never grow old anough to be wiſe to make ſeaſonable uſe of graveſt Autorities, Experiences, Examples? Is it ſuch an unſpeakable Joy to ſerve, ſuch Felicity to wear a Yoke? to clink our Shackles, lock'd on by pretended Law of Subjection, more intolerable and hopeleſs to be ever ſhaken off, than thoſe which are knock'd on by illegal Injury and Violence? Ariſtotle, our chief Inſtructer in the Univerſities, leſt this Doctrin be thought Sectarian, as the Royaliſt would have it thought, tells us in the third of his Politicks, that certain Men at firſt, for the matchleſs Excellence of thir Vertue above others, or ſom great public Benefit, were created Kings by the People; in ſmall Cities and Territories, and in the ſcarcity of others to be found like them: but when they abus'd thir Power, and Governments grew larger, and the number of prudent Men increas'd, that then the People ſoon depoſing thir Tyrants, betook them, in all civileſt places, to the form of a free Commonwealth. And why ſhould we thus diſparage and prejudicate our own Nation, as to fear a ſcarcity of able and worthy Men united in Counſel to govern us, if we will but uſe diligence and impartiality to find them out and chuſe them, rather yoking our ſelves to a ſingle Perſon, the natural Adverſary and Oppreſſor of Liberty, though good, yet far eaſier corruptible by the exceſs of his ſingular Power and Exaltation, or at beſt, not comparably ſufficient to bear the weight of Government, nor equally diſpos'd to make us happy in the enjoyment of our Liberty under him.

But admit, that Monarchy of it ſelf may be convenient to ſom Nations; yet to us who have thrown it out, receiv'd back again, it cannot but prove pernicious. For Kings to com, never forgetting thir former Ejection, will be ſure to fortify and arm themſelves ſufficiently for the future againſt all ſuch Attempts hereafter from the People: who ſhall be then ſo narrowly watch'd and kept ſo low, that though they would never ſo fain, and at the ſame rate of thir Blood and Treaſure, they never ſhall be able to regain what they now have purchas'd and may enjoy, or to free themſelves from any Yoke impos'd upon them: nor will they dare to go about it; utterly diſheartn'd for the future, if theſe thir higheſt Attempts prove unſucceſsful; which will be the Triumph of all Tyrants herafter over any People that ſhall reſiſt Oppreſſion ; and thir Song will then be, to others, how ſped the rebellious Engliſh ? to our Poſterity, how ſped the Rebels your Fathers ? This is not my Conjecture, but drawn from God's known Denouncement againſt the gentilizing Iſraelites, who though they were govern'd in a Commonwealth of God's own ordaining, he only thir King, they his peculiar People, yet affecting rather to reſemble Heathen, but pretending the Miſgovernment of Samuel's Sons, no more a reaſon to diſlike thir Commonwealth, than the Violence of Eli's Sons was imputable to that Prieſthood or Religion, clamour'd for a King. They had thir longing ; but with this Teſtimony of God's Wrath ; Ye ſhall cry out in that day, becauſe of your King whom ye ſhall have choſen, and the Lord will not hear you in that day. Us if he ſhall hear now, how much leſs will he hear when we cry herafter, who once deliver'd by him from a King, and not without wondrous Acts of his Providence, inſenſible and unworthy of thoſe high Mercies, are returning precipitantly, if he withold us not, back to the Captivity from whence he freed us. Yet neither ſhall we obtain or buy at an eaſy rate this new gilded Yoke which thus tranſports us : a new royal Revenue muſt be found, a new Epiſcopal ; for thoſe are individual : both which being wholy diſſipated or bought by privat Perſons, or aſſign'd for Service don, and eſpecially to the Army, cannot be recovered without a general Detriment and Confuſion to Mens Eſtates, or a heavy Impoſition on all Mens Purſes ; Benefit to none, but to the worſt and ignobleſt ſort of Men, whoſe hope is to be either the Miniſters of Court, Riot and Exceſs, or the Gainers by it : But not to ſpeak more of Loſſes and extraordinary Levies on our Eſtates, what will then be the Revenges and Offences remember'd and return'd, not only by the chief Perſon, but by all his Adherents ; Accounts and Reparations that will be requir'd, Suits, Inditements, Inquiries, Diſcoveries, Complaints, Informations, who knows againſt whom or how many, though perhaps Neuters, if not to utmoſt Infliction, yet to Impriſonment, Fines, Baniſhment, or Moleſtation ; if not theſe, yet diſfavor, diſcountenance, diſregard and contempt on all but the known Royaliſt or whom he favors, will be plenteous : nor let the new royaliz'd Presbyterians perſwade themſelves that thir old doings, though now recanted, will be forgotten ; whatever Conditions be contriv'd or truſted on. Will they not beleeve this ; nor remember the Pacification how it was kept to the Scots ; how other ſolemn Promiſes many a time to us ? Let them but now read the diabolical forerunning Libels, the Faces, the Geſtures that now appeer foremoſt and briskeſt in all publick places, as the Harbingers of thoſe that are in expectation to raign over us ; let them but hear the Inſolencies, the Menaces, the Inſultings of our newly animated common Enemies crept lately out of thir Holes, thir Hell, I might ſay, by the Language of thir infernal Pamphlets, the Spue of every Drunkard, every Ribald ; nameleſs, yet not for want of Licence, but for very ſhame of thir own vile Perſons, not daring to name themſelves, while they traduce others by name ; and give us to foreſee, that they intend to ſecond thir wicked Words, if ever they have Power, with more wicked Deeds. Let our zealous Backſliders forethink now with themſelves, how their Necks yok'd with theſe Tigers of Bacchus, theſe new Fanatics of not the preaching but the ſweating-tub, inſpir'd with nothing holier than the Venereal Pox, can draw one way under Monarchy to the eſtabliſhing of Church Diſciplin with theſe new-diſgorg'd Atheiſms : yet ſhall they not have the honor to yoke with theſe, but ſhall be yok'd under them ; theſe ſhall plow on thir backs. And do they among them who are ſo forward to bring in the ſingle Perſon, think to be by him truſted or long regarded ? So truſted they ſhall be and ſo regarded, as by Kings are wont reconcil'd Enemies ; neglected and ſoon after diſcarded, if not proſecuted for old Traytors ; the firſt Inciters, Beginners, and more than to the third part actors of all that follow'd. It will be found alſo, that there muſt be then as neceſſarily as now (for the contrary part will be ſtill fear'd) a Standing Army ; which for certain ſhall not be this, but of the fierceſt Cavaliers, of no leſs expence, and perhaps again under Rupert : but let this Army be ſure they ſhall be ſoon disbanded, and likelieſt without Arrear or Pay ; and being disbanded, not be ſure but they may as ſoon be queſtion'd for being in Arms againſt thir King : the ſame let them fear, who have contributed Money; which will amount to no ſmall number that muſt then take thir turn to be made Delinquents and Compounders. They who paſt reaſon and recovery are devoted to Kingſhip, perhaps will anſwer, That a greater part by far of the Nation will have it ſo, the reſt therfore muſt yield. Not ſo much to convince theſe, which I little hope, as to confirm them who yield not, I reply; that this greateſt part have both in Reaſon, and the trial of juſt Battel, loſt the right of thir Election what the Government ſhall be: of them who have not loſt that right, whether they for Kingſhip be the greater Number, who can certainly determin? Suppoſe they be, yet of freedom they partake all alike, one main end of Government: which if the greater part value not, but will degenerately forgo, is it juſt or reaſonable, that moſt Voices againſt the main End of Government, ſhould enſlave the leſs Number that would be free? More juſt it is doubtleſs, if it come to force, that a leſs Number compel a greater to retain, which can be no wrong to them, thir Liberty, than that a greater Number, for the pleaſure of thir baſeneſs, compel a leſs moſt injuriouſly to be thir fellow Slaves. They who ſeek nothing but thir own juſt Liberty, have always right to win it, and to keep it, whenever they have Power, be the Voices never ſo numerous that oppoſe it. And how much we above others are concern'd to defend it from Kingſhip, and from them who in purſuance therof ſo perniciouſly would betray us and themſelves to moſt certain Miſery and Thraldom, will be needleſs to repeat.

Having thus far ſhewn with what eaſe we may now obtain a Free Commonwealth, and by it with as much eaſe all the Freedom, Peace, Juſtice, Plenty, that we can deſire; on the other ſide, the Difficulties, Troubles, Uncertainties, nay rather Impoſſibilities to enjoy theſe things conſtantly under a Monarch: I will now proceed to ſhew more particularly wherin our Freedom and flouriſhing Condition will be more ample and ſecure to us under a Free Commonwealth, than under Kingſhip.

The whole freedom of Man conſiſts either in Spiritual or Civil Liberty. As for Spiritual, who can be at reſt, who can enjoy any thing in this World with contentment, who hath not liberty to ſerve God, and to ſave his own Soul, according to the beſt Light which God hath planted in him to that purpoſe, by the reading of his reveal'd Will, and the guidance of his Holy Spirit? That this is beſt pleaſing to God, and that the whole Proteſtant Church allows no ſupream Judg or Rule in Matters of Religion, but the Scriptures; and theſe to be interpreted by the Scriptures themſelves, which neceſſarily infers Liberty of Conſcience; I have heretofore prov'd at large in another Treatiſe; and might yet furder by the public Declarations, Confeſſions and Admonitions of whole Churches and States, obvious in all Hiſtories ſince the Reformation.

This Liberty of Conſcience, which above all other things ought to be to all Men deareſt and moſt precious, no Government more inclinable not to favor only, but to protect, than a free Commonwealth; as being moſt magnanimous, moſt fearleſs and confident of its own fair Proceedings. Wheras Kingſhip, though looking big, yet indeed moſt puſillanimous, full of Fears, full of Jealouſies, ſtartl'd at every Ombrage, as it hath been obſerv'd of old to have ever ſuſpected moſt, and miſtruſted them who were in moſt eſteem for Vertue and Generoſity of Mind; ſo it is now known to have moſt in doubt and ſuſpicion, them who are moſt reputed to be religious. Queen Elizabeth, though her ſelf accounted ſo good a Proteſtant, ſo moderate, ſo confident of her Subjects Love, would never give way ſo much as to Presbyterian Reformation in this Land, though once and again beſought, as Camden relates, but impriſon'd and perſecuted the very Propoſers therof; alleging it as her Mind and Maxim unalterable, that ſuch Reformation would diminiſh Regal Authority. What Liberty of Conſcience can we then expect of others, far wors principl'd from the Cradle, train'd up and govern'd by Popiſh and Spaniſh Counſels, and on ſuch depending hitherto for ſubſiſtence? Eſpecially what can this laſt Parlament expect, who having reviv'd lately and publiſh'd the Cov'nant, have reingag'd themſelves, never to readmit Epiſcopacy? Which no Son of Charles returning, but will moſt certainly bring back with him, if he regard the laſt and ſtricteſt Charge of his Father, to perſevere in, not the Doctrin only, but Government of the Church of England; not to neglect the ſpeedy and effectual ſuppreſſing of Errors and Schiſms; among which he accounted Preſbytery one of the chief. Or if, notwithſtanding that Charge of his Father, he ſubmit to the Cov'nant, how will he keep Faith to us, with Diſobedience to him; or regard that Faith given, which muſt be founded on the breach of that laſt and ſolemneſt paternal Charge, and the Reluctance, I may ſay the Antipathy, which is in all Kings againſt Preſbyterian and Independent Diſcpline? For they hear the Goſpel ſpeaking much of Liberty; a word which Monarchy and her Biſhops both fear and hate, but a Free Commonwealth both favors and promotes; and not the word only, but the thing it ſelf. But let our Governors beware in time, leſt thir hard meaſure to Liberty of Conſcience be found the Rock wheron they ſhipwrack themſelves, as others have now don before them in the cours wherin God was directing thir Steerage to a Free Commonwealth; and the abandoning of all thoſe whom they call Sectaries, for the detected Falſhood and Ambition of ſom, be a wilful rejection of thir own chief Strength and Intereſt in the freedom of all Proteſtant Religion, under what abuſive Name ſoever calumniated.

The other part of our Freedom conſiſts in the Civil Rights and Advancements of every Perſon according to his Merit: the enjoyment of thoſe never more certain, and the acceſs to theſe never more open, than in a Free Commonwealth. Both which, in my Opinion, may be beſt and ſooneſt obtain'd, if every County in the Land were made a kind of ſubordinate Commonalty or Commonwealth, and one chief Town or more, according as the Shire is in Circuit, made Cities, if they be not ſo call'd already; where the Nobility and chief Gentry, from a proportionable compaſs of Territory annex'd to each City, may build Houſes or Palaces befitting thir Quality, may bear part in the Government, make thir own Judicial Laws, or uſe theſe that are, and execute them by thir own elected Judicatures and Judges without Appeal, in all things of Civil Government between Man and Man: ſo they ſhall have Juſtice in thir own hands, Law executed fully and finally in thir own Counties and Precincts, long wiſh'd and ſpoken of, but never yet obtain'd; they ſhall have none then to blame but themſelves, if it be not well adminiſter'd; and fewer Laws to expect or fear from the ſupreme Autority; or to thoſe that ſhall be made, of any great concernment to Public Liberty, they may, without much trouble in theſe Commonalties, or in more General Aſſemblies call'd to thir Cities from the whole Territory on ſuch occaſion, declare and publiſh thir aſſent or diſſent by Deputies, within a time limited, ſent to the Grand Council; yet ſo as this thir Judgment declar'd, ſhall ſubmit to the greater number of other Counties or Commonalties, and not avail them to any exemption of themſelves, or refuſal of Agreement with the reſt, as it may in any of the United Provinces, being Sovran within it ſelf, oft-times to the great diſadvantage of that Union. In theſe Imployments they may much better than they do now, exerciſe and fit themſelves till thir Lot fall to be choſen into the Grand Council, according as thir Worth and Merit ſhall be taken notice of by the People. As for Controverſies that ſhall happen between Men of ſeveral Counties, they may repair, as they do now, to the Capital City, or any other more commodious, indifferent Place, and equal Judges. And this I find to have been practis'd in the old Athenian Commonwealth, reputed the firſt and ancienteſt place of Civility in all Greece: that they had in thir ſeveral Cities, a Peculiar; in Athens, a common Government; and thir Right, as it befel them, to the Adminiſtration of both. They ſhould have here alſo Schools and Academies at thir own choice, wherin thir Children may be bred up in thir own ſight to all Learning and noble Education; not in Grammar only, but in all Liberal Arts and Exerciſes. This would ſoon ſpread much more Knowledg and Civility, yea, Religion, through all parts of the Land, by communicating the natural heat of Government and Culture more diſtributively to all extreme parts, which now lie num and neglected, would ſoon make the whole Nation more induſtrious, more ingenuous at home; more potent, more honourable abroad. To this a Free Commonwealth will eaſily aſſent; (nay, the Parlament hath had already ſom ſuch thing in deſign) for of all Governments a Commonwealth aims moſt to make the People flouriſhing, vertuous, noble and high-high-ſpirited. Monarchs will never permit; whoſe Aim is to make the People wealthy indeed perhaps, and well fleec't, for thir own ſhearing, and the ſupply of Regal Prodigality; but otherwiſe ſofteſt, baſeſt, vitiouſeſt, ſerrvileſt, eaſieſt to be kept under; and not only in Fleece, but in Mind alſo ſheepiſheſt; and will have all the Benches of Judicature annex'd to the Throne, as a Gift of Royal Grace, that we have Juſtice don us; wheras nothing can be more eſſential to the freedom of a People, than to have the adminiſtration of Juſtice, and all Publick Ornaments, in thir own Election, and within thir own Bounds, without long travelling or depending on remote Places to obtain thir Right, or any Civil Accompliſhment; ſo it be not ſupreme, but ſubordinate to the general Power and Union of the whole Republic. In which happy firmneſs, as in the Particular above-mention'd, we ſhall alſo far exceed the United Provinces, by having, not as they (to the retarding and diſtracting oft-times of thir Counſels or urgenteſt occaſions) many Sov'ranties united in one Commonwealth, but many Commonwealths under one united and entruſted Sov'ranty. And when we have our Forces by Sea and Land, either of a faithful Army, or a ſetl'd Militia, in our own hands, to the firm eſtabliſhing of a Free Commonwealth, public Accounts under our own inſpection, general Laws and Taxes, with thir Cauſes in our own Domeſtic Suffrages, Judicial Laws, Offices and Ornaments at home in our own ordering and adminiſtration, all diſtinction of Lords and Commoners, that may any way divide or ſever the Public Intereſt, remov'd, what can a perpetual Senat have then, wherin to grow corrupt, wherin to encroach upon us, or uſurp? or if they do, wherin to be formidable? Yet if all this avail not to remove the Fear or Envy of a perpetual Sitting, it may be eaſily provided, to change a third part of them yearly, or every two or three Years, as was above-mention'd; or that it be at thoſe times in the Peoples choice, whether they will change them, or renew thir Power, as they ſhall find cauſe.

I have no more to ſay at preſent: few words will ſave us, well conſider'd; few and eaſy things, now ſeaſonably don. But if the People be ſo affected, as to proſtitute Religion and Liberty to the vain and groundleſs apprehenſion, that nothing but Kingſhip can reſtore Trade, not remembring the frequent Plagues and Peſtilences that then waſted this City, ſuch as through God's Mercy we never have felt ſince; and that Trade flouriſhes no where more than in the Free Commonwealths of Italy, Germany, and the Low Countries, before thir eyes at this day: yet if Trade be grown ſo craving and importunate through the profuſe living of Tradeſmen, that nothing can ſupport it, but the luxurious Expences of a Nation upon Trifles or Superfluities; ſo as if the People generally ſhould betake themſelves to Frugality, it might prove a dangerous matter, leſt Tradeſmen ſhould mutiny for want of Trading; and that therfore we muſt forgo and ſet to ſale Religion, Liberty, Honor, Safety, all Concernments Divine or Human, to keep up Trading. If, laſtly, after all this Light among us, the ſame Reaſon ſhall paſs for current, to put our Necks again under Kingſhip, as was made uſe of by the Jews to return back to Egypt, and to the worſhip of thir Idol Queen, becauſe they falſly imagin'd that they then liv'd in more plenty and proſperity; our Condition is not ſound but rotten, both in Religion and all Civil Prudence; and will bring us ſoon, the way we are marching, to thoſe Calamities which attend always and unavoidably on Luxury, all national Judgments under Forein or Domeſtic Slavery: So far we ſhall be from mending our condition by monarchizing our Government, whatever new Conceit now poſſeſſes us. However with all hazard I have ventur'd what I thought my Duty to ſpeak in ſeaſon, and to forewarn my Country in time; wherin I doubt not but there be many wiſe Men in all Places and Degrees, but am ſorry the Effects of Wiſdom are ſo little ſeen among us. Many Circumſtances and Particulars I could have added in thoſe things wherof I have ſpoken: but a few main Matters now put ſpeedily in execution, will ſuffice to recover us, and ſet all right: And ther will want at no time who are good at Circumſtances; but Men who ſet thir Minds on main Matters, and ſufficiently urge them, in theſe moſt difficult times I find not many. What I have ſpoken, is the Language of that which is not call'd amiſs The good Old Cauſe: if it ſeem ſtrange to any, it will not ſeem more ſtrange, I hope, than convincing to Backſliders. Thus much I ſhould perhaps have ſaid, though I were ſure I ſhould have ſpoken only to Trees and Stones; and had none to cry to, but with the Prophet, O Earth, Earth, Earth! to tell the very Soil it ſelf, what her perverſe Inhabitants are deaf to. Nay, though what I have ſpoke, ſhould happ'n (which Thou ſuffer not, who didſt create Mankind free; nor Thou next, who didſt redeem us from being Servants of Men!) to be the laſt words of our expiring Liberty. But I truſt I ſhall have ſpoken Perſwaſion to abundance of ſenſible and ingenuous Men; to ſom perhaps whom God may raiſe of theſe Stones to become Children of reviving Liberty; and may reclaim, though they ſeem now chuſing them a Captain back for Egypt, to bethink themſelves a little, and conſider whither they are ruſhing; to exhort this Torrent alſo of the People, not to be ſo impetuous, but to keep thir due Channel; and at length recovering and uniting thir better Reſolutions, now that they ſee already how open and unbounded the inſolence and rage is of our common Enemies, to ſtay theſe ruinous Proceedings, juſtly and timely fearing to what a Precipice of Deſtruction the deluge of this epidemic Madneſs would hurry us, through the general defection of a miſguided and abus'd Multitude.

FIRST, all endeavours ſpeedily to be us'd, that the enſuing Election be of ſuch as are already firm, or inclinable to conſtitute a free Commonwealth (according to the former qualifications decreed in Parlament, and not yet repeal'd, as I hear) without ſingle Perſon, or Houſe of Lords. If theſe be not ſuch, but the contrary, who foreſees not, that our Liberties will be utterly loſt in this next Parlament, without ſome powerful courſe taken, of ſpeedieſt prevention? The ſpeedieſt way will be to call up forthwith the chief Gentlemen out of every County; to lay before them (as your Excellency hath already, both in your publiſh'd Letters to the Army, and your Declaration recited to the Members of Parlament) the Danger and Confuſion of readmitting Kingſhip in this Land; eſpecially againſt the Rules of all Prudence and Example, in a Family once ejected, and therby not to be truſted with the power of Revenge: that you will not longer delay them with vain expectation, but will put into thir hands forthwith the poſſeſſion of a free Commonwealth; if they will firſt return immediately and elect them, by ſuch at leaſt of the People as are rightly qualifi'd, a ſtanding Council in every City, and great Town, which may then be dignified with the name of City, continually to conſult the good and flouriſhing ſtate of that Place, with a competent Territory adjoin'd; to aſſume the judicial Laws, either theſe that are, or ſuch as they themſelves ſhall new make ſeverally, in each Commonalty, and all Judicatures, all Magiſtracies, to the Adminiſtration of all Juſtice between man and man, and all the Ornaments of publick Civility, Academies, and ſuch like, in thir own hands. Matters appertaining to men of ſeveral Counties, or Territories, may be determin'd, as they are here at London, or in ſome more convenient Place, under equal Judges.

Next, That in every ſuch Capital Place, they will chooſe them the uſual number of ableſt Knights and Burgeſſes, engag'd for a Commonwealth, to make up the Parlament, or (as it will from henceforth be better called) the Grand or General Council of the Nation: whoſe Office muſt be, with due Caution, to diſpoſe of Forces, both by Sea and Land, under the conduct of your Excellency, for the preſervation of Peace, both at home and abroad; muſt raiſe and manage the publick Revenue, but with provided inſpection of thir Accompts; muſt adminiſter all forein Affairs, make all General Laws, Peace, or War, but not without Aſſent of the ſtanding Council in each City, or ſuch other general Aſſembly as may be call'd on ſuch occaſion, from the whole Territory, where they may without much trouble, deliberate on all things fully, and ſend up thir Suffrages within a ſet time, by Deputies appointed. Though this grand Council be perpetual (as in that Book I prov'd would be beſt and moſt conformable to beſt examples) yet they will then, thus limited, have ſo little matter in thir Hands, or Power to endanger our Liberty; and the People ſo much in thirs, to prevent them, having all Judicial Laws in thir own choice, and free Votes in all thoſe which concern generally the whole Commonwealth, that we ſhall have little cauſe to fear the perpetuity of our general Senat; which will be then nothing elſe but a firm foundation and cuſtody of our Public Liberty, Peace, and Union, through the whole Commonwealth, and the tranſactors of our Affairs with forein Nations.

If this yet be not thought enough, the known Expedient may at length be uſ'd, of a partial Rotation.

Laſtly, if theſe Gentlemen convocated refuſe theſe fair and noble Offers of immediate Liberty, and happy Condition, no doubt there be enough in every County who will thankfully accept them, your Excellency once more declaring publickly this to be your Mind, and having a faithful Veteran Army, ſo ready, and glad to aſſiſt you in the proſecution therof. For the full and abſolute Adminiſtration of Law in every County, which is the difficulteſt of theſe Propoſals, hath bin of moſt long deſired; and the not granting it, held a general Grievance. The reſt when they ſhall ſee the beginnings and proceedings of theſe Conſtitutions propoſ'd, and the orderly, the decent, the civil, the ſafe, the noble Effects therof, will be ſoon convinc'd, and by degrees come in of thir own accord, to be partakers of ſo happy a Government.

Brief NOTES upon a late
SERMON
TITL'D,
The Fear of God and the King;

Preach'd, and ſince publiſh'd,
By MATTHEW GRIFFITH, D.D.
And Chaplain to the late KING.

Wherin many notorious wreſtings of Scripture, and other Falſities are obſerv'd.

I Affirm'd in the Preface of a late Diſcourſe, Entitl'd, The ready way to eſtabliſh a free Commonwealth, and the dangers of readmitting Kingſhip in this Nation, that the humor of returning to our old Bondage, was inſtill'd of late by ſome Deceivers; and to make good, that what I then affirm'd, was not without juſt ground, one of thoſe Deceivers I preſent here to the People: and if I prove him not ſuch, refuſe not to be ſo accounted in his ſtead.

He begins in his Epiſtle to the General, and moves cunningly for a Licence to be admitted Phyſician both to Church and State; then ſets out his practice in Phyſical terms, an wholſom Electuary to be taken every Morning next our Hearts; tells of the oppoſition which he met with from the College of State-Phyſicians, then lays before you his Drugs and Ingredients; Strong purgatives in the Pulpit, contemper'd of the myrrh of Mortification, the aloes of Confeſſion and Contrition, the rubarb of Reſtitution and Satisfaction; a pretty Fantaſtic doſe of Divinity from a Pulpit-Mountibank, not unlike the Fox, that turning Pedlar, open'd his pack of War before the Kid; though he now would ſeem to perſonate the good Samaritan, undertaking to deſcribe the Riſe and Progreſs of our national Malady, and to preſcribe the only Remedy; which how he performs, we ſhall quickly ſee.

Firſt, he would ſuborn Saint Luke as his ſpokeſman to the General, preſuming, it ſeems, to have had as perfect underſtanding of things from the very firſt, as the Evangeliſt had of his Goſpel; that the General who hath ſo eminently born his part in the whole Action, mighty know the certainty of thoſe things better from him a partial Sequeſtred enemy; for ſo he preſently appears, though covertly and like the Tempter, commencing his Addreſs with an impudent Calumny and Affront to his Excellence, that he would be pleas'd to carry on what he had ſo happily begun in the name and cauſe not of God only, which we doubt not, but of his anointed, meaning the late Kings Son; which is to charge him moſt audaciouſly and falſly with the renouncing of his own public Promiſes and Declarations, both to the Parlament and the Army, and we truſt his Actions ere long will deter ſuch inſinuating ſlanderers from thus approaching him for the future. But the General may well excuſe him; for the Comforter himſelf ſcapes not his Preſumption, avouch'd as falſly, to have impowr'd to thoſe deſigns him and him only, who hath ſolemnly declar'd the contrary. What Phanatic, againſt whom he ſo often inveighs, could more preſumptuouſly affirm whom the Comforter hath impowr'd, then this Antifanatic, as he would be thought?

The Text.

Prov. 24. 21. My Son, fear God and the King, and meddle not with them tha be Seditious, or deſirous of change, &c.

Letting paſs matters not in Controverſy, I come to the main drift of your Sermon, the King; which word here is either to ſignify any ſupreme Magiſtrate, or elſe your latter Object of fear is not Univerſal, belongs not at all to many parts of Chriſtendom, that have no King; and in particular, not to us. That we have no King ſince the putting down of Kingſhip in this Commonwealth, is manifeſt by this laſt Parlament, who to the time of thir Diſſolving, not only made no Addreſs at all to any King, but ſummon'd this next to come by the Writ formerly appointed of a free Commonwealth, without Reſtitution or the leaſt mention of any Kingly Right or Power; which could not be, if there were at preſent any King of England. The main part therfore of your Sermon, if it mean a King in the uſual ſenſe, is either impertinent and abſurd, exhorting your Auditory to fear that which is not; or if King here be, as it is underſtood for any ſupreme Magiſtrate, by your own Exhortation they are in the firſt place not to meddle with you, as being your ſelf moſt of all the ſeditious meant here, and the deſirous of change, in ſtirring them up to fear a King, whom the preſent Government takes no notice of.

You begin with a vain Viſion, God and the King at the firſt bluſh (which will not be your laſt bluſh) ſeeming to ſtand in your Text like thoſe two Cherubims on the Mercy-ſeat, looking on each other. By this Similitude, your conceited Sanctuary, worſe than the Altar of Ahaz, pattern'd from Damaſcus, degrades God to a Cherub, and raiſes your King to be his collateral in place, notwithſtanding the other differences you put; which well agrees with the Court-letters, lately publiſh'd from this Lord to tother Lord, that cry him up for no leſs than Angelical and Celeſtial.

Your firſt obſervation, pag. 8. is, That God and the King are coupl'd in the Text, and what the Holy Ghoſt hath thus firmly combin'd, we may not, we muſt not dare to put aſunder; and your ſelf is the firſt man who puts them aſunder by the firſt proof of your Doctrin immediately following, Judg. 7. 20. which couples the ſword of the Lord and Gideon, a man who not only was no King, but refus'd to be a King or Monarch, when it was offer'd him, in the very next Chapter, Ver. 22, 23. I will not rule over you, neither ſhall my Son rule over you; the Lord ſhall rule over you. Here we ſee that this worthy Heroic deliverer of his Country, thought it beſt govern'd, if the Lord govern'd it in that form of a free Commonwealth, which they then enjoi'd without a ſingle Perſon. And this is your firſt Scripture, abus'd and moſt impertinently cited, nay againſt your ſelf, to prove that Kings at thir Coronation have a Sword given them, which you interpret the Militia, the power of life and death put into thir Hands, againſt the declar'd judgment of our Parlaments, nay of all our Laws, which reſerve to themſelves only the power of Life and Death, and render you in thir juſt reſentment of this boldneſs, another Doctor Manwaring.

Your next proof is as falſe and frivolous; The King, ſay you, is Gods Sword-bearer; true, but not the King only, for Gideon by whom you ſeek to prove this, neither was, nor would be a King; and as you your ſelf confeſs, pag. 40. There be divers forms of Government. He bears not the Sword in vain, Rom. 13. 4. this alſo is as true of any lawful Rulers, eſpecially Supreme; ſo that Rulers, ver. 3. and therfore this preſent Government, without whoſe Authority you excite the People to a King, bear the Sword as well as Kings, and as little in vain. They fight againſt God, who reſiſt his Ordinance, and go about to wreſt the Sword out of the hands of his Anointed. This is likewiſe granted: but who is his Anointed? Not every King, but they only who were Anointed or made Kings by his ſpecial command; as Saul, David, and his race, which ended in the Meſſiah, (from whom no Kings at this day can derive thir Title) Jehu, Cyrus, and if any other were by name appointed by him to ſom particular ſervice: as for the reſt of Kings, all other ſupreme Magiſtrates are as much the Lords Anointed as they; and our Obedience commanded equally to them all; For ther is no power but of God, Rom. 13. 1. and we are exhorted in the Goſpel to obey Kings, as other Magiſtrates, not that they are call'd any where the Lord's Anointed, but as they are the Ordinance of Man, 1 Pet. 2. 13. You therfore and other ſuch falſe Doctors, preaching Kings to your Auditory, as the Lord's only Anointed, to withdraw People from the preſent Government, by your own Text are ſelf-condemn'd, and not to be follow'd, not to be medl'd with, but to be noted, as moſt of all others the ſeditious and deſirous of change.

Your third Proof is no leſs againſt your ſelf. Pſal. 105. 15. Touch not mine Anointed. For this is not ſpoken in behalf of Kings, but ſpoken to reprove Kings, that they ſhould not touch his anointed Saints and Servants, the Seed of Abraham, as the Verſe next before might have taught you: He reprov'd Kings for thir ſakes, ſaying, Touch not mine Anointed, and do my Prophets no harm; according to that 2 Cor. 1. 21. He who hath anointed us, is God. But how well you confirm one wreſted Scripture with another: 1 Sam. 8. 7. They have not rejected thee, but me: groſly miſapplying theſe words, which were not ſpoken to any who had reſiſted or rejected a King, but to them who much againſt the Will of God had ſought a King, and rejected a Commonwealth, wherin they might have liv'd happily under the Reign of God only, thir King. Let the words interpret themſelves; ver. 6, 7. But the thing diſpleaſed Samuel, when they ſaid, give us a King to judg us: and Samuel pray'd unto the Lord. And the Lord ſaid unto Samuel, hearken unto the voice of the People in all that they ſay unto thee; for they have not rejected thee, but they have rejected me, that I ſhould not reign over them. Hence you conclude, ſo indiſſoluble is the Conjunction of God and the King. O notorious abuſe of Scripture! whenas you ſhould have concluded, ſo unwilling was God to give them a King, ſo wide was the disjunction of God from a King. Is this the Doctrin you boaſt of to be ſo clear in it ſelf, and like a Mathematical Principle, that needs no farther Demonſtration? Bad Logic, bad Mathematics (for Principles can have no Demonſtration at all) but wors Divinity. O People of an implicit Faith no better than Romiſh, if theſe be thy prime Teachers, who to thir credulous Audience dare thus juggle with Scripture, to allege thoſe places for the proof of thir Doctrin, which are the plain Refutation: and this is all the Scripture which he brings to confirm his Point.

The reſt of his Preachment is meer groundleſs Chat, ſave here and there a few grains of Corn ſcatter'd to intice the ſilly Fowl into his Net, interlac'd here and there with ſom human reading, tho ſlight, and not without Geographical and Hiſtorical Miſtakes: as pag. 29. Suevia the German Dukedom, for Suecia the Northern Kingdom: Philip of Macedon, who is generally underſtood of the great Alexander's Father only, made contemporary, pag. 31. with T. Quintus the Roman Commander, inſtead of T. Quintius and the latter Philip: and pag. 44. Tully cited in his third Oration againſt Verres, to ſay of him, that he was a wicked Conſul, who never was a Conſul: nor Trojan Sedition ever portraid by that Verſe of Virgil, which you cite pag. 47. as that of Troy: School-boys could have told you, that there is nothing of Troy in that whole Portraiture, as you call it, of Sedition. Theſe groſs Miſtakes may juſtly bring in doubt your other looſe Citations, and that you take them up ſomwhere at the ſecond or third hand raſhly, and without due conſidering.

Nor are you happier in the relating or the moralizing your Fable. The Frogs (being once a free Nation ſaith the Fable) petition'd Jupiter for a King: he tumbl'd among them a Log: They found it inſenſible; they petitioned then for a King that ſhould be active: he ſent them a Crane (a Stork ſaith the Fable) which ſtraight fell to pecking them up. This you apply to the reproof of them who deſire change: wheras indeed the true Moral ſhews rather the folly of thoſe who being free ſeek a King; which for the moſt part either as a Log lies heavy on his Subjects, without doing aught worthy of his Dignity and the Charge to maintain him, or as a Stork is ever pecking them up, and devouring them.

But by our fundamental Laws, the King is the higheſt Power, pag. 40. If we muſt hear mooting and Law Lectures from the Pulpit, what ſhame is it for a Doctor of Divinity, not firſt to conſider, that no Law can be fundamental, but that which is grounded on the Light of Nature or right Reaſon, commonly call'd Moral Law: which no form of Government was ever counted, but arbitrary, and at all times in the choice of every free People, or thir Repreſenters? This choice of Government is ſo eſſential to thir Freedom, that longer than they have it, they are not free. In this Land not only the late King and his Poſterity, but Kingſhip it ſelf hath bin abrogated by a Law; which involves with as good reaſon the Poſterity of a King forfeited to the People, as that Law hertofore of Treaſon againſt the King, attainted the Children with the Father. This Law againſt both King and Kingſhip they who moſt queſtion, do not leſs queſtion all enacted without the King and his Antiparlament at Oxford, though call'd Mungrel by himſelf. If no Law muſt be held good, but what paſſes in full Parlament, then ſurely in exactneſs of Legality, no Member muſt be miſſing: for look how many are miſſing, ſo many Counties or Cities that ſent them want thir Repreſenters. But if being once choſen, they ſerve for the whole Nation, then any number which is ſufficient, is full, and moſt of all in times of diſcord, neceſſity and danger. The King himſelf was bound by the old Mode of Parlaments, not to be abſent, but in caſe of Sickneſs, or ſom extraordinary occaſion, and then to leave his Subſtitute; much leſs might any Member be allow'd to abſent himſelf. If the King then and many of the Members with him, without leaving any in his ſtead, forſook the Parlament upon a meer panic fear, as was that time judg'd by moſt Men, and to levy War againſt them that ſat, ſhould they who were left ſitting, break up, or not dare enact aught of neereſt and preſenteſt concernment to public Safety, for the punctilio wanting of a full number, which no Law-book in ſuch extraordinary caſes hath determin'd? Certainly if it were lawful for them to fly from thir Charge upon pretence of privat Safety, it was much more lawful for theſe to ſit and act in thir truſt what was neceſſary for public. By a Law therfore of Parlament, and of a Parlament that conquer'd both Ireland, Scotland, and all thir Enemies in England, defended thir friends, were generally acknowledg'd for a Parlament both at home and abroad, Kingſhip was aboliſh'd: This Law now of late hath bin negatively repeal'd; yet Kingſhip not poſitively reſtor'd, and I ſuppoſe never was eſtabliſh'd by any certain Law in this Land, nor poſſibly could be: for how could our Fore-fathers bind us to any certain form of Government, more than we can bind our Poſterity? If a People be put to war with thir King for his Miſgovernment, and overcom him, the Power is then undoubtedly in thir own hands how they will be govern'd. The War was granted juſt by the King himſelf at the beginning of his laſt Treaty, and ſtill maintain'd to be ſo by this laſt Parlament, as appears by the Qualification preſcrib'd to the Members of this next enſuing, That none ſhall be elected, who have born Arms againſt the Parlament ſince 1641. If the War were juſt, the Conqueſt was alſo juſt by the Law of Nations. And he who was the chief Enemy, in all right ceas'd to be the King, eſpecially after Captivity, by the deciding Verdit of War; and Royalty with all her Laws and Pretenſions, yet remains in the Victor's power, together with the choice of our future Government. Free Commonwealths have bin ever counted fitteſt and propereſt for civil, vertuous and induſtrious Nations, abounding with prudent Men worthy to govern: Monarchy fitteſt to curb degenerate, corrupt, idle, proud, luxurious People. If we deſire to be of the former, nothing better for us, nothing nobler than a free Commonwealth: if we will needs condemn our ſelves to be of the latter, deſparing of our own Vertue, Induſtry, and the number of our able Men, we may then, conſcious of our own unworthineſs to be govern'd better, ſadly betake us to our befitting Thraldom: yet chuſing out of our own number one who hath beſt aided the People, and beſt merited againſt Tyranny, the ſpace of a Raign or two we may chance to live happily enough, or tolerably. But that a victorious People ſhould give up themſelves again to the vanquiſh'd, was never yet heard of; ſeems rather void of all Reaſon and good Policy, and will in all probability ſubject the Subduers to the Subdu'd, will expoſe to Revenge, to Beggary, to Ruin and perpetual Bondage the Victors under the vanquiſh'd: than which what can be more unworthy?

From miſinterpreting our Law, you return to do again the ſame with Scripture, and would prove the Supremacy of Engliſh Kings from 1 Pet. 2.13. as if that were the Apoſtle's work: wherin if he ſaith that the King is ſupreme, preme, he ſpeaks ſo of him but as an Ordinance of Man, and in reſpect of thoſe Governors that are ſent by him, not in reſpect of Parlaments, which by the Law of this Land are his Bridle; in vain his Bridle, if not alſo his Rider: and therfore hath not only Co-ordination with him, which you falſly call ſeditious, but hath Superiority above him, and that neither againſt Religion, nor right Reaſon: no nor againſt common Law; for our Kings reign'd only by Law: but the Parlament is above all poſitive Law, whether civil or common, makes or unmakes them both; and ſtill the latter Parlament above the former, above all the former Lawgivers, then certainly above all precedent Laws; entail'd the Crown on whom it pleas'd; and as a great Lawyer ſaith, is ſo tranſcendent and abſolute, that it cannot be confin'd either for Cauſes or Perſons, within any bounds. But your cry is, no Parlament without a King. If this be ſo, we have never had lawful Kings, who have all bin created Kings either by ſuch Parlaments, or by Conqueſt: if by ſuch Parlaments, they are in your allowance none: if by Conqueſt, that Conqueſt we have now conquer'd. So that as well by your own Aſſertion as by ours, there can at preſent be no King. And how could that Perſon be abſolutely ſupreme, who reign'd, not under Law only, but under Oath of his good Demeanor given to the People at his Coronation, ere the People gave him his Crown? And his principal Oath was to maintain thoſe Laws which the People ſhould chuſe. If then the Law it ſelf, much more he who was but the Keeper and Miniſter of Law, was in thir choice, and both he ſubordinat to the performance of his Duty ſworn, and our ſworn Allegiance in order only to his performance.

You fall next on the Conſiſtorian Schiſmatics; for ſo you call Presbyterians, pag. 40. and judg them to have enervated the King's Supremacy by thir Opinions and Practice, differing in many things only in terms from Popery; though ſome of thoſe Principles which you there cite concerning Kingſhip, are to be ready in Ariſtotle's Politics, long ere Popery was thought on. The Presbyterians therfore it concerns to be well forewarn'd of you betimes; and to them I leave you.

As for your Examples of ſeditious Men, pag. 54, &c. Cora, Abſalom, Zimri, Sheba, to theſe you might with much more reaſon have added your own Name, who blow the Trumpet of Sedition from your Pulpit againſt the preſent Government: in reward wherof they have ſent you by this time, as I hear, to your own place, for preaching open Sedition, while you would ſeem to preach againſt it.

As for your Appendix annext of the Samaritan reviv'd, finding it ſo foul a Libel againſt all the well-affected of this Land, ſince the very time of Ship-money, againſt the whole Parlament, both Lords and Commons, except thoſe that fled to Oxford, againſt the whole reform'd Church, not only in England and Scotland, but all over Europe (in compariſon wherof you and your Prelatical Party are more truly Schiſmatics and Sectarians, nay more properly Fanatics in your Fanes and gilded Temples, than thoſe whom you revile by thoſe names) and meeting with no more Scripture or ſolid reaſon in your Samaritan wine and oyl, than hath already bin found ſophiſticated and adulterate, I leave your malignant Narrative, as needing no other Confutation, than the juſt Cenſure already paſs'd upon you by the Council of State.

True Religion, Hereſie, Schiſm, Toleration,
And what beſt Means may be us'd againſt the Growth of # POPERY.

Printed in the Year 1673.

IT is unknown to no Man, who knows ought of Concernment among us, that the increaſe of Popery is at this day no ſmall Trouble and Offence to greateſt part of the Nation; and the rejoicing of all good Men that it is ſo; the more thir rejoicing, that God hath giv'n a Heart to the People to remember ſtill thir great and happy Deliverance from Popiſh Thraldom, and to eſteem ſo highly the precious benefit of his Goſpel, ſo freely and ſo peaceably injoy'd among them. Since therfore ſome have already in public with many conſiderable Arguments exhorted the People to beware the growth of this Romiſh Weed; I thought it no leſs than a common duty to lend my hand, how unable ſoever, to ſo good a purpoſe. I will not now enter into the Labyrinth of Councils and Fathers, an intangl'd wood which the Papiſt loves to fight in, not with hope of Victory, but to obſcure the ſhame of an open Overthrow: which yet in that kind of Combat, many heretofore, and one of late, hath eminently given them. And ſuch manner of diſpute with them, to Learned Men, is uſeful and very commendable: But I ſhall inſiſt now on what is plainer to common Apprehenſion, and what I have to ſay, without longer Introduction.

True Religion is the true Worſhip and Service of God, learnt and believ'd from the Word of God only. No Man or Angel can know how God would be worſhip'd and ſerv'd unleſs God reveal it: He hath reveal'd and taught it us in the holy Scriptures by inſpir'd Miniſters, and in the Goſpel by his own Son and his Apoſtles, with ſtricteſt command to reject all other Traditions or Additions whatſoever. According to that of St. Paul, Though we or an Angel from Heaven preach any other Goſpel unto you, than that which we have preacht unto you, let him be Anathema, or accurſt. And Deut. 4. 2. Ye ſhall not add to the Word which I command you, neither ſhall you diminiſh ought from it. Rev. 22. 18,19. If any Man ſhall add, &c. If any Man ſhall take away from the words, &c. With good and religious Reaſon therfore all Proteſtant Churches with one Conſent, and particularly the Church of England in her thirty nine Articles, Artic. 6*th*, 19*th*, 20*th*, 21*ſt*, and elſewhere, maintain theſe two Points, as the main Principles of true Religion: that the Rule of true Religion is the Word of God only: and that thir Faith ought not to be an implicit Faith, that is, to believe, though as the Church believes, againſt or without expreſs Authority of Scripture. And if all Proteſtants as univerſally as they hold theſe two Principles, ſo attentively and religiouſly would obſerve them, they would avoid and cut off many Debates and Contentions, Schiſms and Perſecutions, which too oft have been among them, and more firmly unite againſt the common Adverſary. For hence it directly follows, that no true Proteſtant can perſecute, or not tolerate his Fellow-Proteſtant, though diſſenting from him in ſom Opinions, but he muſt flatly deny and renounce theſe two his own main Principles, wheron true Religion is founded; while he compels his Brother from that which he believes as the manifeſt Word of God, to an implicit Faith (which he himſelf condemns) to the endangering of his Brother's Soul, whether by raſh Belief, or outward Conformity: for whatſoever is not of Faith, is Sin.

I will now as briefly ſhow what is falſe Religion or Hereſie, which will be don as eaſily: for of Contraries the Definitions muſt needs be contrary. Hereſie therfore is a Religion taken up and believ'd from the Traditions of Men and Additions to the Word of God. Whence alſo it follows clearly that of all known Sects or pretended Religions at this day in Chriſtendom, Popery is the only or the greateſt Hereſie: and he who is ſo forward to brand all others for Heretics, the obſtinate Papiſt, the only Heretic. Hence one of thir own famous Writers found juſt cauſe to ſtile the Romiſh Church Mother of Error, School of Hereſie. And wheras the Papiſt boaſts himſelf to be a Roman Catholic, it is a meer Contradiction, one of the Pope's Bulls, as if he ſhould ſay, univerſal particular, a Catholic Schiſmatic. For Catholic in Greek ſignifies Univerſal: and the Chriſtian Church was ſo call'd, as conſiſting of all Nations to whom the Goſpel was to be preach'd, in contradiſtinction to the Jewiſh Church, which conſiſted for the moſt part of Jews only.

Sects may be in a true Church as well as in a falſe, when Men follow the Doctrin too much for the Teachers ſake, whom they think almoſt infallible; and this becomes, through Infirmity, implicit Faith; and the name Sectary pertains to ſuch a Diſciple.

Schiſm is a Rent or Diviſion in the Church, when it comes to the ſeparating of Congregations; and may alſo happen to a true Church, as well as to a falſe; yet in the true needs not tend to the breaking of Communion, if they can agree in the right Adminiſtration of that wherin they communicate, keeping thir other Opinions to themſelves, not being deſtructive to Faith. The Phariſees and Saduces were two Sects, yet both met together in thir common Worſhip of God at Jeruſalem. But here the Papiſt will angrily demand, what! Are Lutherans, Calviniſts, Anabaptiſts, Socinians, Arminians, no Heretics? I anſwer, all theſe may have ſome Errors, but are no Heretics. Hereſie is in the Will and Choice profeſtly againſt Scripture; Error is againſt the Will, in miſunderſtanding the Scripture after all ſincere Endeavours to underſtand it rightly: Hence it was ſaid well by one of the Ancients, Err I may, but a Heretic I will not be. It is a human Frailty to err, and no Man is infallible here on Earth. But ſo long as all theſe profeſs to ſet the Word of God only before them as the Rule of Faith and Obedience; and uſe all Diligence and Sincerity of Heart, by Reading, by Learning, by Study, by Prayer for Illumination of the holy Spirit, to underſtand the Rule and obey it, they have done what Man can do: God will aſſuredly pardon them, as he did the Friends of Job, good and pious Men, though much miſtaken, as there it appears, in ſome Points of Doctrin. But ſom will ſay, with Chriſtians it is otherwiſe, whom God hath promis'd by his Spirit to teach all things. True, all things abſolutely neceſſary to Salvation: But the hotteſt Diſputes among Proteſtants, calmly and charitably enquir'd into, will be found leſs than ſuch. The Lutheran holds Conſubſtantiation; an Error indeed, but not mortal. The Calviniſt is taxt with Predeſtination, and to make God the Author of Sin; not with any diſhonourable Thought of God, but it may be over zealouſly aſſerting his abſolute Power, not without Plea of Scripture. The Anabaptiſt is accus'd of denying Infants thir Right to Baptiſm; again they ſay, they deny nothing but what the Scripture denies them. The Arian and Socinian are charg'd to diſpute againſt the Trinity: they affirm to believe the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, according to Scripture and the Apoſtolic Creed; as for terms of Trinity, Triniunity, Coeſſentiality, Triperſonality, and the like, they reject them as Scholaſtic Notions, not to be found in Scripture, which by a general Proteſtant Maxim is plain and perſpicuous abundantly to explain its own meaning in the propereſt Words, belonging to ſo high a Matter, and ſo neceſſary to be known; a Myſtery indeed in thir Sophiſtic Subtilties, tilties, but in Scripture a plain Doctrin. Their other Opinions are of leſs moment. They diſpute the Satisfaction of Chriſt, or rather the word Satiſfaction, as not Scriptural: but they acknowledg him both God and their Saviour. The Arminian laſtly is condemn'd for ſetting up Free Will againſt Free Grace; but that Imputation he diſclaims in all his Writings, and grounds himſelf largely upon Scripture only. It cannot be deny'd that the Authors or late Revivers of all theſe Sects or Opinions were learned, worthy, zealous, and religious Men, as appears by thir Lives written, and the ſame of thir many eminent and learned Followers, perfect and powerful in the Scriptures, holy and unblamable in thir Lives: and it cannot be imagin'd that God would deſert ſuch painful and zealous Laborers in his Church, and oft-times great Sufferers for thir Conſcience, to damnable Errors and a reprobate Senſe, who had ſo often implor'd the Aſſiſtance of his Spirit; but rather, having made no Man infallible, that he hath pardon'd thir Errors, and accepts thir pious Endeavours, ſincerely ſearching all things according to the Rule of Scripture, with ſuch Guidance and Direction as they can obtain of God by Prayer. What Proteſtant then who himſelf maintains the ſame Principles, and diſavows all implicit Faith, would perſecute, and not rather charitably tolerate ſuch Men as theſe, unleſs he mean to abjure the Principles of his own Religion? If it be ask'd how far they ſhould be tolerated? I anſwer, doubtleſs equally, as being all Proteſtants; that is on all occaſions to give account of thir Faith, either by arguing, preaching in thir ſeveral Aſſemblies, publick writing, and the freedom of Printing. For if the French and Polonian Proteſtants injoy all this Liberty among Papiſts, much more may a Proteſtant juſtly expect it among Proteſtants; and yet ſomtimes here among us, the one perſecutes the other upon every ſlight pretence.

But he is wont to ſay, he enjoyns only things indifferent. Let them be ſo ſtill; who gave him Authority to change thir Nature by injoyning them? If by his own Principles, as is prov'd, he ought to tolerate controverted Points of Doctrin not ſlightly grounded on Scripture, much more ought he not impoſe things indifferent without Scripture. In Religion nothing is indifferent, but, if it come once to be impos'd, is either a Command or a Prohibition, and ſo conſequently an addition to the Word of God, which he profeſſes to diſallow. Beſides, how unequal, how uncharitable muſt it needs be, to impoſe that which his Conſcience cannot urge him to impoſe, upon him whoſe Conſcience forbids him to obey? What can it be but love of Contention for things not neceſſary to be don, to moleſt the Conſcience of his Brother, who holds them neceſſary to be not don? To conclude, let ſuch an one but call to mind his own Principles above-mention'd, and he muſt neceſſarily grant, that neither he can impoſe, nor the other believe or obey ought in Religion, but from the Word of God only. More amply to underſtand this may be read the 14*th* and 15*th* Chapters to the Romans, and the Contents of the 14*th*, ſet forth no doubt but with full Authority of the Church of England; the Gloſs is this: Men may not contemn or condemn one the other for things indifferent. And in the 6*th* Article above mention'd, whatſoever is not read in Holy Scripture, nor may be proved therby, is not to be required of any Man as an Article of Faith, or neceſſary to Salvation. And certainly what is not ſo, is not to be required at all; as being an Addition to the Word of God expreſly forbidden.

Thus this long and hot Conteſt, whether Proteſtants ought to tolerate one another, if Men will be but rational and not partial, may be ended without need of more Words to compoſe it.

Let us now enquire whether Popery be tolerable or no. Popery is a double thing to deal with, and claims a twofold Power, Eccleſiaſtical and Political, both uſurpt, and the one ſupporting the other.

But Eccleſiaſtical is ever pretended to Political. The Pope by this mixt Faculty pretends Right to Kingdoms and States, and eſpecially to this of England, thrones and unthrones Kings, and abſolves the People from thir Obedience to them; ſomtimes interdicts to whole Nations the Public Worſhip of God, ſhutting up thir Churches: and was wont to dreign away greateſt part of the Wealth of this then miſerable Land, as part of his Patrimony, to maintain the Pride and Luxury of his Court and Prelats: and now ſince, through the infinite Mercy and Favour of God, we have ſhaken off his Babyloniſh Yoke, hath not ceas'd by his Spies and Agents, Bulls and Emiſſaries, once to deſtroy both King and Parliament; perpetually to ſeduce, corrupt, and pervert as many as they can of the People. Whether therfore it be fit or reaſonable, to tolerate Men thus principl'd in Religion towards the State, I ſubmit it to the conſideration of all Magiſtrates, who are beſt able to provide for thir own and the public Safety. As for tolerating the exerciſe of thir Religion, ſuppoſing thir State-Activities not to be dangerous, I anſwer, that Toleration is either public or private; and the exerciſe of thir Religion, as far as it is idolatrous, can be tolerated neither way: not publicly, without grievous and unſufferable Scandal giv'n to all conſcientious Beholders; not privately, without great Offence to God, declar'd againſt all kind of Idolatry, though ſecret. Ezek. 8. 7, 8. And he brought me to the door of the Court, and when I looked, behold a hole in the Wall. Then ſaid he unto me, Son of Man, dig now in the Wall; and when I had digged, behold a door; and he ſaid unto me, go in, and behold the wicked Abominations that they do here. And ver. 12. Then ſaid he unto me, Son of Man, haſt thou ſeen what the Ancients of the houſe of Iſrael do in the dark? &c. And it appears by the whole Chapter, that God was no leſs offended with theſe ſecret Idolatries, than with thoſe in public; and no leſs provok'd, than to bring on and haſten his Judgments on the whole Land for theſe alſo.

Having ſhown thus, that Popery, as being idolatrous, is not to be tolerated either in public or in private; it muſt be now thought how to remove it and hinder the growth thereof, I mean in our Natives, and not Foreiners, privileg'd by the Law of Nations. Are we to puniſh them by corporal Puniſhment, or Fines in thir Eſtates, upon account of thir Religion? I ſuppoſe it ſtands not with the Clemency of the Goſpel, more than what appertains to the Security of the State: But firſt we muſt remove thir Idolatry, and all the Furniture therof, whether Idols, or the Maſs wherin they adore thir God under Bread and Wine: for the Commandment forbids to adore, not only any graven Image, but the likeneſs of any thing in Heaven above, or in the Earth beneath, or in the Water under the Earth; thou ſhalt not bow down to them, nor worſhip them, for I the Lord thy God am a jealous God. If they ſay that by removing thir Idols we violate thir Conſciences, we have no warrant to regard Conſcience which is not grounded on Scripture: and they themſelves confeſs in thir late Defences, that they hold not thir Images neceſſary to Salvation, but only as they are enjoyn'd them by Tradition.

Shall we condeſcend to diſpute with them? The Scripture is our only Principle in Religion; and by that only they will not be judg'd, but will add other Principles of thir own, which, forbidden by the Word of God, we cannot aſſent to. And [in ſeveral places of the Goſpel] the common Maxim alſo in Logic is, againſt them who deny Principles, we are not to diſpute. Let them bound thir Diſputations on the Scripture only, and an ordinary Proteſtant, well read in the Bible, may turn and wind thir Doctors. They will not go about to prove thir Idolatries by the Word of God, but run to Shifts and Evaſions, and frivolous Diſtinctions: Idols they ſay are Laymens Books, and a great means to ſtir up pious Thoughts and Devotion in the learnedſt. I ſay they are no means of God's appointing, but plainly the contrary: Let them hear the Prophets; Jer. 10. 8. The Stock is a Doctrin of Vanities. Hab. 2. 18. What profiteth the graven Image that the Maker therof hath graven it: The Molten Image and a Teacher of Lies? But they allege in thir late Anſwers, that the Laws of Moſes giv'n only to the Jews, concern not us under the Goſpel: and remember not that Idolatry is forbidden as expreſly, but with theſe Wiles and Fallacies compaſſing Sea and Land, like the Phariſees of old, to make one Proſelite, they lead away privily many ſimple and ignorant Souls, Men or Women, and make them twofold more the Children of Hell than themſelves, Mat. 23. 15. But the Apoſtle hath well warn'd us, I may ſay, from ſuch Deceivers as theſe, for thir Myſtery was then working. I beſeech you, Brethren, ſaith he, mark them which cauſe Diviſions and Offences, contrary to the Doctrin which ye have learned, and avoid them; for they that are ſuch ſerve not our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, but thir own Belly, and by good Words and fair Speeches deceive the Heart of the ſimple, Rom. 16. 17, 18.

The next means to hinder the growth of Popery will be to read duly and diligently the Holy Scriptures, which as St. Paul ſaith to Timothy, who had known them from a Child, are able to make wiſe unto Salvation. And to the whole Church of Coloſſi; Let the word of Chriſt dwell in you plentifully, with all Wiſdom, Col. 3. 16. The Papal Antichriſtian Church permits not her Laity to read the Bible in thir own Tongue: Our Church on the contrary hath propos'd it to all men, and to this end tranſlated it into Engliſh, with profitable Notes on what is met with obſcure, though what is moſt neceſſary to be known be ſtill plaineſt; that all ſorts and degrees of men, not underſtanding the Original, may read it in thir Mother Tongue. Neither let the Countryman, the Tradeſman, the Lawyer, the Phyſician, the Sateſman, excuſe himſelf by his much Buſineſs from the ſtudious reading thereof. Our Saviour ſaith, Luke 10. 41, 42. Thou art careful and troubled about many things, but one thing is needful. If they were ask'd, they would be loth to ſet earthly things, Wealth, or Honour before the wiſdom of Salvation. Yet moſt men in the courſe and practice of thir Lives are found to do ſo; and through unwillingneſs to take the pains of underſtanding thir Religion by thir own diligent ſtudy, would fain be ſav'd by a Deputy. Hence comes implicit Faith, ever learning and never taught, much hearing and ſmall proficience, till want of Fundamental Knowledg eaſily turns to Superſtition or Popery: Therfore the Apoſtle admoniſhes, Epheſ. 4. 14. That we henceforth be no more Children, toſſed to and fro and carryed about with every wind of Doctrin, by the ſleight of men, and cunning craftineſs wherby they lie in wait to deceive. Every member of the Church, at leaſt of any breeding or capacity, ſo well ought to be grounded in ſpiritual Knowledg, as, if need be, to examin thir Teachers themſelves, Acts 17. 11. They ſearched the Scriptures daily, whether thoſe things were ſo. Rev. 2. 2. Thou haſt tried them which ſay they are Apoſtles, and are not. How ſhould any private Chriſtian try his Teachers, unleſs he be well grounded himſelf in the Rule of Scripture, by which he is taught. As therfore among Papiſts, thir ignorance in Scripture chiefly upholds Popery; ſo among Proteſtant People, the frequent and ſerious reading therof will ſooneſt pull Popery down.

Another means to abate Popery, ariſes from the conſtant reading of Scripture, wherin Believers who agree in the main, are every where exhorted to mutual Forbearance and Charity one towards the other, though diſſenting in ſom Opinions. It is written that the Coat of our Saviour was without Seam; whence ſom would infer, that there ſhould be no diviſion in the Church of Chriſt. It ſhould be ſo indeed; yet Seams in the ſame Cloth, neither hurt the Garment, nor misbecom it; and not only Seams, but Schiſms will be while men are fallible: But if they who diſſent in matters not eſſential to Belief, while the common Adverſary is in the Field, ſhall ſtand jarring and pelting at one another, they will be ſoon routed and ſubdued. The Papiſt with open mouth makes much advantage of our ſeveral Opinions; not that he is able to confute the worſt of them, but that we by our continual jangle among our ſelves make them worſe than they are indeed. To ſave our ſelves therfore, and reſiſt the common enemy, it concerns us mainly to agree within our ſelves, that with joint Forces we may not only hold our own, but get ground; and why ſhould we not? The Goſpel commands us to tolerate one another, though of various Opinions, and hath promiſed a good and happy event therof; Phil. 3. 15. Let us therfore, as many as be perfect, be thus minded; and if in any thing ye be otherwiſe minded, God ſhall reveal even this unto you. And we are bid 1 Theſſ. 5. 21. Prove all things, hold faſt that which is good. St. Paul judg'd that not only to tolerate, but to examin and prove all things, was no danger to our holding faſt of that which is good. How ſhall we prove all things, which includes all opinions at leaſt founded on Scripture, unleſs we not only tolerate them, but patiently hear them, and ſeriouſly read them? If he who thinks himſelf in the truth, profeſſes to have learnt it, not by implicit Faith, but by attentive ſtudy of the Scriptures, and full perſwaſion of Heart; with what Equity can he refuſe to hear or read him, who demonſtrates to have gained his knowledg by the ſame way? Is it a fair courſe to aſſert Truth by arrogating to himſelf the only freedom of Speech, and ſtopping the Mouths of others equally gifted? This is the direct way to bring in that Papiſtical implicit Faith which we all diſclaim. They pretend it would unſettle the weaker ſort; the ſame groundleſs fear is pretended by the Romiſh Clergy. At leaſt then let them have leave to write in Latin, which the common People underſtand not; that what they hold may be diſcuſt among the Learned only. We ſuffer the idolatrous Books of Papiſts, without this fear, to be ſold and read as common as our own: Why not much rather of Anabaptiſts, Arians, Arminians, and Socinians? There is no Learned man but will confeſs he hath much profited by reading Controverſies, his Senſes awakt, his Judgment ſharpn'd, and the Truth which he holds more firmly eſtabliſh't. If then it be profitable for him to read, why ſhould it not at leaſt be tolerable and free for his Adverſary to write? In Logic they teach, that contraries laid together more evidently appear: it follows then that all Controverſy being permitted, Falſhood will appear more falſe, and Truth the more true; which muſt needs conduce much, not only to the confounding of Popery, but to the general confirmation of unimplicit Truth.

The laſt means to avoid Popery, is to amend our Lives: it is a general Complaint that this Nation of late years, is grown more numerouſly and exceſſively vitious than heretofore; Pride, Luxury, Drunkenneſs, Whoredom, Curſing, Swearing, bold and open Atheiſm every where abounding: where theſe grow, no wonder if Popery alſo grow apace. There is no man ſo wicked, but at ſomtimes his Conſcience will wring him with thoughts of another World, and the peril of his Soul; the trouble and melancholy which he conceives of true Repentance and Amendment he endures not, but enclines rather to ſom carnal Superſtition, which may pacify and lull his Conſcience with ſom more pleaſing Doctrin. None more ready and officious to offer her ſelf than the Romiſh, and opens wide her Office, with all her faculties, to receive him; eaſy Confeſſion, eaſy Abſolution, Pardons, Indulgences, Maſſes for him both quick and dead, Agnus Dei's, Reliques, and the like: and he, inſtead of working out his Salvation with fear and trembling, ſtrait thinks in his Heart (like another kind of Fool than he in the Pſalms) to bribe God as a corrupt Judg; and by his Proctor, ſome Prieſt, or Fryer, to buy out his Peace with Mony, which he cannot with his Repentance. For God, when men ſin outragiouſly, and will not be admoniſh'd, gives over chaſtizing them, perhaps by Peſtilence, Fire, Sword, or Famin, which may all turn to thir good, and takes up his ſevereſt Puniſhments, hardneſs, beſottedneſs of Heart, and Idolatry, to thir final Perdition. Idolatry brought the Heathen to hainous Tranſgreſſions, Rom. 2. And hainous Tranſgreſſions oftimes bring the ſlight Profeſſors of true Religion, to groſs Idolatry: 1 Theſſ. 2. 11, 12. For this cauſe God ſhall ſend them ſtrong Deluſion that they ſhould believe a Lie, that they all might be damn'd who believe not the Truth, but had pleaſure in Unrighteouſneſs. And Iſaiah 44. 18. Speaking of Idolaters, They have not known nor underſtood, for he hath ſhut thir Eyes that they cannot ſee, and thir Hearts that they cannot underſtand. Let us therfore, uſing this laſt means, laſt here ſpoken of, but firſt to be don, amend our Lives with all ſpeed; leſt through impenitency we run into that Stupidity, which we now ſeek all means ſo warily to avoid, the worſt of Superſtitions, and the heavieſt of all God's Judgments, Popery.

The PREFACE.

THE ſtudy of Geography is both profitable and delightful; but the Writers therof, though ſom of them exact enough in ſetting down Longitudes and Latitudes, yet in thoſe other relations of Manners, Religion, Government, and ſuch like, accounted Geographical, have for the moſt part miſs'd thir proportions. Som too brief and deficient ſatisfy not; others too voluminous and impertinent cloy and weary out the Reader, while they tell long Stories of abſurd Superſtitions, Ceremonies, quaint Habits, and other petty Circumſtances little to the purpoſe. Wherby that which is uſeful, and only worth obſervation, in ſuch a wood of words, is either overſlipt, or ſoon forgotten; which perhaps brought into the mind of ſome men more learned and judicious, who had not the leiſure or purpoſe to write an entire Geography, yet at leaſt to aſſay ſomthing in the deſcription of one or two Countries, which might be as a Pattern or Example to render others more cautious herafter, who intended the whole work. And this perhaps induc'd Paulus Jovius to deſcribe only Moſcovy and Britain. Some ſuch thoughts, many years ſince, led me at a vacant time to attempt the like argument, and I began with Muſcovy, as being the moſt northern Region of Europe reputed civil; and the more northern parts therof, firſt diſcovered by Engliſh Voyages. Wherin I ſaw I had by much the advantage of Jovius. What was ſcatter'd in many Volumes, and obſerv'd at ſeveral times by Eye-witneſſes, with no curſory pains I laid together, to ſave the Reader a far longer travail of wandring through ſo many deſert Authors; who yet with ſome delight drew me after them, from the eaſtern Bounds of Ruſſia, to the Walls of Cathay, in ſeveral late Journeys made thither overland by Ruſſians, who deſcribe the Countries in thir way far otherwiſe then our common Geographers. From proceeding further, other occaſions diverted me. This Eſſay, ſuch as it is, was thought by ſome, who knew of it, not amiſs to be publiſhed; that ſo many things remarkable, diſpers'd before, now brought under one view, might not hazard to be otherwiſe loſt, nor the labour loſt of collecting them.

yond them to Aſtracan, Tartars of Mangat, and Nagay; on the right ſide thoſe of Crimme. From Moſco to Aſtracan is about 600 Leagues. The Town is ſituate in an Iſland on a Hill-ſide wall'd with Earth, but the Caſtle with Earth and Timber; the Houſes, except that of the Governor's, and ſome few others, poor and ſimple; the Ground utterly barren, and without Wood: they live there on Fiſh, and Sturgeon eſpecially; which hanging up to dry in the Streets and Houſes, brings whole ſwarms of Flies, and infection to the Air, and oft great Peſtilence. This Iſland in length 12 leagues, 3 in breadth, is the Ruſſian limit toward the Caſpian, which he keeps with a ſtrong Gariſon, being 20 Leagues from that Sea, into which Volga falls at 70 mouths. From Saint Nicholas, or from Moſco to the Caſpian, they paſs in 46 days and nights, moſt part by Water.

Weſt. Novogrod. 365. Weſt-ward from Saint Nicholas 1200 miles is the City Novogrod 58 degrees, the greateſt Mart-town of all this Dominion, and in bigneſs not inferior to Moſco. The way thither is through the weſtern bottom of Saint Nicholas Bay, and ſo along the Shoar full of dangerous Rocks to the Monaſtery Soloſky, wherin are at leaſt 200 Monks; the People therabout in a manner Savages, yet Tenants to thoſe Monks. Thence to the dangerous River Owiga, wherin are Waterfalls as ſteep as from a Mountain, and by the violence of thir deſcent kept from freezing: ſo that the Boats are to be carried there a mile over land; which the Tenants of that Abby did by command, and were guides to the Merchants without taking any reward. Thence to the Town Povenſa ſtanding within a mile of the famous Lake Onega 320 miles long, and in ſom places 70, at narroweſt 25 broad, and of great depth. Thence by ſom Monaſteries to the River Swire; then into the Lake Ladiſcay much longer then Onega; after which into the River Volhusky, which through the midſt of Novogrod runs into this Lake, and this Lake into the Baltick ſound by Narv and Revel. Thir other Cities toward the weſtern bound are Pleſco, Smolensko, or Vobſco.

Government. Hack. 243. The Emperor exerciſeth abſolute power: if any man die without male Iſſue, his Land returns to the Emperor. Any rich man who through age or other impotence is unable to ſerve the Publick, being inform'd of, is turn'd out of his Eſtate, and forc'd with his Family to live on a ſmall Penſion, while ſome other more deſerving is by the Duke's autority put into poſſeſſion. The manner of informing the Duke is thus. Your Grace, ſaith one, hath ſuch a Subject, abounding with Riches, but for ſervice of the State unmeet, and you have others poor and in want, but well able to do thir Country good ſervice. Immediately the Duke ſends forth to enquire, and calling the rich man before him, Friend, ſaith he, you have too much Living, and are unſerviceable to your Prince; leſs will ſerve you, and the reſt maintain others who deſerve more. The man thus call'd to impart his Wealth repines not, but humbly anſwers, that all he hath is God's and the Duke's, as if he made reſtitution of what more juſtly was anothers than parted with his own. Every Gentleman hath rule and juſtice over his own Tenants: if the Tenants of two Gentlemen agree not, they ſeek to compoſe it; if they cannot, each brings his Tenant before the high Judg of that Country. They have no Lawyers, but every man pleads his own Cauſe, or elſe by Bill or Anſwer in writing delivers it with his own hands to the Duke: yet Juſtice, by corruption of inferior Officers, is much perverted. Where other proof is wanting, they may try the matter by perſonal Combat, or by Champion. If a Debtor be poor, he becomes bondman to the Duke, who lets Hac. 309. out his labour till it pay the Debt; till then he remains in bondage. Another trial they have by Lots.

Revenues. The Revenues of the Emperor are what he liſt, and what his Subjects are able; and he omits not the courſeſt means to raiſe them: for in every good Town there is a drunken Tavern, call'd a Curſemay, which the Emperor either Hac. 314. lets out to farm, or beſtows on ſom Duke, or Gentleman in reward of his Service, who for that time is Lord of the whole Town, robbing and ſpoiling at his pleaſure, till being well enricht, he is ſent at his own charge to the Wars, and there ſqueez'd of his ill got wealth; by which means the waging of War is to the Emperor little or nothing chargeable.

Forces. Hac. 239. 250. The Ruſſian armeth not leſs in time of war then 300000 men, half of whom he takes with him into the Field, the reſt beſtows in Gariſons on the Borders. He preſſeth no Husbandman or Merchant, but the Youth of the Realm. He uſeth no Foot, but ſuch as are Pioneers, or Gunners, of both which ſort 30000. The being Horſemen, are all Archers, and ride with a ſhort Stirrup after the Turkiſh. Thir Armour is a Coat of Plate, and a Scull on thir Heads. Som of thir Coats are cover'd with Velvet, or cloth of Gold; for they deſire to be gorgeous in Arms, but the Duke himſelf above meaſure; his Pavilion cover'd with Cloth of Gold or Silver, ſet with precious Stones. They uſe little Drums at the Saddle bow inſtead of Spurs, for at the ſound thereof the Horſes run more ſwiftly.

They fight without order; nor willingly give battail, but by ſtealth or ambuſh. Hac. 314.
Of Cold and hard Diet marvelouſly patient; for when the Ground is 250.
cover'd with Snow froz'n a yard thick, the common Souldier will lie in the Field two months together without Tent, or covering over head; only hangs up his Mantle againſt that part from whence the Weather drives, and kindling a little fire, lies him down before it, with his Back under the Wind: his Drink the cold Stream mingl'd with Oat-meal, and the ſame all his Food: his Horſe fed with green Wood and Bark, ſtands all this while in the open Field, yet does his ſervice. The Emperor gives no pay at all, but to Strangers; yet repairs good deſerts in War with certain Lands during life; and they who ofteneſt are ſent to the Wars, think themſelves moſt favour'd, tho ſerving without Wages. Hac. 316.
On the 12*th* of December yearly, the Emperor rides into the Field, which is without the City, with all his Nobility, on Jennets and Turky Horſes in great ſtate; before him 5000 Harquebuſiers, who ſhoot at a Bank of Ice, till they beat it down; the Ordnance, which they have very fair of all ſorts, they plant againſt two wooden Houſes fill'd with Earth at leaſt 30 foot thick, and beginning with the ſmalleſt, ſhoot them all off thrice over, having beat thoſe two Houſes flat. Above the reſt 6 great Cannon they have, whoſe Bullet is a yard high, ſo that a man may ſee it flying: then out of Mortar-pieces they ſhoot Wild-fire into the Air. Thus the Emperor having ſeen what his Gunners can do, returns home in the ſame order.

They follow the Greek Church, but with exceſs of Superſtitions: thir Service Religion.

They have many great and rich Monaſteries, where they keep great hoſpitality. 320.
That of Trojetes hath in it 700 Friers, and is wall'd about with Brick very ſtrongly, having many pieces of Braſs Ordnance on the Walls; moſt of the Lands, Towns, and Villages within 40 miles belong to thoſe Monks, who are alſo as great Merchants as any in the Land. During Eaſter Holy-daies when two Friends meet, they take each other by the hand; one of them ſaying, The Lord is riſen; the other anſwering, It is ſo of a truth; and then they kiſs, 318.

But there is no People that live ſo miſerably as the Poor of Ruſſia; if they have Straw and Water, they make ſhift to live; for Straw dry'd and ſtampt in Winter time is thir Bread; in Summer Graſs and Roots; at all times Bark of Trees is good Meat with them; yet many of them die in the Street for hunger, none relieving or regarding them.

Habit. 239. When they are ſent into Foreign Countries, or that Strangers come thither, they are very ſumptuous in apparel, elſe the Duke himſelf goes but meanly.

Travailing. 314. In Winter they travail only upon Sleds, the Ways being hard and ſmooth with Snow, the Rivers all froz'n: one Horſe with a Sled will draw a man 400 miles in 3 days; in Summer the way is deep, and travailing ill. The Ruſſe of better ſort goes not out in Winter, but on his Sled; in Summer on his Horſe: in his Sled he ſits on a Carpet, or a white Bears skin; the Sled drawn with a horſe well deckt, with many Fox or Wolve-tails about his neck, guided by a Boy on his back, other Servants riding on the tail of the Sled.

Beaſts. 252. The Ruſſian Sea breeds a certain Beaſt which they call a Morſe, who ſeeks his Food on the Rocks, climbing up with help of his Teeth; wherof they make as great account as we of the Elephant's tooth.

CHAP. II.

Of Samoedia, Siberia, and other Countries North Eaſt, ſubject to the Muſcovites.

NOrth Eaſt of Ruſſia lieth Samoedia by the River Ob. This Country was firſt diſcover'd by Oneke a Ruſſian; who firſt trading privatly among them in rich Furs, got great Wealth, and the knowledg of thir Country; then reveal'd his diſcovery to Boris Protector to Pheodor, ſhewing how beneficial that Country gain'd, would be to the Empire. Who ſending Ambaſſadors among them gallantly attir'd, by fair means won thir ſubjection to the Empire, every Head paying yearly two skins of richeſt Sables. Thoſe Meſſengers travailing alſo 200 leagues beyond Ob Eaſtward, made report of pleaſant Countries, abounding with Woods and Fountains, and people riding on Elks and Loſhes; others drawn on Sleds by Rain-deer; others by Dogs as ſwift as Deer. The Samoeds that came along with thoſe Meſſengers, returning to Moſco, admir'd the ſtatelineſs of that City, and were as much admir'd for excellent Shooters, hitting every time the breadth of a penny, as far diſtant as hardly could be diſcern'd.

Purch. part 3. 543, 540. The River Ob is reported by the Ruſſes to be in breadth the ſailing of a Summer's day: but full of Iſlands and Shoals, having neither Woods, nor, till of late, Inhabitants. Out of Ob they turn into the River Tawze. The Ruſſians have here, ſince the Samoeds yielded them ſubjection, two Governours with 3 or 400 Gunners; have built Villages and ſome ſmall Caſtles; all which place they call Mongozey or Molgomſay. Molgomſay. 524. 526. Furthe[illegible]p-land they have alſo built other Cities of Wood, conſiſting chiefly of Poles, Tartars and Ruſſes, fugitive or condemned men; as Vergateria, Siber, whence the whole Country is nam'd Tinna, thence Tobolſca on this ſide Ob, on the Rivers Irtis, and Tobol, chief Seat of the Ruſſian Governour; above that, Zergolta in an Iſland of Ob, where they have a Cuſtom-houſe, beyond 526, 527. that on the other ſide Ob, Narim, and Tooina now a great City. Certain Churches alſo are erected in thoſe Parts; but no man forc'd to Religion; beyond Narim eaſt ward on the River Telta is built the Caſtle of Comgoſcoi, and all this Plantation began ſince the year 1590. with many other Towns like theſe. And theſe are the Countries from whence come all the Sables and rich Furs.

Manners of the Samoeds. 522, 555. The Samoeds have no Towns or certain place of abode, but up and down where they find Moſs for thir Deer; they live in companies peaceably, and are govern'd by ſome of the antienteſt amongſt them, but are Idolaters. They ſhoot wondrous cunningly: thir Arrow heads are ſharpned Stones, or Fiſhbones, which latter ſerve them alſo for Needles; thir Thread being the Sinews of certain ſmall Beaſts, wherwith they ſow the Furs which clothe them; the furry ſide in Summer outward, in Winter inward. They have many Wives, and thir Daughters they ſell to him who bids moſt; which, if they be not lik'd, are turn'd back to thir Friends, the Husband allowing only to the Father what the Marriage Feaſt ſtood him in. Wives are brought to bed there by thir Husbands, and the next day go about as before. They till not the ground; but live on the Fleſh of thoſe wild Beaſts which they hunt. They are the only Guides to ſuch as travail Jougoria, Siberia, or any of thoſe North-East parts in Winter; being drawn on Sleds with Bucks, riding poſt day and 548.

night, if it be moon-light, and lodg on the Snow under Tents of Deer Skins in whatever place they find enough of white Moſs to feed thir Sled-Stags, turning them looſe to dig it up themſelves out of the deep Snow: another Samoed ſtepping to the next Wood, brings in ſtore of firing: round about which they lodg within thir Tents, leaving the top open to vent Smoak; in which manner they are as warm as the Stoves in Ruſſia. They carry Proviſion of meat with them, and partake beſides of what Fowl or Veniſon the Samoed kills with ſhooting by the way; thir drink is melted Snow. Two Deer being yok'd to a Sled riding poſt, will draw 200 miles in 24 hours without reſting, and laden with thir Stuff will draw it 30 miles in 12.

them in the Mountains, and then return with thir Cattel to the Plain. The Tingoeſi are a very gentle Nation, they have great ſwoln Throats, like thoſe in Manners.

ſubmitted to the Ruſſian Government: and at thir requeſt travailing the next year to diſcover ſtill Eaſtward, they came at length to a River, which the Savages of that place call'd Piſida, ſomewhat leſs than Jeniſſey; beyond which 528.
hearing oft-times the towling of Brazen Bells, and ſomtimes the noiſe of Men and Horſes, they durſt not paſs over; they ſaw there certain Sails afar off, ſquare, and therfore ſuppos'd to be like Indian or China Sails, and the rather for that they report that great Guns have been heard ſhot off from thoſe Veſſels. In April and May they were much delighted with the fair proſpect of that Country, repleniſh'd with many rare Trees, Plants and Flowers, Beaſts and Fowl. Some think here to be the Borders of Tangut in the 543.
north of Cathay. Some of thoſe Samoeds about the year 1610, travail'd ſo far 546.
till they came in view of a white City, and heard a great din of Bells, and report there came to them Men all arm'd in Iron from head to foot. And in the year 1611. divers out of Cathay, and others from Alteen Czar, who ſtiles himſelf the golden King, came and traded at Zergolta, or Surgoot, on the River Ob, bringing with them Plates of Silver. Wherupon Michael Pheodorowick the Ruſſian Emperor, in the year 1619. ſent certain of his people from Tooma to Alteen, and Cathay, who return'd with Ambaſſadors from thoſe Princes. Theſe relate, that 797.
from Tooma in ten days and a half, three days wherof over a Lake, where Rubies and Saphirs grow, they came to the Alteen King, or King of Alty; through his Land in five weeks they paſs'd into the Country of Sheromugaly, or Mugalla, where reigned a Queen call'd Manchica; whence in four days they came to the Borders of Cathay, fenc'd with a ſtone Wall, 15 fathom high; along the ſide of which, having on the other hand many pretty Towns belonging to Queen Manchica, they travail'd ten days without ſeeing any on the Wall till they came to the Gate; where they ſaw very great Ordnance lying, and 3000 men in watch. They traffic with other Nations at the Gate, and very few at once are ſuffered to enter. They were travailing from Tooma to this Gate 12 weeks; and from thence to the great City of Cathay ten days. Where being conducted to the Houſe of Ambaſſadors, within a few days there came a Secretary from King Tambur with 200 Men well apparell'd, and riding on Aſſes, to feaſt them with divers ſorts of Wine, and to demand thir Meſſage; but having brought no Preſents with them, they could not be admitted to his ſight; only with his Letter to the Emperor they return'd as is aforeſaid to Tobolſca. They report that the Land of Mugalla reaches from Boghar to the North 799. Sea, and hath many Caſtles built of Stone four-ſquare, with Towers at the Corners cover'd with glazed Tiles; and on the Gates Alarum-Bells, or Watch-Bells, twenty pound weight of Metal; thir Houſes built alſo of Stone, the Ceelings cunningly painted with Flowers of all Colours. The People are Idolaters; the Country exceeding fruitful. They have Aſſes and Mules, but no Horſes. The people of Cathay ſay that this great Wall ſtretches from Boghar to the North Sea, four months journey, with continual Towers a flight ſhot diſtant from each other, and Beacons on every Tower; and that this Wall is the bound between Mugalla and Cathay. In which are but five Gates; thoſe narrow, and ſo low that a Horſe-man ſitting upright cannot ride in. Next to the Wall is the City Shirokalga; it hath a Caſtle well furniſh'd with ſhort Ordnance and ſmall ſhot, which they who keep watch on the Gates, Towers and Walls, duly at Sun-ſet and riſing diſcharge thrice over. The City abounds with rich Merchandize, Velvets, Damasks, Cloth of Gold and Tiſſue, with many ſorts of Sugars. Like to this is the City Tara, thir Markets ſmell odoriferouſly with Spices, and Tayth more rich than that. Shirooan yet more magnificent, half a day's journey through, and exceeding populous. From hence to Cathaia the Imperial City is two days journey, built of white ſtone four ſquare, in circuit four days going, corner'd with four white Towers, very high and great, and others very fair along the Wall, white intermingl'd with blew, and Loop-holes furniſht with Ordnance. In midſt of this white City ſtands a Caſtle built of Magnet, where the King dwels, in a ſumptuous Palace, the top wherof is overlaid with Gold. The City ſtands on even ground encompaſs'd with the River Touga, 7 days journey from the Sea. The People are very fair, but not warlike, delighting moſt in rich Traffick. Theſe Relations are referr'd hither, becauſe 806. we have them from Ruſſians; who report alſo, that there is a Sea beyond Ob ſo warm that all kind of Sea-Fowl live therabout as well in Winter as in Summer. Thus much briefly of the Sea and Lands between Ruſſia and Cathay.

CHAP. IV.

Hac. vol. 1. 221. The Succeſſion of Moſcovia Dukes and Emperors, taken out of thir Chronicles by a Polack, with ſome later Additions.

THE Great Dukes of Muſcovy derive thir Pedegree, though without ground, from Auguſtus Cæſar: whom they fable to have ſent certain of his Kindred to be Governours over many remote Provinces; and among them, Pruſſus over Pruſſia; him to have had his Seat on the eaſtern Baltick Shore by the River Wixel; of whom Rurek, Sinaus, and Truuor deſcended by the fourth Generation, were by the Ruſſians, living then without Civil Government, ſent for in 573. the year 573. to bear rule over them, at the perſwaſion of Goſtomiſlius chief Citizen of Novogrod. They therfore taking with them Olecus thir Kinſman, divided thoſe Countries among themſelves, and each in his Province taught them Civil Government.

Ivarſon of Rurek, the reſt dying without Iſſue, became Succeſſor to them all; being left in nonage under the protection of Olechus. He took to Wiſe Olha Daughter to a Citizen of Pleſco, of whom he begat Stoſlaus; but after that being ſlain by his Enemies, Olha his Wife went to Conſtantinople, and was there baptiz'd Helena.

Stoſlaus fought many Battels with his Enemies; but was at length by them ſlain, who made a Cup of his Scull engrav'n with this Sentence in Gold; Seeking after other Mens he loſt his own. His Sons were Teropolchus, Olega and Volodimir.

Volodimir having ſlain the other two, made himſelf ſole Lord of Ruſſia; yet after that fact enclining to Chriſtian Religion, had to Wiſe Anna Siſter of Baſilius and Conſtantine Greek Emperors; and with all his People in the year 988, was baptiz'd, and call'd Baſilius. 988. Howbeit Zonaras reporteth that before that time Baſilius the Greek Emperor ſent a Biſhop to them; at whoſe preaching they not being mov'd, but requiring a Miracle, he after devout Prayers, taking the Book of Goſpel into his hands, threw it before them all into the Fire; which remaining there unconſum'd, they were converted.

Volodimir had eleven Sons, among whom he divided his Kingdom; Boriſtus and Glebus for thir holy Life regiſter'd Saints; and thir Feaſt kept every year in November with great ſolemnity. The reſt, through contention to have the ſole Government, ruin'd each other, leaving only Jaroſlaus inheritor of all.

Volodimir Son of Jaroſlaus kept his Reſidence in the antient City Kiow upon the River Boriſtenes. And after many conflicts with the Sons of his Uncles; and having ſubdu'd all, was call'd Monomachus. He made war with Conſtantine the Greek Emperor, waſted Thracia; and returning home with great ſpoils to prepare new War, was appeas'd by Conſtantine, who ſent Neophytus Biſhop of Epheſus, and Euſtathius Abbot of Jeruſalem, to preſent him with part of our Saviour's Croſs, and other rich Gifts, and to ſalute him by the name of Czar, or Cæſar; with whom he thenceforth enter'd into league and amity.

After him in order of deſcent Vuſzevolodus, George, Demetrius.

Then George his Son, who in the year 1237. was ſlain in battle by the Tartar Prince Bathy, who ſubdu'd Muſcovia, and made it tributary. 1237. From that time the Tartarians made ſuch Dukes of Ruſſia, as they thought would be moſt pliable to thir ends; of whom they requir'd, as oft as Ambaſſadors came to him out of Tartary, to go out and meet them, and in his own Court to ſtand bareheaded, while they ſate and deliver'd thir Meſſage. At which time the Tartars waſted alſo Polonia, Sileſia, and Hungaria, till Pope Innocent the Fourth obtain'd peace of them for 5 years. This Bathy ſay the Ruſſians was the Father of Tamerlan, whom they call Temirkutla.

Then ſucceeded Jaroſlaus the Brother of George, then Alexander his Son.

Daniel the Son of Alexander was he who firſt made the City of Moſco his Royal Seat, builded the Caſtle, and took on him the Title of Great Duke.

John the Son of Daniel was ſirnamed Kaleta, that word ſignifying a Scrip, out of which, continually carried about with him, he was wont to deal his Alms.

His Son Simeon dying without Iſſue left the Kingdom to John his next Brother; and he to his Son Demetrius, who left two Sons, Baſilius and George.

Baſilius reigning had a Son of his own name, but doubting leſt not of his own Body, through the ſupicion he had of his Wife's Chaſtity, him he diſinherits, and gives the Dukedom to his Brother George.

George putting his Nephew Baſilius in priſon, reigns; yet at his death, either through remorſe or other cauſe, ſurrenders him the Dukedom.

Baſilius unexpectedly thus attaining his ſuppoſed right, enjoy'd it not long in quiet; for Andrew and Demetrius the two Sons of George counting it injury not to ſucceed thir Father, made war upon him, and ſurprizing him on a ſudden, put out his Eyes. Notwithſtanding which, the Baiarens, or Nobles kept thir Allegiance to the Duke though blind, whom therfore they call'd Czienmox.

John Vaſiliwich his Son was the firſt who brought the Ruſſian name out of obſcurity into renown. To ſecure his own Eſtate he put to death as many of his Kindred as were likely to pretend; and ſtil'd himſelf great Duke of Wolodimiria, Muſcovia, Novogardia, Czar of all Ruſſia. He won Pleſco the only walled City in all Muſcovy, and Novogrod the richeſt, from the Lituanians, to whom they had been ſubject 50 years before; and from the latter carried home 300 Waggons laden with Treaſure. He had war with Alexander King of Poland, and with the Livonians; with him, on pretence of withdrawing his Daughter Helena, whom he had to wife, from the Greek Church to the Romiſh; with the Livonians for no other cauſe, but to enlarge his bounds: though he were often foil'd by Plettebergius great Maſter of the Pruſſian Knights. His Wife was Daughter to the Duke of Tyverſky; of her he begat John, and to him reſigned his Dukedom, giving him to Wife the Daughter of Steven, Palatine of Moldavia, by whom he had Iſſue Demetrius, and deceas'd ſoon after. Vaſiliwich therfore reaſſuming the Dukedom, married a ſecond Wife, Sophia Daughter to Thomas Palæologus; who is ſaid to have receiv'd her Dowry out of the Pope's Treaſury, upon promiſe of the Duke to become Romiſh.

This Princeſs of a haughty mind, often complaining that ſhe was married to the Tartars Vaſſal, at length by continual perſwaſions, and by a wile found means to eaſe her Husband, and his Country of that Yoke. For wheras till then the Tartar had his Procurators, who dwelt in the very Caſtle of Moſco, to overſee State-affairs, ſhe fain'd that from Heaven ſhe had been warn'd to build a Temple to Saint Nicholas on the ſame place where the Tartar Agents had thir Houſe. Being therfore delivered of a Son, ſhe made it her requeſt to the Prince of Tartary, whom ſhe had invited to the baptizing, that he would give her that Houſe, which obtaining, ſhe raz'd to the ground, and remov'd thoſe Overſeers out of the Caſtle; and ſo by degrees diſpoſſeſs'd them of all which they held in Ruſſia. She prevail'd alſo with her Husband to transfer the Dukedom from Demetrius the Son of John deceas'd to Gabriel his eldeſt by her.

Gabriel no ſooner Duke, but chang'd his name to Baſilius, and ſet his mind to do nobly; he recover'd great part of Muſcovy from Vitoldus Duke of Lituania; 1514. and on the Boriſthenes won Smolensko and many other Cities in the Year 1514. He divorc'd his firſt Wife, and of Helena Daughter to Duke Glinski begat Juan Vaſiliwich.

Juan Vaſiliwich being left a Child, was committed to George his Uncle and Protector; at 25 years of age he vanquiſh'd the Tartars of Cazan and Aſtracan, bringing home with him thir Princes captive; made cruel War in Livonia, pretending right of inheritance. He ſeem'd exceedingly devout; and wheras the Ruſſians in thir Churches uſe out of zeal and reverence to knock thir Heads againſt the ground, his Forehead was ſeldom free of ſwellings and bruzes, and very often ſeen to bleed. The cauſe of his rigour in Government he alledg'd to Horſey's Obſervations. be the malice and treachery of his Subjects. But ſome of the Nobles, incited by his cruelty, call'd in the Crim Tartar, who in the Year 1571. broke into Ruſſia, 1571. burnt Moſco to the ground: He reigned 54 years, had three Sons, of which the eldeſt being ſtrook on a time by his Father, with grief therof dy'd; his other Sons were Pheodor and Demetrius. In the time of Juan Vaſiliwich the Engliſh came firſt by Sea into the north parts of Ruſſia.

1584. Hac. vol. 1. Horſey. Pheodor Juanowick being under age, was left to the protection of Boris, Brother to the young Empreſs, and third Son by adoption in the Emperour's Will. After 40 daies of mourning, the appointed time of Coronation being come, the Emperour iſſuing out of his Palace, the whole Clergy before him, enter'd with his Nobility the Church of Blaveſhina or Bleſſedneſs; whence after Service to the Church of Michael, then to our Lady Church, being the Cathedral. In the midſt wherof a Chair of Majeſty was plac'd, and moſt unvaluable Garments put upon him; there alſo was the imperial Crown ſet on his Head by the Metropolitan, who out of a ſmall Book in his hand read Exhortations to the Emperour of Juſtice and peaceable Government. After this riſing from his Chair he was inveſted with an upper Robe, ſo thick with Orient Pearls and Stones, as weigh'd 200 pounds, the Train born up by 6 Dukes; his Staff imperial was of a Unicorn's Horn three foot and a half long, beſet with rich Stones; his Globe and ſix Crowns carried before him by Princes of the Blood; his Horſe at the Church door ſtood ready with a Covering of imbroidered Pearl, Saddle and all ſutable, to the value of 300000 Marks. There was a kind of Bridg made three waies, 150 fathom long, three foot high, two fathom broad, wheron the Emperor with his Train went from one Church to another above the infinite throng of People making loud Acclamations: At the Emperour's returning from thoſe Churches they were ſpread under-foot with Cloth of Gold, the Porches with red Velvet, the Bridges with Scarlet and Stammel-cloth, all which, as the Emperour paſsd by, were cut and ſnatch't by them that ſtood next; beſides new minted Coins of Gold and Silver caſt among the People. The Empreſs in her Palace was plac't before a great open Window in rich and ſhining Robes, among her Ladies. After this the Emperor came into Parliament, where he had a Banquet ſerv'd by his Nobles in princely order; two ſtanding on either ſide his Chair with Battel-axes of Gold; three of the next Rooms great and large, being ſet round with Plate of Gold and Silver, from the ground up to the roof. This Triumph laſted a week, wherin many royal Paſtimes were ſeen: after which election was made of the Nobles to new Offices and Dignities. The concluſion of all was a Peal of 170 Braſs Ordnance two miles without the City, and 20000 Harquebuzes twice over: and ſo the Emperour with at leaſt 50000 Horſe return'd through the City to his Palace, where all the Nobility, Officers, and Merchants brought him rich Preſents. Shortly after the Emperour by direction of Boris conquer'd the large Country of Siberia, and took Priſoner the King therof: he remov'd alſo corrupt Officers and former Taxes. In ſum, a great alteration in the Government follow'd, yet all quietly and without Tumult. Theſe things reported abroad ſtrook ſuch awe into the neighbour Kings, that the Crim Tartar, with his Wives alſo, and many Nobles valiant and perſonable men, came to viſit the Ruſſian. There came alſo 12 hundred Poliſh Gentlemen, many Circaſſians, and People of other Nations to offer ſervice; Ambaſſadors from the Turk, the Perſian, Georgian, and other Tartar Princes; from Almany, Poland, Sweden, Denmark. But this glory laſted not long through the treachery of Boris, who procured the Death firſt of Demetrius, then of the Emperour himſelf, wherby the Imperial Race after the ſucceſſion of 300 years was quite extinguiſht.

Boris adopted, as before was ſaid, third Son to Juan Vaſiliwich, without impeachment now aſcended the Throne; but neither did he enjoy long what he had ſo wickedly compaſs'd, divine revenge raiſing up againſt him a 1604.
Counterfeit of that Demetrius whom he had cauſ'd to be murthered at Ouglets. Purc. par. 3.
This Upſtart, ſtrength'd with many Poles and Coſſacks, appears in arms to claim 750.
his right out of the hands of Boris, who ſent againſt him an army of 200000 Men, many of whom revolted to this Demetrius: Peter Baſman the General returning to Moſco with the empty Triumph of a reported Victory. But the Enemy ſtill advancing, Boris one day, after a plentiful Meal, finding himſelf heavy and pain'd in his Stomach, laid him down on his Bed; but e're his Doctors, who made great haſte, came to him, was found ſpeechleſs, and ſoon after dy'd with grief, as is ſuppos'd, of his ill ſucceſs againſt Demetrius. Before his death, though it were ſpeedy, he would be ſhorn, and new chriſtn'd. He had but one Son, whom he lov'd ſo fondly, as not to ſuffer him out of ſight; uſing to ſay he was Lord and Father of his Son, and yet his Servant, yea his Slave. To gain the Peoples love, which he had loſt by his ill getting the Empire, he us'd two Policies; firſt he cauſ'd Moſco to be fired in four Places, that in the quenching therof he might ſhew his great care and tenderneſs of the People; among whom he likewiſe diſtributed ſo much of his Bounty, as both new built thir Houſes, and repair'd thir Loſſes. At another time the People murmuring that the great Peſtilence which had then ſwept away a third part of the Nation, was the puniſhment of thir electing him, a Murtherer, to reign over them, he built Galleries round about the utmoſt Wall of Moſco, and there appointed for one whole month 20000 pound to be given to the Poor, which well nigh ſtopt their Mouths. After the death of Boris, Peter Baſman, thir only hope and refuge, though a young man, was ſent again to the Wars, with him many Engliſh, Scots, French, and Dutch; who all with the other General Goleeche fell off to the new Demetrius, whoſe Meſſengers coming now to the Suburbs of Moſco, were brought by the Multitude to that ſpacious Field before the Caſtle Gate, within which the Council were then ſitting, many of whom were by the Peoples threatning call'd out and conſtrain'd to hear the Letters of Demetrius openly read: which, long ere the end, wrought ſo with the Multitude, that furiouſly they broke into the Caſtle, laying violence on all they met; when ſtrait appear'd coming towards them two Meſſengers of Demetrius formerly ſent, pitifully whipt and roaſted, which added to thir rage. Then was the whole City in an uproar, all the great Counſelors Houſes ranſack't, eſpecially of the Godonova's, the Kindred and Family of Boris. Such of the Nobles that were beſt belov'd, by entreaty prevail'd at length to put an end to this Tumult. The Empreſs flying to a ſafer place, had her Collar of Pearl pull'd from her Neck; and by the next Meſſage command was given to ſecure her with her Son and Daughter. Wherupon Demetrius by general conſent was proclaim'd Emperor. The Empreſs now ſeeing all loſt, counſel'd the Prince her Son to follow his Father's example, who, it ſeems, had diſpatcht himſelf by Poyſon; and with a deſperate courage beginning the deadly Health, was pledg'd effectually by her Son; but the Daughter only ſipping, eſcap'd. Others aſcribe this deed to the ſecret Command of Demetrius, and Self-murther imputed to them, to avoid the envy of ſuch a Command. Purc. par. 3. 764.

Demetrius Evanowich, for ſo he call'd himſelf, who ſucceeded, was credibly reported the Son of Gregory Peupoloy a Ruſſe Gentleman, and in his younger years to have been ſhorn a Friar, but eſcaping from the Monaſtery, to have travail'd Germany and other Countries, but chiefly Poland: where he attain'd to good ſufficiency in Arms and other Experience; which rais'd in him ſuch high thoughts, as grounding on a common belief among the Ruſſians, that the young Demetrius was not dead, but convey'd away, and their hatred againſt Boris, on this foundation with ſome other circumſtances, to build his hopes no lower than an Empire; which on his firſt diſcovery found acceptation ſo generally, as planted him at length on the Royal Seat: but not ſo firmly as the fair beginning promis'd; for in a ſhort while the Ruſſians finding themſelves abus'd by an Impoſtor, on the ſixth day after his Marriage, obſerving when his Guard of Poles were moſt ſecure, ruſhing into the Palace before break of day, drag'd him out of his Bed, and when he had confeſs'd the fraud, pull'd him to pieces; with him Peter Baſman was alſo ſlain, and both thir dead Bodies laid open in the Market-place. He was of no preſence, but otherwiſe of a princely diſpoſition; too bountiful, which occaſion'd ſome exactions; in other matters a great lover of Juſtice, not unworthy the Empire which he had gotten, and loſt only through greatneſs of mind, neglecting the Conſpiracy, which he knew the Ruſſians were plotting. Some ſay thir hatred grew, for that they ſaw him alienated from the Ruſſian Manners and Religion, having made Buchinskoy a learned Proteſtant his Secretary. Some report from Gilbert's relation, who was a Scot, and Captain of his Guard, that lying on his Bed awake, not long before the Conſpiracy, he ſaw the appearance of an aged man coming toward him, at which he roſe, and call'd to them that watch'd; but they denied to have ſeen any ſuch paſs by them. He returning to his Bed, and within an hour after troubl'd again with the ſame Apparition, ſent for Buchinskoy, telling him he had now twice the ſame night ſeen an aged man, who at his ſecond coming told him, that though he were a good Prince of himſelf, yet for the injuſtice and oppreſſion of his inferiour Miniſters, his Empire ſhould be taken from him. The Secretary counſell'd him to embrace true Religion, affirming that for lack therof his Officers were ſo corrupt. The Emperor ſeem'd to be much mov'd, and to intend what was perſwaded him. But a few daies after, the other Secretary, a Ruſſian, came to him with a drawn Sword, of which the Emperour made ſlight at firſt; but he after bold words aſſaulted him, ſtrait ſeconded by other Conſpirators, crying Liberty.' Gilbert with many of the Guard overſuddenly ſurpris'd, retreated to Coluga a Town which they fortify'd; moſt of the other Strangers were maſſacred, except the Engliſh, whoſe mediation ſav'd alſo Buchinskoy. Shusky who ſucceeded him reports in a Letter to King James otherwiſe of him; that his right name was Gryſhca the Son of Boughdam; that to eſcape puniſhment for Villanies done, he turn'd Fryar, and fell at laſt to the Black Art; and fearing that the Metropolitan intended therfore to impriſon him, fled into Lettow; where by counſel of Sigiſmund the Poland King, he began to call himſelf Demetry of Ouglitts; and by many Libels and Spies privily ſent into Moſco, gave out the ſame; that many Letters and Meſſengers therupon were ſent from Boris into Poland, and from the Patriarch, to acquaint them who the Runnagate was: but the Polanders giving them no credit, furniſht him the more with Arms and Money, notwithſtanding the League; and ſent the Palatine Sandamersko and other Lords to accompany him into Ruſſia, gaining alſo a Prince of the Crim Tartars to his aid; that the Army of Boris hearing of his ſudden death, yielded to this Gryſhca, who taking to wife the Daughter of Sandamersko, attempted to root out the Ruſſian Clergy, and to bring in the Romiſh Religion, for which purpoſe many Jeſuits came along with him. Wherupon Shusky with the Nobles and Metropolitans conſpiring againſt him, in half a year gather'd all the Forces of Moſcovia, and ſurpriſing him found writing under his own hand all theſe his intentions; Letters alſo from the Pope and Cardinals to the ſame effect, not only to ſet up the Religion of Rome, but to force it upon all, with death to them that refus'd.

Vaſily Evanowich Shusky, after the ſlaughter of Demetry or Gryſhca, was elected 1605.
Emperor, having not long before been at the Block for reporting to have ſeen the true Demetrius dead and buried; but Gryſhca not only recall'd him, but advanc'd him to be the inſtrument of his own ruin. He was then about the age of 50; nobly deſcended, never married, of great wiſdom reputed, a favourer of the Engliſh; for he ſav'd them from riſing in the former Tumults. Some ſay he modeſtly refus'd the Crown, till by lot four times together it fell to him; Purc. par. 3.

with Witches of the Samoeds, Lappians, and Tartarians, about the ſame fears; and being warn'd of one Michalowich to have put to death three of that name, yet a fourth was reſerv'd by Fate to ſucceed him, being then a Youth attendant in the Court, one of thoſe that held the golden Axes, and leaſt ſuſpected. But before that time he alſo was ſupplanted by another reviving Demetrius brought in by the Poles; whoſe counterfeited Hand, and ſtrange relating of privateſt Circumſtances, had almoſt deceiv'd Gilbert himſelf, had not thir Perſons been utterly unlike; but Gryſhca's Wife ſo far believ'd him for her Husband, as to receive him to her Bed. Shusky beſieg'd in his Caſtle of Moſco, was adventrouſly who turns now his force againſt the Counterfeit Demetrius; he ſeeking to fly, is by a Tartar ſlain in his Camp. Smolensko held out a Siege of two years, then ſurrendr'd. Shusky the Emperor carried away into Poland, there ended miſerably in priſon. But before his departure out of Muſcovy the Polanders in his name ſending for the chief Nobility, as to a laſt farewell, cauſe them to be entertain'd in a ſecret place, and there diſpatch'd: by this means the eaſier to ſubdue the People. Yet the Poles were ſtarv'd at length out of thoſe Places in Moſco which they had fortify'd. Wherin the Ruſſians who beſieg'd them, found, as is reported, 60 Barrels of Man's Fleſh powdered, being the Bodies of ſuch as Janſonius.

The firſt diſcovery of Ruſſia by the North Eaſt, 1553, with the Engliſh Embaſſies and Entertainments at that Court, until the year 1604.

Hac. vol. 1. 243. 234. THE Diſcovery of Ruſſia by the Northern Ocean, made firſt of any Nation that we know by Engliſh-men, might have ſeem'd an Enterprize almoſt heroic, if any higher end than the exceſſive love of Gain and Traffick, had animated the deſign. Nevertheleſs that in regard that many things not unprofitable to the knowledg of Nature, and other Obſervations are hereby come to light, as good events ofttimes ariſe from evil occaſions, it will not be the worſt labour to relate briefly the beginning, and proſecution of this adventurous Voyage, until it became at laſt a familiar Paſſage.

When our Merchants perceiv'd the Commodities of England to be in ſmall requeſt abroad, and forein Merchandize to grow higher in eſteem and value than before, they began to think with themſelves how this might be remedied. And ſeeing how the Spaniards and Portugals had encreas'd thir Wealth by diſcovery of new Trades and Countries, they reſolv'd upon ſome new and ſtrange Navigation. At the ſame time Sebaſtian Chabota, a man for the knowledg of Sea-affairs much renown'd in thoſe days, happen'd to be in London. With him firſt they conſult; and by his advice conclude to furniſh out three Ships for the ſearch and diſcovery of the northern parts. And having heard that a certain Worm is bred in that Ocean, which many times eateth through the ſtrongeſt Oak, they contrive to cover ſome part of the Keel of thoſe Ships with thin ſheets of Lead; and victual them for 18 months; allowing equally to thir journey, thir ſtay, and thir return. Arms alſo they provide, and ſtore of Munition, with ſufficient Captains and Governours for ſo great an Enterpriſe. To which among many, and ſome void of experience that offer'd themſelves, Sir Hugh Willowby a valiant Gentleman earneſtly requeſted to have the charge. Of whom before all others both for his goodly perſonage, and ſingular skil in the ſervices of War, they made choice to be Admiral, and of Richard Chancelor, a man greatly eſteem'd for his skil, to be chief Pilot. This man was brought up by Mr. Henry Sidney, afterwards Deputy of Ireland, who coming where the Adventurers were gather'd together, though then a young man, with a grave and eloquent Speech commended Chancelor unto them.

After this, they omitted no enquiry after any perſon that might inform them concerning thoſe North-eaſterly parts to which the Voyage tended; and two Tartarians then of the Kings's Stable were ſent for; but they were able to anſwer nothing to purpoſe. So, after much debate, it was concluded that by the 20*th* of May the Ships ſhould depart. Being come near Greenwich, where the Court then lay, preſently the Courtiers came running out, the Privy Council at the Windows, the reſt on the Towers and Battlements. The Mariners all apparell'd in watchet or sky-coloured Cloth, diſcharge thir Ordnance; the noiſe whereof, and of the People ſhouting, is anſwer'd from the Hills and Waters with as loud an Echo: Only the good King Edward, then ſick, beheld not this ſight, but dy'd ſoon after. From hence putting into Harwich, they ſtaid long, and loſt much time. At length paſſing by Shetland, they kenn'd a far off Æglands, being an innumerable ſort of Ilands call'd Roſt Ilands in 66 degrees. Thence to Lofoot in 68, to Seinam in 70 degrees; theſe Ilands belong all to the Crown of Denmark. Whence departing, Sir Hugh Willowby ſet out his Flag, by which he call'd together the chief men of his other Ships to counſel; where they conclude, in caſe they happen'd to be ſcatter'd by Tempeſt, that Wardhouſe a noted Haven in Finmark be the appointed place of thir meeting. The very ſame day afternoon ſo great a Tempeſt aroſe, that the Ships were ſome driv'n one way, ſome another in great peril. The General with his loudeſt voice call'd to Chancelor not to be far from him; but in vain, for the Admiral ſailing much better than his Ship, and bearing all her Sails, was carried with great ſwiftneſs ſoon out of ſight; but before that, the Ship-boat ſtriking againſt her Ship was overwhelmed in view of the Bonaventure, wherof Chancelor was Captain. The third Ship alſo in the ſame Storm was loſt. But Hac. 235.

Sir Hugh Willowby eſcaping that Storm, and wandring on thoſe deſolate Seas till the 18*th* of September, put into a Haven where they had weather as in the depth of Winter; and there determining to abide till Spring, ſent out three men South-Weſt to find Inhabitants; who journy'd three days, but found none; then other three went Weſtward four days journey, and laſtly three South Eaſt three days; but they all returning without news of People, or any ſign of Habitation, Sir Hugh with the Company of his two Ships abode there till January, as appears by a Will ſince found in one of the Ships; but then periſh'd all with cold. This River or Haven was Arzina in Lapland near to Kegor, where they were Hac. 464. found dead the year after by certain Ruſſian Fiſhermen. Wherof the Engliſh Agent at Moſco having notice, ſent and recover'd the Ships with the dead Bodies and moſt of the Goods, and ſent them for England; but the Ships being unſtaunch, as is ſuppos'd, by thir two years wintring in Lapland, ſunk by the way with thir dead, and them alſo that brought them. But now Chancelor with his Ship and Company thus left, ſhap'd his courſe to Wardhouſe, the place agreed on to expect the reſt; where having ſtaid ſeven days without tidings of them, he reſolves at length to hold on his Voyage; and ſail'd ſo far till he found no night, but continual day and Sun clearly ſhining on that huge and vaſt Sea for certain days. At length they enter into a great Bay, nam'd, as they knew after, from Saint Nicholas; and ſpying a Fiſher-boat, made after him to know what People they were. The Fiſhermen amaz'd with the greatneſs of his Ship, to them a ſtrange and new ſight, ſought to fly; but overtak'n, in great fear they proſtrate themſelves, and offer to kiſs his feet; but he raiſing them up with all ſigns and geſtures of courteſie, ſought to win thir Friendſhip. They no ſooner diſmiſt, but ſpread abroad the arrival of a ſtrange Nation, whoſe humanity they ſpake of with great affection; wherupon the People running together, with like return of all courteous uſage receive them; offering them Victuals freely; nor refuſing to traffick, but for a Loyal Cuſtom which bound them from that, without firſt the conſent had of thir King. After mutual demands of each other's Nation, they found themſelves to be in Ruſſia, where Juan Vaſiliwich at that time reign'd Emperor. To whom privily the Governour of that place ſending notice of the ſtrange Gueſts that were arriv'd, held in the mean while our Men in what ſuſpence he could. The Emperor well pleas'd with ſo unexpected a Meſſage, invites them to his Court, offering them Poſt-horſes at his own charge, or if the journey ſeem'd overlong, that they might freely traffic where they were. But 'ere this Meſſenger could return, having loſt his way, the Muſcovites themſelves, loth that our men ſhould depart which they made ſhew to do, furniſh'd them with Guides and other Conveniences to bring them to thir King's Preſence. Chancelor had now gon more than half his journey, when the Sled-man ſent to Court meets him on the way; delivers him the Emperor's Letters; which when the Ruſſes underſtood, ſo willing they were to obey the Contents therof, that they quarrell'd and ſtrove who ſhould have the preferment to put his Horſes to the Sled. So after a long and troubleſom journey of 1500 miles he arrived at Moſco. After he had remain'd in the City about 12 days, a Meſſenger was ſent to bring them to the King's Houſe. Being enter'd within the Court-Gates, and brought into an outward Chamber, they beheld there a very honourable Company, to the number of a hunder'd, ſitting all apparell'd in Cloth of gold down to thir Ancles; next conducted to the Chamber of Preſence, there ſate the Emperor on a lofty and very Royal Throne; on his Head a Diadem of gold, his Robe all of Goldſmiths work, in his Hand a Chryſtal Scepter garniſh'd and beſet with precious Stones; no leſs was his Countenance full of Majeſty. Beſide him ſtood his chief Secretary; on his other ſide the great Commander of ſilence, both in Cloth of gold; then ſate his Council of 150 round about on high Seats, clad all as richly. Chancelor nothing abaſh'd, made his obeyſance to the Emperor after the Engliſh manner. The Emperor having taken and read his Letters, after ſome enquiry of King Edward's Health, invited them to dinner, and till then diſmiſs'd them. But before diſmiſſion the Secretary preſented thir Preſent bare-headed; till which time they were all cover'd; and before admittance our men had charge not to ſpeak, but when the Emperor demanded ought. Having ſat two hours in the Secretary's Chamber, they were at length call'd in to dinner; where the Emperor was ſet at Table, now in a Robe of Silver, and another Crown on his Head. This place was call'd the golden Palace, but without cauſe, for the Engliſh-men had ſeen many fairer; round about the room, but at diſtance, were other long Tables; in the midſt a Cupboard of huge and maſſy goblets, and other Veſſels of gold and ſilver; among the reſt four great Flagons nigh two yards high, wrought in the top with devices of Towers and Dragons heads. The Gueſts aſcended to thir Tables by three ſteps; all apparell'd in Linen, and that lin'd with rich Furs. The Meſſes came in without order, but all in Chargers of Gold, both to the Emperor, and to the reſt that din'd there, which were two hundred Perſons; on every Board alſo were ſet Cups of gold without number. The Servitors one hundred and forty were likewiſe array'd in gold, and waited with Caps on thir heads. They that are in high favour, ſit on the ſame Bench with the Emperor, but far off. Before Meat came in, according to the cuſtom of thir Kings, he ſent to every Gueſt a ſlice of Bread; whom the Officer naming, ſaith thus, John Baſilivich Emperor of Ruſs, &c. doth reward thee with Bread, at which words all men ſtand up. Then were Swans in ſeveral pieces ſerv'd in, each piece in a ſeveral Diſh, which the Great Duke ſends about as the Bread, and ſo likewiſe the Drink. In dinner time he twice chang'd his Crown, his Waiters thrice thir Apparel; to whom the Emperor in like manner gives both Bread and Drink with his own hands; which they ſay is done to the intent that he may perfectly know his own Houſhold; and indeed when Dinner was done, he call'd his Nobles every one before him by name; and by this time Candles were brought in, for it grew dark; and the Engliſh departed to thir Lodgings from Dinner, an hour within night.

Hac. 258. 263. 465. In the year 1555. Chancelor made another Voyage to this place with Letters from Queen Mary; had a Houſe in Moſco, and Diet appointed him; and was ſoon admitted to the Emperor's Preſence in a large room ſpread with Carpets; at his entring and ſalutation all ſtood up, the Emperor only ſitting, except when the Queen's Name was read or ſpoken; for then he himſelf would riſe: at Dinner he ſat bareheaded, his Crown and rich Cap ſtanding on a Pinacle by. 286. Chancelor returning for England, Oſep Napea Governour of Wologda came in his Ship Ambaſſador from the Ruſſe; but ſuffering Shipwrack in Petriſlego, a Bay in Scotland, Chancelor, who took more care to ſave the Ambaſſador than himſelf, was drown'd, the Ship rifled, and moſt of her lading made booty by the People therabout.

310, &c. In the year 1557. Oſep Napea returned into his Country with Anthony Jenkinſon who had the command of four tall Ships. He reports of a Whirlpool between the Roſt Iſlands and Lofoot call'd Maleſtrand; which from half ebb till half flood is heard to make ſuch a terrible noiſe, as ſhakes the Door-rings of Houſes in thoſe Iſlands ten mile off; Wales that come within the Current therof make a pitiful cry; Trees carried in and caſt out again, have the ends and boughs of them ſo beaten, as they ſeem like the ſtalks of bruized Hemp. About Zeinam they ſaw many Whales very monſtrous hard by thir Ships; wherof ſome by eſtimation ſixty foot long; they roard hideouſly, it being then the time of thir engendring. At Wardhouſe he ſaith the Cattel are fed with Fiſh. Coming to Moſco, he found the Emperor ſitting aloft in a Chair of State, richly Crown'd, a Staff of gold in his hand wrought with coſtly ſtone. Diſtant from him ſat his Brother, and a Youth the Emperor's Son of Caſan, whom the Ruſs had conquer'd; there din'd with him diverſe Ambaſſadors, Chriſtian and Heathen, diverſly apparell'd; his Brother with ſome of the chief Nobles ſat with him at Table: the Gueſts were in all ſix hundred. In Dinner-time came in ſix Muſicians, and ſtanding in the midſt, ſung three ſeveral times, but with little or no delight to our men; there din'd at the ſame time in other Halls two thouſand Tartars who came to ſerve the Duke in his Wars. The Engliſh were ſet at a ſmall Table by themſelves direct before the Emperor; who ſent them diverſe Bowls of Wine and Meath, and many Diſhes from his own hand: the Meſſes were but mean, but the change of Wines and ſeveral Meaths were wonderful. As oft as they din'd with the Emperor, he ſent for them in the morning, and invited them with his own Mouth. On Chriſtmaſs-day being 317. invited, they had for other proviſion as before; but for ſtore of gold and ſilver Plate exceſſive; among which were twelve Barrels of ſilver, hoop'd with fine gold, containing twelve gallons a piece.

1560. Was the firſt Engliſh traffick to the Narve in Livonia, till then conceal'd by Danskers and Lubeckers.

1561. The ſame Anthony Jenkinſon made another Voyage to Moſco; and arriv'd while the Emperor was celebrating his Marriage with a Circaſſian Lady; during which time the City Gates for three days were kept ſhut; and all men whatſoever ſtraitly commanded to keep within thir Houſes, except ſome of his Houſhold; the cauſe wherof is not known.

1566. He made again the ſame Voyage; which now men uſually made in a month from London to Saint Nicholas with good Winds, being ſeven hundred and fifty leagues. 311.

1568. Thomas Randolf, Eſq; went Ambaſſador to Muſcovy, from Queen Elizabeth; and in his paſſage by Sea met nothing remarkable ſave great ſtore of Whales, whom they might ſee engendring together, and the Sperma-ceti ſwimming on the Water. At Colmogro he was met by a Gentleman from the Emperor, at whoſe charge he was conducted to Moſco: but met there by no man, not ſo much as the Engliſh; lodg'd in a fair Houſe built for Ambaſſadors; but there confin'd upon ſome ſuſpicion which the Emperor had conceav'd; ſent for at length after ſeventeen weeks delay, was fain to ride thither on a borrow'd Horſe, his men on foot. In a Chamber before the Preſence were ſitting about three hundred Perſons, all in rich Robes taken out of the Emperor's Wardrobe for that day; they ſat on three ranks of Benches, rather for ſhew than that the Perſons were of honour; being Merchants and other mean Inhabitants. The Ambaſſador ſaluted them, but by them unſaluted paſs'd on with his Head cover'd. At the Preſence-door being receiv'd by two which had been his Guardians, and brought into the midſt, he was there will'd to ſtand ſtill, and ſpeak his meſſage from the Queen; at whoſe name the Emperor ſtood up, and demanded her health: then giving the Ambaſſador his Hand to kiſs, fell to many queſtions. The Preſent being deliver'd, which was a great ſilver Bowl curiouſly grav'n, the Emperor told him he din'd not that day openly becauſe of great affairs; but, ſaith he, I will ſend thee my Dinner, and augment thy Allowance. And ſo diſmiſſing him, ſent a Duke richly apparell'd ſoon after to his Lodging with fifty Perſons, each of them carrying Meat in ſilver Diſhes cover'd; which himſelf deliver'd into the Ambaſſador's own hands, taſting firſt of every Diſh, and every ſort of Drink; that don, ſet him down with his Company, took part, and went not thence unrewarded. The Emperor ſent back with this Ambaſſador another of his own call'd Andrew Savin. 373.

1571. Jenkinſon made a third Voyage; but was ſtaid long at Colmogro by reaſon of the Plague in thoſe Parts; at length had audience where the Court then was, near to Pereſlave; to which place the Emperor was return'd from his Swediſh War with ill ſucceſs: and Moſco the ſame year had been wholly burnt by the Crim; in it the Engliſh houſe, and diverſe Engliſh were ſmother'd in the Sellars, multitudes of people in the City periſh'd, all that were young led captive with exceeding ſpoil.

1583. Juan Baſiliwich having the year before ſent his Ambaſſador Pheodor Andrewich about matters of Commerce, the Queen made choice of Sir Jerom Bowes, one of her Houſhold, to go into Ruſſia; who being attended with more than 40 Perſons, and accompanied with the Ruſſe returning home, arriv'd at St. Nicolas. The Dutch by this time had intruded into the Muſcovy-Trade; which by privilege long before had been granted ſolely to the Engliſh; and had corrupted to thir ſide Shalkan the Chancellor, with others of the great ones; who ſo wrought, that a Creature of thir own was ſent to meet Sir Jerom at Colmogro, and to offer him occaſions of diſlike: Until at Vologda he was receiv'd by another from the Emperor; and at Teraſlave by a Duke well accompanied, who preſented him with a Coach and ten Geldings. Two miles from Moſco met him four Gentlemen with two hundred horſe, who after ſhort ſalutation, told him what they had to ſay from the Emperor, willing him to alight, which the Ambaſſador ſoon refus'd, unleſs they alſo lighted; wheron they ſtood long debating; at length agreed, great diſpute follow'd, whoſe foot ſhould firſt touch the ground. Thir Meſſage deliver'd, and then embracing, they conducted the Ambaſſador to a houſe at Moſco, built for him purpoſely. At his going to Court he and his followers honorably mounted and apparell'd, the Emperor's Guard were ſet on either ſide all the way about 6000 ſhot. At the Court gate met him four Hac. vol. 1. 458.

Noblemen in cloth of Gold, and rich Fur-caps, embroider'd with Pearl and Stone; then four others of greater degree, in which paſſage there ſtood along the Walls, and ſat on Benches ſeven or eight hundred men in colour'd Sattins and gold. At the Preſence-door met him the chief Herald, and with him all the great Officers of Court, who brought him where the Emperor ſat: there were ſet by him three Crowns of Muſcovy, Cazan and Aſtracan; on each ſide ſtood two young Noblemen, coſtly apparell'd in white; each of them had a broad Ax on his ſhoulder; on the Benches round ſat above a hundred Noblemen. Having giv'n the Ambaſſador his hand to kiſs, and enquir'd of the Queen's health, he will'd him to go ſit in the place provided for him, nigh ten paces diſtant; from thence to ſend him the Queen's Letters and Preſent. Which the Ambaſſador thinking not reaſonable, ſtep'd forward; but the Chancellor meeting him, would have tak'n his Letters; to whom the Ambaſſador ſaid, that the Queen had directed no Letters to him; and ſo went on and deliver'd them to the Emperor's own hands; and after a ſhort withdrawing into the Council-Chamber, where he had Conference with ſom of the Council, he was call'd in to dinner: about the midſt wherof, the Emperor ſtanding up, drank a deep Carouſe to the Queen's Health, and ſent to the Ambaſſador a great Bowl of Rheniſh Wine to pledg him. But at ſeveral times being call'd for to treat about Affairs, and not yielding ought beyond his Commiſſion, the Emperor not wont to be gain-ſay'd, one day eſpecially broke into paſſion, and with a ſtern Countenance told him, he did not reckon the Queen to be his fellow: for there are, quoth he, her betters. The Ambaſſador not holding it his part, whatever danger might enſue, to hear any derogate from the Majeſty of his Princeſs, with like courage and countenance told him, that the Queen was equal to any in Chriſtendom who thought himſelf greateſt; and wanted not means to offend her Enemies whomſoever. Yea, quoth he, what ſaiſt thou of the French and Spaniſh Kings? I hold her, quoth the Ambaſſador, equal to either. Then what to the German Emperor? Her Father, quoth he, had the Emperor in his pay. This anſwer miſlik'd the Duke ſo far, as that he told him, were he not an Ambaſſador, he would throw him out of doors. You may, ſaid the Ambaſſador do your will, for I am now faſt in your Country; but the Queen I doubt not will know how to be reveng'd of any injury offer'd to her Ambaſſador. Wherat the Emperor in great ſudden bid him get home; and he with no more reverence than ſuch uſage requir'd, ſaluted the Emperor, and went his way. Notwithſtanding this, the Muſcovite, ſoon as his mood left him, ſpake to them that ſtood by, many praiſes of the Ambaſſador, wiſhing he had ſuch a Servant, and preſently after ſent his chief Secretary to tell him that whatever had paſs'd in words, yet for his great reſpect to the Queen, he would ſhortly after diſpatch him with honour and full contentment, and in the mean while he much enlarg'd his entertainment. He alſo deſir'd that the Points of our Religion might be ſet down, and caus'd them to be read to his Nobility with much approbation. And as the year before he had ſought in marriage the Lady Mary Haſtings, which took not effect, the Lady and her Friends excuſing it, he now again renu'd the motion to take to Wife ſome one of the Queen's Kinſwomen, either by ſending an Ambaſſage, or going himſelf with his Treaſure into England. Now happy was that Nobleman whom Sir Jerom Bows in public favour'd; unhappy they who had oppos'd him: for the Emperor had beaten Shalkan the Chancelor very grievouſly for that cauſe, and threatn'd not to leave one of his race alive. But the Emperor dying ſoon after of a Surfeit, Shalkan, to whom then almoſt the whole Government was committed, caus'd the Ambaſſador to remain cloſe Priſoner in his Houſe nine weeks. Being ſent for at length to have his diſpatch, and ſlightly enough conducted to the Council-Chamber, he was told by Shalkan that this Emperor would condeſcend to no other agreements than were between his Father and the Queen before his coming: and ſo diſarming both him and his Company, brought them to the Emperor with many affronts in thir paſſage, for which there was no help but patience. The Emperor ſaying but over what the Chancellor had ſaid before, offer'd him a Letter for the Queen: which the Ambaſſador, knowing it contain'd nothing to the purpoſe of his Embaſſy, refus'd, till he ſaw his danger grow too great; nor was he ſuffer'd to reply, or have his Interpreter. Shalkan ſent him word that now the Engliſh Emperor was dead; and haſten'd his departure, but with ſo many diſgraces put upon him, as made him fear ſome miſchief in his journey to the Sea; having only one mean Gentleman ſent with him to be his Convoy: he commanded the Engliſh Merchants in the Queen's name to accompany him, but ſuch was his danger, that they durſt not. So arming himſelf and his Followers in the beſt wiſe he could, againſt any outrage, he at length recover'd the Shoar of Saint Nicholas. Where he now reſolv'd to ſend them back by his Conduct ſome of the affronts which he had receiv'd. Ready therfore to take Ship, he cauſes three or four of his valianteſt and diſcreeteſt men to take the Emperor's Letter, and diſgraceful Preſent, and to deliver it, or leave it at the Lodging of his Convoy, which they ſafely did; though follow'd with a great Tumult of ſuch as would have forc'd them to take it back.

1584. At the Coronation of Pheodor the Emperor, Jerom Horſey being then Agent in Ruſſia, and call'd for to Court with one John de Wale a Merchant of the Netherlands and a Subject of Spain, ſome of the Nobles would have prefer'd the Fleming before the Engliſh. But to that our Agent would in no caſe agree, ſaying he would rather have his Legs cut off by the Knees, than bring his Preſent in courſe after a Subject of Spain. The Emperor and Prince Boris perceiving the Controverſy, gave order to admit Horſey firſt: who was diſmiſs'd with large Promiſes, and ſeventy Meſſes with three Carts of ſeveral Meath ſent after him.

1588. Dr. Giles Fletcher went Ambaſſador from the Queen to Pheodor then Emperor; whoſe Relations being judicious and exact, are beſt read entirely by themſelves. This Emperor upon report of the great Learning of John Dee the Mathematician, invited him to Moſco with offer of two thouſand pounds a year, and from Prince Boris one thouſand Marks; to have his Proviſion from the Emperor's Table, to be honourably receiv'd, and accounted as one of the chief men in the Land. All which Dee accepted not. 508.

1604. Sir Thomas Smith was ſent Ambaſſador from King James to Boris then Emperor; and ſtaid ſome days at a place five miles from Moſco till he was honourably receiv'd into the City; met on horſeback by many thouſands of Gentlemen and Nobles on both ſides the way; where the Ambaſſador alighting from his Coach, and mounted on his Horſe, rode with his Trumpets ſounding before him; till a Gentleman of the Emperor's Stable brought him a Gennet gorgeouſly trapt with Gold, Pearl and Stone, eſpecially with a great Chain of plated Gold about his Neck, and Horſes richly adorn'd for his Followers. Then came three great Noblemen with an Interpreter offring a Speech; but the Ambaſſador deeming it to be ceremony, with a brief Compliment found means to put it by. Thus alighting all, they ſaluted, and gave hands mutually. Thoſe three after a tedious preamble of the Emperor's Title thrice repeated, brought a ſeveral Compliment of three words apiece, as namely, the firſt, To know how the King did; the next, How the Ambaſſador; the third, That there was a fair Houſe provided him. Then on they went on either hand of the Ambaſſador, and about ſix thouſand Gallants behind them; ſtill met within the City by more of greater quality to the very Gate of his lodging: where fifty Gunners were his daily Guard both at home and abroad. The Preſtaves or Gentlemen aſſign'd to have the care of his entertainment, were earneſt to have had the Ambaſſador's Speech and Meſſage given them in writing, that the Interpreter, as they pretended, might the better tranſlate it; but he admoniſh'd them of thir fooliſh demand. On the day of his audience other Gennets were ſent him and his Attendants to ride on, and two white Palfreys to draw a rich Chariot, which was parcel of the Preſent; the reſt wherof was carried by his Followers through a lane of the Emperor's Guard; many Meſſengers poſting up and down the while, till they came through the great Caſtle to the uttermoſt Court-gate. There met by a great Duke, they were brought up ſtairs through a Stone-gallery, where ſtood on each hand many in fair Coats of Perſian Stuff, Velvet and Damask. The Ambaſſador by two other Counſellors being led into the preſence, after his obeyſance don, was to ſtay and hear again the long Title repeated; then the particular Preſents; and ſo deliver'd as much of his Embaſſage as was then requiſite. After which the Emperor ariſing from his Throne, demanded of the King's health; ſo did the young Prince. The Ambaſſador then deliver'd his Letters into the Emperor's own hand, though the Chancellor offer'd to have taken them. He bore the Majeſty of a mighty Emperor; his Crown and Sceptre of pure Gold, a Collar of Pearls about his Neck, his Garment of crimſon Velvet embroider'd with precious Stone and Gold. On his right Side ſtood a fair Globe of beaten Gold on a Pyramis with a Croſs upon it; to which before he ſpake, turning a little he croſt himſelf. Not much leſs in ſplendor on another Throne ſat the Prince. By the Emperor ſtood two Noblemen in Cloth of Silver, high Caps of black Fur, and Chains of gold hanging to thir Feet; on thir Shoulders two Poleaxes of gold, and two of ſilver by the Prince; the ground was all cover'd with Arras or Tapiſtry. Diſmiſt, and brought in again to dinner, they ſaw the Emperor and his Son ſeated in ſtate, ready to dine; each with a Skull of Pearl on thir bare Heads, thir Veſtments chang'd. In the midſt of this Hall ſeem'd to ſtand a Pillar heap'd round to a great height with maſſy Plate curiouſly wrought with Beaſts, Fiſhes and Fowl. The Emperor's Table was ſerv'd with two hundred Noblemen in Coats of gold; the Princes Table with young Dukes of Caſan, Aſtracan, Siberia, Tartaria and Circaſſia. The Emperor ſent from his Table to the Ambaſſador, thirty diſhes of Meat, to each a Loaf of extraordinary fine Bread. Then follow'd a number more of ſtrange and rare diſhes pil'd up by half dozens, with boil'd, roaſt and bak't, moſt part of them beſawc'd with Garlick and Onions. In midſt of dinner calling the Ambaſſador up to him, he drank the King's health, who receiving it from his hand, return'd to his place, and in the ſame Cup being of fair Chryſtal pledg'd it with all his Company. After dinner they were call'd up to drink of excellent and ſtrong Meath from the Emperor's hand; of which when many did but ſip, he urg'd it not; ſaying he was beſt pleas'd with what was moſt for thir health. Yet after that, the ſame day he ſent a great and glorious Duke, one of them that held the golden Poleax, with his Retinue, and ſundry ſorts of Meath to drink merrily with the Ambaſſador, which ſome of the Engliſh did, until the Duke and his Followers light-headed, but well rewarded with thirty yards of Cloth of gold, and two ſtanding Cups, departed. At ſecond audience the Ambaſſador had like reception as before: and being diſmiſs'd, had dinner ſent after him with three hundred ſeveral diſhes of Fiſh, it being Lent, of ſuch ſtrangeneſs, greatneſs and goodneſs, as ſcarce would be credible to report. The Ambaſſador departing, was brought a mile out of the City with like honour as he was firſt met; where lighting from the Emperor's Sled, he took him to his Coach, made faſt upon a Sled; the reſt to thir Sleds, an eaſy and pleaſant paſſage.

WE Declare by theſe our preſent Letters unto all and ſingle Perſons whom it may concern: Our Commonwealth being again left widowed by the unſeaſonable Death of that famous Michael late King of Poland, who having ſcarce reigned full five years, on the tenth day of November, of the year laſt paſt, at Leopolis, changed his fading Crown for one Immortal; in the ſenſe of ſo mournful a Funeral and freſh Calamity, yet with an undaumnted Courage, mindful of her ſelf in the midſt of Dangers, forbore not to ſeek Remedies, that the World may underſtand ſtand ſhe grows in the midſt of her loſſes ; it pleaſed her to begin her Counſels of preſerving her Country, and delivering it from the utmoſt chances of an Interreign, from the Divine Deity (as it were by the only motion of whoſe Finger, it is eaſie that Kingdoms be transferred from Nation to Nation, and Kings from the loweſt ſtate to Thrones ; and therfore the buſineſs was begun according to our Country-Laws, and Anceſtors Inſtitutions. After the Convocation of all the States of the Kingdom ended, in the month of February at Warſaw, by the common conſent of all thoſe States, on the day decreed for the Election the 20*th* of April : At the report of this famous Act, as though a Trumpet had been founded, and a Trophy of Vertue erected, the wiſhes and deſires of Forein Princes came forth of their own accord into the Field of the Polonian Liberty, in a famous ſtrife of Merits and good-will towards the Commonwealth, every one bringing thir Ornaments, Advantages and Gifts to the Commonwealth : but the Commonwealth becoming more diligent by the prodigal ambition uſed in the laſt Interreign and Factions, and diſagreeings of minds, nor careleſs of the future, conſidered with her ſelf whether firm or doubtful things were promiſed, and whether ſhe ſhould ſeem from the preſent ſtate to transfer both the old and new Honours of Poland into the poſſeſſion of ſtrangers, or the military Glory, and thir late unheard of Victory over the Turks, and Blood ſpilt in the war, upon the purple of ſome unwarlike Prince ; as if any one could ſo ſoon put on the love of the Country, and that Poland was not ſo much an enemy to her own Nation and Fame, as to favour ſtrangers more than her own ; and Valour being found in her, ſhould ſuffer a Gueſt of new Power to wax proud in her : therfore ſhe thenceforth turned her thoughts upon ſom one in her own Nation, and at length aboliſhed (as ſhe began in the former Election) that reproach caſt upon her, under pretence of a ſecret Maxim, That none can be elected King of Poland, but ſuch as are born out of Poland ; neither did ſhe ſeek long among her Citizens whom ſhe ſhould prefer above the reſt (for this was no uncertain or ſuſpended Election, there was no place for delay) ; for although in the equality of our Nobles many might be elected, yet the vertue of a Hero appeared above his equals : therfore the eyes and minds of all men were willingly, and by a certain divine inſtinct turned upon the High Marſhal of the Kingdom, Captain of the Army, John Sobietski. The admirable vertue of the Man, the High Power of Marſhal in the Court, with his ſupreme command in Arms, Senatorial Honour, with his civil Modeſty, the extraordinary Splendor of his Birth and Fortune, with open Courteſie, Piety towards God, Love to his Fellow-Citizens in words and deeds, Conſtancy, Faithfulneſs, and Clemency towards his very enemies, and what noble things ſoever can be ſaid of a Hero, did lay ſuch Golden Chains on the Minds and Tongues of all, that the Senate and People of Poland and of the great Dukedom of Lituania, with Suffrages and agreeing Voices named and choſe him thir KING ; not with his ſeeking or precipitate counſel, but with mature Deliberations continued and extended till the third day.

Certainly it conduced much for the honour of the moſt ſerene Elect, the Confirmation of a free Election, and the eternal praiſe of the People electing, that the great buſineſs of an Age was not tranſacted in one day, or in the ſhadow of the night, or by one caſual heat : for it was not right that a Hero of the Age ſhould in a moment of time (and as it were by the caſt of a Die) be made a King, whereas Antiquity by an antient Proverb has delivered, that Hercules was not begot in one night ; and it hath taught that Election ſhould ſhine openly under a clear Sky in the open Light.

The moſt ſerene Elect took it modeſtly th[illegible] Nomination ſhould be deferred till the third day, plainly ſhewing t[illegible] [illegible] eavour, leſt his ſudden facility of aſſent being ſuſpected, might detract from [illegible] ir Judgment, and the World might be enforced to believe by a more certain Argument, that he that was ſo choſen was elected without his own ambition, or the envy of corrupted Liberty ; or was it by the appointed Counſel of God that this debate continued three whole days, from Saturday till Munday, as if the Cotimian Victory (begun on the Saturday, and at length on the third day after accompliſhed, after the taking of the Cotimian Caſtle) had been a lucky preſage of his Royal Reward ; or, as if with an auſpicious Omen, the third day of Election had alluded to the Regal name of JOHN the Third.

The famous Glory of War paved his way to the Crown, and confirmed the favour of Suffrages to his moſt ſerene Elect. He the firſt of all the Polonians ſhewed that the Scythian ſwiftneſs (troubleſom heretofore to all the Monarchies of the World) might be repreſſed by a ſtanding Fight, and the terrible main Battalion of the Turk might be broken and routed at one ſtroke. That we may paſs by in ſilence the antient Rudiments of Warfare which he ſtoutly and gloriouſly managed under the Conduct and Authority of another, againſt the Swedes, Meſcovites, Boruſſians, Tranſylvanians, and Coſſacks: though about ſixty Cities taken by him from the Coſſacks be leſs noiſed in the mouth of Fame; yet theſe often and proſperous Battels were a Prelude to greateſt Victories in the memory of man. Miriads of Tartars had overrun within this ſix years with thir plundering Troops the Coaſt of Podolia, when a ſmall force and ſom ſhattered Legions were not ſufficient againſt the hoſtile aſſault, yet our General knowing not to yield, ſhut himſelf up (by a new ſtratagem of War) in Podhajecy, a ſtrait Caſtle, and fortified in haſte, wherby he might exclude the cruel deſtruction which was haſtening into the bowels of the Kingdom, by which means the Barbarian deluded and routed, took Conditions of Peace; as if he had made his inroad for this only purpoſe, that he might bring to the moſt ſerene Elect matter of Glory, Victory.

For theſe four laſt years the famous Victories of Sobietski have ſignalized every year of his warlike Command on the Coſſacks and Tartarians both joined together, the moſt ſtrong Province of Braclavia, as far as it lies between Hypanis and Tyral, with thir Cities and warlike people, were won from the Coſſack Enemy.

And thoſe things are beyond belief which two years ago the moſt ſerene Elect, after the taking of Camenick (being undaunted by the Siege of Laopolis) performed to a miracle by the hardneſs and fortitude of the Polonian Army, ſcarce conſiſting of three thouſand men, in the continual courſe of five days and nights, ſuſtaining life without any food, except wild herbs; ſetting upon the Tartarians, he made famous the names of Narulam, Niemicrovia, Konarnum, Kaluſſia, obſcure Towns before, by a great Overthrow of the Barbarians. He ſlew three Sultans of the Crim Tartars, deſcended of the royal Gietian Family, and ſo trampled on that great force of the Scythians, that in theſe later years they could not regain thir Courage, or recollect the Forces. But the felicity of this laſt Autumn exceeded all his Victories; whenas the Fortifications at Chocimum, famous of old, were poſſeſſed and fortified by above forty thouſand Turks, in which three and forty years ago the Polonians had ſuſtained and repreſſed the Forces of the Ottoman Family, drawn together out of Aſia, Africa, and Europe, fell to the ground within a few hours, by the only (under God) imperatorious Valour and Prudence of Sobietski; for he counted it his chief part to go about the Watches, order the Stations, and perſonally to inſpect the preparations of warlike Ordinance, to encourage the Soldiers with voice, hands, and countenance, wearied with hunger, badneſs of weather, and three days ſtanding in Arms; and he (which is moſt to be admired) on Foot at the head of the Foot-forces made through, and forced his way to the Battery, hazarding his life devoted to God and his Country; and therupon made a cruel ſlaughter within the Camp and Fortifications of the Enemy; while the deſperation of the Turks whetted thir valour, and he performed the part of a moſt provident and valiant Captain: at which time three Baſhaws were ſlain, the fourth ſcarce paſſed with difficulty the ſwift River of Tyras; eight thouſand Janizaries, twenty thouſand choſen Spahies, beſides the more common Souldiers were cut off; the whole Camp with all thir Ammunition, and great Ordnance, beſides the Aſſyrian and Phrygian Wealth of luxurious Aſia, were taken and pillaged; the famous Caſtle of Cotimia, and the Bridg over Tyras, ſtrong Fortreſſes, equal to Caſtles on each ſide the River, were additions to the Victory. Why therfore ſhould not ſuch renown'd Heroic Valour be crowned with the legal reward of a Diadem? All Chriſtendom have gon before us in example, which being arrived to the recovery of Jeruſalem under the conduct of Godfrey of Bulloin, on thir own accord gave him that Kingdom, for that he firſt ſcaled the walls of that City. Our moſt ſerene Elect is not inferior, for he firſt alſo aſcended two main Fortreſſes of the Enemy.

The moment of time adorns this Victory unheard of in many ages, the moſt ſerene King Michael dying the day before, as it were ſignifying therby that he gave way to ſo great Valour, as if it were by his command and favour, that this Conqueror might ſo much the more gloriouſly ſucceed from the Helmet to the Crown, from the Commander's Staff to the Scepter, from his lying in the Field to the Regal Throne.

The Commonwealth recalled the grateful and never to be forgotten memory of his renowned Father, the moſt Illuſtrious and excellent James Sobietski, Caſtellan of Cracovia, a Man to be written of with ſedulous care, who by his Golden Eloquence in the publick Councels, and by his hand in the Scene of War, had ſo often amplified the State of the Commonwealth, and defended it with the Arms of his Family. Neither can we believe it happened without Divine Providence, that in the ſame place wherin forty years ago his renowned Father, Embaſſador of the Polonian Commonwealth, had made Peace and Covnants with Cimanus the Turkiſh General, his great Son ſhould revenge with his Sword the Peace broke (Heaven it ſelf upbraiding the perfidious Enemy). The reſt of his Grandſires and Great-Grandſires, and innumerable Names of famous Senators and great Officers have as it were brought forth light to the ſerene Elect by the emulous Greatneſs and Glory of his Mother's deſcent, eſpecially Staniſlaus Zelkievius, High Chancellor of the Kingdom, and General of the Army, at whoſe Grave in the Neighbouring fields, in which by the Turkiſh rage in the year 1620 he died, his victorious Nephew took full revenge by ſo remarkable an overthrow of the Enemy: The immortal valour and fatal fall of his moſt noble Uncle Staniſlaus Danilovitius in the year 1635, Palatin of Ruſſia, doubled the Glory of his Anceſtors; whom deſirous of Honour, and not induring that ſluggiſh Peace wherin Poland then ſlept ſecure, Valour and youthful Heat accited at his own expence and private forces into the Tauric fields; that by his footing, and the antient warlike Polonian Diſciplin, he might lead and point the way to theſe merits of Sobietski, and being ſlain by Cantimiz the Tartarian Cham, in revenge of his Son by him ſlain, he might by his Noble Blood give luſtre to this Regal Purple. Neither hath the people of Poland forgot the moſt illuſtrious Marcus Sobietski elder Brother of our moſt ſerene Elect, who when the Polonian Army at Batto was routed by the Barbarians, although occaſion was offer'd him of eſcape, yet choſe rather to die in the overthrow of ſuch valiant men, a Sacrifice for his Country, then to buy his life with a diſhonourable retreat; perhaps the divine Judgment ſo diſpoſing, whoſe order is, that perſons paſs away and fail, and cauſes and events happen again the ſame; that by the repeated fate of the Huniades, the elder Brother of great hopes removed by a lamented ſlaughter, might leave to his younger Brother ſurviving the readier paſſage to the Throne. That therfore which we pray may be happy, auſpicious, and fortunate to our Orthodox Commonwealth, and to all Chriſtendom, with free and unanimous Votes, none oppoſing, all conſenting and applauding, by the right of our free Election, notwithſtanding the abſence of thoſe which have been called and not appeared; We being led by no private reſpect, but having only before our eyes the Glory of God, the increaſe of the antient Catholick Church, the ſafety of the Commonwealth, and the dignity of the Poliſh Nation and Name, have thought fit to elect, create, and name, JOHN in Zolkiew and Zloczew Sobietski, Supreme Marſhal General of the Kingdom, General of the Armies, Governour of Neva, Bara, Strya, Loporovient, and Kaluſſien, moſt eminently adorned with ſo high endowments, merits and ſplendor, to be KING of Poland, Grand-Duke of Lituania, Ruſſia, Pruſſia, Mazovia, Samogitia, Kyovia, Volhinnia, Padlachia, Podolia, Livonia, Smolensko, Severia, and Czerniechovia, as we have elected, created, declared, and named him: I the aforeſaid Biſhop of Cracovia (the Archiepiſcopal See being vacant) exerciſing the Office and Authority of Primat, and by conſent of all the States thrice demanded, oppoſed by none, by all and every one approved, conclude the Election; promiſing faithfully that we will always perform to the ſame moſt ſerene and potent Elect Prince, Lord John the third, our King, the ſame Faith, Subjection, Obedience, and Loyalty, according to our Rights and Liberties, as we have performed to his bleſſed Anceſtor, as alſo that we will crown the ſame moſt ſerene Elect in the next Aſſembly at Cracovia, to that end ordained, as our true King and Lord, with the Regal Diadem, with which the Kings of Poland were wont to be crown'd, and after the manner which the Roman Catholic Church before-time hath obſerved in anointing and inaugurating Kings, We will anoint and inaugurate him: Yet ſo as he ſhall hold faſt and obſerve firſt of all the Rights, Immunities both Eccleſiaſtical and Secular, granted and given to us by his Anceſtor of bleſſed memory; as alſo theſe Laws which we our ſelves in the time of this preſent and former Inter-reign, according to the Right of our Liberty, and better preſervation of the Commonwealth, have eſtabliſhed. And if moreover the moſt Serene Elect will bind himſelf by an Oath to perform the conditions concluded with thoſe perſons ſent by his Majeſty before the exhibition of this preſent Decree of Election, and will provide in beſt manner for the performance of them by his authentick Letters; which Decree of Election we by Divine aid deſirous to put in execution, do ſend by common conſent, to deliver it into the hands of the moſt Serene Elect, the moſt illuſtrious and reverend Lord Biſhop of Cracovia, together with ſome Senators and chief Officers, and the illuſtrious and magnificent Benedictus Sapieha, Treaſurer of the Court of the Great Dukedom of Lituania, Marſhal of the Equeſtrian Order; committing to them the ſame Decree of intimating an Oath, upon the aforeſaid premiſes, and receiving his Subſcription; and at length to give and deliver the ſame Decree into the hands of the ſaid Elect, and to act and perform all other things which this Affair requires. In aſſurance wherof the Seals of the Lords Senators, and thoſe of the Equeſtrian Order deputed to ſign, are here affixed.

Given by the hands of the moſt illuſtrious and reverend Father in Chriſt, the Lord Andrew Olſzonski, Biſhop of Culma and Pomiſania, High Chancellor of the Kingdom, in the general ordinary Aſſembly of the Kingdom, and great Dukedom of Lituania, for the Election of the new King. Warſaw the 22*d* day of May, in the year of our Lord 1674.

In the preſence of Franciſcus Praſzmouski, Provoſt of Gueſna, Abbot of Sieciethovia, chief Secretary of the Kingdom; Joannes Malachowski, Abbot of Mogila, Referendary of the Kingdom, &c. with other great Officers of the Kingdom and Clergy, to the number of fourſcore and two. And the reſt very many great Officers, Captains, Secretaries, Courtiers, and Inhabitants of the Kingdom, and Great Dukedom of Lituania, gathered together at Warſaw to the preſent Aſſembly of the Election of the Kingdom and great Dukedom of Lituania.

Aſſiſtants at the ſolemn Oath taken of his ſacred Majeſty on the 5*th* day of the Month of June, in the Palace at Warſaw, after the Letters Patents delivered upon the Covenants, and Agreements, or Capitulations, the moſt Reverend and Excellent Lord Franciſco Bonviſi, Archbiſhop of Theſſalonica, Apoſtolick Nuntio; Count Chriſtopherus a Scaffgotſch, Cæcareus Tuſſanus de Forbin, de Jaſon, Biſhop of Marſeilles in France, Joannes free-barron Hoverbec, from the Marqueſs of Brandenburg, Embaſſadors, and other Envoys and Miniſters of State.

To Maſter Samuel Hartlib.

SIR,

I Am long ſince perſwaded, that to ſay or do ought worth memory and imitation, no purpoſe or reſpect ſhould ſooner move us then ſimply the love of God, and of mankind. Neverthe leſs to write now the reforming of Education, though it be one of the greateſt and nobleſt deſigns that can be thought on, and for the want wherof this Nation periſhes, I had not yet at this time been induc't, but by your earneſt entreaties, and ſerious conjurements; as having my mind for the preſent half diverted in the purſuance of ſome other aſſertions, the knowledg and the uſe of which cannot but be a great furtherance both to the enlargement of truth, and honeſt living with much more peace. Nor ſhould the laws of any private friendſhip have prevail'd with me to divide thus, or tranſpoſe my former thoughts, but that I ſee thoſe aims, thoſe actions which have won you with me the eſteem of a Perſon ſent hither by ſome good providence from a far Country to be the occaſion and the incitement of great good to this Iland. And, as I hear, you have obtain'd the ſame repute with men of moſt approved wiſdom, and ſome of higheſt autority among us. Not to mention the learned correſpondence which you hold in forein parts, and the extraordinary pains and diligence which you have us'd in this matter both here and beyond the Seas; either by the definite will of God ſo ruling, or the peculiar ſway of nature, which alſo is God's working. Neither can I think that ſo reputed, and ſo valu'd as you are, you would to the forfeit of your own diſcerning ability, impoſe upon me an unfit and over-ponderous argument, but that the ſatisfaction which you profeſs to have receiv'd from thoſe incidental Diſcourſes which we have wander'd into, hath preſt and almoſt conſtrain'd you into a perſwaſion, that what you require from me in this point, I neither ought, nor can in conſcience defer beyond this time both of ſo much need at once, and ſo much opportunity to try what God hath determin'd. I will not reſiſt therfore whatever it is, either of divine or human obligement, that you lay upon me; but will forthwith ſet down in writing, as you requeſt me, that voluntary Idea, which hath long in ſilence preſented it ſelf to me, of a better Education, in extent and comprehenſion far more large, and yet of time far ſhorter, and of attainment far more certain, then hath been yet in practice. Brief I ſhall endeavour to be; for that which I have to ſay, aſſuredly this Nation hath extream need ſhould be done ſooner then ſpoken. To tell you therfore what I have benefited herein among old renowned Authors, I ſhall ſpare; and to ſearch what many modern Janua's and Didactics more then ever I ſhall read, have projected, my inclination leads me not. But if you can accept of theſe few Obſervations which have flowr'd off, and are as it were the burniſhing of many ſtudious and contemplative years altogether ſpent in the ſearch of religious and civil knowledg, and ſuch as pleas'd you ſo well in the relating, I here give you them to diſpoſe of.
